PREFACE.

THE first question that naturally comes into one's mind when a place is mentioned is: 'Where is it?' 'What is to be known about it?' is as naturally the second. One cannot open a newspaper without lighting on some reference to the trade of Kiachta, excavations at Bogaz-Keui, atrocities on the Putumayo, the Norddeich time-signals, the growth of Calgary and Medicine Hat, the naval base at Rosyth, or, it may be, to Prince Rupert, Ifni, Blacksod Bay, Lule Burgas, Upavon, Kuala Lumpur; or there will be an allusion to the 'prisoner of Chillon,' the 'rector of Lutterworth,' the 'martyr of Erromango,' the 'sage of Chelsea,' the 'Mantuan,' the 'Corsican,' the 'curé of Meudon,' the 'victor of Barossa,' the 'hero of Khartoum,' the 'Chiltern Hundreds,' the 'monks of Medmenham,' or the 'Little Gidding community.'

Not even Macaulay's schoolboy could carry the whereabouts of all these places in his head, or could explain every one of the allusions. The present work aims to supply the want indicated. It is largely based on the geographical matter of Chambers's Encyclopædia, but many of the articles are new, and there are numerous additions to the list. It is a Gazetteer of the World, comprehensive yet handy, containing the latest and most reliable information about nameworthy places at home and abroad: the last census of civilised countries, and the most authentic official figures, have, it need hardly be said, been taken advantage of in every available case. The etymology of the names, where it is significant and interesting, has not been neglected, and an attempt has been made to do justice, however briefly, to history and literary associations. This is probably the only Gazetteer of the World that explains the interest of Craigenputtock and Somersby, Morwenstow and Chalfont St Giles, Ramsbottom, Wem, and Tong. Yet, full though it is, it does not profess to be exhaustive; to give, for instance, every one of (at least) 275 cities, counties, towns, townships, villages, hamlets, and post-offices of the name of Washington in the United States, or every one of the 234 Newtons and Newtowns in England. To have attempted this would, by the curtailment of the longer articles, have involved the sacrifice of much space now put to a better use. Instead, the aim of the work has been to tell everything that may be reasonably wanted about every place likely to be looked for, and to tell it with the utmost conciseness consistent with clearness and readableness. References to standard books have been added to the articles on the more important and interesting countries, towns, and even villages.

The pronunciation has been indicated in all cases where it seemed desirable —by accent when this suffices, or by re-spelling in full, in the way most likely to be intelligible to the average reader; although it must be remembered that in many cases the pronunciation can only be approximately suggested in English spelling. The g in the re-spellings is always hard, as in get; ay or ā is the English a in fate; ī is the sound in mine; ow is always the sound in how, now; uh is the obscure sound between eh and ah; hh here represents the guttural ch of German and Scotch words; and recourse had sometimes to be had to ö to represent the German ö and the French oeu, and to ü to indicate the German ü and the ordinary French u. Many readers will be glad to know that the instinctive English way of accenting Altona, Potomac, Potosi, and Cordilleras is not that customary in those parts; that English people do not pronounce Godmanchester, Belvoir, or Hughenden as the spelling suggests; that Scotsmen do not defer to Southron expectations in such names as Culloden and Oban, Kirkcudbright and Milngavie; that the Welsh do not say Mer′ioneth, and that Amlwch is easier to utter than it looks at first sight; that British sailors who have been on the spot are not safe guides for the true pronunciation of names like Callao and Iquique, Monte Video and Buenos Aires, Setubal and Santander.

For this re-issue a great part of the revision has been done by Mr C. O. Ovington, B.A., already long pre-eminent among the many users of the Gazetteer whose scrutiny has enabled them to place useful facts and suggestions before the editor. Many articles have been entirely rewritten, many inserted for the first time. Since the last issue South Africa has been united, Morocco dismembered; wide territories in Africa have been acquired by Italy, France, and Spain, Germany and Belgium, and in Europe by Austria-Hungary, Roumania and Bulgaria, Greece, Servia, and Montenegro, while Turkey has almost disappeared from both, China and Portugal have become republics, Delhi and Canberra capitals, Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona states, and Albania a nation; Nicholas II. Land in the north and Luitpold Land in the south have been found; both poles have been reached, New Guinea explored, the Brahmaputra tracked, Mount M'Kinley scaled; in Canada new cities have sprung up, and old have been uncovered in Turkestan; the Loetschberg tunnel, the Burrinjuck dam, and the Panamá Canal have been constructed; Sakurashima has been in disastrous eruption; Messina has been destroyed, and San Francisco rebuilt. These are but instances of thousands of new landmarks of the world's progress and of the changes time brings with it. In the revision of this work a strenuous effort has been made to take account of all new developments and to make the Gazetteer a still more valuable companion to the general reader.

CHAMBERS'S CONCISE GAZETTEER OF THE WORLD

AA (pron. Ah), the name of several European rivers—in Westphalia, Switzerland, and North France—all small.

Aachen (Ah'hen), the German name of Aix-la-Chapelle.

Aalborg (Awl-borg; 'Eel-town'), a seaport of Jutland and seat of a bishopric, on the Limfiord; pop. (1890) 19,503; (1911) 33,449.

Aalen (Ah'len), a town of Würtemberg, on the Kocher, 46 miles E. of Stuttgart; pop. 11,400.

Aalesund (Awl-e-soond), a Norwegian town, with an excellent harbour, built on three small islands of the province of Romsdal; pop. 14,000.

Aalst. See Alost.

Aalten, a Netherlands town, on the Aa, 30 miles E. of Arnhem; pop. 8000.

A'an, or Avon, a small Banffshire lake, lying 2250 feet above sea-level among the Cairngorms, which sends off the Avon, 29 miles, to the Spey.

Aar (Ahr), next to the Rhine and Rhone the largest river in Switzerland, rises in the Bernese Oberland, flows through Lakes Brienz and Thun, and passing Interlaken, Thun, Berne, Soleure, and Aarau, joins the Rhine above Waldshut after a course of nearly 200 miles.

Aarau (Ahr'ow). See Aargau.

Aargau (Ahr'gow; Fr. Argovie), the least mountainous canton of Switzerland, on the lower course of the Aar, with the Rhine for its north boundary; area, 548 sq. m.; pop. (1910) 229,850, mainly Protestant and German-speaking. The chief town is Aarau, on the Aar; pop. 8000.

Aarhuus (Awr-hoos), a seaport on the east coast of Jutland, the second of Danish cities, with a fine Gothic cathedral of the 13th century; pop. (1870) 15,025; (1911) 61,755.

Ab'aco. See Bahamas.

Abakansk, a fortified Siberian town, near the Abakan's junction with the Yenisei; pop. 2000.

Ab'ana and Pharpar are identified generally, the former with the Barada, flowing through Damascus; the latter with the Awaj, which rises on the SE. slopes of Hermon, passes 8 miles from Damascus, and falls into a lake to the south.

Abancay (Aban'kī), chief town of the Peruvian province of Apurimac, 65 miles WSW. of Cuzco. Pop. 5000.

Abbazia (Abbatzee'a), a health-resort on the bay of Fiume, at the head of the Quarnero gulf of the Adriatic, 5 miles NW. of Fiume by rail. The 'Nice of the Adriatic' has since about 1880 become famous for its fine climate, beautiful situation, and luxuriant vegetation. Pop. 3000.

Abbeoku'ta, an African city, or rather collection of small towns or villages, capital of the territory of Egba, in the Yoruba country, 80 miles N. of Lagos. Pop. 50,000.

Abbeville (Abb-veel'), a prosperous manufacturing town in the French dep. of Somme, on the river Somme, 12 miles from its mouth, and 49 miles S. of Boulogne. The west front of the church of St Wolfram, commenced in the reign of Louis XII., is a splendid example of Flamboyant, with noble portals and rich tracery. The chief manufactures are woollen cloths, carpets, linens, sacking, and sugar. Near Abbeville were found, in 1841, many prehistoric flint implements. Pop. 20,000.

Abbey Craig, an abrupt eminence (362 feet), 1½ mile ENE. of Stirling. It is crowned by the Wallace monument (1869), a baronial tower 220 feet high.

Abbeydorney, a Kerry village, 5½ miles N. of Tralee, with a ruined abbey (1154).

Abbeyfeale, a market-town, 37 miles SW. of Limerick; pop. 1000.

Abbeyleix (Abbey-leece'), a town of Queen's County, 61 miles SW. of Dublin; pop. 800.

Abbiate-Grasso (Abbiah'tay), a town of Italy, 14 miles WSW. of Milan; pop. 10,000.

Abbotsbury, a Dorset village, at the head of the Fleet tidal inlet, 8 miles NW. of Weymouth.

Abbotsford, built in 1811-24 by Sir Walter Scott, on the Tweed's south bank, 2 miles W. of Melrose.

Abbottabad, in the NW. Frontier Province of India, 180 miles NNW. of Lahore; pop. 10,000.

Aber, a Carnarvonshire coast-village, at the mouth of a lovely little glen, 4½ miles E. of Bangor.

Aberavon, or PORT TALBOT, a seaport of Glamorganshire, on the Avon, near its mouth in Swansea Bay, 32 miles W. of Cardiff. The valley of the Avon is shut in by lofty hills, while every available space is occupied by tinplate, copper, and iron works. It is one of the 'Swansea boroughs.' Pop. (1861) 2916; (1911) 10,500.

Aberayron, a Cardiganshire watering-place, 14 miles SSW. of Aberystwith. Pop. 1340.

Aberbrothock. See ARBROATH.

Abercarn, a coal-mining municipality, prosperous and progressive, of Monmouthshire, 8 miles NW. of Newport. Pop. 16,500.

Abercorn, a Linlithgowshire hamlet, near the Firth of Forth, 3¾ miles W. of South Queensferry. From 681 to 685 it was the seat of a bishopric.

Aberdare, a town of Glamorganshire, 4 miles SW. of Merthyr-Tydvil, and within its parliamentary boundary. Coal and iron are found in abundance in the vicinity, and Aberdare is a flourishing centre of iron and tin works. Pop. (1841) 6471; (1861) 32,299; (1911) 50,800.

Aberdeen, the chief city and seaport in the north of Scotland, lies in the SE. angle of Aberdeenshire, at the mouth and on the north side of the Dee, 111 miles N. of Edinburgh. William the Lion confirmed its privileges in 1179; the English burned it in 1336, but it was soon rebuilt, and called New Aberdeen. Old Aberdeen, within the same parliamentary boundary, is a small town a mile to the N., near the mouth of the Don, and is the seat of St Machar's Cathedral (1357–1527), now represented by the granite nave. King's College and University, founded by Bishop Elphinstone in Old Aberdeen in 1494, and Marischal College and University, founded by the Earl Marischal in New Aberdeen in 1593, were in 1860 united into one institution, the University of Aberdeen. It has 25 professors and about 1000 students in its faculties of arts, science, divinity, law, and medicine; with Glasgow University it sends one member to parliament. Marischal College was rebuilt in 1841, and greatly enlarged in 1892–95; whilst King's College is a stately fabric, dating from 1500, its chapel adorned with exquisite wood carvings. Aberdeen has a flourishing trade and thriving manufactures; and having been largely rebuilt and extended since the formation of Union Street in 1800, the 'Granite City' now offers a handsome and regular aspect. Among the chief public edifices are the County Buildings (1867–73), the Post-office (1876), the Market-hall (1842; rebuilt after the fire of 1882), the Trades-hall (1847), the Royal Infirmary (1740; rebuilt 1840), the Lunatic Asylum (1819), the Grammar-school (1863), the Art Gallery and Art School (1882–83), and Gordon's College (1739–1834). The last has been much extended as a technical school, the foundationers being no longer resident; whilst the Infirmary was reconstructed and modernised to celebrate Queen Victoria's Jubilee (1887). St Nicholas, now divided into the East and West Churches, has a spire (1880) 190 feet high. A carillon of 37 bells was placed here in 1887. One may also notice the market-cross (1686); the Wallace, Gordon Pasha, and three other statues; and the Duthie Public Park of 47 acres (1883). Since 1810, when the debt upon the harbour was £29,614, the expenditure on harbour improvements has exceeded £1,000,000, the works having included the formation of the Victoria Dock (1848), a breakwater, the southward diversion of the Dee (1872), and a graving-dock (1886). The trade of the port has largely increased since 1850; and the aggregate tonnage of vessels entering in good years exceeds 600,000 tons. Railway communication has also been fully established since 1848–54. The chief exports are woollens, linens, cotton-yarns, paper, combs, granite (hewn and polished), cattle, grain, preserved provisions, and fish. Aberdeen has the largest comb and granite-polishing works in the kingdom. There are several large paper-works within a short distance of the town; and soap, chemicals, whisky, and agricultural implements are amongst the manufactures. Wooden shipbuilding was formerly a prosperous industry, the Aberdeen clippers being celebrated as fast sailers. Connected with Aberdeen, which has always been a celebrated seat of learning, have been the names of Barbour, Boece, Jameson, Gregory, Reid, Beattie, Campbell, Byron, Skinner, Hill Burton, W. Dyce, J. Phillip, and Sir A. Anderson, to whose provostship (1859–66) belong the introduction of a fine water-supply, and many other improvements. Pop. of the burgh, which since 1885 has returned two members, (1801) 26,992; (1841) 63,288; (1881) 105,003; (1891) 121,623; (1901) 153,500; (1911) 163,891.

Aberdeenshire, a large maritime county in the extreme NE. of Scotland. The fifth in size of the Scottish counties, it has a maximum length of 85 and breadth of 47 miles, with 62 miles of sea-coast, and an area of 1971 sq. m. It has long been popularly divided into five districts (proceeding from south-west to north-east)—Mar, Strathbogie, Garioch, Formartine, and Buchan. Aberdeenshire is generally hilly, and in the south-west (Braemar) entirely mountainous, the loftiest summits here being Ben Muich-Dhui (second only to Ben Nevis), 4296 feet; Cairntoul, 4241; Cairngorm, 4084; Benabourd, 3924; Lochnagar, 3786: whilst northward rise Bennachie, 1698; the Buck of Cabrach, 2368; and Mormond Hill, 769. The predominant rocks are granite and gneiss. The granite is very durable, and is much used for building and polishing. The chief rivers are the Dee (87 miles long), Don (82), and Ythan (35), which run eastward into the North Sea; and the Deveron (61 miles), which runs north-east into the North Sea. The Ythan yields the pearl-mussel, but rarely pearls of any value. The most fertile parts lie between the Don and Ythan, and in the north-east angle of the county. About 37 per cent. of the area of the county is cultivated, the chief crops being oats, barley, and turnips; whilst nearly 8 per cent. is under wood. Aberdeenshire is unsurpassed in breeding and feeding stock. Its principal breed is the Polled Angus. The fisheries on the coast are very productive, and Peterhead is the East Coast centre of this industry. Balmoral (q.v.) is the principal mansion; and amongst the antiquities are the ruins of Kildrummie Castle and the Abbey of Deer. The chief towns and villages are Aberdeen, Peterhead, Fraserburgh, Huntly, Kintore, Inverurie, Turriff, Ballater, and Castleton. The county returns two members to parliament; the city of Aberdeen, two; and the burghs of Peterhead, Kintore, and Inverurie, with Elgin, Cullen, and Banff, one. Pop. (1801) 121,065; (1841) 192,387; (1891) 284,036; (1901) 304,440; (1911) 312,177. See the history by A. Smith (1875), the Spalding Club publications, and Watt's Aberdeen and Banff (1900).

Aberdour, (1) a Fife village, on the Firth of Forth, 3 miles W. of Burntisland, with a ruined castle of the Earls of Morton. Pop. 900. (2) An Aberdeenshire village, 8 miles W. by S. of Fraserburgh. Richard Chancellor was lost in Aberdour Bay (1556).

Aberdovey, a watering-place of Merionethshire, on the Dovey estuary, 10 miles N of Aberystwith.

Aberfeldy, a pleasant Perthshire village, near the Tay's south bank, 32½ miles NW. of Perth by rail. The neighbouring Falls of Moness are celebrated in Burns's Birks of Aberfeldy. A monument (1887) commemorates the embodiment of the Black Watch here in 1740. Pop. 1600.

Aberffraw, a seaport of Anglesey, 12 miles SE. of Holyhead. Pop. 1000.

Aberfoyle, a Perthshire hamlet, immortalised through Scott's Rob Roy, 23 miles W. of Stirling by rail.

Abergavenny (Abergen'ny; Rom. Gobannium), a market-town of Monmouthshire, at the Gavenny's influx to the Usk, 13 miles W. of Monmouth. It has remains of an old castle and of a priory, with collieries and ironworks near. Pop. of municipal borough, 8500.

Abergeldie Castle, the Aberdeenshire seat of the Prince of Wales, on the Dee's right bank, 6 miles W. of Ballater, and 2 ENE. of Balmoral.

Abergele, a Denbighshire market-town, 34 miles W. of Chester; pop. 2000.

Aberlady, a Haddingtonshire coast-village, 3 miles NE. of Longniddry; pop. 400.

Abernethy, (1) a police-burgh of Perthshire, near the Earn's influx to the Tay, 8½ miles SE. of Perth. The ancient capital of the Picts, and from 865 till 908 the seat of the sole Scottish bishopric, it has a Round Tower 73 feet high. Pop. 600.—(2) A Speyside parish of NE. Inverness-shire, with a forest.

Abersychan, an iron and coal mining town of Monmouthshire, 11 miles N. of Newport; pop. 25,000.

Abertillery, a town of Monmouthshire, 16 miles NNW. of Newport; pop. 35,400.

Aberystwyth, a watering-place and municipal borough of Cardiganshire, on the Ystwyth, at its mouth in Cardigan Bay, 242 miles NW. of London by rail. It is the seat of the University College of Wales (1872) and the National Library of Wales. There are remains of a castle (1109). Till 1885 it was one of the Cardigan parliamentary boroughs. Pop. (1911) 8400.

Abingdon, a municipal borough of Berkshire, situated at the junction of the Ock and the Thames, 6 miles S. of Oxford, and 60 WNW. of London. 'Abbaddun' (Abbot's town) was an important place in the 8th century, and its Benedictine abbey, rebuilt in 955, was very rich. Its school, founded in 1563, was rebuilt in 1870. A large clothing manufactory employs many hands. Till 1885 Abingdon returned a member to parliament. Pop. 6800.

Abington, a Lanarkshire village, on the Clyde, 14 miles SSE. of Lanark.

Abkhasia, or Abasia, a district of Asiatic Russia, between the Caucasus and the Black Sea. The inhabitants, who numbered at the outbreak of the Turkish war of 1878 about 30,000, are now, by emigration, less than half as numerous. Russia gained possession of the fortresses of Abkhasia in 1824, but finally subdued the people only in 1864. See Caucasus.

Abo (pronounced Obo), the chief town of a government in Finland, on the river Aurajoki, near its embouchure in the Gulf of Bothnia, 170 miles WNW. of Helsingfors by rail. It has an active trade, and exports timber, and bar and cast iron. Its university was transferred to Helsingfors after the great fire of 1827. A peace between Sweden and Russia was signed here in 1743. Pop. 60,000.

Abomey. See Dahomey.

Abor Hills. See Assam.

Aboukir', a coast-village of Egypt, 13 miles NE. of Alexandria. In Aboukir Bay Nelson won the great 'Battle of the Nile' over the French fleet, August 1, 1798; and here Sir Ralph Abercromby's expedition landed in 1801.

Abousambul. See Abu-Simbel.

Aboyne', a Deeside village, 32½ miles W. by S. of Aberdeen. Aboyne Castle is the seat of the Marquis of Huntly. See his Records of Aboyne (1894).

Abraham, Plains or Heights of, close to the city of Quebec, the scene of Wolfe's victory, 13th September 1759. They were so called from a pilot, Abraham Martin.

Abrantes (A-bran'tes), a town of Portugal, on the Tagus, 84 miles NE. of Lisbon. Pop. 8000.

Abruzzo (Abroot'so), or Abruzzi, a district of Central Italy, was formerly the north-east corner of the Kingdom of Naples, in the loftiest portion of the Apennines. The jagged mountain groups reach in the Gran Sasso d'Italia 9600 feet.

Abu, a mountain (5650 feet) of India, in the territory of Serohee, Rajputana, a detached granite mass rising like an island from the plain of Marwar, near the Aravalli ridge. It is a celebrated place of pilgrimage, especially for the Jains, who have five temples at Delwara, about the middle of the mountain, two of which are the most superb of all Jain temples. Both are built of white marble, finely carved, and date from 1031 and 1197 A.D. The mountain contains a beautiful lake 4000 feet above the sea; and the region is a summer-resort for Europeans.

Abu Klea, on the route across country between Korti and Metammeh, both on the great bend of the Nile below Khartoum. Here, on 17th January 1885, Sir Herbert Stewart defeated the Mahdi.

Abushehr. See Bushire.

Abu-Simbel (also Abousambul or Ipsambul), a place on the left bank of the Nile, in Lower Nubia, the site of two very remarkable rock-cut temples, amongst the most perfect and noble specimens of Egyptian architecture.

Aby'dos, (1) a town in Asia Minor, situated at the narrowest part of the Hellespont, opposite Sestos, was the place whence Xerxes and his vast army passed into Europe in 480 B.C.; and in poetry is famous for the loves of Hero and Leander.—(2) A city of Upper Egypt, on the left bank of the Nile, once second only to Thebes, but even in Strabo's time a mere ruin. Here the remains of the Memnonium, of a temple and tomb of Osiris, and of a reservoir are remarkable.

Ab'yla. See Ceuta.

Abyssinia (from the Arabic name Habesh, 'mixture,' given on account of the mixed population), is a highland state of Eastern Africa, jealous in defence of its independence, and lies between the flats at the south end of the Red Sea and the Blue Nile on the west, and extends from Nubia southward to the Galla country.

Divisions are Tigré in the north, Amhara in the centre, and Shoa in the south, besides outlying territories in the S. and SE. (Harar, q.v.). Abyssinia, with an area of 400,000 sq. m., mainly consists of a huge tableland with a mean elevation of 7000 feet. The declivity to the bordering tract on the Red Sea is abrupt; towards the Nile basin it is more gradual. The main mass has been cut into a number of island-like sections by the streams, which have worn their channels into ravines of vast depth—as much sometimes as 4000 feet. The principal are the head-streams of the Blue Nile, issuing from the great Lake Tzana, Tana, or Dembea, and the Atbara, also a tributary of the Nile; less important are the Mareb and the Hawash. The Samen Mountains have summits rising to the height of 15,000 feet. The climate, notwithstanding its tropical position, is on the whole moderate and pleasant owing to its elevation, though in the river valleys and swamps the heat and moisture are suffocating and pestilential. As a whole, the country is exceedingly fruitful; and its productions are of the most varied nature, from the pines, heaths, and lichens of north Europe to the choicest tropical plants. But the leading industry is pastoral, chiefly cattle-breeding. Among minerals, gold and iron are obtained.

The population, estimated at eight millions, consists of various elements, the chief being the Abyssinians proper—a brown, well-formed people, belonging to the Semitic stock. The basis of the language is the ancient Ethiopic (see ETHIOPIA) or Ge'ez, a Semitic tongue which is now the sacred language. The modern dialect of Amhara is the prevalent language of the country. There are Gallas and Somalis in the south and south-east. The Falashas are of Jewish origin. The towns are small—Adis Ababa, or Addis Abeba (q.v.), capital of Shoa and of Abyssinia; Gondar, in Amhara; Adowa (q.v.), or Adua, in Tigré; Axum (q.v.), the old capital; and Harar (q.v.). The foreign trade passes mainly through Massowah and Jiboutil, but partly through Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, by Gambela; the chief exports being coffee, hides, wax, ivory, and rubber. The religion of the Abyssinians proper is a debased Christianity; but the Gallas and other alien tribes are mostly Mohammedan. Abyssinia is a part of what was anciently called Ethiopia; Ityopya is still the Abyssinian name of the country. The first king, according to the native tradition, was Menilehek or Menelek, the son of Solomon and the Queen of Sheba. Christianity was introduced in the 4th century by Frumentius; the kingdom of Axum, named from the capital, was the nucleus of the state, and attained its greatest extent in the 6th century. From the commencement the church of Abyssinia has adhered to the mother-church of Egypt, and with her adopted the Monophysite doctrine; and the metropolitan bishop or abuna continues to be nominated by the Coptic Patriarch. The modern history of Abyssinia has been mainly struggles between the princes of various districts for supreme power. About 1850 an Amharic adventurer obtained dominion over successive provinces, and in 1855 had himself crowned, under the name of Theodore, as Negus of Abyssinia. His maltreatment of European political agents and missionaries led to the British expedition under Lord Napier, which stormed Magdala, Theodore's royal fortress, whereupon Theodore died by his own hand. Johannes, king of Tigré, was the next Negus, and on his death in 1889, Menelek of Shoa succeeded to the 'empire.' Meanwhile Italy had occupied the flats on the coast, now the Italian dependency of Eritrea (with Massowah as headquarters). By a convention of 1889 Abyssinia became almost an Italian protectorate. In 1906 an agreement was signed by Great Britain, France, and Italy to preserve the integrity of Abyssinia. There is a French railway from Jiboutil to Dire Dawa, which is being extended to the capital; and others may be constructed by Great Britain and Italy. See works by Wylde (1900), Vivian (1901), and Skinner (1906).

Acadia (Acadie). See NOVA SCOTIA.

Acajutla (Acahoot-la), a small seaport on the W. coast of San Salvador, with considerable trade.

Acapulco (Acapool'co), the best Mexican harbour on the Pacific, 180 m. SW. of the capital, was visited by an earthquake in 1909; pop. 5000.

Acarnania, with Ætolia, a western province of Greece (q.v.).

Accra, since 1875 capital of the (British) Gold Coast Colony, and, after Cape Coast Castle, the most important town on the coast, lies slightly to the W. of the long. of Greenwich. It is a healthy place, and has considerable export trade in palm-oil, ivory, gold-dust, india-rubber, monkey-skins, and gum-copal. Pop. 20,000.

Accrington, a manufacturing town of Lancashire, incorporated as a municipal borough in 1878. It lies in a deep valley, 22 miles N. of Manchester, and 5½ miles E. of Blackburn. The town-hall (1857) is a handsome building. The industries are mainly calico-printing, Turkey-red dyeing, iron-founding, with coal-mining in the neighbourhood. Pop. 45,000.

Acerra a city of southern Italy, 9 miles NE. of Naples by rail; pop. 15,000.

Achaia, a small Greek district lying along the north coast of the Peloponnesus.

Achalganj, a town of India, in the south part of Oude, near the Ganges.

Acheen. See ATCHEEN.

Achelo'us, now called Aspropot'amo, a river in western Greece, rises in Mount Pindus, flows south and south-west, and falls into the Ionian Sea opposite Cephalonia.

Achill (Ahh'ill), 'Eagle' Isle, off the west coast of Ireland, belonging to County Mayo, is 15 miles long by 12 miles broad, and has a very irregular coast-line. It is wild and boggy, not 500 of its 51,521 acres being cultivated. There are three villages, and a number of hovels scattered over its barren moors, sometimes in small clusters, forming hamlets, but so wretched as hardly to be fit for beasts. Achill rises towards the north and west coast, where one of the mountains, Achill Head, composed, like the rest of the island, wholly of mica-slate, presents towards the sea a sheer precipice, 2192 feet high. Pop. 5300.

Aci Reale (A-see Re-â'le), a town of Sicily, 50 miles SW. of Messina by rail. Lying at the foot of Mount Etna, where the small river Aci enters the sea, it is famed for its mineral waters, and for the cave of Polyphemus and the grotto of Galatea in its vicinity. Pop. 36,000.

Aconcagua, the highest peak of the Andes (q.v.), rising to a height of 22,867 feet, according to Gussfeldt's measurements in 1883. The mountain, which is an extinct volcano (though this has been disputed), is 100 miles ENE. of Valparaiso, on the frontier of Chili and the Argentine Republic.

Acquaviva, a town of South Italy, at the foot of the Apennines, 28 miles SSE. of Bari by rail. Pop. 11,000.

Acqui (Lat. Aquæ Statiellæ), a town of Northern Italy, 21 miles SSW. of Alessandria by rail. It derives its name from its hot sulphur springs, and contains an old castle, a Gothic cathedral (12th century), and remains of a Roman aqueduct. Pop. 10,000.

Acre, St Jean d'Acre, or Acca, the Biblical Accho, is a seaport on the coast of Syria, not far from the base of Mount Carmel, and contains about 10,000 inhabitants. It is 80 miles NNW. of Jerusalem, and 27 S. of Tyre. The harbour is partly choked with sand, yet is one of the best on this coast. In 1892 a railway was commenced from Acre to Damascus; one has since been built from Haifa to Damascus. Taken by the Crusaders in 1110, Acre was recovered in 1187 by the Sultan Saladin, but retaken in 1191 by Richard I. of England and Philip at a cost of 100,000 men. The town was now given to the Knights of the Order of St John, who kept it by constant fighting for a hundred years. In 1517 it was captured by the Turks; in 1799 besieged by the French for sixty-one days, but successfully defended by the garrison, aided by English sailors and marines under Sir Sidney Smith. In 1832 it was stormed by Ibrahim Pasha, son of the viceroy of Egypt, and held by him till in 1840 it was bombarded and taken by a combined English, Austrian, and Turkish fleet.

Acri, a town of South Italy, 13 miles NE. of Cosenza; pop. 5000.

Acton, an urban district of Middlesex, 4 miles W. of Hyde Park; pop. 57,500.

Acton Burnell, a Shropshire parish, 8 miles SSE. of Shrewsbury, at whose ruined castle was passed in 1283 the 'Statute of Merchants.'

Ada, a town of northern Hungary, on the river Theiss, an important station for steamers; pop. 12,000.

Adal is the name of the flat and barren country lying between the Abyssinian plateaux and the Red Sea, from Massowa to the Bay of Tajurra, its greatest width being 300 miles.

Adalia (anc. Attalia), a seaport on the S. coast of Asia Minor, on the Gulf of Adalia. Pop. 30,000.

Adamawa, an African state or territory between the Cameroons and Lake Chad, most of which (excluding Yola) by Anglo-German agreement lies within the German sphere—Yola being in Nigeria. In the S. are mountains, amid which rise numerous streams, the most important being the Benuë (q.v.), which waters the entire province. The people, who profess Mohammedanism, are active, industrious, and intelligent. The chief town is Yola (15,000 inhabitants).

Adams, a township of Massachusetts, adjoining North Adams, with busy manufactories, and embracing Mount Greylock (3505 feet), the highest point in the state. Pop. 15,000.

Adam's Bridge, a chain of sand shoals 30 miles long, extending from a small island off the Indian coast to one just off Ceylon, carries a railway viaduct.

Adam's Peak, the name given by Mohammedans, and after them by Europeans, to a mountain summit in the south of Ceylon, 7420 feet high (not, however, the highest of the group). The native name is Samanella. The cone forming the summit is a naked mass of granite, terminating in a narrow platform, in the middle of which is a hollow, five feet long, having a resemblance (increased by human agency) to a human footstep. Mohammedan tradition makes this the scene of Adam's penitence, after his expulsion from Paradise; he stood 1000 years on one foot, and hence the mark. To the Buddhists, the impression is the Sri-pada, or sacred footmark, left by Buddha on his departure from Ceylon; and the Hindus recognise Buddha as an avatar of Vishnu. Multitudes of devotees visit the mountain.

Adana (A'dana), a province in the SE. of Asia Minor, is named from its chief city Adana, containing 50,000 inhabitants. The city, on the Sihun, 30 miles from the sea, commands the pass of the Taurus Mountains.

Adare, a market-town of Limerick, on the Maig, 11 miles SW. of Limerick; pop. 500.

Adare, Cape. See Antarctica.

Adda, a river of Lombardy, rising in the Alps, flowing through Lake Como, and falling into the Po after a course of 180 miles.

Addis Abeba (Adis Ababa), capital of Abyssinia, lies in the south of the province of Shoa, 8000 feet above the sea; pop. 30,000.

Addiscombe, a place in Surrey, near Croydon. A mansion here was, in 1812, converted by the East India Company into a college for their cadets, but sold in 1861.

Adelaide, the capital of South Australia, on the Torrens, 7 miles by rail SE. of Port Adelaide, on St Vincent Gulf. It stands on a large plain, and is walled in on the eastern and southern sides by the Mount Lofty range; the town proper is enclosed by a wide belt of garden and shrubbery. The first settlement was made in 1836, and named after the queen of William IV. The Torrens divides the town into North and South Adelaide, the former being occupied chiefly with residences, and the latter forming the business portion of the town. Four substantial iron bridges span the Torrens, which has been formed by a dam into a lake 1½ mile long. The streets are broad and regularly laid out, especially in Adelaide proper, to the south of the river, where they cross each other at right angles, and are planted with trees. Among the public buildings are the new parliament houses, erected at a cost of about £100,000; government offices, post-office, and town-hall; South Australian Institute, with museum, library, and art-galleries; and hospital. The botanical garden, with the botanical garden park, covers more than 120 acres of ground. The chief manufactures are woollen, leather, iron, and earthenware goods; but the chief importance of Adelaide depends on its being the great emporium for South Australia. Wool, wine, wheat, flour, and copper ore are the staple articles of export. Among educational institutions the most important are the Adelaide University; St Peter's (Episcopal) College; St Barnabas Theological College, opened in 1881; and Prince Alfred (Wesleyan) College. It is the seat of an Anglican and of a Roman Catholic bishop. Glenelg on the sea, 5 miles away, is a favourite watering-place. The population of Adelaide, including its suburbs, is about 190,000.—Port Adelaide, its haven, dates from 1840, is situated on an estuary of the Gulf of St Vincent, has a safe and commodious harbour, and an ocean dock capable of admitting ships of the largest size. It is a principal port of call for vessels arriving from Europe either round the Cape or by the Suez Canal; and since 1887 railway communication has been established between Adelaide, Melbourne, Sydney, and Brisbane. Two forts have been erected for the defence of the port.

Adélie Land. See ANTARCTICA.

Adelsberg, a market-town in Carniola, 22 miles NE. of Trieste, with a pop. of 4000. The Adelsberg Grotto, the largest in Europe, between 2 and 3 miles long, is divided into the old and the new grotto, the latter discovered in 1816; a third very fine one came to light in 1889. The various chambers, called by names such as the Dome, the Dancing-hall, the Belvedere, contain stalactites and stalagmites of great size and grotesque forms. The river Poik runs through a part of the grotto, and then disappears below the ground.

Aden, a peninsula and town belonging to Britain, on the SW. coast of Arabia, 105 miles E. of the strait of Bab-el-Mandeb, the entrance to the Red Sea. The peninsula is a mass of volcanic rocks, 5 miles long from E. to W., and rising to 1776 feet. It is joined to the mainland by a narrow, level, and sandy isthmus. The town is on the eastern shore of the peninsula, stands in the crater of an extinct volcano, and is surrounded by indescribably barren, cinder-like rocks. The main crater is known as the Devil's Punch-bowl. Frequently the heat is intense; but the very dry hot climate, though depressing, is unusually healthy for the tropics. The Romans occupied it in the 1st century A.D. Till the discovery of the Cape route to India (1498), it was the chief mart of Asiatic produce for the Western nations; but in 1838 it had sunk to be a village of 600 inhabitants. The increasing importance of the Red Sea route gave Aden great value as a station for England to hold; and in 1839, after a few hours' contest, Aden fell into the hands of the British. It is of high importance both in a mercantile and naval point of view, especially as a great coaling station; it has a garrison and strong fortifications. The population and resources of the place have rapidly increased since 1838, and the opening of the Suez Canal in 1869 gave it a great impetus. The annual value of its imports sometimes exceeds three millions, while that of its exports (coffee, gums, hides) amounts to two millions and a half. It is a telegraphic station on the cable between Suez and Bombay, and on the line to Zanzibar and the Cape. To provide for its growing population, a considerable territory on the mainland has been acquired and added to the peninsula, the total area (including the island of Perim, q.v.) being 80 sq. m., and the pop. (1911) 46,165. In addition to the settlement (which is politically connected with Bombay) there is now a British Protectorate over the back-country as far as the Bana River. The bulk of the natives are Arabs and Somalis. In the settlement there are, besides Aden proper, called the Camp, or the Crater, two other centres of population—Steamer Point, and the Shaikh Othman, with a Presbyterian mission, 10 miles inland.

Aden, GULF OF, an arm of the Arabian Sea, between Arabia and Somaliland.

Aderbijan. See AZERBIJAN.

Adernò (anc. (Adranum), a town of Sicily, at the base of Mount Etna; pop. 30,000.

Adiabe'ne, a district of Assyria, E. of the Upper Tigris, between the greater and the lesser Zab rivers.

Adige (Ad'ijay; Ger. Etsch; anc. Athĕsis), a river of Italy, rising in the Rhætian Alps, and formed by various streamlets which descend from these mountains and unite at Glarus. Thence it flows east into Tyrol, then, after a slight south-eastward détour, due south past Trent and Roveredo into Lombardy, and, passing Verona, takes a south-eastern sweep, and enters the Adriatic not far north of the Po. It is 250 miles long, 650 feet broad in the plain of Lombardy, and 10 to 16 feet deep.

Adirondack Mountains, the chief range in New York State, lie between Lakes Champlain and Ontario. Rising from an elevated plateau about 2000 feet above sea-level, they are remarkable for grand and picturesque scenery; the highest summit, Mount Marcy, is 5402 feet high. Small lakes are numerous; the head-streams of the Hudson are here; and there is much fine timber in the region. The whole northern wilderness of New York State is popularly known as the Adirondacks, and is a very favourite resort.

Adlington, a Lancashire township, 3½ miles SE. of Chorley; pop. 4500.

Admiralty Island lies off the coast of Southern Alaska, in 57° 30′ N. lat., and 134° 15′ W. long. It is about 90 miles long, well wooded and watered; and contains coal and copper. It is inhabited, and belongs to the United States.

Admiralty Islands, a group of 40 islands, to the NE. of New Guinea, about 2° S. lat., and 147° E. long. They were discovered by the Dutch in 1616. The largest is above 50 miles long, and is mountainous but fruitful; their total area is 878 sq. m. Some are volcanic, others are coral islands. They abound in cocoa-nut trees, and are inhabited by a race of tawny frizzle-headed savages, of the Papuan stock, about 800 in number. Together with New Britain and some adjoining groups, they were annexed by Germany in 1885, and now form part of the Bismarck Archipelago.

Adoni, a town of Madras, 64 miles NE. of Bellary. Pop. 30,000.

Adour, a French river, rising in the dep. of Hautes Pyrénées, and flowing 180 miles through Gers and Landes, till it enters the Atlantic below Bayonne. It is navigable for 80 miles.

Adowa, a town of Abyssinia, the capital of Tigré, stands 6270 feet above sea-level, and 145 miles NE. of Gondar. Adowa is the chief entrepôt of trade between the interior of Tigré and the coast. Here on 1st March 1896 an Italian army was routed by the Abyssinians. Pop. 3000.

Adpar, a town of Cardigan and Carmarthen shires, on the Teifi, opposite Newcastle-Emlyn. Till 1885 it was one of the Cardigan boroughs.

Adra (anc. Abdera), a Mediterranean seaport of Spain, 49 miles SE. of Granada, near great lead-mines. Pop. 10,000.

Adramyti (anc. Adramyttium; Turkish Edremid), a town on the west coast of Asia Minor, opposite Mitylene. Pop. 6000.

Adrar, a region of 30,000 sq. m. in the west of the Sahara, now part of the territory of Rio de Oro, the whole being known as Spanish Sahara.

Adria, a town of Northern Italy, between the Po and Adige, is one of the oldest cities in Europe, having been founded by the Etruscans. So late as the 12th century A.D., it was a flourishing harbour on the Adriatic Sea, to which it gave name; but it has been gradually separated from the sea, from which it is now 14 miles distant. It still retains several interesting remains of Etruscan and Roman antiquity, with a fine cathedral. Pop. 12,000.

Adrian, a city of Michigan, U.S., situated on the Raisin River. It is well furnished with water-power, commands the trade of a large grain-growing region, has several factories, and a Methodist college founded in 1859. Pop. 12,000.

Adrianople (Turkish Edirné; Bulgarian Odrin), a city of European Turkey, stands on the navigable Maritza (the ancient Hebrus), 198 miles WNW. of Constantinople by rail. The splendid mosque of Selim II., the palace, and the immense bazaar of Ali Pasha may be named as its principal features. Founded or greatly improved by the Emperor Hadrian, Adrianople was the seat of the Ottoman sultanate from 1366 to 1453. The Russo-Turkish war was here concluded, September 14, 1829, by the Peace of Adrianople. After the capture of the Turkish army defending the Shipka Pass in 1878, the Russians entered Adrianople unopposed; and an armistice was concluded here. Taken after five months' siege by the Bulgarians in 1913, it was recovered by the Turks in the same year. Pop. 123,000.

Adriatic Sea, a large arm of the Mediterranean Sea, extending 450 miles north-westward between Italy and the Balkan Peninsula, and terminated to the south by the strait of Otranto, 45 miles wide. The west coast is comparatively low and has few inlets, and the north is marshy and edged with lagoons. On the other side, the coasts of Illyria, Croatia, Dalmatia, and Albania are steep, rocky, and barren, with many inlets, and begirt with a chain of almost innumerable small rocky islands. The total area of the sea, including islands, is calculated at 52,220 sq. m.—the area of the islands being 1290; the mean depth is 110 fathoms, the greatest depth 565 fathoms. The chief rivers flowing into it are the Adige and the Po, which are continually depositing soil on the coast, so that places once on the shore are now inland. The extreme saltness of the Adriatic is probably owing to the comparatively small quantity of fresh water poured into it by rivers. Venice, Trieste, Fiume, Ancona, Bari, and Brindisi are the chief ports. The fisheries are rich.

Adua. See ADOWA.

Adur (Ah'dur), a Sussex river, flowing 20 miles southward to the English Channel at Shoreham.

Ægean Sea, the gulf between Asia Minor and Greece, now often called Archipelago (q.v.).

Ægi'na, a mountainous Greek island, 33 sq. m. in area, in the Gulf of Ægina (the ancient Saronicus Sinus). The town of Ægina stands at the NW. end of the island. There are considerable remains still left of the ancient city, and the ruins of solidly built walls and harbour moles still attest its size and importance. The island contains about 5000 inhabitants.

Afghanistan' is the country lying to the north-west of India. Its boundaries are, on the north, the Oxus or Amu Daria, from its source to Khoja Saleh, and thence (since 1885-87) a line drawn across the Turkoman desert (Russian territory) south-westward to the Murghab, passing south of Penjdeh, and touching the Hari-Rud at Zulfikar. On the east, the frontier runs along the eastern foot of the Suliman Mountains; but here again some of the tribes are almost independent, and the Indian government controls the more important passes. On the south, a line passing north of Quetta in about the 30th parallel of N. lat., divides Afghanistan from the territory of the khan of Kelát and Beluchistan; while on the west, the meridian of 61° E. long. approximately defines the boundary with Persia. Within these limits, Afghanistan extends 400 miles from north to south, and 600 miles from east to west, and contains an area which may be roughly estimated at 250,000 sq. m., or about twice the size of Great Britain and Ireland. This includes Badakhshan and Wakhan in the north-east, and Afghan Turkestan in the north, comprising the Uzbeg States of Balkh, Kundúz, Maimana, Shibarghan, Khulm, Akchá, and Andkhói, owning allegiance and paying tribute to the Ameer. Afghanistan may be divided into the three great river-basins of the Oxus, the Indus, and the Helmand. Afghanistan is for the most part an arid, mountainous country, and cultivation is only met with in some of its valleys. The principal mountain systems are the Hindu Kush, with its westerly continuations, the Koh-i-Baba, Paghman, Safed-Koh, and Siah-Koh. The climate is as diversified as the physical configuration. At Ghazni (7279 feet) the winter is extremely rigorous; the climate of Seistan, in the south-west, is hot and trying; while other parts are temperate.

The population of Afghanistan is composed of a variety of nationalities, and is estimated at about 5,900,000. The Afghans proper, or Pathans, number about 3,000,000, and are divided into tribes or clans—Duránis, Ghilzáis, Yúsufzáis, and others. The Duránis are the dominant tribe; the Ghilzáis, the strongest and most warlike; the Yúsufzáis, the most turbulent. Of the non-Afghans, the Tajiks are the agricultural and industrious portion of the population; the Hindkís and Játs chiefly live in the towns, and are traders; the Kizilbashes are Turko-Persians, and form the more educated and superior class; while the Hazáras, a race of Mongol origin, are nomads. The language of the Afghans—the Pakhtu or Pushtu—belongs to the Aryan family. In religion they are Sunni-Mohammedans. In character they are proud, vain, cruel, perfidious, extremely avaricious, revengeful, selfish, merciless, and idle. 'Nothing is finer than their physique, or worse than their morale.' The Afghans do not as a rule inhabit towns, except in the case of those attached to the court and heads of tribes. The townsmen are mostly Hindkís and other non-Afghan races, who practise various trades and handicrafts considered derogatory by men of rank. The principal towns are Kabul (population 140,000), the seat of government and centre of a fertile district; Ghazni, a strong fortress; Kandahar, the chief city of Southern Afghanistan, with 50,000 inhabitants; and Herat, formerly considered the key of India.

Among the natural productions of Afghanistan is the plant yielding the asafœtida. The castor-oil plant is everywhere common, and good tobacco is grown in the district of Kandahar. The cultivated area round Herat produces magnificent crops of wheat, barley, cotton, grapes, melons, and the mulberry-tree. In special localities are forests of pistachio. The general appearance of the country during winter is barren and arid, owing to the absence of trees and woody shrubs; but in spring a mass of vegetation springs up. There are deposits of gold, copper, iron, and lead. The industrial products are silk, chiefly for domestic use, and carpets, those of Herat being of admirable quality. The manufacture of postins, or sheepskins, is one of the most important occupations. Merchandise is all transported on camel or pony back. Commerce suffers much from frequent wars and bad government.

The history of Afghanistan as an independent state only dates from the middle of the 18th century. For two centuries before, Herat and Kandahar had been in the possession of Persia; while Kabul was included in the Mogul empire of Delhi. Upon the death of Nadir Shah in 1747, Ahmed Shah Duráni subjugated the different provinces, and when he died in 1773, left an empire to his son, Timur Shah. For Englishmen, the chief events in the history of Afghanistan are the expedition in 1839 which established Shah Soojah on the throne; the rebellion of 1841, in which the residents Burnes and Macnaghten were killed, and the Anglo-Indian troops perished in the retreat; the punitive expedition in 1842; the defeat of Dost Mohammed in 1849; the war with Shere Ali in 1878–79, and instalment of Yakub Khan; the rising at Kabul and murder of Cavagnari the English resident; the punitive expedition under Roberts; the establishment in 1881 by British assistance of Abdurrahman, succeeded in 1901 by his son Habibullah; and alarms as to Russian encroachments. But by the Anglo-Russian Convention (1907) Russia acknowledged the country to be within the British sphere of influence; while Great Britain agreed not to interfere with its internal administration.

Afium-Kara-Hissar ('Opium Black Castle'), a city of Asia Minor, 170 miles ENE. of Smyrna. The chief trade is in opium, and there are manufactures of felts, carpets, &c. Pop. 20,000.

Africa, a continent of the eastern hemisphere, forming a south-western extension of Asia, to which it is attached by the narrow isthmus of Suez, now pierced by a canal 90 miles long. Africa is thus an insular mass of irregular triangular shape, with base on the Mediterranean, and apex at the junction of the Indian and Atlantic Oceans, which bathe its eastern and western shores respectively. From Cape Blanco in Tunis, to Cape Agulhas in the Cape Province, it stretches southward across about 5000 miles, disposed almost equally on both sides of the equator. The extreme eastern and western points are Capes Guardafui on the Indian Ocean, and Verde on the Atlantic, about 4500 miles apart. But the total area is considerably less than would seem to be indicated by these extreme distances. Including Madagascar and all adjacent insular groups, it cannot be estimated at much more than 11,500,000 sq. m., or some 5,000,000 less than Asia or America. Of all the continents except Australia, Africa is the most uniform in its general outlines, unrelieved by broad estuaries, bights, or inlets of any kind penetrating far inland. Hence, although it is about three times as large as Europe, its coast-line scarcely exceeds 15,000 miles, as compared with the 19,000 of that more highly favoured continent.

Geologically, Africa is nearly destitute of insular groups, almost the only islands that belong physically to the mainland being Ierba and one or two islets in the Mediterranean, and a few on the east side, such as Socotra, and farther south, Pemba, Zanzibar, and Mafia, almost forming parts of the adjacent coast. Perim, Dahlak, and a few others in the Red Sea, are mere coral reefs, dominated here and there by volcanic crests. The Comoro group between Madagascar and Mozambique is also volcanic; while Madagascar itself and the outlying Mascarenhas (Mauritius, Réunion, and Rodriguez) appear to be surviving fragments of a Miocene continent, now flooded by the waters of the Indian Ocean. On the west side, the little Bissagos group alone forms a geological dependency of the mainland. Annabon, St Thomas, Prince, and Fernando Po, in the Gulf of Guinea, as well as Madeira, the Canary, and Cape Verde archipelagoes, are all of volcanic origin, the latter being separated by profound abysses of over 3000 feet from the continent. Lastly, St Helena and Ascension are mere rocks lost amid the Atlantic waters.

Corresponding with the uniform continental contour, is the generally monotonous character of the interior, which is relieved by no great central highlands or conspicuous water-partings at all comparable to those of the other great continental regions. The somewhat premature generalisation, which compared it to 'an inverted basin,' gives a misleading idea of its true conformation. The outer rim of mountain-ranges is not nearly so continuous and uniform as this comparison would imply; while the interior is disposed, not in one vast elevated plain, but in two well-marked physical regions—a great southern tableland with a mean altitude of over 3500 feet, falling northwards to a much lower but still elevated plain with a mean altitude of about 1300 feet. Owing to this generally high altitude, and to the almost total absence of extensive low-lying plains, Africa, notwithstanding the lack of vast alpine regions like the European Alps and Pyrenees, has nevertheless a greater mean elevation (1900 to 2000 feet) than Europe (1000).

The southern plateau is intersected by several mountain-ranges, very imperfectly explored. The chief mountain systems of the north are the Atlas and the Abyssinian highlands. The culminating points of the continent are near the equator: Ruwenzori (16,600), Kenia (17,000), and Kilima-njaro (19,300 feet).

Hydrographically, the two great southern basins of the Congo and Zambesi balance those of the Nile and Niger of the northern plain, while the secondary Orange and Limpopo in the extreme south find their counterparts in the Senegal and Draa of the NW. The Zambesi and Limpopo, together with the Rovuma, Juba, and a few other coast streams, flow to the Indian Ocean; all the others, together with the Cunene, Koanza, Ogoway, Volta, Gambia, Tensift, Muluya, and Mejerdah, to the Atlantic, either directly or through the Mediterranean. The Makua-Welle is a tributary of the Congo; the Shari flows into Lake Tsad or Chad.

Africa possesses a magnificent equatorial lake system, elsewhere unrivalled except by the great North American lacustrine basins. They are grouped towards the east side of the continent between 15° S. and 4° N. lat., and all stand on the southern tableland, draining seaward through the Zambesi (Nyasa, with outflow Shiré), the Congo (Tanganyika, with intermittent outflow Lukuga), and the Nile (Alexandra Nyanza, Victoria Nyanza, Edward Nyanza, and Albert Nyanza, with outflow Somerset Nile). The Alexandra (Akanyaru) drains north-eastwards through the Alexandra Nile (Kagera) to the Victoria, queen of African lakes, and, next to Superior (31,200 sq. m.), the largest fresh-water basin (over 26,000 sq. m.) on the globe. Lake Tsad (Chad) has in normal seasons no seaward outflow; the Abyssinian Lake Tana, Tzana, or Dembea, 6100 feet, is a true alpine lake.

Above all the great divisions of the globe, Africa is distinguished by the general uniformity of its climatic phenomena, a circumstance due to its massive form and intertropical position. In the region approaching nearest to the northern or southern equinoctial lines, rain falls throughout the year, thanks to the opposing trade-winds. In the northern hemisphere a zone of two wet seasons stretches from the equator to the 15° lat. In summer, copious showers are caused by the moisture-bearing SW. winds; in winter, the NW. currents become in their turn the bearers of heavy rain-charged clouds to the southern plateau. But on both sides of the torrid zone, comprising about seven-tenths of the whole continent, the difference in the disposition of the winds causes a corresponding contrast in the rainfall. Here the trade-winds maintain their normal direction constantly, or with but slight temporary deviations. Blowing from the NE. in the northern, from the SE. in the southern hemisphere, they divert to the equator most of the vapours crossing their path, leaving elsewhere clear skies and arid lands. Thus it happens that Africa has two almost completely barren zones of rocks, gravels, marls, clay, and sand—the Sahara and Libyan desert in the north, Kalahari and other wastes in the south. This regular disposition of the climates is completed by the regular alternation of winds and rains in the zones of Mauritania and the Cape, both belonging to the region of subtropical rains, which fall in the respective winters of each hemisphere. Africa is thus disposed from north to south in successive gray and more or less intensely green belts, whose limits coincide in several places with the isothermals, or lines of equal temperature. The lines indicating mean annual temperatures of 68° and 75° F., traverse, in the north, the Mediterranean seaboard and the Sahara respectively; in the south, the Orange basin and a zone stretching obliquely from Mozambique to the Cameroons; while the area of greatest mean heat (82° F.) is comprised within an irregular curve enclosing the Upper Nile basin between Khartoum and the Albert Nyanza north and south, Lake Tsad and Massowah (Massawah) west and east. The climate, except on the Mediterranean, Saharan, Red Sea, and extreme south coasts, is nearly everywhere malarious on the low-lying and generally marshy coast-lands between the outer rim and the sea. It is the same in the Chambeze, Malagarazi (Unyamwesi), Shari, and other inland districts, which are either constantly or periodically under water. But elsewhere, with due precautions, the continent cannot be regarded as insalubrious; and the Sahara, for instance, is distinctly a healthy region, although, owing to rapid radiation, the hot days are here succeeded by cool and occasionally even frosty nights.

About 41 per cent. of the surface is said to be either desert, or under scrub, or otherwise absolutely waste, and 35 per cent. steppe, or nearly treeless grass-grown savannah, leaving only 24 per cent. for forest and arable lands. The continuous forest growths are confined mainly to the vast equatorial region between the Upper Zambesi and Soudan, and to some isolated tracts about the Abyssinian plateau, in the Moroccan Atlas, all along the Guinea coast, about the Middle Limpopo and Zambesi, and in parts of Masai Land and the Upper Nile basin.

Fauna.—Africa is the peculiar home of the large fauna—such as the lion, the panther and leopard, the hyena, fox, and jackal. The great herbivora are represented by the elephant, the rhinoceros, the buffalo, the giraffe, the hippopotamus, and the crocodile. Africa is also the special home of the gnu, and several other species of antelopes. The monkey family is also spread over the whole continent. Peculiar also are such equidæ as the zebras. Of land mammals there are altogether enumerated about 480 species peculiar to this continent, amongst which are 95 of the simian and 50 of the antelope family. The avifauna includes the ostrich, the secretary, ibis, guinea-fowl, weaver-bird, roller-bird, love-bird, waxbill, whydah, sun-bird, parrots, quail, and many other well-known forms. Reptiles and insects also abound—the disease-carrying tsetse fly being one of the great impediments to the progress of culture.

Recent authorities roughly estimate the population of Africa at about 210,000,000, or 18 to the square mile, a density five times less than that of Europe. According to the nature of soil and climate, the population is distributed very unevenly over the surface, being massed somewhat densely in the Nile delta, in the Upper Nile Valley, and generally throughout Soudan, less thickly over the southern plateau, and very thinly in Mauritania and Tripolitana; while large tracts, especially in the Western Sahara, the Libyan and Kalahari wastes, are absolutely uninhabited. Of the whole number, probably less than 1,000,000 are recent immigrants from Europe, settled chiefly in the extreme north (Egypt and Algeria) and in the extreme south (Cape Province, Natal, and the former Boer States). About 34,000,000, all of Semitic stock, are intruders from Asia, some in remote or prehistoric times (3,000,000 Himyarites in Abyssinia and Harar from South Arabia), some since the spread of Islam (over 30,000,000 nomad and other Arabs, chiefly along the Mediterranean seaboard, in West Sahara, and Central and East Soudan). All the rest, numbering about 175,000,000 altogether, may be regarded as the true aboriginal element, and may be regarded as falling into two main groups—the Negro and Negroid peoples, and the Hamitic. The Negroes proper, including the Fanti, Ashanti, Mandingo, Haussa, Bari, and Monbuttu stocks, are mainly in Upper Guinea, Senegambia, and the Soudan. The Bantus to the south of them include Kaffirs, Zulus, Bechuanas, Matabele, Wagandas; and the other Negroids are the Hottentots and the Bushmen, Batwas, and Akkas. To the Hamitic stock are referred the Berbers, Gallas, and Somalis, as also the Fans, Fulahs, and the Egyptian Fellahs. Speaking generally, the northern Hamites and Semites are Mohammedans and stock-breeders, the southern Bantus nature-worshippers and agriculturists; all these factors intermingling in the intervening zone of Soudan. The chief exceptions to this broad statement are the Christian Abyssinians (Monophysite sect); the Hottentots, who are mainly cattle-breeders; and the Algerian Berbers, who prefer tillage to pasturage.

Nearly the whole of Africa is under the direct or indirect control of seven European states—Great Britain, France, Germany, Portugal, Spain, Italy, and Belgium—or within their recognised spheres of influence. The only independent states remaining are Abyssinia and Liberia. Of African soil, Great Britain holds, (1) in South Africa, the Union, Swaziland, Basutoland, Bechuanaland Protectorate, Rhodesia, Nyasaland Protectorate (1907); (2) in East Africa, Zanzibar Protectorate, East Africa Protectorate, Uganda Protectorate, Somaliland Protectorate; (3) in West Africa, Gambia, Sierra Leone, Gold Coast, and Nigeria; (4) Mauritius, Ascension, St Helena, &c.; (5) Egypt (occupied by Britain, nominally Turkish); (6) Anglo-Egyptian Soudan, held by Britain and Egypt jointly. France holds Algeria, Tunis, most of Morocco (as a protectorate), Maurétanie, Senegal, Upper Senegal-Niger, French Guinea, the Ivory Coast, Dahomey, the Sahara, French Equatorial Africa, French Somaliland, Madagascar, and Réunion. German Africa includes Togoland, the Cameroons, German South-west Africa (Damaraland, Namaqualand), and German East Africa. Portuguese Africa: Angola, Portuguese East Africa, Portuguese Guinea, Madeira, Cape Verde Islands. Spanish Africa: part of Morocco, Rio de Oro and Adrar, the Canaries, Rio Muni, Fernando Po, and other islands. Italian Africa: Eritrea, Italian Somaliland, Tripoli, and Benghazi. Belgian Africa is the Congo Territory.

According to estimates based on the latest available data, British Africa in all (without Egypt, but including the Egyptian Soudan) includes about 3,220,000 sq. m., with about 40,000,000 inhabitants; French Africa, 3,000,000 sq. m., 30,000,000 inhabitants; German Africa, 1,000,000 sq. m., 10,000,000 inhabitants; Portuguese Africa, 800,000 sq. m., 9,000,000 inhabitants; Spanish Africa, 100,000 sq. m., population 700,000; Italian Africa, 570,000 sq. m., 1,600,000 inhabitants; Belgian Africa, 900,000 sq. m., pop. 30,000,000; Turkish Africa (Egypt), 12,000 sq. m., pop. 12,000,000; Abyssinia, 400,000 sq. m., pop. 8,000,000; Liberia, 14,000 sq. m., pop. 1,000,000. The railway from the Cape to Cairo has reached Belgian Congo northwards and beyond Sennar southwards.

Afton, an Ayrshire stream, joining the Nith at New Cumnock.

Agades (A-gâ-des), once a very important city of Africa, and still a great meeting-place of trading caravans, is the capital of the state Aïr or Asben, south of the Sahara, and is built upon the eastern edge of a great tableland, at an elevation of not less than 2500 feet. In the 16th century it probably contained 60,000 inhabitants; now it has some 7000.

Agadir, the southernmost seaport town in Morocco, at the mouth of the Sûs, 23 miles SE. of Cape Ghir. It was once a place of importance; but its pop. now does not exceed 1500. In 1911 a German warship suddenly appeared here as a protest against France's policy in Morocco (q.v.).

Agar, a town of India, in the state of Gwalior, 41 miles NE. of Ujain. It stands in an open plain, 1598 feet above the sea. Pop. 30,000.

Agde (anc. Agatha Narbonensis), a town in the French dep. of Hérault, 3 miles from the Mediterranean Sea, on the left bank of a navigable stream, the mouth of which forms a harbour. Pop. 7000.

Agen (Â-zhon^g), chief town of the French dep. of Lot-et-Garonne, on the right bank of the Garonne, 84 miles SE. of Bordeaux. It carries on an active trade in woollen and linen fabrics, leather, coloured paper, colours, cordage, and sailcloth; and is an important railway centre. Joseph Scaliger and the barber-poet Jasmin were natives. Pop. 18,500.

Aghrim, or AUGHRIM (Auhh'rim), a hill in Galway, Ireland, 30 miles SW. of Athlone. Here, on 12th July 1691, Ginckell defeated the French and Irish adherents of James II. under St Ruth.

Agincourt (Â'zhan^{g}koor), now AZINCOURT, a small village in the centre of the French dep. of Pas-de-Calais, celebrated for Henry V.'s great victory over the French, October 25, 1415.

Agnano, till 1870 a small lake 3 miles west of Naples, about 60 feet in depth, and without visible outlet. As it indirectly caused malaria, it has been drained. On the right lies the Grotta del Cane, and on the left are the sulphurous vapour-baths of San Germano.

Agno'ne, a town of South Italy, 22 miles NW. of Campobasso, noted for its copper and steel manufactures. Pop. 10,000.

Agra, a city in the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh, on the Jumna, 139 miles SE. of Delhi by rail, and 841 NW. of Calcutta. The ancient walls embraced an area of 11 sq. m., of which about one-half is now occupied. The houses are mostly built of red sandstone, and, on the whole, Agra is the handsomest city in Upper India. Some of the public buildings, monuments of the house of Timur, are on a scale of striking magnificence. Among these are the fortress built by Akbar, within the walls of which are the palace and audience-hall of Shah Jehan, the Moti Masjid or Pearl Mosque, and the Jama Masjid or Great Mosque. Still more celebrated is the white marble Taj Mahal, situated without the city, about a mile to the east of the fort. This extraordinary and beautiful mausoleum was built by the Emperor Shah Jehan for himself and his favourite wife, who died in 1629; and is remarkable alike for the complexity and grace of the general design, and the elaborate perfection of the workmanship. In the centre, on a raised platform, is the mausoleum, surmounted by a beautiful dome, with smaller domes at each corner, and four graceful minarets (133 feet high). Of British edifices the principal are the Government House, the Government College, three missionary colleges, the English church, and the barracks. The climate, during the hot and rainy seasons (April to September), is very injurious to Europeans; but the average health of the city is equal to that of any other station in the United Provinces. The principal articles of trade are cotton, tobacco, salt, grain, and sugar. There are manufactures of shoes, pipe-stems, and gold lace, and of inlaid mosaic-work, for which Agra is famous. It is a very important railway centre, and has many claims to be regarded as the commercial capital of the North-west. Pop. (1911) 185,449. Agra first rose to importance in the beginning of the 16th century, ky valley, and is surrounded by a stone wall

:h five gateways. The Dargah or tomb of the ssulman saint, Kwaja, within the town, is d in great veneration. Trade has revived ce the opening of the railway (1875), the prin-al export being cotton. Pop. (1911) 86,222.

jodhya, an ancient city of Oudh, on the right ık of the Gogra, adjacent to Fyzabad (q.v.).
site is marked by heaps of ruins, overgrown
:h jungle; there is also a modern town of the ne name (pop. 9000).

k'abah (the Biblical Elath), a haven at the ıd of the Gulf of Akabah, the north-eastern n of the Red Sea.

ır the salt lake of Ak-shehr, and 60 miles SE.
Konieh; pop. 6000.

k-su, a town of Chinese Turkestan, 260 miles
. from Yarkand, on an affluent of the Tarim,
l at the southern base of the Thian-shan untains. It was formerly the capital of a arate khanate; in 1867 it became a part of state of Eastern Turkestan, under Yakoob
g, but was reconquered by China in 1877. It elebrated for its manufactures of cotton cloth
l saddlery, and is an entrepôt of commerce
ween Russia, Tartary, and China. Pop. 20,000, ides a large Chinese garrison.

kyab, a town of Burma, the chief seaport of kan, is situated on the eastern side of the ınd of Akyab, at the mouth of the Kuladan er, 190 miles SE. of Calcutta. In 1826, being n a mere fishing-village, it was chosen for the ef station of the province, and now is a great port; pop. 43,989.

labama, one of the United States, touching
Gulf of Mexico, and lying between Georgia
l Mississippi. In the south are the Piny ods; next the fertile Cane-brake or Black t; next the mineral region; to the north, t of the fertile valley of the Tennessee. The bama and Tombigbee are navigable rivers. Cotton, maize, oats, wheat, and sweet potatoes are produced; the minerals, including coal and iron, are important; and manufactures are developing. The climate is warm but equable, and save in the Black Belt and near the swamps, healthful. Montgomery is the capital, Mobile the chief port of the state. Area, 51,540 sq. m. —more than England without Wales; pop. (1840) 590,756; (1890) 1,513,017; (1910) 2,138,093, of whom nearly half were coloured.

Ala Dagh, a range (11,000 feet) in the great tableland of Erzerum, in Turkish Armenia, to the north of Lake Van.

Alago'as, a maritime province of Brazil, bounded on the N. and W. by Pernambuco. Pop. about 642,000. The town of Alagoas, once the capital, has 5000 inhabitants. The present capital is the port of Maceio.

Alais, a town of the French dep. of Gard, on a plain at the base of the Cevennes Mountains, 31 miles NW. of Nîmes by rail. It embraced the Protestant cause in the religious wars of France, and was besieged and taken in 1629. Alais owes its prosperity chiefly to the mineral wealth of the surrounding district, which produces coal, iron, lead, zinc, and asphalt; there are large iron-foundries here, and manufactures of silk and ribbons. Pop. 19,000.

Alajuela (A-la-hoo-ay'la), a city of Costa Rica, Central America, 23 miles WNW. of Cartago, with which it is connected by rail; pop. 10,000.

Alameda (A-la-mai'da), a watering-place and port of California, on the Bay, 3 miles by steam-ferry E. of San Francisco; pop. 23,400.

Al'amos, Los ('the poplars'), a town of Mexico, in the state of Sonora, 45 miles E. of the Gulf of California, is famous for its copper and silver mines; pop. 10,000.

Åland Islands (Ō'land), a group of 300 small islands and rocks at the entrance of the Gulf of Bothnia, opposite Abo, the largest being situated about 25 miles from the Swedish coast. Only 80 of them are inhabited. The inhabitants are of Swedish origin, skilful sailors and fishermen. Pop. 30,000, of whom two-thirds inhabit the largest island, called Aland, which is 18 miles in length, and contains Bomarsund. These islands, formerly Swedish, were taken possession of by Russia in 1809.

Ala-shehr ('the exalted city,' anc. Philadelphia), a city of Asia Minor, 75 miles E. of Smyrna. It was founded about 200 B.C., and is famous as the seat of one of the Seven Churches of Asia. It is still a place of considerable importance, and carries on a thriving trade with Smyrna, to which it is now joined by a railway. There are many interesting remains of antiquity. Pop. 18,000, including 3000 Greeks.

Alaska, a territory (organised 1912) of the United States, occupying the NW. portion of the North American continent, together with a great number of islands, mostly in the Pacific Ocean. It is bounded N. by the Arctic Ocean, E. by the Yukon Territory of Canada and by British Columbia; SW. by the Pacific Ocean, and W. by Behring Sea and the Arctic Ocean. Its land area is estimated at 590,800 sq. m., or about as large as Great Britain, Ireland, France, and Spain combined. The northern portion of Alaska, containing five-sixths of its area, consists essentially of a vast expanse of moor or tundra, broken here and there by mountain-spurs (an especially marked feature in the south), and varied by countless lakes, water-courses, and swamps. About one-third of this region lies within the Arctic Circle. The winter climate is here terribly severe, and the short summers are rendered almost unendurable by clouds of mosquitoes or gnats. This region is traversed by the great river Yukon, about 2000 miles long, the Kuskoquim, and other large streams. Its population is Innuit or Eskimo, in the north and on the coast, but Athabascan or Tinneh (Red Indian) elsewhere. The fisheries and the fur-trade afford subsistence to the scanty population. A second section comprises the Aleutian Islands (q.v.), and a great part of the peninsula of Aliaska. This division is mountainous, and actively volcanic. It is very thinly peopled by the Aleuts. The Pribylof Islands, in Behring Sea, are the main seat of the capture of the fur-seal. South-eastern Alaska consists of a narrow strip of continental land, together with the Alexander Archipelago, lying near the mainland. This region is extremely mountainous, and has many great glaciers nearly reaching the sea. The climate on the tide-level is singularly mild for the latitude, but almost incessant rains prevail. The country is well timbered, and the waters abound in valuable fish. The natives are Indians of the Haida and Thlinket races. Alaska has a very small English-speaking white population, and a few semi-Russian natives. Gold is mined in the Yukon and Tanana valleys, at Cape Nome, and elsewhere. Coal, mostly of poor quality, is common.

A few cattle are kept near the settlements, but the climate is so wet that sheep cannot do well. Some potatoes and a few garden vegetables are grown. The native animals include the reindeer, the moose, the Rocky Mountain sheep, bears, wolves, and foxes; the muskrat, ermine, mink, sable, lynx, beaver, wolverene, squirrel, hare, porcupine, and marmot; the sea and river otter; fur, hair, and other seals, and the walrus. The fisheries are very important. Among the valuable food fishes are the cod, herring, halibut, and salmon of several species. The principal towns of the territory are all small, and most of them are on the coast. Among them are Sitka, Nome (pop. 12,500), Fairbanks, and Juneau. The latter is now the administrative centre; and Skagway is the port for the access to Klondike by the White Pass. Illoolook is on Oonalashka Island. Alaska, formerly called Russian America, was first visited by the Russians under Vitus Behring in 1741. In 1799 the whole country passed under control of the Russian American Company. In 1867 the United States purchased the entire territory from Russia for $7,200,000 in gold. Pop. (1910) 64,356 whites, and 30,000 Eskimos and Indians.

Ala-tau ('mottled'), a range of lofty mountains forming the boundary between Turkestan and Mongolia, and the northern limit of the great tableland of Central Asia. It is made up of five sierra-like sub-ranges, all grouped round Lake Issik-Kul, which range in elevation from 10,000 to 15,000 feet. The loftiest peak, Khan Tengri, is 24,000 feet above the sea.

Alatyr, a Russian town, on the Sura, 103 miles NW. of Simbirsk; pop. 16,000.

Alausi, a town of Ecuador, 70 miles E. of Guayaquil, 7980 feet above the sea; pop. 6000.

Al'ava, the southern and largest, but most sparsely populated, of the three Basque provinces of Spain. Mountains are scattered through the whole province, and yield various minerals, stone, and timber in abundance. Area, 1200 sq. m. The inhabitants, who are chiefly Basques, number a little over 96,500. The soil is generally fertile, and along the Ebro fruits and wine are produced. The capital is Vittoria.

Alba (anc. Alba Pompeia), a very ancient city of North Italy, on the Tanaro, 41 miles SW. of Alessandria, with an old cathedral. Pop. 7000.

Albacete (Al-ba-thay'teh), capital of a Spanish province, 140 miles SE. of Madrid by rail, in a fertile but treeless plain; pop. 22,000.—The province is partly formed from the former kingdom of Murcia, and partly from New Castile. It is generally hilly, in some parts attaining 5000 feet, and has some mineral wealth. Area, 5972 sq. m.; pop. 259,000.

Albania, till 1912–13 a western province of European Turkey, thereafter, with diminished area (c. 12,000 sq. m.), an independent kingdom, extends along the western shore of the Balkan Peninsula, from the river Bojana to Cape Stylos, opposite Corfu. To the north it is bounded, since 1878–1913, by Montenegrin territory and Lake Scutari; on the east by the territories added to Servia in 1913 and by Lake Ochrida; to the south by Greece's acquisitions in Epirus and Macedonia. The country is mountainous, attaining in places about 8000 feet. Parallel with its eastern boundary is a mountain-range. Westward of this range lie parallel chains, enclosing long elevated valleys, sinking to level strips along the coast, which mostly consist of unhealthy swamps and lagoons. The highlands advance to the sea, forming steep rocky coasts. One promontory, the Acroceraunian, projecting in Cape Linguetta far into the sea, reaches a height of 6642 feet.

A fine climate and a favourable soil would seem to invite the inhabitants to agriculture, but for the most part in vain. In the north, little is cultivated but maize, with some rice and barley, in the valleys; whilst the mountain terraces are used as pastures for numerous herds of cattle and sheep. In the south the slopes of the lower valleys are covered with olives, fruit, and mulberry trees, intermixed with patches of vines and maize; while the densely wooded mountain-ridges furnish valuable supplies of timber.

Upper or Northern Albania formed part of the Illyria of the Romans; Lower or Southern Albania was part of ancient Epirus, and the Greek element in its population resented and opposed its inclusion in the new kingdom. The greater part of the country's 800,000 inhabitants form a peculiar people, the Albanians, called by the Turks Arnauts, and by themselves Skipetars. According to Lord Strangford, 'the true Albanian part of their language, after precipitation of the foreign elements, is distinctly Indo-European, and is more closely connected with Greek than with any other Indo-European language existing or recorded (Letters on Philological Subjects, 1878). The Albanians are half-civilised mountaineers, frank to a friend, vindictive to an enemy. They are constantly under arms, and are more devoted to robbery than to cattle-rearing and agriculture. They live in perpetual anarchy, every village being at war with its neighbour. Many of them serve as mercenaries in other countries, and they form the best soldiers of the Turkish army. At one time the Albanians were all Christians; but after the death of their last chief, the hero Scanderbeg, in 1467, and their subjugation by the Turks, a large part became Mohammedans. The Albanians are by most writers divided tribally into Gheghs, Tosks, Ljaps, &c.; but again, to quote Lord Strangford, 'the true and intelligible division is that of religious denomination. The typical region of the Mussulmans is in the centre; that of the Latins is in the northern district; and that of the Albanians in communion with the Greek Church is in the south. Of the 1,500,000 Albanians of Albania and Turkey, it is estimated that 1,000,000 are Mohammedans, 280,000 members of the Greek Church, and 120,000 Roman Catholics. There are, besides, some 300,000 Albanians in Greece; and 100,000 in Italy (Sicily mostly), whither they emigrated towards the close of the 15th century. By the treaty concluded then, in 1478, between the Turks and the Venetians, Albania became a Turkisk province, which almost gained independence under Ali Pasha, but which, during the insurrection of Greece (1821–28), returned to at least nominal allegiance to the Porte. Many rebellions broke out—as in 1883 and in 1911–12. In spite of Montenegrin, Servian, and Greek ambitions, the Powers insisted on its independence in 1912–1913, and Prince William of Wied was chosen as king.

Alba'no, a town of Italy, 13 miles SSE. of Rome, on the declivity of the lava-walls which encompass Lake Albano, and opposite the site of Alba Longa. It is the seat of a bishop, and is surrounded by the mansions of wealthy Romans. There are numerous remains of ancient buildings. Good wine is made here. Pop. 9560.

The ALBAN LAKE, or Lago di Castello, is formed in the basin of an extinct volcano, and has a circumference of 6 miles, with a depth of 530 feet. Its surface is 961 feet above the sea-level. While the Romans were at war with Veii (390 B.C.), they opened a tunnel through the lava-wall which bounds it. The tunnel, which still fulfils its ancient office, is a mile in length, with a height of 7 feet, and a width of 4 feet.

Albany is a division of the eastern province of the Cape, in which Grahamstown (q.v.) stands.

Albany, capital of the state of New York, and seat of justice of Albany county, stands on the west bank of Hudson River, 142 miles N. of the city of New York. The river is an important channel of commerce, which is further facilitated by the Erie and Champlain canals; and six important railway lines centre here. The city has a copious water-supply, and excellent drainage and sewerage systems, and is lighted by electricity and gas. Albany has a fine city hall, a high school, one large and several small public parks, a theatre, an opera-house and a music-hall, a celebrated county prison; Roman Catholic and Episcopalian cathedrals; a noted state normal school, a law school, a medical college; an observatory, a large United States government building, and a very costly and splendid state capitol, considered the finest building of its class in the whole republic. Three bridges and several ferries cross the river to the suburban towns of East Albany, Greenbush, and Bath. Albany has a large trade in timber, grain (especially barley), and cattle. Leading articles of manufacture are cast-iron stoves and heating apparatus, farming implements, boots and shoes, bricks, wagons, clothing, flour, stoves, castings and hollow-ware, furniture, ales and beer, malt, tobacco, cigars, musical instruments, and stationers' goods. The winter climate of Albany is severe for its latitude. The extensive cattle-markets are situated at West Albany. Near the site of Albany the Dutch founded a fur-trading station in 1614. The Dutch colony was ceded to Great Britain in 1664, and the town took its present name in honour of the Duke of York and Albany, afterwards James II. of England, who received a grant of the colony. In 1686 a city charter was granted to Albany, which is thus the oldest chartered city in the United States. In 1807 Albany became the capital of the state. Till the 19th-century period the city had many of the quaint characteristics of a Dutch town. Pop. (1800) 5349; (1830) 24,209; (1860) 62,367; (1890) 94,923; (1910) 100,253.

Albany, in Western Australia, on King George's Sound, 352 miles SSE. of Perth by rail, has been superseded by Fremantle as a port of call for mail steamers from England; pop. 4000.

Albay, a town in the south end of the Philippine island of Luzon, 2 miles from the Bay of Albay; pop. 13,000.

Albemarle Sound, a shallowish inlet in the north coast of North Carolina, U.S., running 60 miles inland, with a breadth of 4 to 15 miles.

Alberta, from 1882 one of the four provisional districts of the North-west Territory of Canada, made a province of the Dominion in February 1905. It includes, besides the former district, about one-half of the former district of Athabasca and small parts of Saskatchewan and Assiniboia. The area is 255,000 sq. m. The SW. portion of the province contains the great cattle-ranches of Canada, and has good grass and water. But a vast amount of land is also suitable for agriculture; in some parts without irrigation, and in other parts irrigation works have been made. Calgary and Edmonton are thriving towns. Coal is abundant on the Bow and Belly rivers; timber is plentiful; there is also petroleum, and the Rocky Mountains and their foot-hills are rich in minerals. The capital is Edmonton (q.v.). Pop. (1901) 73,022; (1911) 374,663.

Albert Lea, a city in Freeborn county, Minnesota, on a lake of the same name, 100 miles S. of St Paul. It contains flour-mills, grain-elevators, and machine-shops. Three railways centre here. Pop. 10,000.

Albert-Edward Nyanza (Muta Nzige), now called EDWARD, a lake of Equatorial Africa, discovered by Stanley in 1876, and again visited by him in 1889. It occupies the southern end of a vast natural depression, of which the Albert Nyanza fills the northern extremity; is due south of the mountain mass of Ruwenzori; and is surrounded by wide grassy plains. A NE. extension is known as Lake George. It is 3307 feet above sea-level; and beyond the depression in which it lies is a tableland from 5500 to 6500 feet high. The water of the lake flows into the Albert Nyanza by the Semliki River.

Albert Nyanza (Mwutan Nzige, Luta Nzige), a large lake of East Central Africa, is situated in a deep rock-basin, 80 miles NW. of the Victoria Nyanza. It is of an oblong shape, 100 miles long from N. to S., and 25 broad. On the E. it is fringed by precipitous cliffs, with isolated peaks rising 5000 feet above it. The lake itself lies 2720 feet above the sea, and 1470 feet below the general level of the country; its water is fresh and sweet, and it is of great depth towards the centre. The N. and W. shores of the lake are bordered by the Blue Mountains, nearly 10,000 feet in height. The existence of this vast lake first became known to Europeans through Speke and Grant in 1862; in 1864 Sir Samuel Baker was the first European to visit it, and named it after the Prince Consort. In 1887 Emin Pasha recorded his conviction that the western part of the lake was filling up. It is a great reservoir or backwater of the Nile. The Somerset-Nile runs into its north-east corner, and the Nile issues out of its north-west corner.

Albert River, North Queensland, traverses a grassy plain, and flows 200 miles to the Gulf of Carpentaria, below Burketown. It is connected by a cross branch with another nearly parallel stream, the Gregory.

Albi, capital of the French dep. of Tarn, is built on a height near the Tarn, a tributary of the Garonne, 42 miles by rail NE. of Toulouse. It is very old, and suffered greatly during the persecutions of the Albigenses, who took their name from it. The chief buildings are the cathedral (1282–1512), the old fortress, and the archbishop's palace. Pop. 15,000.

Albion, a town of Michigan, U.S., on the Kalamazoo River, 96 miles W. of Detroit. It is the seat of a Methodist college, with over 300 students. Pop. 6000.

Albuera (Albooai'ra), in the Spanish province of Estremadura, a hamlet, famous for Beresford's defeat of the French, May 16, 1811.

Albufera (Alboofai'ra), a Spanish lake 10 miles long, close to the sea and connected by canal (7 miles) with Valencia.

Al'bula, a pass (7595 feet; ⅜ mile long) and a mountain-stream in the Swiss canton of Grisons.

Albuñol, a small town of Spain, 40 miles SE. of Granada. Pop. 10,000.

Albuquerque (Albookerkay), a town of Spain, 24 miles N. of Badajoz, near the Portuguese frontier. Pop. 7400.

Al'bury (or 'Federal City'), on the New South Wales bank of the Murray River, at the head of its navigation, and 190 miles NE. of Melbourne by rail. Pop. 7000.

Alcala' de Guadaira, a town of Spain, 9 miles E. by S. from Seville by rail, celebrated for producing the finest bread in Spain. Pop. 8000.

Alcala' de Henares, a town in Spain, Cervantes's birthplace, on the Henares, 21 miles E. of Madrid by rail. Its university, founded by Cardinal Ximenes in 1510, enjoyed a European fame, but was removed to Madrid in 1836, and the town is now not a shadow of its former self. Here was printed in 1517 the great Complutensian Bible, a monument of the piety and learning of the great cardinal. The chief buildings are the Colegio de San Ildefonso, the seat of the ancient university; its chapel containing the founder's tomb; the archbishop's palace; the cathedral; and the church of Santa Maria, in which, in 1547, Cervantes was baptised. Pop. 16,000. The Complutum of the Romans, the town owes its modern name to the Moors, under whom it was Al-Kalat, 'the castle.'

Alcala' la Re'al ('the royal castle'), a city of Andalusia, Spain, in the province of Jaen, 26 miles NW. of Granada. Its strong fortress was taken in 1340 from the Moors by Alfonso XI. in person, whence the name Real. Pop. 17,000.

Al'camo, a quaint old town of Sicily, 52 miles SW. of Palermo by rail. Originally founded by the Saracens on Monte Bonifato (2713 feet), it long retained a Moslem population, who were driven out by the Emperor Frederick II. in 1233, when the new town was built at the foot of the hill. Pop. 50,000.

Alcañiz', a town of Aragon, Spain, in the province of Teruel, 63 miles SE. of Saragossa, on the Guadalope, with a magnificent collegiate church; pop. 8000.

Alcan'tara (Arabic, 'the bridge'), an old Spanish town in Estremadura, on a rocky height above the Tagus, near the Portuguese frontier. The six-arched bridge, 670 feet long and 210 high, from which it takes its name, was built under Trajan, 105 A.D. It has twice been partially blown up, but the larger part is still intact. Pop. 3400.

Alcan'tara, a seaport of Brazil, in the province of Maranhão, on the Bay of St Marcos; pop. 10,000.

Alcaude'te, a town of Spain, 22 miles SW. of Jaen. Pop. 10,000.

Alcazar al-kebir, a city of Morocco, 80 miles NW. of Fez. Here, in 1578, Sebastian, king of Portugal, was defeated and slain by the Moors. Pop. 9000.

Alcazar de San Juan, a town of Spain, in the province of Ciudad Real, 92 miles SSE. of Madrid by rail. Pop. 10,000.

Alcester, a Warwickshire market-town, at the confluence of the Alne and Arrow, 15 miles WSW. of Warwick. Pop. 2400.

Alci'ra, a town of Spain, 22 miles SSW. of Valencia by rail, on an island in the river Xucar; pop. 19,469.

Alcoy, a town of Spain, on the river Alcoy, 15 miles N. of Alicante, manufacturing paper, especially cigarette-paper, sugar-plums, and coarse woollen cloths; pop. 34,000.

Aldborough, a decayed town, now a mere village, of the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the river Ure and on Watling Street, 7½ miles SE. of Ripon. Till 1832 it sent two members to parliament. Extensive remains of the Roman town of Isurium have been found here. Pop. of township, 400.

Aldeburgh, a small seaport and watering-place of Suffolk, 29 miles NE. of Ipswich by rail. It was disfranchised in 1832; but in 1885 it received a new municipal charter. It has a quaint, half-timbered Moot Hall; and in the church is a bust of the poet Crabbe, who was a native. Pop. 2400.

Alderney (Fr. Aurigny), a British island in the English Channel, 55 miles S. by E. of Portland Bill, 15 NE. of Guernsey, 31 N. of Jersey, and 10 W. of Cape la Hogue. The Race of Alderney, or strait that separates it from the coast of Normandy, is very dangerous in stormy weather. The island is 4¼ miles by 1½ mile; area, 3 sq. m. The highest point is 281 feet above sea-level. To the S. the coast is bold and lofty; to the N. it descends, forming numerous small bays, one of which has been formed into a fine, though uncompleted, harbour, with a granite breakwater, at a cost, including strong fortifications, of more than £1,250,000. The Caskets are a small cluster of dangerous rocks, 6¾ miles to the W., on which are three lighthouses. The soil in the centre of the island is highly productive; the Alderney cattle are a small but handsome breed. Half the inhabitants, originally French, now speak English, and all understand it. Protestantism has prevailed here since the Reformation. Alderney is a dependency of Guernsey, and subject to the British crown. The 'town' of St Anne is situated in a picturesque valley near the centre of the island. It has an Albert memorial in the shape of a Gothic arch, and a cruciform church (1850) in the Early English style, with a tower 104 feet high. The population of the island has long fluctuated above and below 2000. See CHANNEL ISLANDS.

Aldershot Camp, a permanent camp of exercise on the confines of Hampshire, Surrey, and Berkshire, 35 miles SW. of London, and 18½ S. of Windsor. It was established in 1854–55 during the Crimean war, to provide for practical instruction in tactics, outpost duties, and other exercises requiring a wide tract of country and large bodies of troops, &c. From its situation on the Bagshot Sands it is extremely healthy; the old wooden huts have been superseded by brick huts and barracks. The Basingstoke Canal, running directly across the Heath, has occasioned a division into North Camp and South Camp. There are usually from 10,000 to 15,000 troops of all arms at the camp; and a considerable town has sprung up near it, with a population of over 35,000, as against 875 in Aldershot parish in 1851.

Aldwinkle All Saints, a Northamptonshire parish, on the Nen, 3 miles NNE. of Thrapston. Dryden was a native, as was Fuller of the adjoining parish of Aldwinkle St Peter.

Aldworth. See HASLEMERE.

Ale, a Roxburghshire stream, flowing 24 miles to the Teviot.

Alemtejo (Alen^{g}tai'zho), the largest (9381 sq. m.) but most sparsely peopled of the provinces of Portugal. The chief towns are Evora (the capital), Elvas, and Portalegre. Pop. 416,000.

Alençon (Alon^{g}son^{g}), chief town of the dep. of Orne, on the Sarthe, 68 miles SSE. of Caen. The cathedral of Notre Dame (1553–1617) is a Gothic edifice, with good stained glass. Woollens and linens, embroidered fabrics, straw-hats, lacework, artificial flowers, hosiery, &c. are made; the manufacture of the famous Alençon point-lace (point d'Alençon) employs barely a tenth part of the 20,000 hands that once engaged in it. The cutting of the so-called Alençon diamonds (quartz-crystals) is an industry which has also greatly declined, as has also bleaching. Pop. 14,000.

Aleppo (Italianised form of Haleb), a town in the north of Syria, capital of a Turkish province between the Orontes and the Euphrates, in a fruitful valley watered by the Kuweik. It stands in a large hollow, surrounded by rocky hills of limestone, and beyond is mere desert. The fruitful gardens, celebrated for their excellent plantations of pistachios, are the sole contrast to the desolation which environs the city, whose numberless cupolas and minarets, clean, well-paved streets, and stately houses, make it even yet one of the most beautiful in the East. Till the discovery of the sea-route to India, it was a principal emporium of trade between Europe and Asia. It supplied a great part of the East with fabrics of silk, cotton, and wool, and gold and silver stuffs; but in 1822 an earthquake swallowed up two-thirds of the houses. The plague of 1827, the cholera of 1832, and the oppression of the Egyptian government, all but completed its destruction. It has only partially recovered from its misfortunes, but is still the principal emporium of the inland commerce of Northern Syria. Its port is Scanderoon. Aleppo has a large trade in cotton and silk goods, skins, tobacco, wine, and oil; and manufactures much-admired cloth (of silk, cotton, and wool), carpets, cloaks, and soap. English goods are largely imported. The trade is mainly in the hands of the native Christians (Greeks and Armenians), who may number 20,000, and have superseded the European houses formerly here. The Jews, 5000 in number, are a very wealthy community. Aleppo is a telegraph station on the Indo-European line. Pop. 210,000.

Aleshki, a Russian town in the government of Taurida, on the Dnieper; pop. 9915.

Alessandria, the capital of a province of Northern Italy, in a marshy country near the confluence of the Bormida and Tanaro, 58 miles ESE. of Turin. It was built in 1168 by the inhabitants of Cremona, Milan, and Placentia, as a bulwark against the Emperor Frederick I., and was afterwards called Alessandria in honour of Pope Alexander III. In 1800, Bonaparte here concluded an armistice. It was the principal stronghold of the Piedmontese during the insurrection of 1848–49. The citadel is still one of the strongest fortresses in Italy, and in war the whole surrounding country can be inundated. The cathedral was rebuilt in 1823. Pop. 76,000.

Alessio, an Albanian port at the mouth of the Drin, 17 miles SE. of Scutari, occupied by Montenegrins and Servians during the war of 1912; pop. 3000.

Aletsch, the largest glacier (12½ miles long) in Europe, sweeps round the southern side of the Jungfrau. NW. is the Aletschhorn (13,773 feet).

Aleutian Islands, a chain of about 150 islands, in several groups, extending westward from the American peninsula of Aliaska, and forming an insular continuation of that peninsula towards the Asiatic peninsula of Kamchatka. These islands are chiefly included in the United States territory of Alaska, and fall into five groups—the Fox, Andreanov, Rat (Kreesi), Blizhni, and Komandorski Islands. The chain is apparently a continuation of the main Alaskan range of mountains, and contains volcanic peaks from 4000 to 8000 feet high. The islands abound in springs, and are overrun with foxes, dogs, and reindeer, while the coasts swarm with fish, seals, and otters. The 2000 inhabitants, of mixed descent, from the aboriginal Eskimos and Russian settlers, are hunters and fishers, and trade in furs and fish. See works cited at ALASKA.

Alexandra Park, a place of public recreation for northern London, 6 miles N. of Charing Cross. It was opened in 1863, and its present 'palace' dates from 1873, its predecessor having been burnt. Horse-races take place here.

Alexandretta. See SCANDEROON.

Alexandria was founded by Alexander the Great in 332 B.C. It was situated originally on the low tract of land which separates the lake Mareotis from the Mediterranean, 14 miles west of the Canopic mouth of the Nile. In the Mediterranean, off the city, lay an island, on whose NE. point stood the famous lighthouse, the Pharos, built in the 3d century B.C., and said to have been 400 feet high. The island was connected with the mainland by a mole, thus forming the two harbours. Alexandria had reached its greatest splendour when, on the death of Cleopatra, the last of the Ptolemies, in 30 B.C. it came into the possession of the Romans. Its population may have numbered 300,000 free citizens, and a larger number of slaves. Its glory was long unaffected, and it was the emporium of the world's commerce, especially for corn. In the reign of Caracalla, however, it suffered severely; and the rise of Constantinople promoted the decay of Alexandria. Christianity was introduced, according to tradition, by St Mark. The strife between Christianity and heathenism—powerfully described in Kingsley's Hypatia—gave rise to bloody contests in Alexandria. The Serapeum, the last seat of heathen theology and learning, was stormed by the Christians in 389 A.D., and converted into a Christian church. Alexandria was a chief seat of Christian theology till it was taken by the Arabs in 641. The choice of Cairo as capital of the Egyptian califs hastened the now rapid decay of the city; the discovery of America, and of the passage to India by the Cape of Good Hope, very much diminished its trade; and when, in 1517, the Turks took the place, the remains of its former splendour wholly vanished. In 1778 Alexandria contained no more than 6000 inhabitants. Under Mehemet Ali, however, the tide turned, and the city recovered rapidly. It is now again one of the most important commercial places on the Mediterranean. The Suez Canal diverted part of its trade; but this was more than compensated by the general impetus given to Egyptian prosperity. In 1882, during the rising of Arabi Pasha, an English fleet, in the interests of the khedive, bombarded the forts of Alexandria for over ten hours, July 11. On the two following days the town was sacked and plundered by the soldiery and populace, and great part of it destroyed by fire.

The present city (called Skanderi'eh by the Arabs) is chiefly built on the mole, which has been increased by alluvial deposits till it has become a broad neck of land between the two harbours. The city is a strange mixture of East and West, old and new. The unpaved native town contains poor houses and wretched huts. The ever-increasing Frankish quarters have quite a well-lit European appearance, and swarm with cafés, shops, theatres, and the like. The castle stands near the old Pharos, and the handsome new lighthouse has a revolving light, visible at a distance of 20 miles. Recent improvements, undertaken at a cost of £2,000,000, were to convert the old harbour—the western one—into one of the best and most spacious on the Mediterranean. There is railway communication with Cairo and Suez; the Mahmoudieh Canal connects Alexandria with the Nile. The recent growth of the city has been extraordinary. Pop. (1825) 16,000; (1840) 60,000; (1882) 227,064; (1907) 332,246, of whom 67,000 were foreigners, many Greeks, Italians, and French. The value of exports (cotton, cotton seed, lentils, wheat, oil seed, hemp, drugs) varied in 1891–1909 from £10,000,000 to £25,000,000 (two-thirds going to Britain); of imports, from £5,000,000 to £19,000,000 (half from Britain). Of the few remaining objects of antiquity the most prominent is Pompey's Pillar, as it is erroneously called. Of the so-called Cleopatra's Needles—two obelisks of the 16th century B.C. which long stood here—one was brought to England and erected on the Thames Embankment, 1878; and the other, presented by the khedive to the United States, was set up at New York in 1881.

Alexandria, a town of Dumbartonshire, on the west bank of the Leven, opposite Bonhill, 3 miles N. of Dumbarton. It has grown from a mere 'clachan' to a thriving town, such growth being due to the neighbouring cotton-printing, bleaching, and Turkey-red dye-works, established since 1768. Pop. 6000.

Alexandria, a port of entry on the right or Virginian bank of the Potomac, U.S., 7 miles below Washington (on the opposite side of the river), and 100 from the entrance of the Potomac into Chesapeake Bay, whence the largest vessels may reach the port. There are cotton manufactures here. Pop. (1870) 13,570; (1890) 14,339; (1900) 14,528; (1910) 15,329.

Alexandropol (formerly Gumri), the largest town in the Erivan district of Russian Armenia, with a stronghold commanding the head-waters of the Euphrates. The silk trade is actively carried on. Pop. 35,000.

Alexandrov, a town in the Russian government of Vladimir, 58 miles NE. of Moscow. Pop. 8200.

Alexandrovsk, (1) a Russian town in the government of Ekaterinoslav, on the Dnieper; pop. 17,500.—(2) A port in Siberia, opposite Saghalien.—(3) A town in the Don province, near Novo-Tcherkask; pop. 46,000.—See also KOLA.

Alexinatz, a town of Servia, on the Moravitza, 134 miles SSE. of Belgrade by rail. Pop. 6000.

Alford, (1) an urban district of Lincolnshire, 23 miles NNE. of Boston; population, 2400.—(2) A village of Aberdeenshire, 30 miles NW. of Aberdeen. Here Montrose defeated the Covenanters under Baillie, 2d July 1645. Pop. 600.

Alfoxton Park, in Somerset, 12 miles WNW. of Bridgwater, was Wordsworth's home in 1797–98.

Alfreton, an urban district of Derbyshire, 14 miles NNE. of Derby by rail. It has manufactures of hats, stockings, and brown earthenware, with neighbouring collieries and ironworks. Pop. 20,000.

Algarve, the smallest and most southerly of the provinces of Portugal. The name is Arabic, and means 'a land lying to the west.' It was a Moorish province till 1253. Area, 1873 sq. m.; pop. 255,000. The northern part of the province is occupied by a range of barren mountains of 4000 feet high, terminating in Cape St Vincent. The chief town is Faro.

Algeci'ras, or ALGEZIRAS, a town of Spain, on the Bay of Gibraltar, 5 miles by water (9 by road) W. of Gibraltar. Its harbour is bad, but it possesses a good dock. It was the first town in Spain taken by the Moors (711); in 1344 it was retaken by Alfonso XI. of Castile, after a twenty months' siege. He destroyed the old Moorish town; the modern one was built by Charles III. in 1760. An International Conference with reference to Morocco was held here in 1906. Pop. 14,000.

Algeria (Fr. Algérie), a country on the north coast of Africa, which has since 1830 been a French possession, and is now regarded as an outlying part of France rather than as a colony. It lies between Morocco and Tunis, and is usually defined as extending from the Mediterranean to about the 30th parallel of N. lat. on the south. But the southern boundary, separating the Algerian Sahara from the rest of French Sahara (which now extends southwards to a line drawn west from Lake Chad to the Niger), is very arbitrary. The total area, with the northern or Algerian Sahara, is about 255,000 sq. m., or more than twice the size of Great Britain and Ireland. From the coast inwards Algeria is marked off into three distinct regions: in the north, the Tell—mountainous, cultivated land, with fruitful valleys; in the middle, the region of Steppes —mountainous tableland, producing much grass and other fodder for cattle after the rains, and traversed from west to east by a string of brackish lakes or marshes, called Shotts; while farther south is the Algerian Sahara, with oases. In the northern part of the Tell is a series of mountain-chains, called by the French the Lesser Atlas or Coast Mountains; while the south limit is a parallel chain, the Middle Atlas. The Tell, the most fertile and much the most populous section of Algeria, occupies an area altogether of about 54,000 sq. m. The Algerian Sahara consists partly of sandy dunes, partly of country covered after rain with herbage; and there are oases round the wells.

The more considerable streams of Algeria rise in the middle region, and have therefore to seek their outlet in the Mediterranean, through passes in the middle and coast ranges. Though swollen in the winter, they shrink in the summer to a thread, or even quite out of sight. Not one of them is navigable, but they are used for purposes of irrigation. The Shelïf is the longest and largest.

The climate of Algeria is distinguished into only three seasons: winter, from November to February; spring, from March to June; summer, from July to October. The planting of forests, drainage, and irrigation, by the French, have effected great improvements. In the Sahara, by the sinking of artesian wells, desert tracts have been converted into cultivated land, and in ten years the inhabitants of the oases of the northern Sahara increased from 6600 to 13,000, while about 517,000 palms and 90,000 fruit-trees are now counted. Algeria is coming to the front as a wheat-growing country. Fruits and vegetables are grown for the markets in France, England, and Germany. The cultivation of the vine, silk, and tobacco is rapidly extending. Phosphates are obtained in large quantities, and petroleum has recently been found in Oran. The forest vegetation of Algeria is extremely rich by nature, comprising pine, oak, cedar, pistachio, mastic, carob, olive, myrtle. Special exports are cork and halfa or esparto grass. Algeria has a very considerable wealth of metals, iron and copper being abundant, also lead and zinc. Over 100 mineral springs are counted in Algeria.

Algeria has two divisions—Northern and Southern. Northern Algeria is divided into three departments:

	Area in sq. m.	Pop. 1911.
Algiers department	65,930	1,720,881
Oran	44,620	1,230,195
Constantine	73,930	2,118,446
	184,480	5,069,522
Southern Algeria	159,000	494,306
Total	343,480	5,563,828

The number of Europeans (in 1830 only 600; in 1840, 27,000; in 1881, 400,000) was in 1906 about 600,000, of whom 449,000 were French by origin or naturalisation, and 117,000 Spanish, and 64,000 naturalised Jews, besides Italians, Germans, &c. The native population are partly Arabs (including Bedouins), partly Berbers or Kabyles; the Moors of the towns being of mixed descent from these two stocks. In 1910 about 2000 English miles of railway were open for traffic, and the telegraph had over 8900 miles of line.

The trade of Algeria shows a constant increase. Since the French occupation, the imports have increased fifty and the exports one hundred fold. The imports, three-fourths of which come from France, have varied of late years from £16,000,000 to £22,000,000. The exports, two-thirds of which go to France, varied from £11,000,000 to over £20,000,000. The imports are chiefly manufactured cotton, hemp, linen, silk, and woollen stuffs; cloth, sugar, hides, paper, liquors, metals, building materials, &c. The exports are wine, cereals, wool, raw hides, animals, minerals, early fruit, halfa and other vegetable fibres, cork, iron, copper, and lead ores.

Part of the present Algeria was anciently included in Numidia and part in Mauritania. Occupied and partially Romanised by the Romans, it was overrun by the Vandals in the 5th century. Later came the Arabs, who began about the 9th century to establish Mohammedan dynasties and states. Hither emigrated many of the Moors expelled from Spain. From the middle ages downward, the Algerian coast towns were known to Europe mainly as nests of pirates. The French conquered the country, not without much fighting, in 1830. From 1834 down to 1870 Algeria was entirely under military rule. At that date a civil governor-general was substituted, assisted by a council. The colonists send two deputies and one senator for each department to the French Chambers. See works by Leroy-Beaulieu (1897), Hilton-Simpson (1906), Stanford (1912), and Devereux (1912).

Alghero (Algai'ro), a seaport on the west coast of the island of Sardinia, 15 miles SW. of Sassari. It has a cathedral. Pop. 10,000.

Algiers (Aljeers'; Fr. Alger; Ar. Al-jezair, 'the islands'), the capital of Algeria, was built about 935 A.D. by an Arab chief. It rises from the sea-shore up the sides of a precipitous hill in the form of an equilateral triangle. The apex is formed by the Kasbah, the ancient fortress of the deys, which is 500 feet above sea-level. With the exception of some mosques, the new or low town consists of wharfs, warehouses, government houses, squares, and streets, principally built and inhabited by the French; while the old or high town is almost wholly Moorish. The great glory of the city is the Boulevard de la République, with its magnificent terrace, built in 1860–66 by Sir Morton Peto, at a cost of eight million francs. Here may be found as motley a crowd as anywhere in the world, denizens of all nations—Arabs, Moors, and Jews; French, Spaniards, Maltese, English, Germans, and Italians. The shops, too, are occasionally very good. The French have at great expense improved the port, which is safe and spacious and has a lighthouse. It is strongly fortified, and is an important coaling-station. The original harbour was made in 1525 by connecting with the shore four little islands (hence the name of the city). Near the great quays is the railway station, connecting Algiers with Constantine and Oran. The town has a Catholic cathedral, a French Protestant church, an English church, a synagogue, a library, museum, hospitals, theatres, and banks. There is a great trade, Algiers being the chief commercial place in Algeria. Algiers has become famous as a winter residence for Europeans suffering from chest diseases. It fell into the hands of the French in 1830. Pop. (1906) 138,240; with suburbs, 154,049—not quite half French.

Algoa Bay, a broad inlet at the eastern extremity of the south coast of Africa, with a sheltered anchorage except towards the south-east. On it stands Port Elizabeth (q.v.).

Alham'a (Arabic Al Hammám, 'the bath'), a decayed town of Andalusia, Spain, 24 miles SW.

of Granada. Its warm sulphur baths are still frequented by visitors. It was a famous fortress of the Moors; and there are still remains of Roman and Moorish buildings. The town was much injured by a severe earthquake in the end of 1885. Pop. 8000.—ALHAMA DE ARAGON, 8 miles SW. of Calatayud, has famous mineral springs. Pop. 2000.—ALHAMA, 13 miles SW of Murcia, is also celebrated for its warm mineral waters. Pop. 9000.

Alhambra, a fortified suburb of Granada, which forms a sort of acropolis to the city, and in which stand the exquisite remains of the palace of the ancient Moorish kings of Granada. The name is a corruption of the Arabic Kal 'at al hamra, 'the red castle.' It is surrounded by a strong wall, more than a mile in circuit, and studded with towers. One of them contains the famous Hall of the Ambassadors. The remains of the Moorish palace are called by the Spaniards the Casa Real. It was begun by Ibn-l-ahmar (1248), and completed by his grandson, Mohammed III., about 1314. The portions still standing are ranged round two oblong courts, one called the Court of the Fishpond, the other the Court of the Lions. They consist of porticos, pillared halls, cool chambers, small gardens, fountains, mosaic pavements, &c. In the most beautiful room in the palace, the Hall of the Abencerrages, to the beauty of colour and of ornamentation is added an arcade resting on light and graceful marble arches that run round the place. A great part of the ancient palace was removed to make way for the palace begun by Charles V., but never finished. Since then it has suffered from the neglect and greed of successive governors; from the French, who blew up eight of its towers and tried to destroy the whole; and from earthquake. A partial restoration was made at the expense of Queen Isabella (1862); but much damage was done by fire in September 1890. See the works by Washington Irving (1832), Owen Jones (1848), and Murphy (new ed. 1856).

Alican'te, chief town of a Spanish province, on a bay of the Mediterranean, 282 miles SE. of Madrid by rail. It is the third seaport in the kingdom. The chief exports are esparto grass, lead, wine, almonds, and liquorice root. Its climate is well suited for invalids. Population, 51,165.—The province, formed in 1834 of parts of the old kingdoms of Valencia and Murcia, has an area of 2098 sq. m. The wine of Alicante has a high reputation, and there are about twenty lead and copper mines. Pop. 484,000.

Aligarh (or Allygurh), a fort in the United Provinces of India, 55 miles N. of Agra. It was stormed by the British in 1803; and here early in the mutiny of 1857—ten days after the outbreak at Meerut—the native troops rose. There is here a Mohammedan Anglo-Indian college. Fort, station, and the native city of Koil form the municipality of Aligarh; pop. 64,285.

Alima, a right-hand tributary of the Congo, flowing mainly westward.

Aline, a sea-loch of Argyllshire.

Aliwal, a Punjab village on the Sutlej, 9 miles W. of Ludhiana; scene of a British victory over the Sikhs on 28th June 1846.—ALIWAL NORTH, a town of the Cape Province, just across the Orange from the Orange Free State, with a brisk trade; pop. 3500.—For ALIWAL SOUTH, see MOSSEL BAY.

Alkmaar, an old town of the Netherlands, on the North Holland Canal, 19 miles N. by W. of Amsterdam by rail. It has a Gothic town-house, the 15th-century church of St Lawrence, manufactures of sailcloth, sea-salt, &c., and trade in cattle, grain, butter, and excellent cheese—of which it exports enormous quantities. Alkmaar held out against Alba in 1573, and here, in 1799, the Duke of York signed a not very honourable capitulation. Pop. 21,261.

Allahabad ('city of God'), the seat of the government of the United Provinces of British India, occupies the fork of the Ganges and Jumna, 390 miles SE. of Delhi, and 564 WNW. of Calcutta. The situation of Allahabad, at the confluence of the holy streams of India, has rendered it a much-frequented place of pilgrimage. A stronghold existed here from the earliest times, but the present fort and city were founded by Akbar in 1575. From 1736 till 1750 the Mahrattas held Allahabad, which was ceded to the British in 1801. On 6th June 1857, the mutiny extended to Allahabad; and, the Europeans continuing to hold the fort, the city soon became little better than a heap of ruins. The position of Allahabad, with its ready communication by river and rail, renders it naturally a centre of commerce and civilisation. The most noteworthy buildings are the great mosque and the Sultan Khossor's caravanserai—a fine cloistered quadrangle. The fort contains the famous pillar of Asoka (240 B.C.). Near by is the temple covering the undying banian tree; it is said to communicate with Benares by a subterranean passage, through which flows a third holy river, the Saraswati, visible only to the eye of faith. Allahabad possesses the government offices and courts, Roman Catholic cathedral, Mayo Memorial and town hall, a free public library, &c. The Muir Central College, instituted by Sir W. Muir, was opened in 1886; and a university was opened in 1889. A great fair is held annually, which is visited by about 250,000 persons. The cotton, sugar, and indigo produce of the fertile district of Allahabad is brought in large quantities into the city. Pop. (1872) 143,693; (1911) 171,697.—ALLAHABAD district is 85 miles in length by 50 in breadth. Area, 2850 sq. m.; pop. 1,500,000.

Allan, (1) a tributary of the Forth, near Stirling.—(2) A tributary of the Teviot, near Hawick.

Alleghanies (Allegai'nies), a term sometimes used as synonymous with the Appalachians (q.v.), sometimes applied only to that portion of the system which extends from Pennsylvania to North Carolina, and which forms the watershed between the Atlantic and the Mississippi. It is sometimes used in a still more restricted sense. The ridges, 2000 to 2400 feet high, are remarkable for their parallelism and regularity, all the main valleys being longitudinal. Composed of stratified rocks of the Silurian, Devonian, and Carboniferous ages, they are rich in coal, iron, and limestone, and their forests supply much valuable timber.

Alleghany, a river, which, rising in the north part of Pennsylvania, unites with the Monongahela at Pittsburgh to form the Ohio. It is navigable for nearly 200 miles above Pittsburgh.

Allegheny, until 1906 one of the chief manufacturing cities of Pennsylvania, on the Alleghany River, opposite Pittsburgh. It is the terminus of important railway lines, and the site of the Western Penitentiary, a Presbyterian theological seminary, an observatory, the Carnegie Public Library, two large parks, a Catholic orphanage, and a college for coloured persons. The chief industries include rolling-mills for iron, cotton and woollen mills, breweries, foundries, a steel factory, blast-furnace, and locomotive works. It is a favourite place of residence for Pittsburgh business men. Pop. (1906, just before it became part of Pittsburgh) 145,240.

Allen, Bog of, a series of morasses east of the Shannon, in King's County and Kildare, Ireland, comprising about 150,000 acres. Their average elevation is 250 feet above sea-level. Lough Allen, in Leitrim, is a lake on the upper course of the Shannon (q.v.), 8900 acres in area.

Allendale, a town of Northumberland, on the Allen rivulet, 9 miles SW. of Hexham. Pop. of parish, 1000.

Allentown, a manufacturing town of Pennsylvania, U.S., on the Lehigh River, 60 miles NW. of Philadelphia by rail. The Lehigh Valley is rich in iron ore and anthracite coal, and has large blast-furnaces, ironworks, and rolling-mills; and there are manufactures of furniture and linen thread. Pop. (1860) 8025; (1880) 18,063; (1890) 25,228; (1900) 35,416; (1910) 51,913.

Alleppi. See Aulapolai.

Allier, a river of Central France, rising in the east of the dep. of Lozère, and flowing 233 miles northward through Haute-Loire, Puy-de-Dôme, and Allier, to the Loire below Nevers.

Allier, a dep. in the centre of France, has an area of 2822 sq. m., and a population of 406,000. Mineral springs are found at Vichy and elsewhere. The chief town is Moulins.

Allington, a Kentish parish, 1½ mile NNW. of Maidstone. It was the birthplace of Sir Thomas Wyatt the poet.

Alloa, a seaport town in Clackmannanshire, on the left bank of the tidal Forth, 6½ miles E. of Stirling, and 35 WNW. of Edinburgh. Among its buildings are the county court-house (1865), the handsome new town-hall (1888), the corn exchange (1862), and the parish church (1819); and its special feature is the Lime-tree Walk (1714), leading up from the harbour. It manufactures whisky, ale, woollen yarn, pottery, glass, iron, &c. There is some shipbuilding; and coals are exported from neighbouring pits. The harbour was improved in 1863. The Forth is here crossed by a railway viaduct (1885). Close by is Alloa House (1838), the seat of the Earl of Mar and Kellie, with Alloa Tower, 89 feet high, and built about 1223. Here Queen Mary spent part of her childhood, as also did James VI. and Prince Henry. Pop. 12,000.

Alloway, Burns's birthplace, and the scene of his Tam o' Shanter, lies on the right bank of the 'bonny Doon,' 2 miles S. of the town of Ayr. The 'auld clay biggin,' in which the poet was born on 25th January 1759, was in 1880 converted into a Burns Museum. The 'haunted kirk' still stands, a roofless ruin, near the 'Auld Brig;' and hard by is the Burns Monument (1820).

All-Saints' Bay, in the province of Bahia, Brazil, forms a superb natural harbour, measuring 37 by 25 miles.

Allygurh. See Aligarh.

Alma, a river in the Crimea, rising at the foot of the Tchadir Dagh, and flowing westward into the Bay of Kalamita, half-way between Eupatoria and Sebastopol. On its steep banks a brilliant victory was won on 20th of September 1854, by the allied armies of Britain and France, under Lord Raglan and Marshal St Arnaud, over the Russian army commanded by Prince Menschikoff.

Alma'da, a town of Portugal, in the province of Estremadura, built upon a height over the Tagus, opposite Lisbon. Pop. 8000.

Almaden' ('the mines'), a town of Spain, in the Sierra Morena, 50 miles SW. of Ciudad Real. It is famous for its twelve rich quicksilver mines, which are known to have yielded 140,000 tons of metal. The present mines, 1200 feet deep, date from the 17th century; but the quicksilver was worked here by the Romans. Crown property, they were rented by the Fuggers of Augsburg (1525–1645), and by the Rothschilds (1836–63), but are now again carried on by government. Pop. 9000.—New Almaden, in the Coast Range, California, 12 miles from San José, was first worked regularly for mercury in 1845, and used to yield upwards of 2,000,000 lb. a year.

Almagro, a town of Spain, 13 miles ESE. of Ciudad Real. It has a great manufacture of lace. Pop. 9000.

Almali. See Elmalu.

Almansa, a town of Spain in the province of Albacete, 60 miles NW. of Alicante by rail. There is a ruined Moorish castle. An obelisk, about a mile distant, marks the spot where the French, under the Duke of Berwick, on 25th April 1707, defeated an army of Spanish and English troops. Pop. 10,000.

Almeida, one of the strongest fortified places in Portugal, on the Spanish frontier, and in the province of Beira. In 1762 it was captured by the Spaniards, and in 1810 it was defended against Massena by an English officer, until the explosion of a powder-magazine compelled him to capitulate. Pop. 3000.

Almeri'a (Arabic Al-Mariyat, 'the conspicuous'), the chief town of a Spanish province, on a gulf or bay of the Mediterranean, 120 miles E. of Malaga. It has a well-defended harbour, a cathedral, and a grammar-school. In the time of the Moors, it was, next to Granada, the richest town in the kingdom, with 150,000 inhabitants. Now, it has only a few trifling manufactures, although it still keeps up considerable trade. The much-needed railway from Linares to this isolated port was completed in 1893–94. Population, about 45,000.—The province consists of the eastern portion of the ancient kingdom of Granada, and has an area of 3302 sq. m. There are rich mines in the sierras, yielding copper, iron, mercury, silver, and lead. Population, 354,000.

Almodo'var del Campo, a town of New Castile, Spain, 22 miles SW. of Ciudad Real; pop. 13,000, chiefly employed in agriculture and silver-mining.

Almond, in Scotland, tributaries (1) of the Firth of Forth at Cramond, and (2) of the Tay above Perth.

Almondbury, to the SE. of Huddersfield, is partly within its bounds.

Almo'ra, a town in the United Provinces of India, 87 miles N. of Bareilly, on the crest of a ridge of the Himalayas, 5337 feet above the sea. Pop. 8000.

Almuñecar, a seaport of Andalusia, Spain, 33 miles S. of Granada; pop. 10,000.

Alnmouth, a little watering-place of Northumberland, at the mouth of the Alne, 5 miles ESE. of Alnwick; pop. 500.

Alnwick (An'nick), the county town of Northumberland, on the Alne, 38½ miles N. by W. of Newcastle by rail. It has a large central market-place, a spacious town-hall, and a corn exchange of 1862. Alnwick was at an early period a fortified town, and one of its four gates remains, with fragments of the walls. At the north entrance of the town stands Alnwick Castle, the seat originally of the De Vescis, and since 1310 of the Percies of Northumberland. It has been sumptuously restored since 1854 in the Italian palazzo style, and is one of the most magnificent baronial structures in England. During the middle ages, it was a bulwark against the invasions of the Scots, and it was thrice besieged—by Malcolm Canmore, who here met his death; by David I., who captured it; and by William the Lion, who here was taken prisoner. Alnwick ceased in 1886 to enjoy certain prescriptive municipal usages it formerly possessed. Pop. 7000.

Alo′ra, a town of Spain, 23 miles NW. of Malaga by rail, with mineral springs; pop. 11,000.

Alost, or AALST, a town in the Belgium province of East Flanders, on a navigable tributary of the Scheldt, 19 miles NW. of Brussels by rail. The church of St Martin, though unfinished, is one of the grandest in Belgium, with a famous painting by Rubens—'St Roche beseeching our Saviour to stay the Plague of Alost,' and also the mausoleum of Marten, a native of Alost and Belgium's first printer (1473). Alost has also a 13th-century town-hall with a beautiful belfry, and a Jesuit college. Pop. 34,300.

Alpe′na, an American post-town, at the mouth of Thunder Bay River, in Michigan, with foundries and numerous sawmills. Pop. (1880) 6153; (1890) 11,283; (1900) 11,802; (1910) 12,400.

Alpes, name of three deps. in France. That of BASSES-ALPES occupies the NE. part of Provence, and is, for the most part, mountainous. The wines are excellent; the mines produce lead, green marble, &c. The dep. is watered by the Durance; its chief town is Digne. Area, 2685 sq. m.; population, 107,000.

The HAUTES-ALPES, lying north of the Basses-Alpes, and forming a part of the old province of Dauphiné, is traversed by the chief range of the Cottian Alps, which here rise to 14,000 feet. The scenery, especially along the impetuous Durance, is singularly picturesque. Area, 2158 sq. m.; population, 105,000. The mines produce lead, copper, iron, and anthracite. Chief town, Gap.

ALPES MARITIMES, a dep. in the extreme SE. of France, on the shores of the Mediterranean and confines of Italy, was formed in 1860. It is made up of the ancient county of Nice, then ceded to France, and of the arrondissement of Grasse. The chain of the Alpes Maritimes forms the northern boundary of the dep., and from it numerous spurs run seaward, among which are lovely and fertile valleys. The silkworm is reared, and honey exported. There are some mineral springs. The tunny, anchovy, and sardine fisheries are important. The capital is Nice, and the other principal towns are Antibes, Villefranche, Cannes, Grasse, and Menton or Mentone. Area, 1482 sq. m.; pop. 356,338.

Alpnach, or ALPNACHT, a Swiss village, in the canton of Unterwalden, at the foot of Mount Pilatus, 1½ mile from that part of Lake Lucerne called Lake Alpnach. Its celebrated 'slide,' 8 miles long, for the timber of Mount Pilatus, is now disused. Pop. 2000.

Alps (possibly a Celtic word meaning 'high;' cf. Gaelic alp, 'a high mountain;' or connected with Lat. albus, 'white'), the most extensive system of lofty mountains in Europe, raising their giant masses on a basis of 90,000 sq. m., between 6° 40′ and 18° E. long., and extending in some places from the 44th to the 48th parallel of latitude. The Alpine system is bounded on the N. by the hilly ground of Switzerland and the upper plain of the Danube; on the E., by the low plains of Austria; on the S., by the Adriatic Sea, the plains of Lombardy, and the Gulf of Genoa; and on the W., by the plains of Provence and the valley of the Rhone. A string of lakes encircles both the northern and southern bases of these mountains, the former at an elevation of 1200 to 2000 feet; the latter, 600 to 700 feet. The varied natural scenery of France, Italy, Germany, and Austria has a common centre of union in this lofty region. Valleys open out in all directions, sending their melted snows on one side into the North Sea, on another into the Black Sea, and on another into the Mediterranean. The principal basins are those of the Rhine, the Danube, the Po, the Rhone, and the Var.

I. Of the WESTERN ALPS the principal ranges are: (1) The Maritime Alps, extending from the middle Durance southwards to the Mediterranean, and rising in the Aiguille de Chambeyron to a height of 11,155 feet. (2) The Cottian Alps, north of these, whose highest summit, Monte Viso, is 12,605 feet. (3) The Dauphiné Alps, separated by the valley of the Durance from the Cottian; their highest summit is the Pic des Ecrins, 13,462 feet. (4) The Graian Alps, forming the boundary between Savoy and Piedmont, and attaining in the Grand Paradis, an elevation of 13,300 feet. II. MIDDLE ALPS. Central Chain.—(1) The Pennine Alps, between the plains of Lombardy and the valley of the Rhone. Highest summits: Mont Blanc, 15,732 feet; Monte Rosa, 15,151 feet. (2) The Lepontian or Helvetian Alps, from the depression of the Simplon, along the plateau and masses of St Gothard, to the pass of the Splügen. (3) The Rhætian Alps, between the Inn, the Adda, and the Upper Adige. Northern Chain.—(1) The Bernese Alps, between the Rhone and the Aar. Highest summits: Finsteraarhorn, 14,026 feet; Aletschhorn, 13,803; Jungfrau, 13,671 feet. (2) The Alps of the Four 'Forest Cantons,' the Schwyz Alps, &c. The Southern Chain.—(1) The Ortler Alps, between the Adda and the Adige. (2) The Trientine Alps, between the Adige and the Piave. III. Of the EASTERN ALPS the principal chains are: (1) The Noric Alps, between the plains of the Drave and the Danube. (2) The Carnian Alps, between the Drave and the Save. (3) The Julian Alps, between the Save and the Adriatic Sea.

No lofty mountains in the world are more easily crossed than the Alps; the Mont Cenis, the Brenner, the St Gothard, and the Simplon (with still longer tunnel bored 1896–1904) railways into Italy from the north now afford special facilities. Other notable passes are the Little St Bernard (7190 feet at the highest point), the Great St Bernard (8120 feet), and the Splügen (q.v.).

The rocks which enter into the composition of the Alps belong to many different geological systems, and occur for the most part as more or less interrupted belts or zones, which extend in the same general direction as the great chain itself—viz. from SW. to NE. The higher and central ranges consist principally of crystalline schists, such as gneiss and mica-schist, with which granite is occasionally associated. These crystalline Archæan rocks are flanked on either side by an irregular zone of various sedimentary strata, along with beds of limestone, dolomite,

&c. The geological structure of the Alps clearly shows that these mountains are 'mountains of upheaval.' The strata of which they are composed must originally have been spread out in approximately horizontal positions, and they have since been folded, flexed, puckered, and fractured. Since their upheaval, the Alps have suffered excessive denudation. Enormous mountain-masses have been gradually removed by the action of ice, running water, &c.

The population of the Alpine regions is estimated at 6,000,000 to 7,000,000, of whom perhaps one half are Teutonic, and the other half of French, Italian (and Romanic), or Slavonic origin, in pretty equal proportions. Six states share the Alps. The western portion is shared by France and Italy. Switzerland claims the Middle Alps almost exclusively for her own. Bavaria has only a small share. Austria has the largest share of the Alps—in the provinces of Tyrol, Illyria, Styria, and the archduchy. The Alpine mountains are rich in singularly beautiful natural scenery, and attract such crowds of visitors that they have been called 'the playground of Europe.'

Alpujarras (Al-poo-har'ras; Arabic Al-Bush-erat), a name applied to all the valleys lying south of the chief chain of the Sierra Nevada, in the south of Spain.

Alsace-Lorraine (Ger. Elsass-Lothringen), since 1871 a state or 'imperial territory' (Reichsland) of the German empire, bounded west by France, east by Baden, and south by Switzerland. Its utmost length, from north to south, is 123 miles; its breadth varies between 22 and 105 miles; and its area is 5580 sq. m., of which 1353 belong to Upper Alsace (in the south), 1844 to Lower Alsace (NE.), and 2383 to Lorraine (NW.). Pop. (1871) 1,549,738; (1910) 1,874,014, of whom over 1,400,000 were Catholics and 80 per cent. German-speaking, the French-speaking population being mainly in the larger towns and in Lorraine. The Rhine flows 115 miles north-by-eastward along all the eastern boundary, and receives, below Strasburg, the Ill from Alsace, 127 miles long. Other rivers are the Moselle, flowing through Lorraine past Metz, and its affluent the Saar. Along the Rhine is a strip of level country, 9 to 17 miles broad, and declining from 800 to 450 feet above sea-level. Westward of this rise the Vosges Mountains, culminating at a height of 4677 feet; whilst Lorraine, rather hilly than mountainous, rarely attains 1300 feet. About 48·5 per cent. of the entire area is arable, 11·6 meadow and pasture, and 30·8 under wood. Alsace-Lorraine produces much wine, grain, and tobacco; it is rich in mines, iron and coal; and manufactures iron, cotton, wool, silks, chemicals, glass, and paper. It contains the important cities of Strasburg, Mühlhausen, Metz, and Colmar.

In Cæsar's time Alsace-Lorraine was occupied by Celtic tribes, and formed part of ancient Gaul; thereafter largely Germanised, from the 10th century it formed part of the German empire, till a part of it was ceded to France at the Peace of Westphalia (1648), and the rest fell a prey to the aggressions of Louis XIV., who seized Strasburg (1681) by surprise in time of peace. By the Peace of Ryswick (1697), the cession of the whole was ratified. In 1814–15 Russia would not hear of the restitution of Alsace-Lorraine to Germany; and it was not till 1871, after the Franco-German war, that Alsace and German Lorraine were, by the treaty of Frankfort, incorporated in the new German empire. The great mass of the population were strongly against the change, and 160,000 elected to be French, though only 50,000 went into actual exile, refusing to become German subjects. For, at least since the era of the Revolution, Alsace in sentiment was wholly French. To France she gave the bravest of her sons—Kellermann, Kléber, and many another hero; Strasburg first heard the Marseillaise; and MM. Erckmann-Chatrian, Lorrainers both, faithfully represented their countrymen's love of La Patrie in the days of the second as of the first Napoleon. See French works by Grad (1889) and Matthis (1890).

Alsen, a Baltic island off the coast of Sleswick. Formerly Danish, it became Prussian in 1864. It is 19 miles long, and 12 broad; its area is 121 sq. m. Pop. 30,000, almost all Danish-speaking. The chief town is the port of Sonderborg; pop. 6000.

Alster, a river in Holstein, formed by the confluence of three streams, in the neighbourhood of Hamburg spreads itself out, and forms a lake, called the Great or Outer Alster, and within the town, the Inner Alster. It flows by several channels into the Elbe.

Alston, a market-town of Cumberland, 26 miles ESE. of Carlisle. Pop. of parish, 3000.

Altai, the Ghin-shan or Golden Mountains of the Chinese, is the name given to a wild mountainous region which covers the southern parts of Tomsk, in Siberia, and partly extends into Mongolia. It comprises the mountainous border-region of the great plateau of Central Asia, between the Tian-shan and the Sajan Mountains, and consists of two separate parts—the Altai proper, belonging to the Russian empire; and the Great Altai, in Mongolia. The highest summit, Byelukla, reaches the height of 11,000 feet. The valleys on its outskirts are being rapidly colonised by Russian agriculturists (over 600,000), who find an easy living in the fertile soil and the rich sub-alpine meadows. The gold-washings of the Altai, and its silver, lead, copper, iron, and coal mines, are another source of wealth. Nearly 45,000 Kalmucks, Teleutes, and Kumandintses represent the small remainder of the formerly much denser and more highly civilised population, all of the Ural-Altaic stock. The town of Barnaul (17,180 inhabitants) is the chief centre of administration.

Altamu'ra, a town of South Italy, 28 miles SW. of Bari, with a fine cathedral, founded in 1220; pop. 23,000.

Alte'a, a Spanish seaport, 25 miles NE. of Alicante; pop. 6000.

Al'tena, a town of Prussia, 47 miles NW. of Siegen by rail, with manufactures of needles, pins, and hardware; pop. 14,000.

Altenburg, the capital of the duchy of Saxe-Altenburg, on the Pleisse, 30 miles S. of Leipzig by rail. On an almost perpendicular rock of porphyry stands the old castle of Altenburg, the scene in 1455 of the 'Prinzenraub.' Its foundations are probably as old as the 11th century; and, since the two fires of 1865 and 1868, it has been finely restored. Brushes, woollen goods, gloves, and cigars are manufactured. Population, 40,000.

Altengaard, a hamlet in Finmarken, the northernmost province of Norway, on the south side of the Alten Fiord, in 69° 55′ N. lat., with a meteorological station.

Althorp Park, the seat of Earl Spencer, 6 miles NW. of Northampton.

Alton, a town of Hampshire, 8¾ miles SW. of Farnham. Its Perpendicular parish church was thoroughly restored in 1867. Hops are grown in the neighbourhood, and there are large breweries in the town. Pop. 5600.

Alton, a city and port of Illinois, U.S., on the left bank of the Mississippi, 24 miles N. of St Louis. Laid out in 1817, and since 1868 the seat of a Catholic bishopric, it is a centre of commerce, and has a Baptist college (1836). Pop. 17,500.

Al′tona, the largest and richest city in the Prussian province of Sleswick-Holstein, is situated on the steep right bank of the Elbe, just below Hamburg, so that the two cities are divided only by the state-boundaries. Altona lies higher than Hamburg, and is much healthier. Of public buildings, the most notable are the churches of the Trinity (1743) and St John (1873); and of four monuments, there is one to Blücher (1832). Invested with special privileges in 1664, and burnt by the Swedes in 1713, Altona was annexed to Prussia in 1866. Pop. (1840) 28,095; (1860) 45,524; (1890) 143,249; (1910) 172,533.

Altoo′na, a city of Pennsylvania, U.S., at the eastern base of the Alleghanies, 117 miles E. of Pittsburgh. It contains large locomotive works and machine-shops in connection with the Pennsylvania Central Railroad, employing 5000 hands. Pop. 52,000.

Altorf, or ALTDORF, the chief town in the Swiss canton Uri, at the head of the Lake of Lucerne, and on the St Gothard road and railway. There is a colossal statue of William Tell in this the scene of his chief exploits. Pop. 4000. —ALTORF, or ALTDORF, in Middle Franconia (pop. 5000), was the seat of a university from 1623 to 1809.

Altötting, a very ancient place of pilgrimage in Upper Bavaria, not far from the river Inn, 31 miles N. of Traunstein. A chapel contains the wonder-working black image of the Virgin, dating from the 8th century, and a rich treasure of gold, silver, and precious stones. Another chapel contains the tomb of Tilly. Pop. 5000.

Altrincham (Al′tring-am), a town of Cheshire, on Bowdon Downs, 8 miles SW. of Manchester by rail, is situated on the Bridgewater Canal. It has manufactures of artificial manures, and an iron-foundry; but the chief employment is raising fruits and vegetables for the Manchester market. Pop. 17,800.

Altrive, the home and death-place of Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, in Yarrow parish, Selkirkshire.

Alum-Bagh (Alambágh), a domain 4 miles from Lucknow, comprised a palace, mosque, and park; and in 1857 was converted by the rebels into a fort. It was taken by the British in September; and on evacuating Lucknow, Sir James Outram with 3500 men held it against 30,000 sepoys and 50,000 volunteers, until in March, Sir Colin Campbell reconquered Lucknow, and relieved the Alum-Bagh. Havelock had been buried within the walls in November 1857.

Alum Bay, Isle of Wight, near the Needles, a bay with fantastically variegated cliffs.

Alva, a town in what since 1891 is Clackmannanshire, at the base of the Ochils, 7¾ miles ENE. of Stirling by rail (1863). It has extensive manufactures of shawls and tweeds. Immediately behind the village is Alva Glen, noted for its picturesque beauty and magnificent waterfall. Pop. 4000.

Alvara′do, a town of Mexico, on the Gulf of Mexico, at the mouth of the river Alvarado, 40 miles SE. of Vera Cruz; pop. 6000.

Alwar, or ULWAR, a Rajput state of India, in Rajputana, with an area of 3024 sq. m. and a pop. of 791,000. The capital, Alwar, is a town of 57,000 inhabitants, 94 miles WNW. of Agra.

Alyth (Ai′lith), a Perthshire town, 26 miles NE. of Perth, with woollen, linen, and jute manufactures; pop. 1800.

Alzey (Altzei), a town of Rhenish Hesse, on the Selz, 18 miles SW. of Mainz; pop. 8000.

Amalfi (Amâl′fee), a seaport on the Gulf of Salerno, 24 miles SE. of Naples. It has a Romanesque cathedral. Founded under Constantine the Great, and long a powerful republic, with 50,000 inhabitants, and 'doges' of its own, it fell about the close of the 11th century under the power of the Normans, was plundered by the Pisans in 1135, and saw its commercial decay completed by a terrible storm in 1343. Masaniello was a native. Pop. 8000.

Amarapu′ra ('city of the gods'), till 1860 the capital of Burma, was situated on the left bank of the Irawadi, 6 miles NE. of Ava. Founded in 1783, it was totally destroyed by fire in 1810, and almost totally by earthquake in 1839; so that the population dwindled from 175,000 in 1800, to almost nil after Mandalay became the seat of government. Little remains but some beautiful trees, and a few ruined pagodas.

Amasia, a town in the province of Sivas, in Asia Minor, in the deep valley of the Yeshil-Irmak. The ancient town, long capital of the kings of Pontus, was the birthplace of Strabo. There are numerous interesting remains of antiquity, particularly the tombs of the kings of Pontus. Silk and salt are the chief articles of export. Pop. 25,000.

Amatitlan, a deep lake in the Central American state of Guatemala, surrounded with precipitous volcanic rocks. It empties into the Pacific Ocean through the river Michatoyat. Near the lake are many hot springs, and on the river is the town of Amatitlan, as late as 1840 a miserable Indian village, but now, through the introduction of the cochineal culture, an active town of 10,000 inhabitants.

Amazon, or AMAZONS (Portuguese Amazōnas, from an Indian word Amassona, 'boat-destroyer'), a river of South America, and the largest stream on the face of the globe. It is known locally as Marañon, Orellana, Solimoens, Parana-tinga, and Parana-uassu. The name Marañon (or Tunguragua) belongs properly to the more northern of its two main head-streams, rising on San Lorenzo mountain, 100 m. SW. of Lake Lauricocha (Peru). Some writers insist that the river Apurimac, or Ucayali (the more southern of the two great head-streams), is the true Amazon. It is commonly said that the Amazon, to its remotest source, is nearly 4000 miles long; but 3000 miles is a more probable estimate. Most of the upper branches flow in deep mountain gorges of the Cordillera; east of the Cordillera the vast forest-plain is entered, which stretches from the sub-Andean foot-hills to the sea. It is a region rich in botanical treasures, having a fertile soil and a prodigiously large rainfall. Owing to this rainfall, the country is traversed by a very great number of large navigable rivers, either direct or indirect affluents of the Amazon. Steam navigation has been introduced on many of the larger branches; but the natural resources of the country are very little developed.

The principal tributaries from the north are the Napo, the Putumayo, the Japurá, and the Rio Negro (which connects, through the Cassiquiare, with the Orinoco); from the south the Javary, the Jutahy, the Juruá, the Purus, the Madeira, the Tapajos, the Xingu, and the Tocantins. For a considerable distance the main river forms the boundary between Peru and Ecuador; but its course lies chiefly through the northern half of Brazil, its general direction being to the NNE. Its mouth is crossed by the equator. The drainage area of the river is placed at 2,500,000 sq. m., or two-thirds the area of Europe; and the main stream and its tributaries are said to afford over 15,000 miles of waterway suitable for steam navigation. Steamers from Liverpool go to Iquitos, 2300 miles up the river. The main channel, at the mouth, is 50 miles wide. The tides are noticed for about 400 miles up the river. The tidal phenomenon called the bore (here known as Pororoca) is very destructive in the main channel of the lower river, near its mouth; and from this phenomenon the Indian name of the river (Amassona, 'boat-destroyer') is said to be derived. The name Marañon is derived from a voyager who visited the river in 1503; Orellana was the name of one who sailed on it in 1540.

The climate of the river-valley, though hot and very damp, is greatly mitigated by its trade-winds, which blow from the east with little interruption throughout the dry season. The river abounds in fish in very great variety of species, and turtles and alligators are plentiful, as well as porpoises and manatees. The main river is fullest from March to June inclusive, and lowest in August and September. The river is open to the commerce of all nations, but trade has been impeded by import and export duties. Pará is the principal outlet by sea of the commerce of the Amazon Valley. Many useful and some highly valuable timber-trees grow on the river. One of the leading pursuits of the whole valley is the shipment to Pará of india-rubber and Brazil-nuts. The western part of the basin affords quinine-yielding barks, coca, cacao, sugar, coffee, palm-wax, ipecacuanha, copaiba, sarsaparilla, vanilla, and other valuable vegetable products, and a considerable amount of gold is procured in it.

Amazo'nas, (1) the northernmost province of Brazil, has an area of 750,000 sq. m., and a pop. of 249,000.—(2) A fertile department of Peru, bounded on the N. by Ecuador. Area, 14,150 sq. m.; pop. 70,800.

Ambala. See UMBALLA.

Amber, a decayed city in the Rajput state of Jaipur, India, formerly its capital, about 4 miles NE. of Jaipur, with a vast but deserted palace. It is situated on the margin of a small lake.

Amberg, a town of Bavaria, 35 miles E. of Nuremberg. Chief buildings are the town-hall (1490) and St Martin's (1421), with a steeple 321 feet high. There is a large arsenal, some manufactures, and mining. Near is the Maria-Hilfsberg, a place of pilgrimage. Pop. 25,300.

Amberno, a great river of New Guinea (q.v.).

Ambleside, an urban district of Westmorland, situated in the heart of the Lake District, about a mile from the head of Lake Windermere. Rydal Mount, for many years the residence of Wordsworth; Fox How, a summer retreat of Dr Arnold; and the Knoll, where Miss Martineau lived and died, are all in the neighbourhood. Near here is the site of a Roman fort. Pop. 2600.

Amboise, a French town in the dep. of Indre-et-Loire, on the Loire, 15 miles by rail E. of Tours. The town is memorable for the Huguenot conspiracy (1560), which cost the lives of 1200 Protestants. The castle of Amboise from 1431 was a frequent residence of the Valois kings; and since the days of Louis XI., 15,000 prisoners are said to have been confined in its subterranean 'oubliettes.' Pop. 4500.

Amboyna, the most prominent of the Moluccas or Spice Islands belonging to the Dutch, lies SW. of Ceram, and NW. of Banda. Area, 365 sq. m. Pop. about 40,000, nearly a third Mohammedans. Amboyna is mountainous, well watered, fertile, and healthy. Clove, sago, mango, and cocoa-nut trees are abundant, also fine timber for cabinet-work. The Dutch took Amboyna from the Portuguese in 1605. The British settlement was destroyed by the Dutch in the infamous Amboyna massacre of 1623, for which, in 1654, Cromwell exacted compensation. The British held the island in 1796–1802. It became finally Dutch in 1814.—AMBOYNA, capital of the Dutch Moluccas, on the bay of Amboyna, has a good roadstead; pop. about 9000.

Ambriz, a seaport 70 miles N. of Loanda, in the northern part of the Portuguese territory of Angola, West Africa, exports rubber, copper, coffee, and gums; pop. 3000. See ANGOLA.

Ambrym. See NEW HEBRIDES.

America, the western continent and its adjacent islands, forming the main body of land found in the western hemisphere. America has an area of about 16,500,000 sq. m., and is larger than Europe and Africa together. It is more than four times as large as Europe, five times as large as Australia, and half as large again as Africa; but is considerably smaller in area than Asia. It is customary to regard Greenland as a part of America; while the adjacent island of Iceland, though partially in the western hemisphere, is usually associated with Europe. The other principal American islands in the Atlantic are Newfoundland, Cape Breton, Anticosti, Prince Edward Island, Long Island, the Bermudas, the Antilles or West Indies, Joannes, the Falkland Islands, Staten Land, and South Georgia. At the southern extremity of America lies the archipelago of Fuegia (Tierra del Fuego). In the Pacific are the Aleutian Islands, Kadiak, the Alexander and Queen Charlotte groups, Vancouver and other British-Columbian Islands; the Santa Barbara group, Revilla-Gigedo, the Pearl Islands, and others in the Gulf of Panama, the Galápagos, Juan Fernandez and the associated islets, Chiloe and the Chonos Archipelago. In the Arctic Ocean there are many large but unimportant islands.

The American continent consists of two principal parts, NORTH AMERICA and SOUTH AMERICA, which are connected by the narrow Isthmus of Panama. These two bodies of land, though differing very much in climate and productions, are much alike in several respects. Each is of triangular outline, with the shortest side to the north, and with a narrow southern prolongation. In outline, North and South America have each a certain resemblance to Africa. The two Americas have each a high range of volcanic mountains, extending from north to south along the west coast, a broad central plain, and a relatively low eastern mountain-range. Their great rivers have also some features in common, especially in regard to their direction. America is called the New World; and from the historical point of view, this name is obviously appropriate; but geologically it may be called the Old World, since the oldest known strata have their widest development on its surface; and there have been here found relics of prehistoric man, which must be regarded as among the oldest yet discovered.

North America has an area of more than 9,000,000 sq. m. It is considerably larger than South America, which is in turn larger than Europe and Australia combined. The western mountain-system of North America comprises a very great number of minor ranges, mostly having a north and south direction. The main chain (Sierra Madre) cannot be said to preserve an unmistakable identity throughout. The Coast Range, the Sierra Nevada, and the Cascade Mountains are the most noted of the western parallel ranges; they all lie on the Pacific slope, and they contain some of the highest of North American peaks. The elevated plateau called the Great Basin (chiefly in Utah and Nevada, U.S.), contains the Great Salt Lake and several smaller bodies of strongly saline water, evidently the remains of a much larger lake which once sent its waters to the sea. The eastern or great Appalachian mountain-system has a general NNE. direction, nearly parallel with the Atlantic coast-line.

North of the St Lawrence River is seen the vast and complicated mountain-system of the Laurentides, which extend from the Atlantic westward to near Lake Superior. The highest mountain in North America is Mount McKinley, in Alaska (20,464 feet). Orizaba, in Mexico, is 18,250 feet; Mount Logan, in Yukon, 19,539; Mount St Elias, long believed to be the highest summit, 18,024. Popocatepetl and Iztaccihuatl, in Mexico, are 17,520 feet and 16,960 feet respectively. Many other peaks are over 14,000 feet.

A very remarkable feature of North America is the great central plain which reaches from the Arctic Ocean to the Gulf of Mexico. A prominent feature of the central plain is the Hauteur des Terres, a high ridge, whence flow the Mississippi, the Red River, the St Lawrence, and the Winnipeg. This ridge is nowhere over 2000 feet high, and its ascent is extremely gradual. The most general name for the great plains of North America is prairie; there are local distinctions between timbered and bald or treeless prairies; and few prairies are of a dead-level surface, and many are 'rolling'—that is, their surface is a succession of low wave-like swells and depressions.

The coast-line of North America on the west is almost everywhere high and rocky. To the south of Puget Sound, good harbours are rare; but British Columbia and Alaska have great numbers of good seaports, the coast-line being, in many places, deeply cut with high-walled fjords, or 'canals,' and elsewhere sheltered by ranges of high and well-wooded islands. The Atlantic coast, to the north of New York Bay, is generally rocky and well sheltered with islands, and has abundance of good natural harbours; but south of the parallel of New York, the coast of the mainland is almost everywhere low and sandy. Many of the best ports are formed by river-mouths, and have sand-bars across their entrances. Nowhere else in the world is there any such extent of low and sandy coast as on the Atlantic and Gulf seaboards of the United States.

In general, Canada and the Atlantic slope are well watered and have abundant rains. Along a narrow strip on the Pacific slope, from San Francisco southward to Acapulco, the water-supply is deficient, and the interior regions near the coast have locally a desert character; while from Acapulco southward the rainfall is ample for all needs. The central valley is generally well supplied with water; but to the west of the Mississippi there are but scanty summer rains. As the Rocky Mountains are approached, the water-supply becomes more deficient; and, except where irrigation is practicable, agriculture proper generally gives place to the grazing of cattle. But in the Canadian part of the central valley there is ordinarily no deficiency of rainfall. In the Rocky Mountain region, the summers are generally very dry; and in some sections, irrigation is required in order to produce crops. Still the great volume and length of the North American rivers, and the immense number of lakes, are sufficient proof of the amplitude of the general rainfall. In the Rocky Mountain region of Canada, the great rivers, Yukon, Fraser, Columbia, Saskatchewan, and Mackenzie, take their rise. Between these mountains and Hudson Bay, a girdle of vast lakes, or inland seas (Great Bear, Great Slave, Athabasca, Deer Lake, Winnipeg, and others), are seen to form a regular succession running from the Arctic Circle in a SSE. course to Lake Superior (412 by 167 miles), which is itself the largest fresh-water lake in the world, and the first of a wonderful chain of great sea-like expansions of the Upper St Lawrence (the others being Michigan, Huron, Erie, and Ontario). The line of these great lakes (from Great Bear Lake to the Lake of the Woods inclusive) marks the eastern limit of a fertile prairie region resting on fossiliferous rocks. East of this line we find a vast wilderness of 'Barren Grounds.' North of the St Lawrence system, almost the whole country is thickly studded with lakes, which, with their connecting streams, form a network of important waterways traversable by canoes and boats.

The Atlantic slope of the United States is well supplied with water, and many of its streams afford extensive navigation. The Hudson is noted for its fine scenery; the Potomac is one of the noblest of American rivers; and important streams flowing to the Atlantic are the St John, the Penobscot, the Kennebec, the Merrimac (noted as affording more utilised water-power than any other river in the world), the Connecticut, the Delaware, the Susquehanna, the James, and the St John's, nearly all navigable in their lower courses. The chief rivers flowing to the Gulf of Mexico are the Appalachicola, the Mobile, the Pearl, the great Mississippi, the Sabine, the Trinity, the Brazos, the Colorado of Texas, and the Rio Grande.

Of the many large Alaskan rivers, the principal are the Yukon and the Kuskoquim. The Fraser is a swift and strong river; the great river Columbia is noted alike for its navigation, its salmon-fisheries, and its enormous cataracts. The Rio Colorado, whose waters flow to the Gulf of California, traverses a desert plateau. Here, nearly every watercourse runs in a deep-walled cañon, a narrow valley with precipitous sides, often of prodigious height.

The winter cold and the summer heat of North America are extreme, when we consider the latitudes. Variations of temperature are more sudden and more extreme than in South America or Western Europe. The arctic portion of North America has a climate of extreme severity; and much of the northern sub-arctic region has a decidedly arctic climate. South of the Canadian line, we are still in the spring-wheat belt; and not till we go south 4 or 5 degrees of latitude do we enter the winter-wheat belt. Maize is planted in the warmer parts of Canada, and in nearly all the more southern parts of North America. The other cereals grown in the United States are much the same as those ordinarily produced in Europe. Sugar-cane is raised only in the most southern parts of the United States, and in latitudes still farther south. Tobacco is an important crop not only in tropical America, but nearly as far north as Canada. Cotton reaches its northern limit in California, Missouri, and Virginia. True rice is grown in the more southern United States. Throughout the Atlantic and Gulf slopes of North America, the winter climate is much more severe than in corresponding European latitudes. It will be observed that nearly all the cultivated crop-products of North America (except maize, potatoes, and tobacco) are of Old-World origin. The same thing is true in a less degree of the cultivated fruits. The European apple thrives even better in North America than in Europe; so likewise do the peach, the pear, and other fruits. But the grapes generally cultivated in America are of native or hybrid origin; although the European grape does well in California and Mexico. The cranberries, strawberries, and some of the other cultivated small fruits of North America, are of native origin, as are some of the more hardy varieties of the plum. Subtropical fruits, such as the orange, fig, and lemon, do well in that limited part of non-tropical North America which lies south of the frost-line. The mineral treasures of North America are vast; coal, iron, copper, gold, silver, lead, and petroleum being abundant, besides salt and other valuable products.

The native peoples of North and South America alike would appear to have been all of one race, although the Eskimo of the far North resemble the 'Indian,' or copper-coloured native races, not so much in appearance and in physical features, as in the polysynthetic or incorporative character of their system of word-building. The present population of North America contains a copious element of the Indian stock, chiefly found in the remoter parts of Canada and in Mexico and Central America. In Spanish America and in Manitoba (Canada), there are many persons of mixed white and Indian origin. The Spanish language is spoken in Central America, Mexico, Cuba, and Puerto Rico; French prevails in parts of Canada and Louisiana, and in some of the West Indies; and a German dialect prevails locally in Pennsylvania. But by far the largest share of the North American people are English in language, if not in descent.

The political divisions of North America are (1) Danish America, which includes Greenland, and three small islands of the Virgin group in the West Indies. (2) British North America, in which division we may place the Dominion of Canada, Newfoundland, Labrador, the Bermudas, the numerous British West Indian islands, and British Honduras. (3) The United States, including the detached territory of Alaska. (4) Mexico. (5) The Central American republics of Honduras, Guatemala, Salvador, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica, together with Panamá—unless its southern part be regarded as belonging to the South American continent. (6) The West Indian republics of Hayti and San Domingo. (7) The Dutch West Indies. See the articles on the separate states and colonies.

The population of North America, with the West Indies, is not less than 105,000,000 souls, of whom 7,000,000 may be of Indian descent. The very great majority of North American Indians, who fall into about a dozen stocks or groups of tribes, are found in Mexico and Central America. The people of African stock number at least 11,000,000, most of whom are natives of the United States. The original slave element was derived from almost every coast-region of the African continent.

South America has somewhat the same general shape on the map as North America, and the semi-continents have many features in common, as well as certain marked contrasts. The broadest part of each is towards the north; but the northern portion of North America is a frozen and most repelling region, having its coasts washed by a trackless frozen ocean, filled with barren and ice-crowned islands; while the Caribbean Sea, which lies north of the southern half of the continent, is entirely tropical, and is encircled by a chain of rich and beautiful islands, where frosts are never seen. The climates are therefore reversed. The greater portion of North America has either a cold or a temperate climate; while that part of South America which is of corresponding position and importance has a hot climate. The tropical region of North America is relatively small in area; while in South America it is much the smaller part which has a cold climate. Moreover, the winter cold of Patagonia, Tierra del Fuego, and the Falkland Islands is never extreme, like that of so great a part of North America. Even Tierra del Fuego, which has a terribly bleak and blustering wet and windy climate, is never very cold. The summers of the extreme south of America are indeed relatively cold, but the winters are correspondingly mild; that is to say, the climate is more steady and less changeable than that of North America.

The Andes, or South American Cordilleras, have some features in common with the great North American Cordilleras, the Rocky Mountain system. They both extend north and south; both are near the west coast; both are volcanic; and both cut off the rains from a considerable region, rendering the climate locally very dry. But the Andes are much more nearly continuous; they are a much more complete barrier to the traveller and merchant, as well as to the rain-bearing winds of the Atlantic; they have a much greater absolute height, and contain a far greater number of very lofty peaks. Their volcanic activity is also at present much more intense than is seen at any point in North America north of the Tehuantepec Isthmus. The dry or desert region west of the Andes is far more extensive and far more completely arid than the corresponding section of North America. To the east of the Andes, and as it were reclining against them, there is an enormous and lofty plateau on which are scattered various extinct or dormant volcanic peaks; but the western slope of the Andes is usually very steep. In some parts of the eastern sub-Andean plain there appear complicated (but generally north and south) ranges of lower mountains, occasionally sending out an arm of hills into the plains of the interior. The really temperate part of South America, including most of Chili, Uruguay, and the Argentine Republic, has a mild, and for the most part singularly equable and agreeable climate; although Northern Chili is a hot and arid desert, and the southern third of that country, including the Chonos Archipelago, is drenched with continual rains. The greater and most characteristic region of South America is the tropical portion. For a tropical country the climate is in general remarkably fine, regular, and healthful. A marked feature is the large and regular rainfall, caused by the Andes, which here stand exactly across the course of the trade-winds. These winds, carried gradually upwards by the shelving plateaus, till they reach the cold Andean summit-region, precipitate nearly all their moisture, and leave the narrow strip of land west of the Andes a desert. Towards the north and south, the Pacific slope, being out of the highway of the trade-winds, receives abundant moisture from the Pacific. Owing to the enormous rainfall of tropical South America, it is above all others the land of great rivers. The three great river-systems of the Orinoco, the Amazon, and the Plata are all primarily developed upon the eastern terraces of the Andes; but the Plata derives its main water-supply from the Brazilian mountains. Other large rivers are the Magdalena in Colombia, the São Francisco in Brazil, and the Rio Negro in the Argentine Republic. South America has few large lakes, Lake Titicaca being one of the most remarkable; but the slopes of the Southern Andes abound in smaller lakes, doubtless of glacial origin.

The interior of South America presents considerable variety. In the central and southern portion of Venezuela we find extensive steppes or prairies, here called llanos; an open region, in part treeless, but in general grassy and devoted to pasturage. To the east and west of these the country is for the most part densely wooded. The vast forest-clad plain of the Amazon is of fluviatile origin. Towards the southern tropic we encounter a region which, though little developed, appears to be one of the finest and most fertile on the globe. Farther south the forests begin to disappear, and finally end in the great treeless pampas of the Argentine Republic. The Patagonian region south of the pampas consists largely of a succession of terraces rising westward to the Andes, and crossed by many swift and copious rivers. Here are seen vast fields covered with loose stones and shingle, recalling the enormous boulder-covered waste of Labrador. Farther south lies the Fuegian Archipelago, a gloomy and unpleasant region with a bleak climate.

The mineral wealth of South America is very great, including gold, silver, mercury, copper, diamonds, and coal.

The agricultural capabilities of a large part of South America are unquestionably very great. Stock-breeding is the leading industry on the pampas of the south, and on the llanos and campos of the north. Coffee-growing is a prominent pursuit in Brazil. The cereal grains thrive remarkably in the temperate regions. Sugar, tobacco, and cotton are produced in the warmer latitudes. Silver, copper, iodine, nitrates, guano, hay, and provisions are shipped from the west coast. From the La Plata countries wool and various cattle products still take the lead, although flour and grain have become important staples of export. Peruvian bark and other medicines, india-rubber, cabinet-woods, chocolate, tobacco, and fruits are shipped from the tropical and forest-regions of the north.

The aboriginal population of South America is divided into a large number of tribes, which have been grouped under some eight different stocks. The white population is largely Spanish in language and descent, except in Brazil, where Portuguese is spoken. The common people of Chili are largely of Galician (Spanish) descent; while Basque blood is said to prevail in Peru. The Brazilian whites are to a considerable extent of Azorean and Madeira stock. There are numbers of German colonists in Brazil, the La Plata countries, and Chili; and also many Italians, Basques, and other Europeans in the Argentine Republic and Uruguay. The English language is spoken in the Falklands and in Guiana; French and Dutch prevail in parts of Guiana. The negro element is strong in Brazil, in parts of Peru, and in Guiana; and there are many persons of mixed descent. It is believed that the total population of South America is about 40,000,000.

A considerable number of the islands usually reckoned as West Indian, and assigned by most geographers to North America, are really continental and South American. Such are the large British colony of Trinidad; the Venezuelan island of Marguerita; and the Dutch island of Curaçoa.

All the states of America, each with a separate article, are either republics or colonies.

Amherstburg, a town of Ontario, Canada, at the head of Lake Erie, 4 miles S. of Detroit ; pop. 2600.

Amiens (Fr. pron. Am-i-on^{g} ; anc. Samarobriva), a French city, capital once of Picardy, and now of the dep. of Somme, on the many-channelled, navigable Somme, 81 miles N. of Paris by rail. Its fortifications have been turned into charming boulevards, but it still retains its old citadel. The cathedral of Notre Dame is a masterpiece of Gothic architecture. Begun in 1220, it is 452 feet long, and has a spire (1529) 426 feet high ; but its special feature is the loftiness of the nave, 141 feet. In his little work called The Bible of Amiens, Ruskin says this church well deserves the name given it by Viollet-le-Duc, 'the Parthenon of Gothic architecture,' and affirms that its style is 'Gothic pure, authoritative, and unaccusable.' Other noteworthy buildings are the Hôtel-de-Ville (1600–1760), in which the Peace of Amiens was signed in 1802 ; the large museum (1864), in Renaissance style ; and the public library (1791), with 70,000 volumes. Amiens has considerable manufactures of velvet, silk, woollen, and cotton goods, ribbons, and carpets. Peter the Hermit and Ducange were natives, and there are statues to both of them. In the Franco-German war, on 27th November 1870, General Manteuffel inflicted, near Amiens, a signal defeat on a French army 30,000 strong, and three days later the citadel surrendered. Pop. 93,200.

Amirante Islands, a group of eleven low, wooded islands lying SW. of the Seychelles, opposite the east coast of Africa. Area, 32 sq. m. ; pop. 100 French-speaking half-breds. They fell to Great Britain in 1814, and form a dependency of the Seychelles (q.v.).

Am'lwch (pron. w as oo), a small seaport of Anglesey, North Wales, on the north coast of the island, 21½ miles NNW. of the Menai Bridge by rail (1867). It is a busy but rather dirty town, with the neighbouring rich copper-mines of the Parys Mountain. Till 1885 Amlwch united with Beaumaris, &c. in returning one member. Pop. 2700.

Ammergau. See OBER-AMMERGAU.

Amol, a town of Persia, 76 miles NE. of Teheran, on the Heraz, a river which flows into the Caspian ; pop. 10,000.

Amoor. See AMUR.

Amoy', a seaport of China, on a small island of the same name, in the province of Fukien, 325 miles ENE. of Canton direct. The third in importance of the treaty ports, it was one of the earliest seats of European commerce in China, the Portuguese having had establishments here in the 16th, and the Dutch in the 17th century. In 1841 it was taken by the British, and by the treaty of Nankin, a British consul and British subjects were permitted to reside there. The trade is now open to all nations. The imports are opium, rice, cotton-twist, British long-cloths, beans, peas, umbrellas, clocks, &c. ; the exports are tea, sugar, paper, opium, grass-cloths, gold-leaf, &c. Pop. 114,000. The island of Amoy, measuring 9 by 7 miles, has 400,000 inhabitants.

Ampthill, a town of Bedfordshire, 7 miles S. by W. of Bedford. Pop. 2300.

Amraoti (sometimes Oomrawuttee), a district in Berar, British India, with an area of 2759 sq. m., and a pop. of 675,328. Its capital, Amraoti, is an important cotton-mart, the terminus of a state branch railway ; pop. 35,000.

Amritsar (often Umritsir), a well-built city of the Punjab, 32 miles E. of Lahore by rail. It is the religious metropolis of the Sikhs, a distinction which, along with its name (literally, 'pool of immortality'), it owes to its sacred tank, in the midst of which stands the marble temple of the Sikh faith. Founded in 1574, but all of it more recent than 1762, it possesses considerable manufactures of cashmere shawls, cotton, silks, &c., and carries on trade to the annual value of £3,500,000. Pop. 153,000.

Amroha, a town in the United Provinces of India, 20 miles NW. of Moradabad ; pop. 37,000.

Amrum, a north Frisian island off the coast of Sleswick, SW. of Föhr, is a low-lying half-moon of grassy downs, 8 miles long, of late visited as a health-resort. Oysters are taken and wild ducks decoyed. Pop. 1000.

Amsterdam ('dam' or 'dike of the Amstel'), the capital of the Netherlands, is situated at the influx of the Amstel to the Ij or Y (pron. eye), an arm (now mostly drained) of the Zuider-Zee, 44¾ miles NNE. of Rotterdam by rail. It is divided by the Amstel and numerous canals into a hundred small islands, connected by more than 300 bridges. Almost the whole city, which extends in the shape of a crescent, is founded on piles driven 40 or 50 feet through soft peat and sand to a firm substratum of clay. Merely a fishing-village at the beginning of the 13th century, with a small castle, in 1482 it was walled and fortified. After the revolt of the seven provinces (1566), it speedily rose to be their first commercial city ; and in 1585 it was enlarged by the building of the New Town on the west. The establishment of the Dutch East India Company (1602) did much to forward the well-being of Amsterdam, which, twenty years later, had 100,000 inhabitants. It had to surrender to the Prussians in 1787, to the French in 1795 ; and the union of Holland with France in 1810 entirely destroyed its foreign trade. The old firms, however, lived through the time of difficulty, and in 1815 commerce again began to expand—an expansion greatly promoted by the opening of the North Holland Canal (1825), and the North Sea Canal (1876).

The city has a fine appearance when seen from the harbour, or from the high bridge over the Amstel. Church towers and spires, and a perfect forest of masts, relieve the flatness of the prospect. The old ramparts have been levelled, planted with trees, and formed into promenades. The three chief canals—the Heerengracht, Keizersgracht, and Prinsengracht—run in semicircles within each other, and are from 2 to 3 miles long. On each side of them, with a row of trees and a carriage-way intervening, are handsome residences. The building-material is brick; and the houses have their gables towards the streets, which gives them a picturesque appearance. The defences of Amsterdam now consist in a row of detached forts, and in the sluices, several miles distant from the city, which can flood (save in time of frost) the surrounding land.

The population, which from 217,024 in 1794, sank to 180,179 in 1815, rose to upwards of 573,000 in 1910, of whom the majority belong to the Dutch Reformed Church. The chief industrial establishments are sugar refineries, engineering works, mills for polishing diamonds and other precious stones, dockyards, manufactories of sails, ropes, tobacco, silks, gold and silver plate and jewelry, colours and chemicals, breweries, distilleries, with export houses for corn and colonial produce; cotton-spinning, book-printing, and type-founding are also carried on. The present Bank of the Netherlands dates from 1824, Amsterdam's famous bank of 1609 having been dissolved in 1796.

The former Stadhuis ('Townhouse'), converted in 1808 into a palace for King Louis Bonaparte, and still retained by the reigning family, is a noble structure of 1648–55, 282 feet long, and 235 broad, with a round tower rising 182 feet. It has a hall, 120 feet long, 57 wide, and 90 high, lined with white Italian marble. The cruciform Nieuwe Kerk (New Church), a Gothic edifice of 1408–14, has a splendidly carved pulpit, and the tombs of Admiral de Ruyter and Vondel. The 14th-century Old Church (Oude Kerk) is rich in painted glass, has a grand organ, and contains several monuments of naval heroes. Literature and science are represented by a university supported by the municipal principality, museums and picture-galleries, a botanical garden, several theatres, &c. The new Ryksmuseum contains a truly national collection of paintings, its choicest treasure Rembrandt's 'Night-guard.' Rembrandt made Amsterdam his home; and his statue (1852) now fronts the house he occupied. Spinoza was a native. A water-supply was introduced in 1853.

Amsterdam, a manufacturing town of New York, on the Mohawk River, 33 miles NW. of Albany. Pop. 32,000.

Amsterdam, a barren volcanic islet annexed by France, with the islet of St Paul, in 1893, is in 37° 50′ S. lat. and 77° 30′ E. long., about midway between the Cape of Good Hope and Tasmania.

Amu-Daria. See OXUS.

Amur (Amoor), or SAKHALIN, a river formed by the junction of the Shilka and the Argun, which both come from the south-west—the former rising in the foothills of the Yablonoi Mountains. From the junction, the river flows 3000 miles south-eastward and north-eastward to the Sea of Okhotsk, opposite the island of Saghalien. Its main tributaries are the Sungari and the Usuri, both from the south. Above the Usuri, the Amur is the boundary between Siberia and Manchuria; below it, the river runs through Russian territory. It is very valuable for navigation, and carries a considerable fleet of steamers, but on account of the bar at its mouth, goods are generally disembarked, and carried overland to Alexandrovsk. The river is frozen for six months of the year; in summer there are extensive inundations.

From 1636, Russian adventurers made excursions into the Chinese territories of the Lower Amur; but it was not until 1854–56 that two military expeditions established the stations of Alexandrovsk and Nikolaevsk. In 1858 China agreed to the treaty of Tientsin, by which the left bank of the Amur, and all the territory north of it, became Russian; and below the confluence of the Usuri, both banks. In 1860 Russia acquired the wide territory extending from the Amur and the Usuri to the Pacific coast, with harbours on the Pacific in a comparatively temperate latitude, where navigation is impeded by ice for not more than three or four months a year.

This vast territory falls into four Russian provinces—the Maritime Province, Kamtchatka, Saghalien, and the province of Amur, north of the river. The last has an area of 172,850 sq. m., and a pop. of 217,700, largely belonging to the Tungusic stock. The capital is, since 1882, Khabarovsk, as Blagovestschensk is of the Amur province. Nikolaevsk, once the only important place in these regions, is on the Amur, 26 miles from its mouth, where the river is 1¼ mile wide, and in places 15 feet deep. Near the southern end of the Maritime Province (area, 210,000 sq. m.; pop. 300,000) is situated the important harbour of Vladivostok ('Rule of the East'), or Port May, which in 1872 was placed in telegraphic communication with Europe by the China submarine cable. Vladivostok is one terminus of the Trans-Siberian railway, commenced in 1891, with which Khabarovsk and Blagovestschensk are connected.

Amurnath, a cave in Cashmere, amidst the mountains on the north-east boundary. It is an opening in a gypsum rock, 30 yards high, and 20 in depth. Believed to be the residence of the god Siva, it is visited by multitudes of pilgrims.

Anadyr, a gulf of North-east Siberia, into which flows the Anadyr River after a course of 500 miles from the Stanovoi Mountains.

Anagni, a town of Italy, on a hill, 40 miles ESE. of Rome. The seat of a bishop since 487, it was the birthplace of popes Innocent III., Gregory IX., Alexander IV., and Boniface VIII. Pop. 7000.

Anahuac ('near the water'), the original name of the ancient kingdom of Mexico.

Anam. See ANNAM.

Ananiev, a town of Southern Russia, 100 miles N. of Odessa; pop. 17,000.

Anapa, a Russian seaport on the east shore of the Black Sea, 50 miles SE. of Yenikale; pop. 8000.

Anatolia. See ASIA MINOR.

Anco'na, the capital of a province in Italy, on a promontory of the Adriatic, 127 miles SE. of Ravenna by rail. Its harbour had become much silted up, but in 1887 was improved and deepened; and it is still the most important seaport between Venice and Brindisi. The manufactures are silk, ships' rigging, leather, tobacco, and soft soap; the exports (declining) are cream-of-tartar, lamb and goat skins, asphalt, bitumen, corn, hemp, coral, and silk. Since 1815, the old citadel was the only fortification until, recently, strong forts were erected on the neighbouring heights. A mole 2000 feet long, built by Trajan, and a triumphal arch of the same emperor, are the most notable antiquities; the cathedral was built in the 11th c. Population, 63,000. Founded about 380 B.C. by Syracusans, Ancona was destroyed by the Goths, rebuilt by Narses, and again destroyed by the Saracens in the 10th century. It afterwards became a republic, but in 1532 was annexed to the States of the Church. In 1797 it was taken by the French, but surrendered to the Russians and Austrians. During 1832–38 a French force held it; in 1849 a revolutionary garrison capitulated to the Austrians; and in 1861 it was incorporated in the kingdom of Italy.—The March of Ancona was the name applied to the territory lying between the Adriatic and the Apennines, from Tronto NW. to San Marino.

Ancrum Moor, Roxburghshire, 5¼ miles NW. of Jedburgh, was in 1544 the scene of the defeat of 5000 English.

Andalu'sia (Span. Andaluci'a), a large and fertile region occupying the south of Spain, and washed both by the Mediterranean and the Atlantic. The name is a form of Vandalitia or Vandalusia, from the Vandals, who overran it in the 5th century. The biblical Tarshish probably, it was the seat of a splendid Moorish monarchy from the 8th century A.D. to 1235–48. Andalusia mainly consists of the great basin of the Guadalquivir; in the south, the Sierra Nevada attains a height of 11,657 feet. It is still one of the most fertile districts of Spain, with celebrated breeds of horses and mules. It is divided into the provinces of Almeria, Jaën, Malaga, Cadiz, Huelva, Seville, Cordova, and Granada. The chief towns are Seville, Cordova, Jaën, and Cadiz. Area, 33,340 sq. m. Pop. 3,733,000.

An'damans, a group of thickly wooded islands towards the east side of the Bay of Bengal, 680 miles S. of the Hooghly mouth of the Ganges. They consist of the Great and Little Andaman groups. The former group, more than 150 miles long and 20 miles broad, comprises four islands, the North, Middle, and South Andaman, and Rutland Island. The Little Andaman, 30 miles S. of the larger group, is 28 miles long by 17 miles broad. The total area is 2508 sq. m. The dark, dwarfish natives, seldom five feet high, stand also in the lowest stage of civilisation. Their number in Great Andaman is about 2000; in Little Andaman, from 1000 to 1500. A British settlement was made on North Andaman in 1789, but abandoned in 1796 for Penang. The present capital is Port Blair, on South Andaman, the largest island of the group. The harbour here is one of the finest in the world. Since 1858, the Andamans have been used by the Indian government as a penal settlement for sepoy mutineers and other life-convicts. In 1911 the population of the convict colony was 11,930, of whom 634 were women. In 1872 Lord Mayo, viceroy of India, was assassinated here by a convict.

Andelys, LES, a town in the Norman dep. of Eure, 20 miles NE. of Evreux. It consists of Grand and Petit Andely. Here are the ruins of Château Gaillard, built by Richard Cœur de Lion to command the Seine. Pop. 6000.

Andenne, a town of Belgium, 12 miles E. of Namur by rail; pop. 9000.

Anderab, a town in Afghan Turkestan, on the northern slope of the Hindu Kush Mountains, 80 miles SSE. of Kunduz; pop. 6500.

Andermatt, or URSERN, a Swiss village, 4700 feet above sea-level, in the canton of Uri, 18 miles S. of the Lake of Lucerne; pop. 1000.

Andernach (Roman Autunnacum), a town of Rhenish Prussia, on the Rhine, 11 miles NW. of Coblenz by rail. It was a residence of the Merovingian kings, and afterwards one of the most flourishing places on the Rhine. A great tower, a fine church, and the ruined castle of the archbishops of Cologne, give it quite a mediæval aspect. Pop. 9000.

Anderson, capital of Madison county, Indiana, on the west fork of White River, 36 miles by rail NE. of Indianapolis. It manufactures engines, carriages, furniture, &c. The population is about 22,500.

Andersonville, a village in Georgia, U.S., 60 miles SW. of Macon by rail, noted as having been the seat of a Confederate States military prison.

Andes (said to be derived from the Peruvian anti, copper, metal), a lofty mountain-system of South America, extending north and south along the whole Pacific coast, and really a continuation of the vast and complicated mountain-system of Western North America, though on the Isthmus of Darien the height of the connecting ridges is less than 130 feet. The mountains of the Fuegian Archipelago, south of the mainland of South America, including Cape Horn and Diego Ramirez, must be held to belong to this system. Without allowing for curves, the Andes extend some 4500 miles. The Patagonian portion of the system is much cut by steep ravines, sometimes partly filled with glaciers, and not seldom occupied by deep arms of the sea. On both east and west sides of the ranges vegetation is luxuriant, due to the excessive abundance of the rainfall. Between lat. 42° and 24° S. the main chain of the Andes recedes from the sea-coast, leaving in Chili a tract of country nowhere exceeding 120 geographical miles in breadth. The mountains here reach a mean elevation of 11,830 feet; one of the peaks, Aconcagua, is nearly 23,000 feet in height; other two, Mercedario and Tupungato, exceed 20,000 feet. In this region, both to the north and to the south, there is but one main line of peaks; but between these two parts two high parallel ranges occur, having between them a relatively low plateau. The Bolivian Andes occupy perhaps one-third of the area of the republic, and form a vast arid region of great elevation. Amongst them are Gualtieri, 22,000 feet high, and Sorata and Illimani, both above 21,000. The east and west Cordilleras of Bolivia enclose the land-locked plateau of the Desaguadero, 13,000 feet in height, and having an area of 30,000 sq. m.

In Peru the maritime Cordillera overlooks the sea in a close succession of volcanic cones. Near lat. 10° S. the chain divides into the seaward Cordillera Negra, and the more eastward Cordillera Nevada, with a deep trough or ravine intervening. The central Cordillera of Peru is the chain which bounds the Titicaca basin on the west. The eastern Andes of Peru form a magnificent succession of grand peaks, with only very local evidences of recent volcanic action. Of the Peruvian peaks the highest are Huascan (22,000 feet) and Huandoy (21,088 feet). The lofty wildernesses of the high Peruvian Andes form a cold and wind-swept region known as the Puna. In the SW. of Ecuador the various ridges of the Andes coalesce, immediately to divide again into two main chains, both characterised by intense volcanic activity. According to Whymper Chimborazo is 20,498 feet, Cotopaxi 19,613, and Antisana 19,335. The Colombian Andes are disposed in three main lines. Only a few of the peaks of the Venezuelan Andes rise above the snow-line. One of the plateaus, Assuay, is 14,500 feet high; the lowest notable pass, Planchon, is 11,455 feet high.

The great bulk of the Andean masses is composed of stratified rocks; upheaval, denudation, and direct volcanic action have been leading factors in building the mountains. Volcanic action is still very great in Ecuador, but less so in the other parts of the chain. Gold, silver, copper, mercury, and other metals abound in nearly every part of the Andes. There are several trans-Andean railways; the more important are, one connecting Antofagasta in Chili with Oruro in Bolivia, with a highest altitude of 15,600 feet; other two in Peru; and the one (completed in 1909) connecting the Argentine Railway from Buenos Ayres with the Chilian Railway from Valparaiso by a tunnel about 10,000 feet long, at an elevation of 10,500 feet. See books by Conway (1901), Fitzgerald (1899), and Whymper (1892).

Andijan, capital of a district in Ferghana, at the foot of the Alai Mountains, connected by rail with Bokhara. Pop. 74,000.

Andkhui, capital of a khanate in Afghan Turkestan, between the northern spurs of the Paropamisus and the Amu-Daria (Oxus).

Andorra, a valley republic of the Eastern Pyrenees, between the French dep. of Ariége and the Spanish province of Lerida, part of Catalonia. It is enclosed by mountains, through which its river, the Balira, breaks to join the Segre at Urgel. Area, 171 sq. m.; pop. 5231. Said to have been declared a free state by Charlemagne, Andorra now stands under the common protectorate of France and the Catalonian Bishop of Urgel. The republic is governed by a sovereign council of twenty-four members, chosen by certain heads of houses, and the council elects a president for four years. The Andorrans are good-natured, hard-working mountaineers, hospitable, moral, and devoted to liberty. They speak a dialect of Catalonian. The capital is Andorra la Vieja (pop. 600); San Julian (500) and Canillo (500) are the other towns. See works by Berthet (Paris, 1879) and Deverell (Lond. 1884).

An'dover (Andeafaran, 'passage of the river Ande'), a municipal borough and market-town of Hampshire, 66 miles SW. of London. Chartered by Henry I., Richard I., and John, Andover till 1867 returned two members, till 1885, one. The chief trade consists in corn and malt; at Weyhill, 3 miles west, an October fair is held, formerly very important. Pop. 7600.

Andover, a village of Essex county, Massachusetts, 23 miles N. of Boston, with about 7300 inhabitants. Settled in 1643 from its English namesake, it is famous, even in Massachusetts, for its educational institutions, especially the Phillips Academy and the Congregational Theological Seminary.

Andria, a city of South Italy, 30 miles W. of Bari, with a fine cathedral (1046); pop. 50,000.

Andros, (1) an island of the Greek Archipelago, the most northern of the Cyclades, separated from Eubœa by a channel 6 miles broad. It is 25 miles long, 10 miles broad, and 156 sq. m. in area. Pop. 20,000, of whom 2000 are in the chief town, Andros, on a bay of the east coast.—(2) One of the Bahamas (q.v.).

Andujar, a town of Spain, on the Guadalquivir, at the base of the Sierra Morena, 48 miles ENE. of Cordova by rail; pop. 16,000.

Anega'da, a British coral island, the most northerly of the Virgin Islands, lying east of Porto Rico, in the West Indies. Area, 13 sq. m.; pop. 200.

Angara, a tributary of the Yenisei (q.v.).

Angeln, a district of Sleswick, between the Bay of Flensburg and the Schlei, supposed to be the home from which came the Angles who invaded England in the 5th century.

Angermanland, a former division of Sweden, now chiefly comprised in the government of Westernorrland, extends along the Gulf of Bothnia, and is watered by the river Angerman, 200 miles long. The chief town is Hernösand, with a pop. of 8000.

Angermünde, a town of Prussia, on Lake Münde, 43 miles NE. of Berlin by rail; pop. 9000.

Angers (On^{g}zhayr; anc. Andegavum), formerly the capital of the duchy of Anjou, and now of the French dep. of Maine-et-Loire, on the navigable Maine, not far from its junction with the Loire, 214 miles SW. of Paris by rail. Angers was the seat of a university (1246-1685), and of a military college, at which the Earl of Chatham and the Duke of Wellington received part of their education. David, the great sculptor, was a native. The castle was built by St Louis about 1250 on a projecting rock above the river. The fine cathedral is also a 13th-century building. Sail-making, wool and cotton spinning, and weaving are carried on. The neighbouring slate-quarries employ 3000 men. Population, about 84,000.

Anglesey, or ANGLESEA (A.S. Angles Ey—i.e. 'the Englishmen's island'), an island and county of Wales, separated from the north-west mainland by the Menai Strait (q.v.), which is spanned by the suspension bridge (1826) and by the tubular bridge (1850). The extreme length is 21 miles; the extreme breadth, 19; the coast-line measures about 80; and its area is 302 sq. m., or 193,453 acres. The climate is mild but foggy, especially in autumn; the general aspect of the island, flat and uninteresting, there being very little wood. The island is rich in minerals; the Parys and Mona copper-mines, near Amlwch, were opened in 1768. Lead ore, containing much silver, has also been found. Anglesey, known to the Romans as Mona, was one of the chief seats of the Druidical power, which in 61 A.D. was all but destroyed by the Roman general, Suetonius Paulinus. The island was again subdued by Agricola, 76 A.D. Egbert conquered it in the 9th century, and it was finally subdued by Edward I. The market-towns are Amlwch, Beaumaris, Holyhead, Llangefni, and Llanerch-y-medd. The first four united in sending one member till 1885, when they were merged in the county, which returns one member. Pop. (1841) 38,106; (1901) 50,606; (1911) 50,943.

Anglia, EAST, a kingdom founded by the Angles about the middle of the 6th century, in the eastern part of central England, in what forms the present counties of Norfolk and Suffolk.

Ango'la, a name formerly used loosely of the whole West African coast from Cape Lopez to Benguela, but restricted, since the establishment of the Congo Free State in 1885, to the Portuguese West Africa, extending from the Congo to Cape Frio, and including Cabinda; or even more narrowly, to the northern section between the Congo and the Coanza. Area, 500,000 sq. m.; pop. 4,000,000. The coast strip is level, barren, extremely hot, and very unhealthy. Beyond is hill-country, reaching a height of 3000 feet. The main rivers are the Kwango, running north to the Congo, and the Coanza and Cunene, running west to the Atlantic. Yams, tobacco, indigo, rice, cotton, and sugar are freely produced; but under Portuguese mismanagement the wealth of the country is undeveloped or decaying. There is abundance of iron in the mountains; also copper, lead, sulphur, and petroleum are obtained. Angola was long notorious for its great slave-trade. The natives are Congo negroes, and belong to the great Bantu stock. Lately there have been great abuses in connection with recruiting them for work on the cocoa plantations in St Thomas and Principe Islands. Many of the 3000 white men, mostly Portuguese, are transported convicts, and there are some 30,000 mulattos. The Portuguese under Diogo Cam discovered this coast in 1486, but St Paul de Loanda (the capital) was not built till 1578.

Ango'ra, or ANGWIREH (anc. Ancyra), capital of a Turkish province in the mountainous interior of Asia Minor, 220 miles ESE. of Constantinople. It was a flourishing city under the Persians, and was made the capital of the Roman province of Galatia Prima. The present city has 32,000 inhabitants; its trade is mainly in the hands of the Armenians, who number 9000. It is famous for its breed of goats, with beautiful silky hair, eight inches long.

Angostura, capital of the province of Guayana, in Venezuela, on the right bank of the navigable Orinoco, about 240 miles from its mouth. It is built at a pass (angostura), where the river is narrowed by rocks. The town is now more usually called Ciudad Bolivar. Pop. 12,000.

Angoulême, the capital of the French dep. of Charente, and formerly of the province of Angoumois, stands 220 feet above the winding Charente, 83 miles NE. of Bordeaux by rail. It has a fine Romanesque cathedral (1136), and a striking hôtel-de-ville, with which is incorporated the remnant of the ancient castle of Angoulême, where was born the celebrated Marguerite of Navarre, author of the Heptameron. Ravaillac was also a native. The old bastions have been converted into fine terrace-walks. There are manufactures of machinery, paper, and wire, and a brisk trade in brandy. Pop. (1866) 24,961; (1891) 34,188; (1901) 37,650; (1911) 38,211.

Angra, the capital of the Azores, a seaport at the head of a deep bay on the south coast of the island of Terceira. Pop. 10,000.

Angra-Pequena, a bay on the south-west coast of Africa, 150 miles N. of the Orange River mouth, on the coast of Great Namaqualand (q.v.). It is the chief port of the German South-west African territory; the neighbourhood is a sandy, waterless region, enjoying a healthy climate. In 1883 Angra-Pequena was ceded by a Namaqua chieftain to Lüderitz, a Bremen merchant; and next year it was taken under German protection.

Angri, a town of South Italy, 17 miles NW. of Salerno. Pop. 10,000.

Anguilla, or LITTLE SNAKE, an English West India Island, one of the Lesser Antilles, 160 miles E. of the eastern extremity of Porto Rico. Area, 35 sq. m.; pop. 4000.

Angus. See FORFARSHIRE.

Anhalt, a duchy of the German empire, almost surrounded by the Prussian province of Saxony, which breaks it up into two principal and five smaller portions. Area, 869 sq. m.; pop. (1875) 213,689; (1910) 331,047, nearly all Protestants. Dessau, Zerbst, Bernburg, Köthen, and Ballenstedt are the principal towns. The eastern part is level and fertile; the western part, approaching the Harz Mountains, is hilly and largely covered with wood, and possesses mineral wealth, especially in lead and silver. Anhalt began to be an independent principality in the first half of the 13th century. It was divided into three duchies in the beginning of the 17th century, but in 1863 the whole territory was reunited into one duchy.

Anio, the ancient name of the Teverone, a tributary of the Tiber, which rises in Monte Cantaro, and joins the larger river 3 miles above Rome. Its beautiful cascade at Tivoli (the ancient Tibur) is celebrated by the classical poets.

Anjou (On^{g}zhoo), a former province in the NW. of France, of about 3500 sq. m. in extent, now forming the dep. of Maine-et-Loire, and small parts of the deps. of Indre-et-Loire, Mayenne, and Sarthe. It lies on both sides of the lower course of the Loire, where it receives the Maine. Its capital was Angers.

Anklam, a town in the Prussian province of Pomerania, on the navigable Peene, 4 miles from its mouth in the Kleines Haff, and 41 SE. of Stralsund by rail. Long a place of commercial importance, a member of the Hanseatic League from the 14th to the 16th century, it manufactures iron, sugar, and soap. Pop. 16,000.

Anko'bar, formerly the capital of Shoa (q.v.), in Abyssinia, is built 8200 feet above sea-level. Pop. 2000—15,000.

Annaberg, a mining-town of Saxony, on the Erzgebirge range, 34 miles S. of Chemnitz by rail. Pop. 18,000.

Annabon. See ANNOBON.

Annagh, an island of County Mayo, in Achill Sound.

Annam, an 'empire' on the east coast of the Indo-Chinese peninsula, has since 1885 been a French protectorate and part of French Indo-China, which comprises, besides Annam, Tongking or Tonquin in the north (once a province of Annam), French Cochin-China in the south, and Cambodia on both sides of the lower Mekong. Before the French controversy with Siam in 1893, the western boundary of Annam was generally understood to be the main mountain ranges between the Mekong and the sea. But in 1893 France insisted that the Mekong should be regarded as the frontier; and this demand was, under protest, conceded from Cambodia north to the Laos country, or about 18° N. lat. The area of Annam, as now extended (but without Tonquin or other divisions of Indo-China), is some 50,000 sq. m.; the population, Annamites on the coast, and Mois and Laos in the hills and west of them, is variously stated at from 5,000,000 to 10,000,000.

Annam lies wholly in the torrid zone, yet even during the hot and rainy season, extending over the six months from April to September, the thermometer seldom mounts from a minimum of 70° to beyond 100° F. On account of the moisture, however, the heats in June and July are sometimes almost intolerable. The country, save on the coast and along the Mekong, is mountainous; coal and iron are now known to abound; coal is worked near Turane. The mountains are covered with valuable timber, and the lower lands are extremely fertile. The chief productions are, besides rice and other cereals, cotton, cinnamon, sugar, tea, coffee, and tobacco. The chief ports are Turane (wholly under French control), Qui-Nhon, and Xuan-Day; Hué is the capital. The principal imports are rice, cotton cloths and yarns, opium, and paper, for the most part from China and Japan.

The Annamese are mainly of Mongoloid stock. The speech of the Annamese is monosyllabic, like Chinese, from which they have borrowed many words. Confucianism is in vogue with the more cultivated; the remainder adhere to Buddhism. There are besides about 420,000 Roman Catholics.

The native prince is retained on the throne, and the interior administration—on the Chinese pattern—is in the hands of Annamite officials, though the French, through the superior council of Indo-China, have supreme authority.

Annamaboe, a seaport on the Gold Coast of Africa, 10 miles E. of Cape Coast Castle. Pop. 5000.

Annan, a seaport of Dumfriesshire, on the river Annan, near its entrance into the Solway Firth, 18 miles ESE. of Dumfries by rail. Edward Irving was a native (marble statue, 1892); and Carlyle, as a schoolboy, led 'a doleful and hateful life' at the academy. A royal burgh, Annan unites with Dumfries, &c., to return one member. Pop. 4200.

Annandale, a district of Dumfriesshire, traversed by the river Annan, which, rising near headstreams of the Tweed and Clyde, flows 49 miles southward to the Solway Firth, at a point 1¾ mile below Annan town. Near its source is a singular hollow called the Marquis of Annandale's (or Devil's) Beef-tub.

Annap'olis, a seaport of Nova Scotia, on an arm of the Bay of Fundy, 95 miles W. of Halifax by rail. Established in 1604 by the French as the capital of their province of Acadia, under the name of Port Royal, it was ceded to Britain in 1713, and changed its name in honour of Queen Anne; not till 1750 was it superseded by Halifax. Pop. 1000.

Annapolis, the capital of Maryland, U.S., on the south bank of the Severn, 2 miles from its entrance into Chesapeake Bay. Among its edifices are an imposing state-house, St John's College (1784), a Roman Catholic seminary, a naval hospital (1871), and a naval academy (1845). Founded as Providence in 1649, Annapolis was renamed after Queen Anne in 1708. Pop. (1870) 5744; (1890) 7604; (1900) 8525; (1910) 8609.

Ann Arbor, a flourishing city of Michigan, on the Huron River, 38 miles W. of Detroit by rail. Settled in 1824, and incorporated as a city in 1851, it is the seat of the state university (1837), and has various manufactories, with mineral springs. Pop. 15,000.

An'necy, chief town of the French dep. of Haute-Savoie, 22 miles S. of Geneva, and 25 miles NW. of Aix-les-Bains by rail. It stands at the NW. extremity of the Lake of Annecy, which, lying 1426 feet above the sea, is 9 miles long, and flows by the Fier to the Rhone. It has manufactures of linens, cotton-yarn, silks, &c. The castle of the Counts of Geneva is now a barrack; and there are a cathedral (1523) and hôtel-de-ville. Pop. 10,000.

Anniston, a town of Alabama, 63 miles by rail E. of Birmingham, with flourishing iron mines and works. Pop. 12,000.

Annobon, or ANNOBOM, the smallest of the four islands in the Bay of Biafra, the eastern part of the Gulf of Guinea, now belonging to Spain. Area, 6 sq. m.; pop. 2000 negroes.

Annonay (anc. Annoniacum), a town in the French dep. of Ardèche, 37 miles S. of Lyons. The chief manufacture is paper. Pop. 14,000.

Ansbach (in England often ANSPACH), a town of Bavaria, on the Rezat, 25 miles SW. of Nuremberg. The last margrave of Ansbach, of the Hohenzollern line, gave up his possessions in 1791 to Prussia; and in 1807 Napoleon transferred Ansbach to Bavaria. Pop. 20,000.

Ansonia, a manufacturing city of New Haven county, Connecticut, 12 miles W. of New Haven by rail. Pop. 15,000.

Anspach. See ANSBACH.

Anstruther, EASTER and WESTER, two contiguous royal burghs on the coast of Fife, 9 miles S. of St Andrews. Fishing and fish-curing are the staple industries. Joint pop. 1700; or, with Kilrenny, 4250.

Antanànarìvo, or TANÀNARÌVO, the capital of Madagascar, has a population estimated at 55,000. It is situated 5000 feet above the level of the sea, from which it is distant 110 miles.

Antarctic Ocean, the ocean situated about, or within, the Antarctic Circle. The average depth of the continuous ocean which surrounds south polar land is about two miles; a sounding in Ross Sea (lat. 70° 42′ S.) reached 1575 fathoms without touching bottom; it gradually shoals towards Antarctic land, which in some places is met with a short distance within the Antarctic Circle (see ANTARCTICA). Three navigators, Cook, Weddell, and Ross, crossed the 70th parallel south. The last in 1841 sailed along the coast as far as 78° S., within sight of high mountain ranges, which here terminated in an active volcano, Mount Erebus, 13,000 feet high. His farther progress was stopped by an icy barrier 150 to 200 feet in height, along which he sailed to the east for 300 miles. The depth off this ice-barrier was 260 fathoms, so that it was just in the condition to generate those large, flat-topped, tabular icebergs which are the characteristic feature of the Antarctic regions. Most of these bergs, and a large portion of the Great Barrier also, are probably composed mainly of consolidated snow coated with ice. This barrier in some places extends inland for about 300 miles, but at its seaward end is almost certainly afloat. It has considerably receded in Ross Sea since Ross's time, and seems to be the remains of the ancient ice-sheet that covered this sea at the period of maximum glaciation. In 1912 Dr Mawson, coasting westward past Adelie Land and Knox Land, arrived at a barrier similar to that of Ross, but not so high. Ross Sea is approximately between lat. 70° and 80° S., and long. 165° W. and 160° E. Weddell Sea is approximately between the Antarctic Circle and lat. 75° S., and between long. 15° and 45° W. Whales, grampuses, seals, penguins, petrels, albatrosses, and other oceanic birds abound. Diatoms are very abundant in the surface-waters, and their dead frustules form a pure-white deposit called diatom ooze, about the latitude of 60°, outside the blue muds which surround the continent. Life is abundant in the surface-waters and at the bottom of the ocean. See works by Mackinder (1892), Burn-Murdoch (1894), Neumayer (Berlin, 1901), Gerlache (Paris, 1902), Balch (Philadelphia, 1902), and the works cited under ANTARCTICA.

Antarctica, a general name conveniently applied to the continental land (with an area roughly estimated by Sir John Murray at about 3,000,000 sq. m.) mainly within the Antarctic Circle, and extending thence to the Pole. The comparatively small portion that has been more or less explored consists of a vast plateau covered with ice and snow, from 7000 feet to over 10,000 feet above sea-level, crossed by a range of great mountains trending from north-west to south-east, and bordered on the coast by mountains and glaciers, to which there generally succeeds a cliff-like ice-barrier as a sea-front (see ANTARCTIC OCEAN); though in some regions this is replaced by rock cliffs partly covered with ice. There are no human inhabitants, and no land animals, if insects are excepted; but seals abound on the coast, as well as penguins and other sea-birds. Small quantities of moss, lichens, and fungus occur, but no other vegetation. Several seams of coal and also some fossils have been found recently. The mean winter temperature (at Cape Adare) is −11° F., and the summer temperature 30° F. The lowest temperature at Scott's winter station was −50° F.; but for a while on the barrier it was rarely above −60°, and often below −70° F. The annual snowfall at Cape Royds is equivalent to about 9½ inches of rain.

D'Urville (1840) and Ross (1841) were the first to set foot on land within the Antarctic Circle. The former discovered Adelie Land, which is approximately in lat. 66° S., and between long. 135° and 140° E. The latter landed on Possession Island, discovering Victoria Land, approximately between lat. 70° and 80° S., and long. 170° and 150° E. In 1899–1900 Borchgrevink was the first to winter on the continent (at Cape Adare in Victoria Land). Subsequently landing on the barrier in long. 164° W., on the opposite shore of Ross Sea, he made a short journey to 78° 50′ S. In 1902–3 Scott, reaching 150° long. W., discovered King Edward VII. Land; then crossing towards Victoria Land, he found that Mount Erebus was on an island (which he named Ross) in M'Murdo Sound. Afterwards he travelled on the barrier to 82° 17′ S. Climbing a huge glacier and high mountain slopes, he was the first to get upon the vast plateau. In 1902 a German expedition discovered Kaiser Wilhelm Land. In 1904 Bruce, going through Weddell Sea, reached 74° 1′ S. and 22° W., seeing signs of land, Coats Land, of which Dr Filchner (1912) traced a continuation (Luitpold Land) to 79° S. In 1904 a French expedition discovered Loubet Land, a continuation of Graham's Land. In 1908–9 Shackleton wintered at Cape Royds (Ross Island). Then his southern party struggled up to and over the plateau (which gradually rose to more than 10,000 feet) as far as 88° 23′ S., within 100 nautical miles of the Pole. This part of the plateau he called King Edward VII. Plateau. In 1911 Amundsen, having made his headquarters near Whales Bay, on the east shore of Ross Sea, started on 20th October for the Pole, which his party reached on 16th December. The adjacent plateau he named King Haakon VII. Plateau. Meanwhile Scott's second expedition was wintering at Cape Evans, by M'Murdo Sound. On 2d November he set out for the Pole, which he reached on 18th January 1912; but the whole party died on its return journey. Dr Mawson explored the region of the magnetic pole; and Mr Wild followed the coast westwards to Queen Mary Land, which he surveyed as far as Kaiser Wilhelm Land. See works by Scott (1905–13), Shackleton (1909), Amundsen (1912), and works cited under ANTARCTIC OCEAN.

Anteque'ra, a town in the Spanish province of Malaga, on the Guadalhorce, 65 miles W. of Granada by rail. Pop. 31,600.

Antibes (On^{g}teeb'; anc. Antipolis), a seaport in the French dep. of Alpes Maritimes, 6 miles NE. of Cannes. Pop. 9000.

Anticosti, a Canadian island in the Gulf of St Lawrence, is 140 miles long, and 30 broad in the centre. The climate is severe, the surface an alternation of rocks and swamps. It is visited by fishermen in the summer, but there are hardly any inhabitants.

Antietam (pron. Antee-tam), a narrow but deep river in Maryland, U.S., falling into the Potomac 7 miles above Harper's Ferry. On its banks, in 1862, McClellan defeated Lee.

Antig'ua, a West India island, the most important of the Leeward Islands, has an area of 97 sq. m. It was discovered in 1493 by Columbus. It was first settled by a few English in 1632, and was declared a British possession by the Treaty of Breda (1667). Antigua is the seat of an Anglican bishop. Antigua produces sugar, molasses, rum, tamarinds, arrowroot, and cotton. Pop., including Barbuda, a little under 39,000; of St John, the capital, 10,000.

Anti-Lebanon. See LEBANON.

Antilles, a term applied to the whole of the West India Islands (q.v.) except the Bahamas. The Greater Antilles are Cuba, Jamaica, Hayti, and Porto Rico; the others the Lesser Antilles.

An'tioch, the ancient capital of the Greek kings of Syria, lies in a fertile and beautiful plain, on the left bank of the river Orontes, 14 miles from the sea. In the time of Antiochus the Great, and under the Roman emperors of the first three centuries, it contained 500,000 inhabitants. It was one of the earliest strongholds of Christianity—here the name Christians was first used. Its decline dates from the 5th century; and the modern Antakieh, with a pop. of only 20,000, exhibits almost no traces of its former grandeur, except the ruins of the old walls and of a Crusaders' fortress.—ANTIOCH, in Pisidia, founded also by Nicator, was declared a free city by the Romans in the 2d century B.C. It was often visited by St Paul.

Antip'aros (anc. Oliaros), one of the middle Cyclades, in the Ægean Sea, close to Paros. It is 13½ sq. m. in area, and has about 700 inhabitants. Rich lead-mines were discovered in 1872. Its wonderful stalactite grotto is not alluded to by any classical writer, but has been well known since 1673.

Antisana, a volcano of the Andes, in Ecuador, 35 miles SE. of Quito, 19,335 feet high.

Antiva'ri, a seaport on the coast-district assigned to Montenegro by the Treaty of Berlin in 1878, 18 miles NW. of Scutari. Pop. 2500.

Antofagasta, a port in the Chilian province of the same name. Founded in 1870, it owes its rapid rise to the neighbouring saltpetre deposits, and to the rich mines of Caracoles. It was taken from Bolivia by Chili in 1879. Pop. 32,500.

Antoninus, WALL OF, or GRAHAM'S DYKE, a Roman rampart erected in 140 A.D., during the reign of Antoninus Pius, from Carriden on the Firth of Forth to near Old Kilpatrick on the Firth of Clyde. It was 36 miles long, and followed the line of Agricola's forts (81 A.D.). See Macdonald, The Roman Wall in Scotland (1911).

Antrim, a maritime county of Ulster, third in Ireland in population (first with part of Belfast), but in size only ninth. Its greatest length is 57 miles; its greatest breadth, 28; its extent of sea-coast, 90; and its area, 1192 sq. m. Of this rather more than three-fourths is in tillage and pasture, and one per cent. under wood. Off the north coast lie Rathlin Isle and the Skerries; and off the east coast, the Maiden Rocks. The east coast is hilly; and from Larne to Fair Head, parallel ranges stretch SW. into the interior, forming valleys opening seaward, called the Glens of Antrim. The interior slopes towards Lough Neagh. The highest eminences are—Trostan, 1810 feet; and Slievemish, or Slemish, 1782. The principal streams are the Bann, from Lough Neagh to the Atlantic; the Main, running parallel to the Bann, but in the reverse direction, into Lough Neagh; and the Bush, flowing north into the Atlantic. Many peat-bogs occur. Between Ballycastle and the mouth of the Bann, the basalt assumes very picturesque forms; and the Giants' Causeway (q.v.) is one of the most perfect examples of columnar basalt in the world. Fine salt-mines occur at Duncrue and Carrickfergus; small coal-fields near Ballycastle and in the interior; and rich beds of iron ore in Glenravel. The soil is mostly light, and the chief crop is oats. There are some linen, cotton, and coarse woollen manufactures. The towns are Lisburn, Ballymena, Ballymoney, Carrickfergus, Larne, and Antrim (pop. 2000). Belfast, most of which was formerly reckoned as in Antrim, is now wholly without the administrative county. County Antrim returns four members to parliament; Belfast borough, four. Pop. (1841) 351,496; (1891) 427,968; (1911, excluding Belfast) 193,864—50 per cent. Presbyterians, 21·7 Protestant Episcopalians, 20·5 Roman Catholics.

Antwerp (Fr. Anvers; Flem. Antwerpen, 'on the wharf'), the chief commercial city of Belgium, on the river Scheldt, 52 miles from the sea, and 27 N. of Brussels. It is the Liverpool of the Continent, and the tonnage of vessels entering its port has increased to a vast extent of late years, until it stands at over 11,000,000 tons annually. The large dock and quay accommodation having been found too limited, a new quay, 2 miles in length, and docks, constructed at a cost of nearly £4,000,000, were opened in 1885, and further extensions have been made and are contemplated. The chief exports are flax, sugar, iron, woollen goods, metals, glass, and tallow; the chief imports are wheat, petroleum, wool, cotton, coffee, tobacco. The manufactures consist chiefly of sugar, white-lead, cotton goods, lace, linen-thread, sewing-silk, black silk stuffs, starch, and printers' ink. There are also to be mentioned oil-refining, tobacco-manufacture, the cutting of diamonds and other precious stones, and shipbuilding. The chief public institutions are—the Academy of Sciences, Academy of Painting and Sculpture, a Medical and Surgical School, Naval Arsenal, Museum (with specimens of the pictures of Rubens, Vandyck, Titian, and Matsys), Zoological Gardens, the Flemish Theatres, and the Plantin Museum (1876). The six-aisled cathedral (1352–1518), the noblest Gothic structure in Belgium, is 500 feet in length by 250 in breadth, with a roof supported by 125 pillars, and an exquisite spire, 403 feet high, in which hangs a splendid carillon of 99 bells. The interior is enriched by the two greatest of all the pictures of Rubens, the Elevation of, and the Descent from, the Cross. The Church of St James contains the monument of the Rubens family. The Exchange (1531), a fine building, is said to have been Gresham's model of the old London Exchange. It was burnt in 1858, but rebuilt in the same style, and reopened in 1872. The hôtel-de-ville (1565) is a fine building in the Renaissance style. The old fortifications were demolished in 1860, though Alva's famous citadel (1567) stood till 1874; and since 1851 new fortifications have been erected outside the city, with detached forts to the south-east, rendering Antwerp one of the most strongly fortified places in Europe. Pop. (1846) 88,487; (1891) 232,723; (1910) 320,640.

Antwerp in the beginning of the 16th century was the commercial capital of the world. When in 1576 it was seized by the Spanish soldiery, 8000 persons were murdered, and the city-hall and nearly a thousand buildings burnt. This and the assault of the Duke of Parma in 1585, caused Antwerp to sink into decay. From 1794 till 1814, while it was held by the French, Napoleon attempted to make it a great military and commercial centre. The union of Belgium with Holland in 1815 was very favourable to Antwerp. When the revolutionary party gained possession in 1830, the Dutch commandant, General Chassé, retreated to the citadel, and commenced a bombardment, which destroyed the arsenal. In 1832, 50,000 French under Marshal Gérard appeared before Antwerp, to demand the surrender of the citadel; and after its interior had been reduced to ruins by the French artillery, Chassé capitulated. The city was handed over to the Belgians, and since the treaty of 1839, Antwerp has had a singularly prosperous career. French is the business language, but the majority of the inhabitants speak Flemish.

Anupshahr, a town of India, in the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh, on the Ganges, 73 miles SE. of Delhi; pop. 15,000.

Aonlaganj', or Aounlah, a town of India, 21 miles SW. of Bareilly; pop. 14,000.

Aosta (anc. Augusta Prætoria), a cathedral city of Italy, on the Dora Baltea, 19 miles from the opening of the great St Bernard Pass, and 80 miles NNW. of Turin by rail. St Bernard was archdeacon of Aosta; and here Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, was born. Near by are the celebrated baths and mines of St Didier. Pop. 8000.

Apatin', a town of Hungary, on the left bank of the Danube, 49 miles SW. of Theresiopol; pop. 15,000.

Ap'eldorn, a town of Holland, 17 miles N. of Arnheim. The Loo, a royal hunting-lodge, beloved of William of Orange, is near. Paper-making is the staple industry. Pop. 36,500.

Ap'ennines (Ital. Appennini, Lat. Mons Apenninus), a mountain-chain extending 740 miles uninterruptedly throughout the whole length of the Italian peninsula. It belongs to the system of the Alps. The average height of the entire chain is about 4000 feet, which in the north sinks to 3500 feet, and in the Abruzzi rises to 7000 feet. Here, in Monte Corno, the highest peak of the range known as Gran Sasso d'Italia, they reach an elevation of 9574 feet, and in Monte Velino, of 7916 feet. The Apennines are crossed by thirteen principal passes; and seven of these are traversed by railways. The principal chain exhibits, for the most part, a dreary and barren appearance. It looks like a vast wall, with very few projecting peaks to break its dull monotony. Only in the Abruzzi, and above all, in the marble mountains of Carrara and Seravezza, do the bold and magnificent forms of the Alps appear. Where water is plentiful there is no lack of rich pastures and dense forests; but usually only thin grass and wild scrubby bushes cover the stony slopes. The greater number of the forest brooks, with deep rocky ravines, during summer are dry.

Where the mountains dip down to the sea, as at the Riviera of Genoa and the Gulf of Naples, a rich, peculiarly southern vegetation clothes the declivities. There is no region of perpetual snow; but the summits of the Abruzzi and the lofty peaks of Lunigiana are often covered with snow from October far into May.

Apenrade (Ah-pen-rah'dā), a Sleswick-Holstein seaport, 66 miles NNW. of Kiel. Pop. 8000.

Apia (Ah-pee'a). See SAMOA.

Apol'da, a town of Saxe-Weimar, 9½ miles NE. of Weimar by rail. It has manufactures of hosiery, amongst the most important in Germany, besides dye-works, machine-works, and bell-foundries. Pop. 22,000.

Appalachians, a great mountain-system of North America, nearly parallel with the Atlantic coast, and extending from the Gulf of St Lawrence SSW. to the west central portion of Alabama. Geologically, it is much older than the Western Cordillera, known as the Rocky Mountain system, but it is in the main much later in geologic date than the Laurentian system, which represents it on the north of the St Lawrence. It is the parent of many of the rivers of the Atlantic States; but several large streams break its continuity; and one, the river Hudson, is a tidal channel which carries even sea-going vessels through the range. The Appalachians consist, in the main, of various parallel ranges, separated by wide valleys. Even the low hill-ranges between the mountains and the sea have much of the same parallelism, and the sea-coast has in a marked degree the same general direction and curvature as the mountains themselves; while, far to the NE., the nearly detached peninsula of Nova Scotia and the island of Newfoundland are traversed by ranges exhibiting the same parallelism and the same general direction as are seen in the Appalachian ranges.

Locally, the Appalachians have various names —e.g. in the Gaspé Peninsula, the Shickshock Mountains, the Franconia Mountains of New Hampshire (where Mount Washington attains 6293 feet); the Green Mountains of Vermont are the Hoosic Range in Massachusetts; the Catskills and Shawangunk Mountains; in Pennsylvania and Maryland, the South Mountain or Blue Ridge, which is regarded as identical with the Unaka or Smoky Mountain Ridge of North Carolina and Tennessee; and west of the South Mountain of Pennsylvania the great Alleghany Ridge (q.v.), which often gives name to the whole system.

Nowhere do the Appalachians reach the snow-line. Their highest points occur in North Carolina, where Mitchell's Peak reaches the height of 6688 feet. The principal coal-beds of this chain occur in Pennsylvania to the NNE., and in the other states southward along the mountains to their termination in Alabama, the chief coal-basins being either among the mountains, or to the westward of them. There are beds of anthracite coal on the eastern slopes of the Appalachians, chiefly in Pennsylvania, west of which the coal becomes bituminous, after we have crossed basins of semi-anthracitic and moderately bituminous coal. This coal region is one of the most productive, extensive, and important anywhere known. Of the metals, by far the most important is iron, of which various ores are largely wrought. Gold occurs chiefly to the eastward of the mountains, and is wrought at various points from Virginia to Alabama. Zinc, lead, and other metals are found in this range, which also affords marbles, slates, and a great variety of building-stones, as well as petroleum.

Appalachico'la, a river of the United States, rising in Georgia, and flowing through Florida into Appalachicola Bay in the Gulf of Mexico. Reckoning from its remotest sources, it is about 400 miles long, being navigable by steamboats for 70 miles up to the junction of the Chattahoochee with the Flint, where the name of Appalachicola is first given.—APPALACHICOLA is also a cotton-shipping seaport at the mouth of this stream; pop. 3000.

Appenzell' (from Abbatis Cella), a double canton in the NE. of Switzerland. It is divided into two divisions—Innerroden and Ausserroden; the former of which is peopled by Roman Catholics; the latter by Protestants, and noted for its dense population. The surface is mountainous, especially in the south, where Mount Sentis attains 8220 feet. The chief river is the Sittern. The canton, once dependent on the Abbey of St Gall, won its independence after a struggle, and joined the seven old cantons in 1452. Area, 162 sq. m.; pop. (1910) 72,354, of whom over 57,000 were in Ausserroden. Appenzell, the capital, is situated on the Sittern; pop. 5000. The largest town is Herisau (pop. 15,000).

Appin (Apthane, 'abbey lands'), a beautiful coast district of Argyllshire, extending along the east shore of Loch Linnhe, 15 miles NNE. of Oban. It is the country of a branch of the Stewarts.

Appleby, the county town of Westmorland, on the Eden, 13 miles SE. of Penrith. There is a castle, first mentioned in 1088, the keep of which, called Cæsar's Tower, is still in tolerable condition. Appleby was disfranchised in 1832, but received a new municipal charter in 1885. Pop. 1700.

Appleton, a city of Wisconsin, U.S., 185 miles N. of Chicago, and 120 miles from Milwaukee by rail. It stands on the Grand Chute Rapids of the Fox River, which, with a descent of 30 feet in 1½ mile, affords immense water-power for flour, paper, and woollen mills. There are also manufactures of machinery. Lawrence University (1847) is a Methodist institution. Pop. 17,000.

Appomattox Courthouse, a village of Virginia, 20 miles E. of Lynchburg. Here Lee, on April 9, 1865, surrendered the army of Northern Virginia, 27,805 men strong, to Grant.

Apsheron, a peninsula on the west coast of the Caspian Sea, belonging to the Russian government of Baku. Its enormous petroleum industry is noticed at Baku (q.v.).

Apt (Apta Julia), a cathedral town in the French dep. of Vaucluse, 30 miles E. of Avignon; pop. 4000.

Apu'lia (modern Puglia), the south-eastern part of Italy as far as the promontory of Leuca, comprising the three provinces of Bari, Foggia, and Lecce, with an area of 8540 sq. m., and a pop. of 2,130,000.

Apu're, a navigable river of Venezuela, which rises near the western boundary among the Eastern Cordillera, and flows nearly 1000 miles eastward to the Orinoco.

Apu'rimac, a river of Peru, also called Tambo, which, after a northward course of 500 miles, helps to form the Ucayali, and finally joins the Amazon. It gives name to a province with an area of 8200 sq. m., and a pop. of 180,000.

Aq'uila, the capital of an Italian province, on the Alterno, near the loftiest of the Apennines, 64 miles SE. of Terni by rail. It was built by the Emperor Frederick II. from the ruins of the ancient Amiternum, a town of the Sabines, and birthplace of Sallust the historian. In 1703 it was almost destroyed by an earthquake, in which 2000 persons perished. It is a bishop's see, and a busy place, with a large trade in saffron. Pop. 22,000.

Aquilei'a (also Aglar), a decayed town of Austria, at the head of the Adriatic, 22 miles NW. of Trieste; pop. 1000.

Aquita'nia, the Latin name of a part of Gaul, originally including the country between the Pyrenees and the Garonne, peopled by Iberian tribes and by Celtic settlers.

Arabgir' (anc. Anabrace), a town of Asiatic Turkey, in the province of Sivas, not far from the Euphrates, and on the caravan road from Aleppo to Trebizond. Pop. 30,000, one-fourth Armenians, the rest Turks.

Arabia, the great south-western peninsula of Asia. Its greatest length from NW. to SE. is about 1800 miles; its mean breadth, about 600; its area, 1,230,000 sq. m.; and its population conjectured to be 3,000,000. It is bounded on the N. by the highlands of Syria and the plains of Mesopotamia; on the E., by the Persian Gulf and the Gulf of Omân; on the S., by the Arabian Sea; and on the W., by the Red Sea and the Suez Canal. Midway between Mecca and Medîna runs the tropic of Cancer. Ptolemy is supposed to be the author of the famous threefold division into Arabia Petræa, in the NW.; Arabia Felix, to the south of Mecca; and Arabia Deserta, in the interior. Modern divisions are: the Sinaitic Peninsula (see SINAI), between the Gulfs of Suez and Akaba; the Hedjâz ('the Barrier'), the larger and northern strip to the east of the Red Sea; Yemen, the southern and smaller strip to the east of the Red Sea; Hadramaut, the region along the southern coast; Omân, the extreme south-eastern end of the peninsula; El-Hasa, along the Persian Gulf; Nejd, the central highlands of Arabia.

In shape, Arabia is an irregular parallelogram, broadest at the southern end; in character, it is mainly African. The vast central plateau rises from a height of 2500 feet in the N. to 7000 feet in the SW., and is bounded by western and southern mountain chains, the former attaining, to the south of Mecca, a height of 8500 feet. Between the mountains and the sea is a low hot strip of land, partially fertile, of varying width. There is a desert in the north of the interior, the mountainous country of Nejd near the very centre, and to the south of Nejd another very sterile sandy desert (Dahna). Hedjâz and Yemen extend from the Red Sea indefinitely towards the interior, and consist partly of the Tehâma, or low country, along the sea, and partly of the mountain district beyond. Mecca and Medîna, with their seaports Jiddah and Yembo, are in Hedjâz. Yemen is on the whole well watered, has rich and fertile valleys, and contains one-fifth of the whole population of Arabia. Yemen possesses two very important commercial towns, Mocha and Loheia, situated on the coast of the Red Sea. Hadramaut resembles the Hedjâz in character. Omân is mainly mountainous, is partly very fertile, and possesses the good harbour of Muscat. It has considerable trade, and some manufactures of cotton, silk, and arms. Hasa is comparatively level and fertile. Large portions of Arabia are perfectly arid; nowhere does a river reach the sea all the year round; but the more fertile portions are so extensive as to constitute two-thirds of the total area: one-third of the whole may be accounted desert and uninhabitable.

Politically, Hedjâz, Yemen, and El-Hasa are really three Turkish provinces; the Sinaitic Peninsula is in Egyptian hands; England exercises much influence in Hadramaut through her possession of Aden; the Sultan of Omân is independent, and in alliance with England; Nejd, the seat of the once powerful Wahâbi State, is independent. The Emîr of Shomer or Shammar pays a small annual tribute to the Sherîf of Mecca, in recognition of Turkish supremacy.

The Arab is of medium stature, muscular make, and brown complexion. Independence looks out of his glowing eyes; by nature he is quick, sharp-witted, imaginative, and passionately fond of poetry. Courage, temperance, hospitality, and good faith are his leading virtues; but these are often marred by a spirit of rapacity and sanguinary revenge. His wife or wives do the work, keep the house, and educate the children. Arabian life is either nomadic or settled. The wandering tribes, or Bedouin, who have, however, their allotted winter and summer camping-grounds, and a strong attachment to their own mode of life, entertain notions of the rights of property differing seriously from those regulating the West; yet even their most marauding tribes are not without a traditional code of law and honour, the only law recognised among them; the enforcing of it is left to every tribesman. The settled tribes, styled Hadesi and Fellahs, are despised by the Bedouin, who scorn to intermarry even with the few artisans that accompany every tribe. The Bedouin are several times outnumbered by the settled population, and therefore must not be regarded as normal Arabs, who are adventurous, commercial, and willing to become sailors. Yet mountain and desert barriers and patriarchal anarchy make Arabia the 'anti-industrial centre of the world.' The export of coffee, dates, figs, spices, and drugs, though still considerable, is said to be only a shadow of the old commerce which existed before the circumnavigation of Africa. The government is patriarchal, and the chief men of the various tribes have the title of Emîr, Sheikh, or, in a religious sense, Imâm.

Before the rise of Mohammed the history of the peninsula is obscure and confused; one bond of union amongst the tribes, constantly at war with each other, was the Káaba, a small rude temple of unknown antiquity, where the idols of the tribes, over 350 in number, were kept. The grand epoch in Arabian history, the Hegira (Hedjra), is Mohammed's flight in 622 A.D. from Mecca to Medina, where he gathered his first body of adherents, and commenced actively the establishment of his doctrines by the sword and otherwise. Now for the first time the Arabian tribes became united under one sceptre, and were powerful enough to erect new empires in three quarters of the world—in Palestine, Mesopotamia, and Persia; in Egypt and the north of Africa; and in Spain. The dominion of the Arabs, from the time of Mohammed till the fall of the califate of Bagdad in 1258, or even to the expulsion of the Moors from Spain, is an important period in the history of civilisation. The Arabian literature became the vehicle of a characteristic culture, and Arabic scholars were the main cultivators of philosophy and science—including mathematics, astronomy, medicine, &c.—in the middle ages.

But the movements that had so much effect on the destinies of other nations left Arabia itself in a neglected and exhausted condition, and the peninsula was broken up into several distinct and unimportant principalities. In the 16th and 17th centuries the Turks, Persians, Dutch, and Portuguese took possession of parts of the country. The native orthodox Moslem Wahâbi empire was founded in Central Arabia about 1760, shattered in 1812 by Mehemet Ali of Egypt, and again restored. In 1911 Turkey had to suppress a revolt in Yemen.

Arabian Gulf. See Red Sea.

Arabian Sea, that part of the Indian Ocean which lies between India on the east and Arabia on the west. Its two great arms are the Red Sea proper and the Persian Gulf.

Aracan. See Arakan.

Arad, a town of Hungary, on the Maros, an affluent of the Theiss, 95 miles SE. of Buda-Pesth, and 74 E. of Szegedin by rail. It carries on a large trade in corn, spirits, wine, and tobacco, and is one of the greatest cattle-markets in Hungary. Pop. 63,000.—New Arad, across the river, has 5000 inhabitants.

Ar′afat, Mount, a granite hill (260 feet), 15 miles SE. of Mecca, visited by the faithful, and believed to be the spot where Adam again met Eve, after a punitive separation of 200 years.

Ar′agon, once a kingdom, now divided into the three provinces of Saragossa, Huesca, and Teruel, in the NE. of Spain. Area, 17,980 sq. m.; population, 950,000. It is bounded on the north by the Pyrenees, and watered by the Ebro. Aragon was conquered by the Moors in the beginning of the 8th century, recovered from them and united with Catalonia (1137), and was united with Castile through the marriage of Ferdinand of Aragon with Isabella, heiress of Castile (1469). The chief towns are Saragossa, Calatayud, Huesca, and Teruel.

Arago′na, a town of Sicily, 6 miles NNE. of Girgenti by rail. Pop. 13,000.

Araguay′, a large river of Brazil, flowing 1000 miles northward, till, at San Joao, it joins the Tocantins, which again, after a northerly course of 300 miles more, mingles its estuary with that of the Amazon.

Ar′akan, long the most northerly division of Lower Burma, is a narrow strip of territory on the Bay of Bengal. Its length is 400 miles; its breadth varies from 90 miles in the north to about 15; and the area is 14,526 sq. m. A range of mountains, nearly parallel with the line of coast, the highest point 7000 feet above sea-level, separates Arakan from Pegu and Upper Burma. Rice is the chief article of exportation; the others are cotton, tobacco, sugar, hemp, indigo, betel-nuts, and timber, especially teak. The imports consist mainly of British manufactures. Pop. 787,518.

Aral, Lake, separated by the plateau of Ust-Urt from the Caspian Sea, is the largest lake in the steppes of Asia. It has an area of about 24,000 sq. m.; is fed by the Jaxartes and Oxus (the present Sir-Daria and Amu-Daria); has no outlet; and is generally shallow, its only deep water (225 feet) being on the west coast. Its level is 117 feet above that of the Caspian, which is 84 feet below the surface of the Black Sea. Like other lakes which are drained only by evaporation, it is brackish. Fish, including sturgeon, carp, and herring, are abundant. The lake is dotted with multitudes of islands and islets; and navigation is difficult. The area now occupied by the Sea of Aral has been dry land twice within historical times—the Jaxartes and the Oxus then running south of the Sea of Aral to the Caspian. This was the case during the Greco-Roman period, and again during the 13th and 14th centuries A.D.

Aran, South Isles of, Ireland, are three small islands lying NE. and SW. across the entrance to Galway Bay. Total area, 11,287 acres. They rise to a height of from 200 to 354 feet on the west side, ending in cliffs facing the Atlantic. Most of the land is rudely cultivated. Inishmore, the chief island, is still known as Aran-na-naomh, or 'Aran of the Saints.' Pop. 2700. See Burke's South Isles of Aran (1887).

Aranjuez (Â-rân-hoo-ayth′; Lat. Ara Jovis), a town of Spain, on the Tagus, 30 miles SSE. of Madrid by rail. Its palace was long a favourite spring-resort of the royal family, from Charles V. downwards. Pop. 14,000.

Ar′arat, a general old name for the district through which the Aras flows, and never the name by which the Mount of Ararat has been known to the people around it. Associated, however, as the mountains of this district are in Genesis, viii. 4, with the landing-place of the ark after the flood, the name has been, naturally enough, appropriated to the highest peak, which in Armenian is called Massis or Massis Ljarn; in Tartar and Turkish, Aghri-Dagh, or curved mountain; and in Persian, Koh-i-Nuh, or Noah's mountain. The twin mountains of Ararat form an elliptical mass, 25 miles long, by 13 broad, and rising, Great Ararat to 16,969 feet, Little Ararat to 12,840 feet above the sea-level; the two summits 7 miles apart. In 1828 the Czar Nicholas annexed the territory around Erivan; and Little Ararat is now the meeting points of the Russian, Turkish, and Persian empires. On the 20th of June 1840, dreadful shocks of earthquake were felt, and great masses of the mountain were thrown into the plain. Tournefort made a partial ascent of the mountain in 1700; and several ascents have been made since 1829. See Bryce's Transcaucasia and Ararat (2d ed. 1878).

Aras (anc. Araxes), the chief river of Armenia, formed by the junction of the Bingol-Su and the Kaleh-Su, and itself, after a course of 500 miles, joining the Kur (anc. Cyrus), which descends from the Caucasus through Georgia, about 75 miles from its mouth. Their united waters turn suddenly to the south, and fall by three mouths into the Caspian.

Araucania, the country of the Araucos or Araucanian Indians, in the south of Chili. The Chilian province of Arauco, lying between the Andes and the Pacific Ocean, and bounded on the north by Concepcion, on the south by Valdivia, was formed in 1875, with an area of 8100 sq. m., and a pop. (1910) of 63,666. A large part of Arauco and the more southerly province of Valdivia is occupied by Indians, who have mostly submitted to Chilian authority. The Araucanians are a fierce and warlike people, now numbering less than 50,000.

Arau′re, a town of Venezuela, 60 miles ENE. of Truxillo. Pop. 5000.

Aravalli, a range of mountains in Western India, extending 300 miles north-eastward through Rajputana. The highest summit is Abu (q.v.), 5650 feet.

Arbe′la, now Erbil or Arbil, a small town of Assyria, east from Mosul, gave name to Alexander's final defeat of Darius, 331 B.C.

Arbigland, an estate, the birthplace of Paul Jones, on the coast of Kirkcudbrightshire, 13 miles S. of Dumfries.

Arbirlot, a Forfarshire parish, 3 miles W. by S. of Arbroath. Archbishop Gladstanes and Dr Guthrie were ministers.

Arbo′ga, a town in Sweden, on the small river Arboga, by which, with the aid of a canal, the lakes Hielmar and Mälar are united, 101 miles WNW. of Stockholm by rail. Pop. 6000.

Arbois, a town in the French dep. of Jura, 7 miles NE. of Poligny by rail. Pop. 3400.

Arbroath′, or ABERBROTH′OCK, a seaport of Forfarshire, at the mouth of the Brothock Burn, 17 miles ENE. of Dundee. Here in 1178 William the Lion founded a Tyronensian abbey in which he was buried (1214), and which was destroyed by the Reformers in 1560. The picturesque ruins of its cruciform church, which measured 276 by 160 feet, present a noble west doorway and a rose-window, 'the round O of Arbroath.' The chief industries are flax-spinning, engineering, and the manufacture of boots, sail-cloth, and linen fabrics. The new harbour, begun in 1841, admits vessels of 400 tons; the old harbour was converted into a wet-dock (1871–77). The chief exports are grain, potatoes, fish, and paving-flags; the chief imports are coal, flax, hemp, jute, and hides. Arbroath is a royal burgh, and with Montrose, &c., returns one member. Arbroath is the 'Fairport' of Scott's Antiquary. Pop. (1831) 13,795; (1911) 20,648. See works by Miller (1860), Hay (1876), and J. Adam (1886).

Arbuthnott, a Kincardineshire parish, 2½ miles WNW. of Bervie. Dr Arbuthnott was a native.

Arcachon (Ar′ca-shon^{g}), a bathing-place dating from 1854, in the French dep. of Gironde, 34 miles SW. of Bordeaux by rail. The fine broad sands are admirably adapted for bathing; and the place is sheltered by sand-hills, covered with extensive pine-woods. The climate is always temperate, and the rainfall is but 32 inches. Scientific oyster-culture is practised here on a large scale. Pop. 11,000.

Arcadia, the central, mountainous part of the Peloponnesus (or Morea) in Greece, treated in poetry as the home of primitive simplicity, peace, and innocence.

Archaig, a loch of Lochaber, Inverness-shire, 10 miles N. of Fort William. It is 12 miles long, and sends off the Archaig River 1¼ mile to Loch Lochy.

Archangel, the chief city of a Russian government, 40 miles above the junction of the Dwina with the White Sea. It is the seat of an archbishop, and the chief commercial city for the north of Russia and Siberia, and is frequented by much shipping—especially British—from June to October, the port being clear of ice only during that period. The harbour is a mile below the town, at the island of Solombaly; and 12 miles below are a government dockyard and merchants' warehouses. The chief articles of traffic are fish, flax, oats, linseed, tar, pitch, rosin, train-oil, skins, furs, timber, wax, iron, tallow, bristles, caviare. The manufactures include cordage, canvas, linen, leather, beer, and sugar. The town, which owes its name to a monastery of St Michael, and which is connected by river and canal with a great part of European Russia, is the oldest seaport in the empire, dating its rise from a visit paid by the English seaman, Chancellor, in 1553. Pop. 35,000.—The government has an area of 331,505 sq. m., and a pop. of 437,000.

Archipel′ago, an Italian coinage, first met with in 1268, and signifying 'the chief sea,' was applied originally to that part of the Mediterranean which separates Greece from Asia (the Ægean Sea of the ancients); but is now extended to any sea, like it, thickly interspersed with islands, or rather to the group of islands themselves. All archipelagoes fall naturally into two groups, the oceanic and the continental. The islands in the Greek Archipelago consist principally of two groups, called Cyclades and Sporades; the first from their encircling the sacred island of Delos, the second from their being scattered in a wavy line. The former lie to the east of Southern Greece, while the latter skirt the west of Asia Minor. The numerous islands which stud this sea range in size from the merest barren rocks to Crete, with an area of 3326 sq. m. Most are of volcanic origin, with high bluffs rising abruptly from the sea. Of the Cyclades, all belonging to Greece, the principal are: Syra, Delos, Tenos, Andros, Cythnos, Thera, Naxos, Melos, and Paros. The chief islands of the Sporades are: Carpathos, Rhodes, Cos, Patmos, seized from Turkey by Italy in 1912 and held as pledges for the fulfilment of the Treaty of Ouchy; Icaria, Samos, Chios, Lesbos, Lemnos, Samothrace, and Thasos, assigned to Greece in 1914; Imbros, still Turkish. The following, off Eubœa (Negropont), and many smaller islands, belong to Greece: Scyros, Icos, Scopelos, and Sciathos.

Arcis-sur-Aube (Ar′see-sür-Oab), a town of 3000 inhabitants, in the French dep. of Aube, on the navigable Aube, 22 miles N. of Troyes by rail. It was the birthplace of Danton, and near it the allies defeated Napoleon, March 20–21, 1814.

Ar′cole, a village on the left bank of the Adige, in Northern Italy, 15 miles ESE. of Verona. Here Napoleon defeated the Austrians, 15-17th November 1796.

Arcos de la Fronte′ra, a town on the Guadalete, in the Spanish province of Cadiz, 20 miles ENE. of Xeres. It was so called from its standing on the frontiers of the old Moorish kingdom of Granada. Pop. 18,000.

Arcot (Aru-Kadu, 'six deserts'), a city of British India, in the province of Madras, on the Palar, 5 miles from Arcot railway station, and 65 WSW. of Madras. In 1751 Clive captured Arcot; and having taken it, was in turn besieged for seven weeks. Pop. 12,000.

Arctic Ocean. The Arctic Ocean lies to the north of Europe, Asia, and North America, and surrounds the North Pole; it is usually defined as the water area within the Arctic Circle. Physiographically, the Norwegian Sea and Greenland Sea, situated between Norway and Greenland, belong to the same basin as the Arctic Ocean. If the Arctic Ocean be regarded as lying wholly within the Arctic Circle, then it is almost land-locked between that circle and the parallel of 70° N. It communicates with the Pacific by Behring Strait, and with the Atlantic through Davis Strait and the wide sea between Norway and Greenland. The area of the ocean is about 5,500,000 sq. m., and into it there drain about 8,600,000 sq. m. of land. The coasts of Europe and Asia are low, and have several deep indentations, the principal being the White Sea and Gulf of Obi. The shores of North America are skirted by a most irregular assemblage of islands, forming numerous gulfs, bays, and channels, and, judging mainly from the tides, there is now a surmise that a large tract of land or an archipelago may lie between these islands and Siberia. The Arctic highlands are covered with an enormous depth of snow and ice. In some places this results in the formation of great glaciers, one of the most remarkable of which is the Humboldt Glacier, in 79° N. lat., on the west coast of Greenland. The whole ocean is covered by immense ice-fields from 5 to 100 feet in thickness. During winter these are generally bound together by the severe frost, but these continuous masses break up during the summer months into floes and floe-bergs. When these great floating ice-fields come together, the margins where they collide are piled up on each other, and thus are produced the well-known hummocky ice-floes. Immense quantities of field and hummocky ice pass down each year between Spitzbergen and Greenland, and Greenland and Iceland. As to the nature of the ice on the Polar Sea, Peary points out that beyond the 'glacial fringe' of the coast come the 'pressure ridges' (often like a series of hills) caused by the floating and stationary ice crushing together; between these ridges are the floes, composed of great sheets of ice that have drifted there; and only a small proportion of comparatively thin and smooth ice is formed by the direct freezing of the sea each winter. Most dangerous to travellers on the ice are the 'leads' or lanes of open water which, even in winter, may be quickly produced through the winds and tides setting the ice in motion. The ocean is shallow to the north of Europe and Asia, the depth 500 miles N. of the Lena being only 38 fathoms; but it deepens very much towards the Pole. The depth increases 46 miles off Cape Columbia to 110 fathoms, and in lat. 84° 29′ to 825 fathoms, falling again to 310 fathoms in lat. 85° 23′. Three soundings farther northward failed to touch bottom; one of these, 5 miles south of the Pole, going down to 1500 fathoms. At the Pole itself the ice was too thick for a sounding to be made.

During his stay of thirty hours at the Pole Peary noted temperatures from −11 ° F. to −30° F. At Cape Columbia (in the winter) temperatures ranged from zero to −60° F. Even in summer the mean temperature is but little above freezing-point. Parry reached a latitude of 82° 45′, Markham reached 83° 20′, and Lockwood (of Greely's expedition, 1882) 83° 24′. In 1850 M'Clure entered Behring Strait, and brought his crew home by Davis Strait, thus discovering the North-west Passage. In 1878 and 1879 Nordenskiöld sailed from the Atlantic to the Pacific along the northern shores of Europe and Asia, thus discovering the North-east Passage. Nansen's voyages in 1888 and 1893–96, when he reached 86° 14′ N., had many important scientific results. Peary made several expeditions—in 1892; in 1898–1902; and in 1903–1906, when he reached 87° 6′ N., or about 200 miles from the Pole. In 1899–1902 the Duke of the Abruzzi reached 86° 33′ N., and Amundsen (1905–6) was the first to complete the NW. Passage in his ship the Gjoa, M'Clure having finished his voyage on the ice after abandoning his ship. In 1908 Peary, taking the Smith Sound route, wintered at Cape Sheridan, left Cape Columbia on 1st March 1909 to go with the sledges across the frozen sea, and reached the Pole (413 nautical miles distant) on 6th April. Along the coasts of the Arctic Ocean dwell the nomadic Eskimos, whom Peary found of so much assistance, and without whose dogs he could not have got to the Pole. Among the fauna of these regions are whales, walruses, and seals; bears, musk-oxen, reindeer, foxes, and hares; as well as various kinds of birds.

Ardalân, a region in the west of Persia, embracing the basin of the Shirwan Rúd.

Ardebil, a town of Persia, 110 miles E. of Tabriz; pop. 16,000.

Ardèche, a mountainous dep. in the south of France, which includes part of ancient Languedoc. In the NW. of the dep., the Cevennes culminate in the volcanic Mont-Mezène (5752 feet). Iron, coal, antimony, lead, marble, and gypsum are wrought. Area, 2136 sq. m.; pop. 331,000. The capital is Privas.

Ardee′, a town in the west of County Louth, Ireland, on the Dee, 12 miles inland; pop. 1800.

Ardennes, an extensive hill-country and forest, occupying the SE. corner of Belgium, between the Moselle and the Meuse, but extending also into France and Rhenish Prussia. The average height of the hills is less than 1600 feet; but in the east they attain 2100. The Arduenna Silva of the Romans extended over a still wider area. See a work by Lindley (1887).—Shakespeare's Forest of Arden is a district in Warwickshire, extending from the Avon to near Birmingham.

Ardennes, a French dep. bordering on Belgium. Mézières is the capital, but Sedan is the chief town. Area, 2020 sq. m.; pop. 319,000.

Ardlam′ont Point, Argyllshire, at the W. entrance to the Kyles of Bute.

Ardnamurchan Point, a rugged headland of Argyllshire, the most westerly point of the mainland, with a castle-like lighthouse (1849).

Ardoch, Perthshire, 12 miles NNE. of Stirling, has a Roman camp, the most entire in Britain.

Ardoye, a town of Belgium, 17 miles S. of Bruges; pop. 7000.

Ardrish′aig, a seaport of Argyllshire, at the entrance of the Crinan Canal, 2 miles SSW. of Lochgilphead; pop. 1100.

Ardross′an, a seaport and watering-place in Ayrshire, 1 mile WNW. of Saltcoats, and 32 miles SW. of Glasgow by rail, with a good harbour. A new dock was formed in 1887–92. The chief exports are coal and pig-iron. On a hill above the town stands a fragment of Ardrossan Castle. Population, 6000.

Ardvreck Castle. See Assynt.

Areci′bo, a town on the north coast of the U.S.A. West Indian island of Porto Rico, 45 miles W. of San Juan; pop. 10,000.

Arenberg (Aremberg), from 1644 till 1820 a small sovereign duchy of Germany, lying between Jülich and Cologne; now part of the district of Coblenz, Rhenish Prussia.

Ar′endal, a town of Norway, near the mouth of the Nidelf in the bay of Christiania. It is built partly on piles, partly on rock, and has been called 'Little Venice.' Pop. 12,000.

Arequipa (Ar-e-kee′pâ), a name given to a mountain in the west Cordillera of the Peruvian Andes, and then to a city at its foot, and to the southern dep. of Peru. The mountain, also called Mistí, is volcanic, and has a height of 18,500 feet. Its neighbourhood is subject to earthquakes. The city (pop. 35,000), in a rich valley, 7600 feet above the sea, is the second in Peru. Harvard University has an observatory near by. The dep. has an area of 27,744 sq. m., and a pop. of 229,000.

Arezzo (anc. Arretium), the chief city of an Italian province, near the confluence of the Chiana with the Arno, 38 miles ESE. of Florence. The Piazza Grande, built by Vasari, is remarkable; and the Gothic cathedral (begun 1277) has a splendid marble altar by Pisano. The city produces silk, and manufactures cloth, combs, and pottery. Natives were Petrarch, the poet Aretino, the painter Spinello Aretino; possibly Guido of Arezzo, who introduced the Aretinian syllables in music; the botanist Cesalpino; Pope Julius III.; and Vasari. Pop. 47,500.

Argaum′, a village in Berar, India, between Ellichpur and Aurungabad. Near it, on 28th November 1803, two months after Assaye, Wellesley again defeated the Mahrattas.

Argenta (Ar-jen′ta), a town of Central Italy, 21 miles SE. of Ferrara by rail; pop. 4000.

Argentan (Ar-zhon^{g}tan^{g}), a Norman town in the French dep. of Orne, on the river Orne, 42 miles SSE. of Caen by rail; pop. 6000.

Argenteuil (Ar-zhon^{g}-tuh′yee^{l}), a town in the French dep. of Seine-et-Oise, on the Seine, 6 m. NW. of Paris. Its ruined priory was founded in 656, and was by Charlemagne turned into a nunnery, of which Heloise became abbess. Pop. 16,000.

Argentine Republic, or ARGENTINA, a federal republic of South America, taking its name from the river La Plata ('River of Silver'). It has an area of 1,135,086 sq. m., including the unsettled territories on the north and the south, but the organised and settled provinces occupy less than one-half this area. The whole country is more than ten times larger than Great Britain and Ireland taken together. The republic is made up of fourteen provinces and a number of territories. On the west, the Andes divide this republic from Chili; Bolivia bounds the country on the north, while Paraguay, Brazil, Uruguay, and the Atlantic Ocean form the eastern limit. The great island-group of Fuegia, on the south, belongs partly to this republic and partly to Chili.

Except for the sub-Andean foot-hills, and a few other local and unimportant hilly or mountainous tracts, nearly all the country consists of vast plains or pampas. The northern plain region (the Chaco) is in part densely wooded; but most of the Pampas country is open, presenting wide ranges of treeless pasture, varied by patches of huge thistles and other coarse plants. In the Patagonian region there are extensive districts completely covered with stones and shingle, interspersed with clumps of thorny brushwood, and having in the hollows many strongly saline ponds or lakes.

The climate in the extreme north is very hot, for it lies north of the tropic of Capricorn. The more remote southern territories have an extremely bleak, windy, and disagreeable climate, but are not really so cold as might be expected from their relatively high latitude. But the country in general enjoys an equable, temperate, and healthful climate. The people of the country are mostly Spanish in their language and descent, although there are many Italians, French, and other European immigrants. The Gauchos, or herdsmen of the plains, are a hardy and spirited, but ignorant race, often of partial Indian descent. Some of the Indians of the remote districts have become skilled in the rearing of flocks and herds. Agriculture has of late been rapidly extended. Wheat, maize, flax, and linseed are exported; other chief staples of export are skins, hides, hair, bones, bone-ashes, horns, phosphorus, ostrich-feathers, wool, tallow, dried and salt beef, beef-extract, fresh meat (frozen), and live animals. The greater part of the republic is well watered and highly fertile, but there are extensive regions of waste land. Sugar-culture thrives in the NW. and north. Wines, spirits, and dried fruits are extensively produced; a valuable product of the north is maté, or Paraguay tea. The rivers Paraná and Uruguay, with their large tributaries, are important channels of trade. The minerals include gold, silver, copper, iron, petroleum, salt, and coal. The chief seaport is Buenos Aires, the capital and largest city. Among the other large towns are Córdoba, Rosario, La Plata, Mendoza, Tucuman, Corrientes, Salta, and Santa Fé. The commerce of the country (imports £60,000,000; exports £79,000,000) is mainly with Great Britain, Germany, the United States, and France.

The population of the country in 1869 was 1,736,922; estimated pop. (1911) 7,171,910 (6·1 per sq. m.)—843,000 Italians, 424,000 Spanish, 104,000 French, 26,000 English, 24,000 Austrians, 23,000 Germans. The religion is Roman Catholic. The government is closely modelled upon that of the United States. In 1911 the length of railway lines open for traffic was 25,136 miles, with the recent extension across the Andes to meet the Chilian railways. The river La Plata was visited by the Spaniards in 1516, and the country was colonised in 1535. In 1810 the colonists founded a local provisional government. A sanguinary war for independence followed, which did not cease till 1824. Spain acknowledged the independence of the country in 1842. Since 1890 financial troubles and political turmoil have too often injured the well-being of what is perhaps the best-governed and most prosperous of South American states.

Ar′gŏlis, the north-eastern peninsula of the Morea of Greece, lying between the Bays of Nauplia and Ægina.

Argos, a city state of ancient Greece, 3 miles from the sea, in NE. Peloponnesus, in which it was for long the chief power; but in 495 B.C. Sparta gained supremacy. The modern town on its site has remains of its walls and amphitheatre. Pop. 9814.

Argos′toli, a seaport of the Ionian Islands, the capital of Cephalonia. Near it are the 'sea-mills of Argostoli,' two holes in the rocky coast, into which the sea pours with a force sufficient to drive two mills. Pop. 10,000.

Argyll′shire, a county in the west of Scotland. Its greatest length is 115 miles; its greatest breadth, 55; and its extent of coast-line as much as 2289 miles, owing to the numerous sea-lochs. Next to Inverness, it is the largest county in Scotland, its area being 3213 sq. m., of which 623 belong to the islands. The chief islands are Mull, Islay, Jura, Tyree, Coll, Lismore, and Colonsay, with Iona and Staffa. The chief peaks are Bidean nam Bian (3766 feet) and Ben Cruachan (3689); the sea-lochs, Lochs Moidart, Sunart, Linnhe (branching off into Lochs Leven and Eil), Fyne, and Long; the streams are the Orchy and Awe; the fresh-water lakes are Lochs Awe and Lydoch. Lead occurs at Strontian (where the mineral Strontianite was discovered), at Tyndrum, and in Islay and Coll; roofing-slates in Easdale and Ballachulish; coal near Campbeltown; fine marble in Tyree, &c.; and excellent granite near Inveraray. The total percentage of cultivated area is only 5·7. Sheep and cattle rearing is the chief occupation. Whisky is manufactured in Campbeltown and Islay. Towns and villages are Inveraray, Campbeltown, Oban, Dunoon, Lochgilphead, Tarbert, and Tobermory. The county returns one member to parliament. Pop. (1831) 100,973; (1901) 65,849; (1911) 70,902, 46 per cent. Gaelic-speaking.

Argyrokastron (the Turkish Ergeri), a town of southern Albania, near the Dryno, an affluent of the Viosa; pop. 14,000.

Aria'no (Arianum), a cathedral city of Italy, 2800 feet above the sea, and 84 miles NE. of Naples by rail. Pop. 18,000.

Ari'ca, a seaport of Tacna, the most southerly department of Peru. It was stormed and taken by the Chilians in 1880, was retained (with Tacna) by treaty for ten years, and was still in Chilian hands in 1912. Pop. (once 30,000) 4000.

Arichat (A-ree-shat'), a seaport on the south side of Isle Madame, Nova Scotia, with a harbour for the largest vessels. It is the see of a Roman Catholic bishop. Pop. 800.

Ariège, a dep. in the south of France, lying along the northern slopes of the Pyrenees. Area, 1890 sq. m.; pop. (decreasing) 198,000.—The river Ariège rises in the Pyrenees, and flows 93 miles to the Garonne near Toulouse.

Arin'os, a river in the south-west of Brazil, which, after a north-west course of 700 miles, joins the Tapajos, itself an affluent of the Amazon.

Arizona, till 1912 a territory, now a state, of the U.S.A., bounded N. by Utah, E. by New Mexico, S. by the republic of Mexico (Sonora), and W. by California and Nevada. Its western boundary is mostly formed by the Colorado of the West. This river traverses the NW. part of Arizona in a deep and narrow water-worn channel (the Grand Cañon), more than 300 miles long, and nowhere less than a mile below the surface of the surrounding country. Arizona had an area of 112,920 sq. m.; it was thus nearly as large as Italy. It is in general a region of high plateaus, traversed by various mountain-ranges, presenting abundant evidence of not remote volcanic action. In the SW. the country has a desert character, and in all parts the rainfall is decidedly limited—14·21 inches annually at Fort Defiance. In various parts there are extensive lava-beds. The whole region lies in the drainage basin of the Colorado, the chief affluents being the Gila, the Bill Williams, and the Colorado Chiquito. The water-supply over large areas of Arizona is mainly derived from deep natural wells and 'water-holes.' Irrigation has lately made vast regions of desert land fit for agriculture. The country is in general extremely healthful; but in the SW. the summer heat is excessive, and malarial fevers are not unknown. Lucerne is an important crop; after it maize, barley, and wheat are the leading products. Arizona is an important seat of gold and silver mining. Copper is also mined and smelted very largely. Coal has been obtained. Rock-salt, lead, and other valuable mineral deposits are found in almost every part of the country. The principal towns are Phœnix, the capital, and Tucson. Some interesting old Indian towns, or pueblos (Moquis), still remain, with their remarkable native semi-civilisation. The cliff-dwellings and cave-dwellings in and about the Walnut Cañon and near Phœnix are easily accessible. This region was first visited by Spaniards in 1570. After 1821 the country was a part of Mexico until 1848, when all the region N. of the Gila was ceded to the United States, the transference being completed in 1853 by the 'Gadsden Purchase.' The territory was organised in 1863. In 1870 the population was 9658; in 1910, 204,354. See New Mexico.

Arkan'sas (formerly pron. Ar'kansaw), a state of the American Union, is bounded on the N. by Missouri, on the E. by Missouri, Tennessee, and Mississippi, on the S. by Louisiana, and on the W. by Texas and the Indian Territory. Area, 53,850 sq. m.—about that of England without Wales, of which some 800 sq. m. is water-surface. The southern limit is the parallel of 30° N. lat., and the northern boundary for the most part is on the parallel of 36° 30′. The Mississippi River washes nearly all the eastern border of the state. The extreme east and west limits are respectively 89° 40′ and 94° 42′ W. long. Nearly all the country is well timbered. Along the eastern border of the state lies a strip of rich alluvial and swampy land, limited westward by Crowley's Ridge. A similar low and wet tract is traversed by the lower Arkansas River. The southern half of the state contains great areas of yellow and loamy land of Tertiary age, interspersed thinly with tracts of red clays and hills of iron-ore. West of the Crowley's Ridge region is a considerable breadth of gray silty prairies. In the west of the yellow Tertiary loams are large patches of 'black prairie' of Cretaceous age. The west and central portions of the state form a broken hill-region of Tertiary origin. Great prairies of red loam and clay soil prevail in the W. and NW. Towards the north is the Ozark mountain-region, a broken country of high hills and ridges. The soils, though of extremely various character, are mostly good throughout the state. The coal-measures very extensively underlie the surface, and coal crops out at many points; the semi-anthracite being particularly valuable. Silver-bearing galena and zinc appear to be abundant, and iron-ores exist in vast amounts. The villages of Hot Springs in Garland county, and Eureka Springs in the NW., are celebrated health-resorts. The novaculite, or hone-stone, of this state is extensively wrought and exported. The Mississippi, Arkansas, Red, White, St Francis, Ouachita, and other navigable rivers afford cheap transport. Agriculture is the leading pursuit in Arkansas, and cotton is the great staple of production. Maize is also very largely produced, and considerable quantities of oats and wheat are harvested. Live-stock, wool, tobacco, pork, fruit, and dairy products are marketed. Although malarial fevers and severe heat are to be encountered in the marshy and flat alluvial districts, the larger portion of the country has an agreeable and healthful climate. In quality, variety, and accessibility, the timber of this state is hardly surpassed. The mineral resources of the state have been but little utilised. Lying outside the great currents of immigration, Arkansas has, until very recent years, preserved to a remarkable degree the character of a frontier country. Even the large extent of river navigation for a long time served to hinder the development of the country, since it discouraged the construction of railways; and the old system of slave labour and of large holdings of land was not favourable to rapid material development. This region formed a part of the French colony of Louisiana, and was purchased, together with the rest of that colony, by the United States in 1803. The earliest French settlement was made at Arkansas Post in 1685. Arkansas was organised as a territory in 1819, and became a state in 1836, and seceded in 1861.

The principal towns are Little Rock, the state capital (pop. 46,000), Pine Bluff (13,000), and Fort Smith (23,500); Hot Springs (11,000) is a health-resort. Pop. of Arkansas (1820) 14,255; (1860) 435,450; (1880) 802,525; (1890) 1,128,179; (1910) 1,574,449, of whom about 1,000,000 are white, the remainder mainly of African or mixed descent.

Arkansas City, a manufacturing town in the state of Kansas, on the Arkansas River, 51 miles by rail S. by E. of Wichita. Population, 6000.

Arkansas River, next to the Missouri the Mississippi's chief affluent, is 1514 miles long (800 navigable for steamers); rises in the Rocky Mountains, at an altitude of 10,000 feet, on the borders of Utah, and joins the 'Father of Waters' at Napoleon, 275 miles above New Orleans. Its chief tributary is the Canadian River.

Arkinholm. See LANGHOLM.

Arklow, a seaport of Wicklow, 49 miles S. of Dublin, at the mouth of the lovely Avoca. There are ruins of the castle of the Ormonds, destroyed by Cromwell in 1649, and traces of an ancient monastery. Pop. 5000.

Arko'na, the NE. promontory of the island of Rügen, in the Baltic. Its chalk cliffs, rising 177 feet, are topped with a lighthouse (1827), itself 78 feet high. Here stood a famous fortification long impregnable, and the temple of the Wend deity Swantewit, destroyed by Waldemar I. of Denmark in 1168.

Arlberg, a crystalline mountain mass of Austria amongst the Alps, which forms the boundary between the Tyrol and Vorarlberg ('the land before or beyond the Arlberg'). The difficult pass over this ridge, from Bludenz to Landeck and Innsbruck, is 5300 feet high; but a railway, with a main tunnel 6720 yards long, through the Arlberg Alp was opened in 1884.

Arles (Roman Arelate), a town in the French dep. of Bouches du Rhone, on the principal branch of the Rhone, 15 miles from the sea, and 53 miles NW. of Marseilles. Its Roman remains include baths, a palace of Constantine, an aqueduct, and an amphitheatre for 25,000 spectators. The cathedral (7th century) has a splendid doorway. Arles manufactures silk, hats, tobacco, brandy, soap, glass bottles, and railway wagons. Pop. 15,000.

Arlon (Arlong), a town of Belgium, 27 miles WNW. of Luxemburg by rail. Pop. 11,000.

Armadale, a police-burgh of Linlithgowshire, with chemical-works, 2½ miles W. by S. of Bathgate. Pop. 4700.

Armagh', the capital of County Armagh, 33 miles SW. of Belfast, is situated on a gentle eminence, whence its Ard-Magha, 'high field.' The cruciform 12th-century cathedral occupies the site of one founded by St Patrick in the 5th century. A new Roman Catholic cathedral (1904) occupies the principal height to the north, and the primate's palace that to the south. There are a college, a celebrated observatory, public library (1771), and barracks for 200 men. The chief manufacture is linen-weaving. Armagh, from 495 to the 9th century, was the metropolis of Ireland, renowned as a school of theology and literature. Till 1885 it returned one member. Pop. 7300.

Armagh, a small inland county in Ulster, Ireland. Its greatest length is 32 miles, and breadth 20. Area, 512½ sq. m., about one-half under tillage. Slieve Gullion, in the SW., attains 1893 feet. The country bordering upon Lough Neagh is low and boggy, and the Louth plain extends into the south end of Armagh. The principal rivers are the Callan, Tynan, Upper Bann, and Blackwater. The soil is fertile, with a good deal of bog. Besides agriculture, linen and cotton weaving are the chief industries. The county returns three members of parliament. The chief towns are Armagh, Lurgan, and Portadown. Pop. (1841) 233,024; (1891) 143,056; (1911) 120,291, of whom 45 per cent. were Catholics, and 32 Episcopalians.

Armagnac (Ar-mân-yac), a district in the south of France, a part of Gascony now mostly included in the dep. of Gers. The soil is fertile, and its wine and brandy (Eau d'Armagnac) are well known.

Armenia, a high tableland in the upper valleys of the Euphrates, Tigris, Aras, and Kur, some 500 miles long, by nearly the same breadth. In ancient times an independent country, it repeatedly recovered its independence down to the middle ages, although with varying boundary. It is now, however, distributed between Russia, Turkey, and Persia, and stretches, in its utmost extent, from Asia Minor on the W. to the Caspian Sea on the E., and from the Caucasus on the N. to the Murad Su on the S. The interior consists mostly of pastoral plateaus, 2700 to 7000 feet above sea-level, crowned by conical heights or traversed by mountain-chains, and culminating in Mount Ararat, 16,969 feet high. A chain of mountains, stretching from Ararat to the confluence of the two head-waters of the Euphrates, divides Armenia into a northern half and a southern half. The mountain-system of Armenia is mostly volcanic, a fact still evidenced by the hot mineral springs, such as the sulphur springs of Tiflis, and by earthquakes. The Murad Su and the Kara Su form the head-waters of the Euphrates; whilst the Shett, rising to the south of Lake Van, and an arm of the Diarbekr, rising in the Alinjik Dagh, constitute the head-waters of the Tigris. Other rivers are the Aras, the Kur, and the Tchorak. Of lakes, there is Van in Turkish, Goktcha or Sevan in Russian, and Urmia in Persian Armenia. Armenia is rich in metals, possessing mines of silver, lead, iron, arsenic, alum, rock-salt, and especially copper. The climate is distinguished into a region of rains, with subtropical climate, embracing parts of the valley of the Kur and the Upper Tigris; a region of perpetual snow, and an intermediate region of very various grades. The plateaus—volcanic, dry, and singularly bare of wood—have a very severe climate; the winters long and inclement, and the summers short.

The ancients distinguished Armenia Major, the larger and eastern half, bordering on Media and the Caspian Sea, on Mesopotamia and Assyria, from Armenia Minor to the west of the Euphrates. Turkish Armenia comprises, besides the old Armenia Minor, the vilayets of Van, Bitlis, Darsim, Erzerum, with parts of Diarbekr and Charput. The Sasun district was the scene of great atrocities by Kurds and Turks in 1893-94. Russian Armenia, formerly Persian, forms the NE. part of old Armenia Major, and includes the governments of Erivan, Elizabetpol, and Kars, with parts of Tiflis. In this Russian division of Armenia are situated the three old monasteries—Etchmiadzin (q.v.), Haghpad, and Sanahine. Persia holds the SE. corner of Armenia Major in the province of Azerbijan.

The Armenians, whose national character is almost as strong as is that of the Jews, belong to the Iranian group of the Indo-Germanic family. The Armenians, at the present day, are to be found in almost all Turkish provinces; in Russia, Persia, and India; in the great commercial cities of the Mediterranean; in the Austrian empire; at London, Manchester, and other capitals of Western Europe, occupying posts as money-changers, bankers, and merchants, though also as artisans and porters. Their number in Armenia itself is estimated at 1,000,000 at the most; in Persia and adjacent territories, 100,000; in the Balkan States, 400,000; in Russia, 500,000; in India, 5000; in Africa, 5000; in Transylvania, Hungary, and Galicia, 16,000. Their total number is calculated at not more than 2,500,000. Among the foreign invaders domesticated in Armenia are the Turks, mostly engaged in agriculture; the nomadic Kurds; in the SE., the Tartars; Nestorians occupying the mountains of the Persian frontier, and speaking a Syriac dialect; Georgians, in the north. Greeks, Jews, and Gypsies are also scattered throughout Armenia. The Armenians themselves are at home mostly shepherds and tillers of the soil. The Armenian church differs from the Greek church in being monophysite (attributing one nature only to Christ). Some Armenians are 'united' (i.e. to the Roman Catholic Church).

Armentières, a manufacturing town in the French dep. of Nord, on the Lys, 12 miles WNW. of Lille by rail. Pop. 25,000.

Armistiçio, a region, formerly a territory, of Venezuela, bounded on the S. and W. by the United States of Colombia.

Armor'ica, an old name of Brittany (q.v.).

Arnhem, the capital of the Dutch province of Guelderland, on the Rhine, 38 miles ESE. of Utrecht. The manufactures include tobacco, woollen and cotton goods, soap, and paper. Sir Philip Sidney died here in 1586; in 1813 the town was taken by the Prussians. Population, 64,000.

Arnhem Land, a name applied to a peninsular region belonging to the Commonwealth Territory of North Australia, so called from the ship of the Dutch navigators who discovered it in 1618.

Arno, next to the Tiber the most considerable river of Central Italy, rises on Mount Falterona, an offset of the Apennines, at 4444 feet above sea-level, and 25 miles N. of Arezzo. It flows 140 miles westward to the sea, 11 miles below Pisa, where it once had its embouchure. At Florence it is 400 feet wide, but is fordable in summer. Of its rapid and destructive inundations the most memorable were those of 1537 and 1740.

Arnold, a town of Notts, 5½ miles N. by E. of Nottingham, with lace and stocking manufactures. Bonington was a native. Pop. 11,000.

Arnsberg, a town of Westphalia, on the Ruhr, 36 miles E. of Hagen by rail. Here were held the famous Vehmgerichte. Pop. 10,000.

Arnstadt, the chief town in the principality of Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, on the Gera, 10 miles S. of Erfurt. Dating back to 704 A.D., it is now a manufacturing town, with weaving, glove-making, brewing, &c. Pop. 18,000.

Arnswalde, a Prussian town, 41 miles SE. of Stettin, between three lakes. Pop. 9000.

Arokszallas, a town of Hungary, 44 miles NE. of Budapest. Pop. 14,000.

Arolsen, the capital of the principality of Waldeck, on the Aar, 14 miles SSW. of Warburg. Its castle (1720) contains West's 'Death of Wolfe.' The sculptor Rauch and the painter Kaulbach were natives. Pop. 3000.

Aroo'stook, a river which, rising in the north of Maine, falls into the St John in New Brunswick, after a course of about 120 miles.

Arpi'no (anc. Arpinum), the birthplace of Cicero and Marius, on an eminence midway between Rome and Naples. Pop. 5000.

Ar'quà, an Italian village with 2000 inhabitants, 12 miles SW. of Padua, in the Euganean Hills. Here Petrarch died (1374).

Arrabida, a monastery, cave, and place of pilgrimage, W. of Setubal (q.v.) in Portugal.

Arracan. See ARAKAN.

Arragon. See ARAGON.

Arrah, a town of Bihar, 320 miles NW. of Calcutta by rail. Here in 1857 a dozen Englishmen, with 50 Sikhs, held out for eight days against 3000 sepoys. Pop. 46,998.

Arran, an island of Buteshire, in the mouth of the Firth of Clyde, 5¾ miles SW. of Bute, 10 W. of Ayrshire, and 3 E. of Kintyre, from which it is separated by Kilbrannan Sound. It is 19 miles long and 10½ broad, with an area of 168 sq. m., about a seventh part being cultivated. Population, 4600. The general aspect of Arran is mountainous and heathy, and in the north the jagged peaks are singularly grand. All around the coast is the low platform of an ancient sea-margin, with lofty cliffs on the S. and SW., from which the country rises abruptly. The highest point is Goatfell (Gaelic Gaoth Bheinn, 'wind mountain'), which rises 2866 feet. From its sides slope the romantic glens of Rosa and Sannox, and at its base to the SE. opens Brodick Bay. South of this, round a bluff headland, is Lamlash Bay, the chief harbour of Arran, and the best on the Firth of Clyde, sheltered by Holy Island, once the seat of a monastery. A picturesque mass of columnar basalt, 1030 feet high, succeeds. Farther south lies Whiting Bay, near which are two cascades 100 and 50 feet high. At the SE. point of Arran is Kildonan Castle, opposite which is the small isle of Pladda, crowned by a lighthouse. Large caverns occur in the cliffs of the S. and SW. coast. In one of these, the 'King's Cave,' in the basaltic promontory of Drumadoon, Robert the Bruce hid himself. Shiskine Vale, opening into Drumadoon Bay, is the most fertile part of Arran. Loch Ranza, a bay in the north end of Arran, runs a mile inland, and is a herring-fishing rendezvous. There are only rivulets in Arran; one of them tumbles over a precipice 300 feet high. The chief crops are oats and potatoes, and cattle and sheep are exported. Many antiquities occur, such as cairns, standing stones, and stone circles. Lochranza Castle, now in ruins, was once a residence of the Scots kings. See D. Landsborough's Arran (2d ed. 1875), and J. Bryce's Geology of Arran (4th ed. 1875).

Arranmore, or North Arran, a Donegal island, 4 miles long by 3 wide, and 745 feet high.

Arras, the capital of the French dep. of Pas-de-Calais, on the navigable Scarpe, 120 miles N. of Paris. A fortress of the first rank, it has a cathedral (1755–1833) and a beautiful Gothic hôtel-de-ville (1510), whose belfry, 246 feet high, was rebuilt in 1835. There are manufactures of lace, hosiery, beet-sugar, &c.; and its tapestry was formerly so famous that in England the name arras was given to all such hangings. Arras was the capital of the Celtic Atrebates (whence the name), and subsequently of Artois. It did not finally become French till 1640. Robespierre was a native. The population is about 20,000.

Arrochar, a village at the head of Loch Long, 17 miles N. of Helensburgh by rail.

Arroyo Molinos, a village in Estremadura, Spain, where Lord Hill routed the French, 28th October 1811.

Arru Islands, a group of over eighty islands in the Dutch East Indies, lying west of New Guinea, with a united area of 2650 sq. m., and a population of 25,000. The largest island is Tanna-Besar (77 miles long by 50 broad). The surface is low, the coasts are steep and inaccessible, on the east side fringed with coral reefs. The soil is covered with the most luxuriant vegetation.

Arsamas, a Russian town, 60 miles S. of Nijni-Novgorod; pop, 12,000.

Ars-sur-Moselle, a town of Alsace-Lorraine, on the Moselle, 6 miles SW. of Metz by rail; pop. 6000.

Arta (Turkish Narda, the ancient Ambracia), capital of a division of Thessaly, ceded to Greece by Turkey in 1881 (area, 395 sq. m.; pop. 41,280). The town stands on the Arta (the ancient Aracthus), 8 miles from its mouth in the Gulf of Arta (the ancient Ambracian Gulf). It was the capital of the old kingdom of Epirus. It is the see of a Greek archbishop. Pop. 8000.

Arthur's Seat, a lion-shaped hill, immediately east of Edinburgh, rising 822 feet. The ascent is easy, and the prospect from the top unrivalled. Arthur's Seat is supposed to derive its name from the British king.

Artois (Ar-twah'), an old province in the north of France, bounded by Flanders and Picardy, and almost corresponding with the modern dep. of Pas-de-Calais. Its capital was Arras.

Artvin, a town of Russian Armenia, on the Charuch, 34 miles S. of Batum; pop. 8000.

Aru. See Arru.

Arun, a Sussex river, flowing 37 miles to the English Channel at Littlehampton.

Ar'undel, an ancient municipal borough (till 1867 also parliamentary) of Sussex, on the navigable Arun, 5 miles from its mouth, and 10 miles E. of Chichester. Arundel Castle, the seat of the Fitzalans, Earls of Arundel, from 1243 to 1580, and since then of the Howards, comprises a circular Norman keep, 100 feet high, and a modern Gothic edifice dating from 1791. It has stood three great sieges, in 1102, in 1139, and in 1644. There are a cruciform parish church (1387) and a splendid R. C. church (1873). Pop. 3000.

Aruwimi, an important tributary of the Congo, entering the latter from the north in 1° 10′ N. lat., 23° 30′ E. long. It was explored for 100 miles by Stanley in 1883, and by it Stanley advanced to the relief of Emin Pasha in 1887.

Arve (Árv), a Swiss stream rising in the Col de Balme, one of the Savoy Alps, and flowing 62 miles through the Vale of Chamouni and the canton of Geneva to the Rhone.

Arveyron, a small tributary of the Arve, in Savoy, is the outlet of the famous Mer de Glace, in the Vale of Chamouni, from which it issues in a torrent through a beautiful grotto of ice, 40 to 150 feet high.

Asben. See Aïr.

Ascension, a solitary island nearly in the middle of the South Atlantic, 685 miles NW. of St Helena, in 7° 57′ S. lat., and 14° 21′ W. long. It is said to have received its name from having been discovered by a Portuguese navigator on Ascension-day, 1501. It is 7½ miles long, 6 broad, and 35 sq. m. in area. First occupied by the English in 1815, in connection with Napoleon's detention on St Helena, it is now used only as a sanatorium, but has recently been fortified by the Admiralty. Like St Helena, it is of volcanic origin, one of the peaks of a submarine ridge which separates the north and south basins of the Atlantic. It rises in the Green Mountain to a height of 2870 feet. Several astronomers and savants have visited Ascension, from Halley in 1677, to Darwin, Sir Wyville Thomson, and Mr Gill. Pop., with Kroomen, about 400. See Mrs Gill's Six Months in Ascension (1879).

Asch, a town of Bohemia, 14 miles NW. of Eger, with thriving silk, cotton, and woollen manufactures; pop. 22,000.

Aschaffenburg (Ashaffenboorg'), a Bavarian town of Lower Franconia, on the Main, at the Aschaff's influx, 25 miles SE. of Frankfort. The castle of Johannisburg, a Renaissance pile of 1605–14, overlooks the whole town. Paper is the staple manufacture. Pop. 20,000. The Romans built a fortress at Aschaffenburg, which in 1814 was ceded to Bavaria by Austria. Near it the Prussians defeated the Austrians, July 14, 1866.

Aschersleben (Ashersläy'ben), a town of Prussian Saxony, on the Eine, 32 miles SW. of Magdeburg. Population, 30,000, largely occupied in manufactures of woollens, linens, sugar, &c.

As'coli (anc. Asculum Picenum), a city of Italy, on the Tronto, 83 miles S. of Ancona by rail. It has a fine cathedral, and it suffered much from an earthquake in 1878. Pop. 30,600.—Ascoli (anc. Asculum Apulum) is another episcopal city, 19 miles S. of Foggia. Pop. 7000. Pyrrhus here defeated the Romans, 279 B.C.

Ascot Heath, a circular race-course in Berkshire, nearly 2 miles long, 29 miles WSW. of London, and 6 SW. of Windsor. The races, which take place early in June, were instituted in 1711.

Ashanti, or Ashantee, a negro kingdom of Western Africa, included since 1896 in the British protectorate, and attached to the Gold Coast colony, behind which it lies. It is a hilly country; its rivers are the Volta, Prah, and Assinee. The population, once estimated at from 1,000,000 to 3,000,000, was only 645,383 in 1911. The country proper is one continuous forest; the land in the neighbourhood of the towns is carefully cultivated and extremely fertile, producing maize, millet, rice, yams, tobacco, sugar, cocoa, the pine-apple, gums, dye-woods, and timber. The principal exports are gold, rubber, cocoa, and palm-oil. The capital is Coomassie (q.v.); Kpando, near the Volta, is an important centre of trade, and so is Salaga. In 1700 Coomassie was made the capital by Osai Tutu, who conquered various neighbouring states, and became a sort of feudal sovereign over a large district. In their course of conquest over the Fantees, the Ashantis became involved in war with the British (1807–26), and were finally driven from the sea-coast; and in 1873–74 an army under Wolseley took Coomassie. King Prempeh, after a spell of raiding, was forced in 1896 to accept the British protectorate; and a rebellion was suppressed after a third expedition to Coomassie, which is now connected by rail with the port of Sekondi. See works by Bowdich (1819; new ed. 1873), Brackenbury (1874), Reade (1874), Stanley (1874), Weitbrecht (1875), Reindorf (1895), and Freeman (1898).

Ashbourne, a market-town of Derbyshire, 13 miles NW. of Derby. Its church (1241) has a spire 212 feet high ('the Pride of the Peak'); the grammar-school dates from 1585. Prince Charles Edward was here in 1745, and here Moore wrote great part of Lalla Rookh. Pop. 4000.

Ashburnham, a Sussex parish, 5 miles W. of Battle, with the seat of the Earl of Ashburnham.

Ashburton, a small town in the south of Devonshire, on the borders of Dartmoor, 9½ miles NNW. of Totnes by rail. Till 1868 it returned a member to parliament. Pop. 2500.

Ashburton River, an unnavigable stream of Western Australia, rising in the mountains west of the Great Desert, and flowing 400 miles north-westward into Exmouth Gulf. Its lower course was explored by Sholl in 1866, its upper by Giles in 1876.

Ashby-de-la-Zouch, a town of Leicestershire, 18 miles NW. of Leicester. It owes its suffix to the Norman family of La Zouch. Their ruined castle, celebrated in Scott's Ivanhoe, and rebuilt in 1480 by Sir William Hastings, crowns a height to the south of the town. Mary, Queen of Scots, was imprisoned here. Leather is the staple industry. Pop. 5000.

Ashdod (New Test. Azotus, now Esdud), a village on the Mediterranean, 21 miles S. of Jaffa. Once a chief city of the Philistines, it is now a miserable place with a pop. of 300.

Ashdown, the seat of Lord Craven, in West Berkshire, 3¼ miles NW. of Lambourn. Here, in 871, Ethelred and Alfred gained the great victory of Æscdun over the Danes.

Ashe, the Duke of Marlborough's birthplace, 3 miles SW. of Axminster, Devon.

Asheville, capital of Buncombe county, North Carolina, 70 miles by rail NW. of Spartanburg, with a number of tobacco factories. Population, 20,000.

Ashford, an urban district of Kent, 14 miles SW. of Canterbury, and 56 SE. of London. It is a railway junction, and the seat of the South-eastern Railway workshops. Eastwell Park lies 3 miles N. Pop. 13,700.

Ashiestiel, a Selkirkshire mansion, on the Tweed, 5½ miles WSW. of Galashiels. Scott lived here 1804–12.

Ashingdon, a parish of South Essex, 2¼ miles N. of Rochford. Here, in the battle of Assandun (1016), the sixth fought in the year, Canute defeated Edmund Ironside.

Ashland (1), a post-borough of Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, 119 miles NW. of Philadelphia by rail. It depends principally upon its rich mines of anthracite coal; but it has also foundries, machine-shops, and several mills. Population, about 6000.—(2) Capital of Ashland county, Wisconsin, on Lake Superior, 391 miles by rail NW. of Milwaukee. It has a busy trade in lumber, is a terminus of five railways, and has grown up since 1880. Pop. 15,000.

Ashraf, a town in the Persian province of Mazanderan, near the south coast of the Caspian Sea, 56 miles W. of Astrabad. A favourite residence of Shah Abbas the Great, it still contains over 800 houses.

Ashridge Park, Earl Brownlow's seat, on the Bucks and Herts border, 3½ miles N. of Berkhampstead.

Ashtabu'la, a rapidly increasing town of the state of Ohio, U.S., on the Cleveland and Erie Railway, 3 miles from Lake Erie, and 49 miles NE. of Cleveland. Pop. (1880) 4445; (1910) 18,266.

Ashton-in-Makerfield, an urban district in South Lancashire, 4 miles S. of Wigan. Pop. 21,500.

Ashton-under-Lyne, a town of Lancashire, 6½ miles E. of Manchester. It was enfranchised in 1832, and returns one member. A great seat of the cotton manufacture, it suffered severely during the cotton famine (1861–65). The population is also employed in bleaching, dyeing, and calico-printing, in collieries, and in the manufacture of machines, bricks, &c. Among the buildings are the town-hall (1841), the infirmary (1860), and the old parish church, with tombs of the Assheton family, from whom the town got its name. Pop., parliamentary borough, 53,000; municipal, 45,000.

Asia, the largest of the divisions of the world, occupies the northern portion of the eastern hemisphere in the form of a massive continent which extends beyond the Arctic Circle, and by its southern peninsulas nearly reaches the equator. Apparently Asia was a local name given to the plains of Ephesus, gradually extended to the Anatolian peninsula, and later on to the whole of the continent.

Viewed in their broad features, Europe and Asia constitute but one continent, extending from west to east, and having the shape of an immense triangle, the angles of which are Spain in the west, the peninsula of the Tchuktchis in the north-east, and that of Malacca in the south-east. The Arctic Ocean in the north, the Pacific in the east, and the Indian Ocean, continued by its narrow gulf, the Red Sea, which nearly reaches the Mediterranean, enclose the continent of Asia. This immense mass of land touches the latitude of 77° 34′ N. in Cape Tchelyuskin, while Cape Burros, at the extremity of the peninsula of Malacca, and 5350 miles distant from the former, falls short by 1° 15′ of reaching the equator. Cape Baba, in Asia Minor, advances as far west as the 26th degree of longitude, and the utmost NE. extremity of Asia—East Cape, 5990 miles distant from Cape Baba—protrudes to the 190th degree (12 hours 40 minutes) to the east of Greenwich. The area covered by Asia and its islands is 16,000,000 to 17,000,000 sq. m., about one-third of the land-surface of the globe (32 per cent.). It is one-half larger than Africa, and more than four times larger than Europe. Geographically, Europe is a mere appendix to Asia, and no exact geographical delimitation of the two continents is possible. The low Urals are not even an administrative frontier: European Russia extends over their eastern slope. Caucasus is Asiatic in character; but, to separate it from Europe, one must resort to the old dried-up channel of the two Manytch rivers, which, at a geologically recent epoch connected the Black Sea with the Caspian. Asia Minor—also Asiatic in character—so closely approaches Europe that the Sea of Marmora and its narrow river-like straits seem almost an artificial boundary. The line of separation from Africa is better defined by the narrow Red Sea; but Arabia participates so largely in the physical features of Africa that it is in a sense intermediate between the two continents. In the south-east, the numberless islands of the Dutch Indies—relics of a sunken continent—appear as a bridge towards Australia. And in the extreme north-east, Asia sends out a peninsula to meet one of the Alaskan peninsulas in America, from which it is separated only by a shallow and narrow channel, Behring Strait. Although the coasts of Asia are much more indented by gulfs and peninsulas than those of Africa or America, still it stands in this respect much behind Europe, and the length of its coast-line is reckoned at 33,000 miles in all (Europe having one of 50,000 miles); besides, about one-fifth of its shores is washed by the ice-bound Arctic Ocean, or by the foggy and icy Sea of Okhotsk. Its peninsulas are massive too, and, as a rule, little indented. Three immense offsets continue the continent of Asia into more tropical latitudes—Arabia, India, and the Indo-Chinese Peninsula. Asia Minor protrudes between the Black Sea and the Mediterranean. In the Pacific there are only three large peninsulas—Corea, Kamchatka, and that of the Tchuktchis.

The islands of Asia are very numerous, and cover an aggregate of no less than 1,000,000 sq. m. (nearly 6 per cent. of Asia's surface). The coasts of Asia Minor are dotted with islands. Cyprus and Ceylon are important. In Eastern Asia, a narrow strip of islands, some large like Sumatra (177,000 sq. m.) and Java, others mere reefs, extend in a wide semicircle, under the name of Andaman and Sunda Islands, from Burma to Australia, separating the Indian Ocean from the shallow Java Sea and the Malay Archipelago. This last—an immense volcanic region inhabited by the Malay race—comprises the huge Borneo, the ramified Celebes, and the numberless small islands of the Moluccas, the Philippines, &c.; connected northward with the Chinese coast by the island of Formosa, which, like Hainan, may almost be considered part of the Chinese mainland. The Loo-choo (Liu-kiu) Islands and the Japanese Archipelago, the latter joining Kamchatka by the Kuriles, continue farther NE. the chain of islands. Saghalien is close to the continent. In the Arctic Ocean also are some unimportant islands.

Asia is at once the largest and the highest of all continents. Not only has it a number of mountains which exceed by five and six thousand feet the loftiest summits of the Andes; it has also the highest and the most extensive plateaus. If the whole mass of its mountains and plateaus were uniformly spread over its surface, the continent would rise no less than 2800 to 3000 feet above the sea. High plateaus are the predominant feature of Asia's orographical structure: they occupy nearly two-fifths of its area. One of them—that of Western Asia, including Anatolia, Armenia, and Iran—extends in a south-easterly direction from the Black Sea to the valley of the Indus; while the other—the high plateau of Eastern Asia, still loftier and much more extensive—stretches NE. from the Himalayas to the north-eastern extremity of Asia. These vast regions, mostly unfit for human settlement, and over wide areas mere dry deserts, divide Asia into two parts—the lowlands of Siberia and the Aral-Caspian depression to the north, and the lowlands of Mesopotamia, India, and China to the south. The highest parts of the East Asian plateau are in Tibet, varying from 18,000 feet to 10,000 feet in height. This highest plateau of the earth is girdled by the highest chains of mountains, first by the Tibetan Trans-Himalaya, and next by the Indian Himalaya. The former, extending at least 1500 miles, has peaks 24,000 and 25,000 feet high, and passes of 18,000 feet and upwards. The latter chain of snow-clad peaks, which in Europe would reach from Gibraltar to Greece, raises its lofty summits above 20,000 feet; its lowest passes are 15,000 feet high, and Mount Everest—the highest mountain of the globe—has its snow-cap at a height of 29,000 feet, that is, 5½ miles above the sea.

In the north-west, the Tibet plateau joins another much smaller, but very high plateau—that of Pamir ('the roof of the world'), of which the Tagarma peak reaches a height of 25,800 feet. Farther north and north-east of the Pamir is a wide, intricate complex of several high chains, known under the general name of Tian-shan (q.v.). The great Khan-tengri rises there to 24,000 feet.

On the north, the plateau of Tibet is bordered by a succession of lofty chains (Kuen-lun, Altyn-tagh, Nañ-shan), reaching more than 20,000 feet in their highest parts. These chains separate it from the great central depression which is occupied by Eastern Turkestan in the west, and by the Desert of Gobi in the east. This great depression—including the Han-hai, or 'dried-up sea,' of the basin of the Tarim—has an altitude of from 3000 to 4000 feet in the west, and 2200 feet in its lowest part—the depression of Lake Lob-nor. It has no outlet. The dry and barren ridge called Eastern Tian-shan, and two other ridges running NW., separate the Han-hai depression of Central Asia from the trenches of Urumtsi and Urungu, which descend west to the lowlands of Siberia. Beyond the great depression the plateau rises again, and reaches an average height of from 4000 to more than 5000 feet in the upper basin of the Yenisei and Selenga. To the north-west, the plateau is bordered by the snow-clad Sailughem ridge of the Altai (8000 to 9000 feet), which is broken by the depression in which Lake Baikal lies. A broad zone of alpine tracts more than 150 miles wide and 2000 miles long—the Altai, the Kuznetskiy Ala-tau, the Baikal, Lena, Olekma, and Vitim mountains—fringes this plateau in the west.

The hilly tracts of Asia are not confined to the plateaus and their border-ridges. The Caucasus, an immense wall of snow-clad mountains, stretches NW. to SE. for nearly 800 miles along the border of the Armenian plateau, from which it is separated by the broad valley of the Kura. It reaches 18,560 feet in the Elborous (Elburz) peak. The Urals, from 2000 to 4000 feet high, which separate Europe from Asia, are a broad belt of hilly tracts, stretching as a whole from north to south.

The interior of the Indian peninsula is again occupied by the wide plateau of the Deccan, having an average height of from 1500 to 3000 feet, bordered in the west by the Western Ghats (7870 feet high) and the Cardaman Mountains, and in the east by the much lower and broader Eastern Ghats. The Pedrotallagalla peak in Ceylon rises 8330 feet.

The whole of North-western Asia is occupied by an immense lowland—Siberia—which joins in the south the wide Aral-Caspian depression. This lowland, whose level is less than five or six hundred feet high, does not touch the alpine regions which fringe the great plateau of East Asia. It is separated from them by a belt of elevated, undulating plains. On the northern coast of the Caspian, the Aral-Caspian depression descends even below the level of the sea. The wide space between the great plateaus of Western and Eastern Asia and that of the Deccan, watered by the Indus and the Ganges, is again an immense lowland, covering no less than 400,000 sq. m., and supplying the means of existence to 130 millions of inhabitants. Another wide lowland, Mesopotamia, or the broad valley of the Tigris and Euphrates, was a cradle of civilisation from the remotest antiquity. The predominant feature of Asia's hydrography is the existence of very wide areas having no outlet to the sea. On the great plateau of Eastern Asia the region of the Han-hai and Gobi is watered only by the Tarim, which falls into the rapidly drying marshes of Lob-nor. If we add to this wide area the drainage basins of Lake Balkhash with its tributaries, the Ili and other smaller rivers; the great Lake Aral, with the Syr-daria (Jaxartes) and Amudaria (Oxus), as also the numerous rivers which flow towards it or its tributaries, but are desiccated by evaporation before reaching them; and finally the Caspian with its tributaries, we find an immense surface of more than 4,000,000 sq. m. —that is, much larger than Europe—which has no outlet to the ocean. Four inland drainage areas more must be added to the above—the plateaus of Iran and Armenia, two separate areas in Arabia, and one in Asia Minor.

The drainage area of the Arctic Ocean includes all the lowlands of Siberia, its plains, and large portions of the great plateau. The chief rivers flowing north to the Arctic Ocean are the Obi, with the Irtish; the Yenisei, with its great tributary the Angara, which brings to it the waters of Lake Baikal; and finally the Lena, with its great tributaries, the Vitim, Olekma, Vilui, and Aldan.

Three great rivers enter the Pacific, and all three are navigable for thousands of miles: the Amur, composed of the Arguñ and Shilka, and receiving the Sungari (a great artery of navigation in Manchuria), the Usuri, and the Zeya; the Hoang-ho; and the Yang-tse-kiang, the last two taking their rise on the plateau of Tibet. The Cambodia or Mekong, the Salwen, and the Irawadi, rising in the eastern parts of the high plateau, water the Indo-Chinese Peninsula. Rising on the same height, the Indus and the Brahmaputra flow through a high valley in opposite directions along the northern base of the Himalayas, until both pierce the gigantic ridge at its opposite ends, and find their way in opposite directions to the sea. The Tigris and Euphrates, both rising in the high plateau of Armenia, flow parallel to each other.

A succession of great lakes, or rather inland seas, are situated all along the northern slope of the high plateaus of Western and Eastern Asia. The Caspian, 800 miles long and 270 wide, is an immense sea, its level now 85 feet below the level of the ocean; Lake Aral has its level 157 feet above the ocean; farther east we have Lake Balkhash (780 feet), Zaisan (1200 feet), and Lake Baikal (1550 feet). Three large lakes, Urmia, Van, and Goktcha, and many smaller ones, lie on the highest part of the Armenian plateau.

Volcanoes play an important part in Asia's geology; more than 120 active volcanoes are known in Asia, chiefly in the islands of the south-east, the Philippines, Japan, the Kuriles, and Kamchatka, and also in a few islands of the Sea of Bengal and Arabia, and of Western Asia. Numerous traces of volcanic eruptions are found, not only in these same regions, but also in Eastern Tian-shan, in the north-western border-ridges of the high Siberian plateau, and in the south-west of Aigun in Manchuria. Earthquakes are frequent, especially in Armenia, Turkestan, and around Lake Baikal.

Asia is exceedingly rich in a great variety of mineral products. There are gold-mines of great wealth in the Urals, the Altai, and Eastern Siberia; and auriferous sands are found in Corea, Sumatra, Japan, and the Caucasus Mountains. Silver is extracted in Siberia; platinum in the Urals; copper in Japan, India, and Siberia; tin in the Malay Peninsula and Archipelago; mercury in Japan. Iron ore is found in nearly all the mountainous regions, especially in those of Asia Minor, Persia, Turkestan, India, China, Japan, and Siberia. Immense coal-beds are spread over China and the islands of the Pacific (Hainan, Japanese Archipelago, Saghalien), Eastern Siberia, Turkestan, India, Persia, and Asia Minor. They cover no less than half a million square miles in China alone; but the extraction of coal is as yet very limited. Graphite is found in Siberia. The diamonds of India, the sapphires of Ceylon, the rubies of Burma and Turkestan, the topazes, beryls, &c. of the Urals and Nertchinsk, have a wide repute. Layers of rock-salt are widely spread, and still more so the salt lakes and springs. The petroleum wells of the Caspian shores rival those of the United States. Mineral springs are widely spread over Asia; those of Caucasus and Transbaikalia already attract a number of patients.

Even Eastern Europe has quite a continental climate. Still more continental is the climate throughout Asia, with the exception of a part of its coast regions. On account of the immense area of Asia, great differences of climate are met with, and therefore the meteorologists subdivide the continent into several very different climatic regions, of which Eastern Siberia, dry, and in winter very cold, includes Verkhoyansk, the coldest spot of the Eastern Hemisphere; while India, the Indo-Chinese Peninsula, and adjoining islands have a tropical climate, with abundant periodical rains. Asia Minor has of all Asiatic regions the most moderate and agreeable climate. During the winter, Asia, as a whole, with the exception of India, the Indo-Chinese Peninsula, and South-western Arabia, enjoys a temperature much lower than that of corresponding latitudes elsewhere; while in July, throughout all Asia, except on the coasts of the Kara Sea, Kamchatka, and the Manchurian littoral, the temperature is higher than under the same latitudes elsewhere.

The aggregate population of Asia is estimated at 950 millions, being thus more than one-half of the entire population of the globe. This population gives, however, only an average of 57 inhabitants per sq. m. It is very unequally distributed, and reaches perhaps 700 per sq. m. in some provinces of China—denser than in England (618 per sq. m.)—and over 500 in some parts of India. Nearly one-tenth is almost quite uninhabited.

The inhabitants of Asia belong to five different groups: the so-called Caucasian (Fair type) in Western Asia and India; the Mongolian in Central and Eastern Asia, as also in the Indo-Chinese Peninsula; the Malay in Malacca and the Indian Archipelago; the Dravidas in South-eastern India and Ceylon; and the Negritos and Papuans in the virgin forests of the Philippine Islands and Celebes. A sixth great division comprises the stems which inhabit North-eastern Asia—the Hyperboreans. The Europeans reckon about ten millions (Russians) in Caucasus, Turkestan, and Siberia; some 100,000 (British) in India; and 80,000 in the Dutch Indies.

The four great religions which are professed by the great majority of mankind—the Jewish, Buddhist, Christian, and Mohammedan—had their origin in Asia. At present the inhabitants of Asia belong chiefly to the Buddhist religion, which—inclusive of the followers of Lamaism, the moral philosophy of Confucius, and the teachings of Lao-tse, who all accept more or less the Buddhist ritual—has no less than 530 to 560 millions of followers—i.e. nearly one-third of mankind. The old faith of Hinduism has no less than 227 millions of followers in India. Most of the inhabitants of Western Asia, as also of part of Central Asia, follow the religion of Islam; they may number about 90 millions. The Christians number about 20 millions in Armenia, Caucasus, Siberia, and Turkestan. Many of the Ural-Altaians continue to maintain their ancient faith, Shamanism. Jews are scattered mostly in Western and Central Asia. A few fire-worshippers—Guebres or Parsees—who are found in the west of India and Persia are the sole remnant of the once wide-spread religion of Zoroaster.

The chief political divisions of Asia, with their approximate areas and population (mostly estimated), are as follows:

States and Territories.	Area in sq. m.	Population.
Siberia	4,787,000	8,220,000
Central Asia and Caucasia (Russian)	1,500,000	11,700,000
Khiva and Bokhara	111,000	2,000,000
Asiatic Turkey	690,000	18,000,000
Sinai and El ‘Arîsh	11,200	44,000
Cyprus	3,600	274,000
Arabia (independent)	650,000	1,000,000
Persia	630,000	10,000,000
Afghanistan	250,000	6,000,000
India (with Aden, &c.)	1,773,000	315,133,000
Nepal and Bhutan	74,000	5,500,000
Ceylon	25,500	4,100,000
French and Portuguese India	1,700	900,000
Siam	200,000	6,500,000
Straits Settlements	1,600	714,000
Malay States	52,000	2,000,000
French Indo-China	310,000	16,300,000

The amount of cereals—rice, millet, wheat, barley, oats, &c.—supplied by the rich cornfields of China, Indo-China, Japan, and even Turkestan—may be best judged by the density of population in the better-watered parts of these countries, and by the rapidly increasing amounts of corn exported, especially from India; while in Southern Siberia, the Altai, and the Middle Amur, Russian settlers raising wheat, rye, oats, barley, melons, &c. on the virgin soil of the prairies enjoy a welfare hardly known in Russia. The crops of cotton in India and Asia Minor helped Europe to meet the cotton crisis of 1863; and those of Bokhara and Transcaucasia gave an impulse to the growing cotton industry of Russia. Tea is the chief crop of Southern China, Assam, India, and Ceylon; and coffee is largely grown in Arabia, India, Ceylon, and the Dutch colonies. The silkworm culture is widely spread in Asia Minor, Persia, Turkestan, India, China, and Japan. The sugar-cane is largely raised in Southern and South-eastern Asia. Oleaginous plants, indigo and other dye plants, jute, spices, the cinchona-tree, and opium-producing plants are extensively cultivated; as also fruit-trees in Western Asia and Turkestan. The coconut-palm, the bread-tree, the rubber-tree, and the gutta-percha tree are also grown in tropical Asia.

On the inland steppes and plateaus of Asia, numberless herds of horses, horned cattle, and sheep furnish all the necessaries of life to the nomad or half-nomad Mongolian inhabitants of these regions, and supply the European trade with a yearly increasing amount of hides, wool, and tallow. The forests of the far north and north-east afford the means of existence to nomad and Russian hunters. Both supply the trade with rich furs; while the rivers of Siberia and Manchuria provide food for the nomad Ostiaks, Gols, and Ghilyaks. And the Behring and Okhotsk Seas of the Northern Pacific, and their islands, supply the civilised world with some of the finest furs.

The plateaus, the deserts, and the mountainous regions of Asia, thickly clothed with impenetrable forests and intersected by deep gorges and valleys, are so many obstacles to the communication between different parts of the continent. The roads of Asia, except those of China and India, and a few main lines elsewhere, are mostly mere footpaths or tracks marked in the deserts, with wells far apart, and bleached with the bones of camels. Caravans of camels are therefore the chief means of transport for goods and travellers in the interior; donkeys, yaks, and even goats and sheep are employed in crossing the high passages of the Himalayas; horses are the usual means of transport in most parts of China and Siberia, and in the barren tracts of the north the reindeer, and still farther north the dog, are made use of. Fortunately, the great rivers of Asia (especially China and Siberia) provide water communication over immense distances.

Railways are only beginning to make their appearance in Asia. In India they already represent a total length of 33,000 miles. Russia, too, has spread her railways right across Asia to the shores of the Pacific. China decided in 1886 to open its territory to railway construction, and in 1911 had about 5500 miles open, and 2800 more under construction. Japan has over 6000 miles open. There are also railways in Indo-China, Siam, the Malay States, and Turkey in Asia. And a Trans-Persian Railway is projected with the object of linking up the Russian and Indian systems.

Telegraph communications are in a much more advanced state than the roads. St Petersburg is connected by telegraph with the mouth of the Amur, Vladivostok, and Port Arthur; while another branch, crossing Turkestan and Mongolia, runs on to Tashkend, Peking, and Shanghai. Constantinople is connected with Bombay, Madras, Singapore, Saigon, Hong-kong, and Nagasaki in Japan; and Singapore with Java, Australia, and so with New Zealand. India has nearly 73,000 miles of telegraphs; China, 40,000 miles; and Japan, 19,000 miles, with 3900 miles of submarine cables.

Hitherto Asia has supplied Europe chiefly with raw materials—gold, silver, petroleum, teak and a variety of timber-wood, furs, raw cotton, silk, wool, tallow, and so on; with the products of her tea, coffee, and spice plantations; and with a yearly increasing amount of wheat and other grain. Steam-industry, although but a very few years old, threatens to become a rival to European manufacture. Indian cottons of European patterns and jute-stuffs already compete with those of Lancashire and Dundee. The silks, printed cottons, carpets, jewellery, and cutlery of particular districts in India, China, Japan, Asia Minor, and Persia, far surpass in their artistic taste many like productions of Europe; and the export of these articles is increasing.

CENTRAL ASIA is a term, in its geographical sense, used of the region lying between the Altai Mountains and the Persian Gulf, and includes part of Siberia, all Turkestan, Afghanistan, Beluchistan, and part of Persia. An earlier usage —that of Humboldt—gave this name to the khanates of Bokhara and Tartary. In Russian official language, Central Asia is an administrative division of the empire lying to the SW. of Siberia, and comprising, with part of what used to be called Siberia, the recent Russian annexations in Turkestan. Russian Central Asia is divided into the governments of Akmolinsk, Semipalatinsk, Turgai, Uralsk, Semirechinsk, Sir-daria, Samarkand, Ferghana, and the Trans-Caspian territory. The total area is given at 1,326,000 sq. m., and the pop. at 9,973,000. For the physical geography of the region, see ASIA; see also TURKESTAN, SIBERIA, KHOKAND, &c.

Asiago, a town of North Italy, 22 miles N. of Vicenza, on a ridge. Pop. 3000.

Asia Minor (Asia the Less) is the name usually given to the western peninsular projection of Asia, forming part of Turkey in Asia. The late Greek name for Asia Minor is Anatolia—Anatolé, 'the East,' whence is formed the Turkish Anadŏli. Asia Minor includes the whole peninsula, with an area of 220,000 sq. m. It constitutes the western prolongation of the high tableland of Armenia, with its border mountain-ranges. The interior consists of a great plateau, or rather series of plateaus, rising in gradation from 3500 to 4000 feet, with bare steppes, salt plains, marshes and lakes; the structure is volcanic, and there are several conical mountains, one of which, the Ergish-dagh (Argæus), with two craters, attains a height of 11,830 feet. The plateau is bordered on the north by a long train of parallel mountains, 4000 to 6000 feet high. These mountains sink abruptly down on the north side to a narrow strip of coast. Similar is the character of the border ranges on the south, the ancient Taurus, only that they are more continuous and higher, being, to the north of the Bay of Skanderoon, 10,000 to 12,000 feet. Between the highlands and the sea lie the fertile coast-lands. Of the rivers the largest is the Kizil Irmak (Halys), which, like the Yeshil Irmak (Iris), and the Sakaria (Sangarius), flows into the Black Sea; the Sarabat (Hermus) and Meinder (Mæander) flow into the Ægean. Here the forest-trees and cultivated plants of Europe are seen mingled with the forms characteristic of Persia and Syria. The central plateau, which is barren, has the character of an Asiatic steppe, more adapted for the flocks and herds of nomadic tribes than for agriculture; while the coasts, rich in all European products, fine fruits, olives, wine, and silk, have quite the character of the south of Europe, which on the warmer and drier south coast shades into that of Africa.

The inhabitants, some 7,000,000 in number, comprise the dominant race, the Osmanli Turks, who number about 1,200,000; allied to these are the Turkomans and Yuruks. There are also hordes of nomadic Kurds, with the robber tribes of the Lazes in the north-east. The Greeks and Armenians are the most progressive elements in the population, and have most of the trade. The Anatolian Railway, under German control, runs from Scutari to Konieh, and from there the first section of the Bagdad Railway (see BAGDAD) extends to Bulgurlu.

Here, especially in Ionia, was the early seat of Greek civilisation; and here Alexander the Great and the Romans successively contended for the mastery of the civilised world. Since the conquest by the Turks (about 1300 A.D.), the ancient civilisation of the country and its prosperity have been sadly brought to ruin. After the Russo-Turkish war of 1877 Great Britain made a secret engagement to guarantee the Asiatic dominions of the Porte. Germany has created vast economic interests here of recent years.

Asirgarh, a strong fortress in the Central Provinces, 300 miles NE. of Bombay.

Askabad, a town of Russian Turkestan, the political centre of Trans-Caspia, situated on the Trans-Caspian Railway, 200 miles SE. of Mikhailovsk, the seaward terminus, and 232 WNW. of Merv. Pop. 20,000.

Askeaton, a town in the county, and 15 miles WSW. of the town, of Limerick. Pop. 600.

Askja (Ask'ya; 'basket'), the largest volcano in Iceland, rises near the centre of the island. Its vast circular crater, over 23 sq. m. in area, and about 17 miles in circumference, lies at a depth of over 700 feet within a mountain built up to a height of 4633 feet above the sea.

Asmara. See ERITREA.

As′olo, a walled town 35 miles NW. of Venice, with memories of Caterina Cornaro, queen of Cyprus, and Robert Browning. Pop. 1000.

Aspatria, a Cumberland urban district, with an agricultural college, 7¾ miles NE. of Maryport.

Aspe (Asp), a romantic valley (pop. 12,000) in the Western Pyrenees, close to the Spanish frontier. It was formerly a republic under the protection of the princes of Béarn.—(2) A town of Spain, 25 miles W. of Alicante. Pop. 8000.

Aspern, a small village of Austria, on the Danube's left bank, nearly opposite Vienna. Here, on May 21-22, 1809, Napoleon was defeated by the Austrians under Archduke Charles.

Aspinwall, or COLON, a seaport of the republic of Panama, but practically a United States colony, is situated at the Atlantic extremity of the Panama Railway (1849-55), and of the Panama Canal, within the Canal Zone, on the island of Manzanilla in Limon Bay, 8 miles NE. of the old Spanish port of Chagres, and 47 NW. of Panama by rail. In 1870 the Empress Eugénie presented the town with a statue of Columbus, after whom it is named officially Colon. The name Aspinwall it derives from a New York merchant, the originator of the Panama Railway; the company having founded the town in 1850. Pop. 20,000.

Aspromonte (As-pro-mon'tay), a rugged mountain (6907 feet) of Italy, near Reggio, overlooking the Strait of Messina. Here Garibaldi was defeated and captured, 28th August 1862.

Assab Bay, an Italian trading station on the west coast of the Red Sea, 40 miles NW. of the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb. The district around it (area, 243 sq. m.; pop. 1300) was sold in 1870 by some Danakil chieftains to an Italian steamship company for a coaling station, and it now forms part of the Italian colony of Eritrea (q.v.).

Assal', a large salt-lake, nearly 600 feet below sea-level, in Adal, East Africa, 9 miles from the coast of the Bay of Tajurrah.

Assam', from 1874 to 1905 a separate province at the NE. extremity of British India, with an area of 46,341 sq. m.; then joined to E. Bengal; and since 1912 administered separately by a Chief Commissioner. A series of valleys, watered by the Brahmaputra and some sixty lesser rivers, it is very fertile, and abounds in wood; the tea-plant is indigenous. Since 1840, when its commercial cultivation was begun, 600,000 acres have been taken up for tea; some three-fourths of the tea grown in India is the produce of Assam. The other products are rice, mustard, gold, ivory, amber, musk, iron, lead, petroleum, and coal. Scarcely a fourth of the fertile area is cultivated. There is steamboat and railway communication with Calcutta. In 1826, at the close of the first Burmese war, Assam was ceded to the British, but it was only in 1838 that, in consequence of the misgovernment of the native rajah, the entire country was placed under British administration. The towns of any size are Gauhátí (12,000) and Sebságar (6000). A majority of the people are Hindus. A striking feature of Assam is the abundance of wild animals and poisonous snakes. In 1911 a punitive expedition had to be sent against the Abors, a savage tribe just across the Tibetan frontier. The seat of government is Shillong. Pop. of Assam, 5,000,000.

Assa'ye, an Indian village in the extreme north-east of the Nizam's dominions, 43 miles NE. of Aurungabad. Here, on 23d September 1803, Wellesley, afterwards Duke of Wellington, with 4500 men, defeated 50,000 Mahrattas.

Assen, a town of NE. Holland, 17 miles S. of Groningen by rail. Pop. 12,000.

Assiniboia, till 1905 a Canadian district within the limits of the North-west Territories, formed by an order in Council in 1882. It was bounded on the south by the United States frontier, on the east by Manitoba, and on the north by the former district of Saskatchewan, and had an area of 89,535 sq. m. It contained the towns of Regina (now the capital of the new province of Alberta) and Fort Pelly. The climate is subject to extremes, ranging from 58° F. below zero in winter to 106° above it in summer. In 1905 the new provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were formed, and Assiniboia was divided between them, Saskatchewan getting the greater portion.

Assin'iboine, a river of British North America, rising in 51° 40′ N. lat. and 105° E. long., and, after a course of 400 miles, at Winnipeg joining the Red River (q.v.), which discharges its waters into Lake Winnipeg. Its tributaries are the Little Souris, Qu'appelle, Rapid River or Little Saskatchewan, White Sand River, and Beaver Creek.

Assi'si, a town of Central Italy, on a steep hill, 14 miles SE. of Perugia by rail. It is the birthplace of St Francis, who founded here in 1209 the mendicant order that bears his name. The monastery (1229) has two Gothic churches, one surmounting the other, with frescoes and paintings by Cimabue, Giotto, &c.; beneath, in a Doric crypt (1818), are the relics of St Francis. Assisi also possesses a cathedral. Pop. 7000.

Assiut. See Siout.

Assmannshau'sen, a village on the Rhine, 3 miles below Rüdesheim, famous for its red and white wine.

Assos, a ruined town on the Gulf of Edremid, whose still imposing remains were successfully excavated, in 1881–83, by the American Institute of Archæology.

Assouan' (Aswan, Eswan; the ancient Syene) is the southernmost city of Egypt proper, on the right bank of the Nile, and beside the first or lowest cataract. Near are the islands of Philæ and Elephantine. On the left bank are catacombs. There are some remains of the ancient city. In the neighbourhood are the famous syenite quarries from which so many of the huge obelisks and colossal statues were cut to adorn the temples and palaces of ancient Egypt. Here is the great Egyptian irrigation dam (1899–1902; extended 1907–12). Pop. 13,000. See Philæ.

Assumption. See Asuncion.

As'synt, Loch, a beautiful fresh-water lake of Sutherland, 6½ miles E. of Lochinver. Lying 215 feet above sea-level, it measures 6¾ miles by ¾ mile. To Ardvreck Castle, on a north-eastern promontory, the Marquis of Montrose was brought a prisoner in 1650.

Assyria, the northernmost of the three great countries that occupied the Mesopotamian plain. It was bounded on the N. by the Niphates Mountains of Armenia; on the S. by Susiana and Babylonia; on the E. by Media; and on the W., according to some, by the Tigris, but more correctly by the watershed of the Euphrates, for many Assyrian ruins are found to the west of the Tigris. It was thus about 280 miles long from N. to S., and rather more than 150 broad from E. to W. This plain is diversified by mountain-chains on the north and east, and watered by the Tigris and its affluents, between two of which—the Zab rivers—lay the finest part of the country, called Adiabené. As it was the boundary-land between the Semitic people and Iran, it became the scene of important political events. Its extraordinary fertility enabled it to support a large population. The high degree of prosperity and civilisation reached by its inhabitants in very early times is attested not only by ancient writers, but by the extensive ruins of mighty cities, by the canals and contrivances for irrigation, and by the numerous proofs—furnished by recent excavations—of an acquaintance with the arts and sciences. The ruins of many cities are grouped around Nineveh; while lower down, the Tigris exhibits an almost unbroken line of ruins from Tekrit to Bagdad. Under the Mohammedans this fine country is now almost a desert. Nineveh (q.v.) was the capital. There are indications that this Semitic state was founded as far back as 2330 B.C.; its king was certainly powerful about 1320 B.C.; Tiglath-pileser (1140) was its first great prince; after some centuries of decay the empire was again a great power under Shalmaneser II. (858). In the 7th century B.C. the empire was greatly decayed, and Babylon independent: finally Nineveh was taken in 605, and Assyria became a province of Media. The Assyrian language was akin to Hebrew and Phœnician. On the topography and archæology, see books by Botta, Oppert, Layard, George Smith, Perrot and Chipiez, Sayce, Maspero, Rogers (1901).

Asterabad′. See ASTRABAD.

Asti (Asta Pompeia), a city of Piedmont, lies on the Tanaro, 35 miles ESE. of Turin. The vino d'Asti is a kind of sweet muscatel, effervescing like champagne. Pop. 18,000.

Aston, the name of upwards of sixty English towns, villages, townships, or parishes, Aston Manor being part (1912) of Birmingham (q.v.).

Astoria, originally a fur-trading station in Oregon, U.S., on the left bank of the Columbia, founded by the Pacific Fur Company in 1811, and named from its chief proprietor, John Jacob Astor. It was a main point in the American claim to the territory of Oregon (q.v.). There are upwards of fifty large salmon-tinning establishments in the neighbourhood. The lumbering industry is also important. Pop. 10,000.

Astrabad′, a decayed town in the north of Persia, at the foot of the Elburz Mountains, 30 miles SE. of the Caspian. Pop. (1808) 75,000; (1904) 18,000.

Astrakhan′, a government in the SE. of European Russia, watered by the Volga, and washed on the SE. by the Caspian Sea. Most of the soil is barren, but there are some fertile regions. Area, 91,000 sq. m.; pop. 1,300,000.—ASTRAKHAN, the capital, is situated on a high island in the Volga, 41 miles from its mouth in the Caspian Sea. The Kreml, or fortress, and the White Town alone have houses of stone; the suburbs contain wooden buildings only. Lengthwise through the middle of the city runs a canal which connects the Kutum arm of the Volga with the main stream. Of nearly 40 Greek churches, the finest is the cathedral (1696), on the highest point in the Kreml. Pop. 150,000, consisting of Russians, Armenians, Tatars, and Persians. Almost the entire commerce with Persia and Transcaucasia passes through the city. Its great markets attract every year many thousands of merchants. The city is connected by steamers with all parts of the Caspian, and is the principal harbour of that sea. The industries are shipbuilding, dyeing, silk manufacture, &c.; the sturgeon and other fisheries are amongst the greatest in the world.

Astrolabe Bay, a large inlet of the sea on the northern coast of German New Guinea.

Astropalia, an island in the Archipelago (q.v.), with an area of about 50 sq. miles, and pop. 2000.

Astu′rias, or OVIEDO, a northern province of Spain, washed on the north by the Bay of Biscay. Area, 4200 sq. m.; population, 686,000. The capital is Oviedo (q.v.).

Asuncion (Span. As-soon-thee-oan′), capital of the republic of Paraguay, on Paraguay River, has connection with Buenos Ayres by steamer and by railway, with a train-ferry at Encarnacion. Founded in 1537 on the Feast of the Assumption, it has a cathedral (1845), and a trade in leather, tobacco, sugar, manioc, and maté or Paraguay tea. Pop. (1910) 84,000.

Aswan. See ASSOUAN.

Ataca′ma, a northern province of Chili, with an area of 30,400 sq. m., and a population of 66,000. Silver and copper are largely mined, and gold is also found in considerable quantities. Capital, Copiapo; pop. 10,000.—The Desert of Atacama till the war of 1879 belonged also partly to Bolivia. Its silver and saltpetre works have to some extent peopled its solitudes.

At′bara, a tributary of the Nile, rises in Abyssinia near Lake Tzana, flows mainly northwest, and after receiving the larger Takazze, joins the Nile below Berber—being its only tributary below the junction of the White with the Blue Nile. For some months its course is almost dry.

Atchafalay′a, an outlet of the Red River or of the Mississippi, but receiving very little of the waters of the latter except in time of flood. It runs nearly southward to Chetimaches Lake, and after passing through it, reaches the Gulf of Mexico by Atchafalaya Bay after a course of about 220 miles.

Atcheen (also Acheen or Atchin; called by the Dutch Atjeh), until 1873 an independent state in the north-west part of Sumatra, now a province of the Dutch Indies, with an area of 20,500 sq. m., and a pop. of 582,175. The natives, who after much resistance remain unpacified, are distinct from the rest of the inhabitants of Sumatra, being of darker colour and lower stature, and more active and industrious. The capital is Kota Radja or Atcheen, in the north-western extremity, on a stream navigable by boats, 4½ miles from its port Oleh-leh, with which, since 1876, it has been connected by a railway. Pop. 10,000.

Atchison, a city of Kansas, U.S., on the Missouri's left bank, 333 miles above St Louis. Nine railway lines converge here; and the city has flour-mills, an iron-foundry, machine-shops, manufactures of furniture, carriages, and wagons. Pop. 20,000.

Ateshga ('place of fire'), a spot on the peninsula of Apsheron, on the west coast of the Caspian Sea. Many Guebres or Persian Fire-worshippers still visit it, and bow before the holy flames which issue from the bituminous soil.

Ates′sa, a town of South Italy, 23 miles SSE. of Chieti. Pop. 6000.

Ath, or AATH, a fortified town in the province of Hainault, Belgium, on the navigable Dender, 32 miles SW. of Brussels. Pop. 12,000.

Athabas′ca (locally La Biche, 'red-deer or elk river'), a river and lake in the Canadian provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, forming part of the great basin of the Mackenzie. The river rises in the Rocky Mountains, in a little lake at the foot of Mount Brown, one of the highest points in the range, and flows over 600 miles NE. and NW., until it unites with the Peace River, from beyond the Rocky Mountains, to form the Slave River, which, again, after passing through Great Slave Lake, takes the name of the Mackenzie (q.v.). Lake Athabasca receives nearly all its waters from, and has its sole outlet in, the Athabasca River, which traverses not its length but its breadth, and that not in its middle, but at its extremity. It is 230 miles long, and from 14 to 30 broad. It was discovered in 1771 by Samuel Hearne, and named by him Lake of the Hills.—ATHABASCA, formerly one of the four divisions of the Canadian North-west, defined in 1882, between British Columbia and a line to the east of the Athabasca River, and between the parallels 55° and 60° N. lat. In 1905 it was about equally divided between the newly formed provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Athboy, a market-town of County Meath, on the river Athboy, 7 miles NW. of Trim. Pop. 575.

Ath'elney, Isle of ('island of nobles'), a marsh at the junction of the rivers Tone and Parret, in the middle of Somersetshire, 7 miles ENE. of Taunton. Here Alfred hid himself from the Danes in 878.

Athenry, in County Galway, 10 miles NW. of Loughrea. Pop. 800.

Athens, anciently capital of the Greek state of Attica and centre of Greek culture, now capital of the modern kingdom of Greece, 4½ miles from its harbour of Piræus, on the Gulf of Ægina. The city, which takes its name from Athena, 'goddess of science, arts, and arms,' and its own patron divinity, was originally built on the Acropolis, a conspicuous limestone rock rising 320 feet above the Attic plain, and afterwards spread out on the plain below; while the Acropolis became the citadel and subsequently the site of a group of beautiful temples of the time of Pericles (5th century, B.C.). The ruins of the Parthenon, the Erechtheum, the temple of Nike Apteros ('Wingless Victory'), and the Propylæa, still remain to testify to the former glory of the Acropolis. Of the other ancient buildings the most notable are the Theseum (also of the Periclean period, and still almost perfect), and the fragments of the vast temple of Zeus (begun in 530 B.C. and finished by the Roman Emperor Hadrian), with the theatre of Dionysus, &c. Not far from the Acropolis rose the hill Lycabettus (911 feet), and the hillocks or ridges of the Pnyx and the Areopagus or Mars Hill. At a greater distance the plain is bounded by Hymettus (3368 feet), Pentelicus (3641), and other ranges. Athens was fabled to have been founded by the hero Cecrops. The most brilliant period of its history was when, after the Persian wars (5th century, B.C.), Athens took the lead amongst the Greek states, became powerful by land and sea, was adorned by Pericles with her most glorious buildings, and brought Greek literature and Greek philosophy to their highest development. Its decline dates from the disastrous conclusion of the Peloponnesian war (403 B.C.). It was plundered and ruined by Sulla in 87 B.C.; and neither under Byzantine nor Turkish rule ever attained any prosperity. In the days of her glory Athens had some 100,000 free inhabitants and twice as many slaves; when after the liberation of Greece Athens was made the capital of the new kingdom (1834), it was a wretched village of a few hundred houses. Since then it has had a prosperous growth, looks like a well-built German town, and had in 1907 a pop. of 167,500, with a fine royal palace, a marble Stadium (restored), a university with over 150 professors and lecturers and 2500 students, and a good deal of miscellaneous trade by way of the Piræus. It is connected by rail also with Corinth, and the Athens-Larissa line is to bring Greece into railway communication with the rest of Europe. See, besides works on Greece, ancient and modern, Dyer's Ancient Athens (1873).

Athens, a name applied to more than twenty places in the United States. (1) In Georgia, 92 miles WNW. of Augusta. It contains several cotton factories, and is the seat of the university of Georgia (1801). Population, about 15,000.—(2) In the south of Ohio, on the Hocking River, is the seat of the Ohio University (1804). Pop. 5500.

Atherstone, a market-town of Warwickshire, 14 miles N. of Coventry by rail. Drayton was born close by. Pop. 5600.

Atherton, an urban district of Lancashire, 13 miles WNW. of Manchester, with a population of 20,000.

Athlone, a town of Ireland, on the Shannon, chiefly in Westmeath, but partly in Roscommon, 80 miles W. of Dublin by rail. The chief manufactures are felt-hats, friezes, linens, and stays. The Shannon is crossed by a fine bowstring and lattice iron bridge of two arches, 175 and 40 feet span. Till 1885 Athlone returned one member. Its castle, founded in King John's reign, in the war of 1688 was unsuccessfully besieged by William III., but was afterwards taken by General Ginckell. The fortifications cover 15 acres, and contain barracks for 1500 men. Pop. 7500.

Ath'ol, a district in the north of Perthshire, occupying a great part of the southern slopes of the Grampians.

A'thos (Gr. Hagion Oros, 'Holy Hill'), the most eastern of the three tongues of the Chalcidice Peninsula on the Ægean Sea, connected with the mainland by a low and narrow isthmus, about a mile across. The length of the peninsula is about 31 miles; its breadth varies from 3 to 6 miles. At the southern extremity, a solitary peak rises abruptly to a height of 6346 feet above the sea. Xerxes cut a canal through the isthmus, traces of which still exist. This peninsula is the seat of 20 large monasteries (17 Greek, 1 Bulgar, 1 Servian, 1 Russian), besides hermitages and chapels. The number of monks is about 6000. Under Turkish government (till 1912–13) they enjoyed autonomy, paying an annual tribute. Caryes, the principal place in the peninsula, is picturesquely situated in the midst of vineyards and gardens, and has 1000 inhabitants. Here the market is held; but no female, even of the lower animals, is permitted on Athos. In the middle ages, Athos was the centre of Greek learning and Christian-Byzantine art. Now learning is at a very low ebb; scarcely more than two or three monks of tolerable education can be found in a monastery. The libraries are neglected, though containing several beautiful (but not important) manuscripts. See works by Curzon (1849; 6th ed. 1881), Riley (1887), Brockhaus (1891), Lambros (1896–1901), and Abbott (1903).

Athy', the chief town of County Kildare, on the Barrow, here joined by the Grand Canal, 45 miles SW. of Dublin by rail. Pop. 3500.

Atitlan, a Central American lake, in Guatemala, 24 miles long, and 8 to 10 miles broad. It seems to occupy the crater of an extinct volcano, and is of great depth. It has no visible outlet. High cliffs surround it, and on its southern bank rises the volcano of Atitlan (12,538 feet), at whose foot lies the little Indian town of Santiago de Atitlan, with a pop. of 9000.

Atlanta, a flourishing city of the United States, capital of Georgia, is situated 1100 feet above sea-level, 294 miles NW. of Savannah, and 7 miles SE. of the Chattahoochee River. Seven railroads centre at it. Atlanta has an extensive and rapidly increasing trade in cotton, dry goods, horses and mules, and especially tobacco. Public buildings are the custom-house, state-house, opera-house, the Atlanta University for the education of coloured young men and women, Clark Theological School (coloured Methodist), and two medical colleges. In September 2, 1864, the city was captured by the Union troops under General Sherman, and the entire business portion destroyed by them on leaving it a month later. Since the restoration of peace, however, its prosperity has been uninterrupted and its growth rapid. Atlanta was settled in 1840; was incorporated as the village of Marthasville in 1842; as Atlanta, in 1847. Pop. (1850) 2572; (1870) 21,879; (1890) 65,533; (1900) 89,872; (1910) 154,839.

Atlantic City, a fashionable American health-resort, on a narrow, sandy island off the coast of New Jersey, 60 miles SE. of Philadelphia by rail. Pop. (1870) 1043; (1890) 13,055; (1910) 46,150.

Atlantic Ocean (so called either from Mount Atlas or from the fabulous island of Atlantis), separating the Old from the New World, Europe and Africa being on the E., and North and South America on the W. Its greatest width is about 5000 miles, but between Brazil and the African coast the distance is only about 1600 miles. It is in open communication with both the Arctic Ocean and Antarctic or Southern Ocean. The North Atlantic, stretching from 70° N. to the equator, has an area of 14,000,000 sq. m. It communicates with many inclosed or partially inclosed seas, such as the Caribbean Sea, Gulf of Mexico, and Hudson Bay on the west, the Baltic, North Sea, Mediterranean, and Black Sea on the east. The South Atlantic from the equator to 40° S. has an area of 10,100,000 sq. m.; if it be supposed to extend through the great Southern Ocean as far as the Antarctic circle, its area is 16,700,000 sq. m.

Towards the centre of the North Atlantic, between Africa and North America, and in the centre of the South Atlantic, between Africa and South America, there are anticyclonic areas of high atmospheric pressure (over 30 inches), out of which winds blow in all directions to surrounding regions where the pressure is less. The positions of these high-pressure areas and the winds that blow out from them, determine the great oceanic currents and the positions of the Sargasso seas, for the winds everywhere determine and control the movements of the surface waters. The SE. and NE. trades drive the heated surface waters of the tropics before them, and eventually produce the Equatorial current, which on reaching Cape St Roque bifurcates, one branch becoming the Brazil current of the South Atlantic, the other and larger branch passing on to the Caribbean Sea and Gulf of Mexico, finally issuing from the latter by the Strait of Florida, forming the Gulf Stream (q.v.), the greatest and most important of all oceanic currents. A cold Arctic current passes southward along the shores of Greenland, and unites off Cape Farewell with the Davis Strait current, forming the Labrador current, which passes along the west coast of America, and passes beneath the Gulf Stream to the south of the banks of Newfoundland. Icebergs are carried as far south as 39° N. in the northern and as far north as 38° S. in the southern hemisphere. In April 1912 the White Star ss. Titanic collided with an iceberg in lat. 41° 46′ N., long. 50° 14′ W., and sank, causing terrible loss of life. In the equatorial regions, the surface water has generally a temperature ranging from 70° to 84° F. The warm water is a relatively thin stratum, the greater part of ocean water having a temperature below 40° F. The water of the Atlantic contains the least salt towards the poles and in the equatorial belt of calms. The saltest water (density over 1·0275) is found in the centre of the trade-wind regions. The salinity of the deeper waters is considerably below the average of the surface. The average depth of the Atlantic is between 2 and 3 miles (2200 fathoms). A low submarine ridge runs down the centre, from north to south, with an average depth of about 1700 fathoms over it. On either side of this ridge there are, both in the North and South Atlantic, depths of between 3000 and 4000 fathoms. The greatest depth yet met with is just north of the Virgin Islands (4561 fathoms). The surface waters from equator to poles swarm with all kinds of pelagic plants and animals, many of which emit phosphorescent light, producing what is known as luminosity of the sea. In the centre of the North Atlantic, in the so-called Sargasso Sea, there are enormous floating banks of gulf weed (Sargassum bucciferum), on which a large number of peculiar animals live. Life has been found to exist at all depths in the Atlantic, but it becomes less abundant as greater depths and a greater distance from continental shores are reached. There are relatively few oceanic islands. Iceland, the Azores, St Paul's Rocks, Ascension, and the Tristan da Cunha group all rise from the central elevation, and are all of volcanic origin. Jan Mayen rises from the deep water of the Norwegian Sea. The coral group of Bermudas rises from the deep water of the Western North Atlantic. Off the west coast of Africa are the Canaries, Cape Verds, and Madeira. In the South Atlantic, to the west of the central ridge, are Fernando Noronha and Trinidad, and to the east of the central ridge, St Helena. There are numerous continental islands, such as the British Isles, Newfoundland, the West Indies, the Falklands, and others. The Atlantic is the main commercial highway of the world. It has been sounded in all directions, and the nature of its bed is so well known that telegraph cables can be laid on it with security. Near some continental shores, and around some of the volcanic cones which rise from the floor of the ocean, there are occasionally very steep slopes; but as a rule the bed of the ocean is a widespread, gently undulating plain. See Thomson's Voyage of the 'Challenger' (1877), and The Depths of the Ocean, by Sir J. Murray and Dr. Hjort (1912).

Atlas, the great mountain-system of North-western Africa, stretching north-eastward from Cape Nun in Morocco to Cape Bon in Tunis, a distance of 1400 miles. It is not properly a mountain-chain, but rather a very irregular mountainous mass of land, that attains its greatest height (13,000 feet) in Miltsin—27 miles SE. of the city of Morocco, whilst in Algeria the elevation is only 7673 feet, in Tunis 4476, and in Tripoli 3200. The slopes on the north, west, and south are covered with vast forests of pine, oak, cork, white poplar, wild olive, &c. The valleys are well watered and capable of cultivation with great profit.

Atra′to, a river of Colombia, rising on the Western Cordillera at an altitude of 10,560 feet, and running 305 miles northward through low swampy country, till it falls by several mouths, interrupted by bars, into the Gulf of Darien. It is navigable by steamers for fully 250 miles, being 750 to 1000 feet wide, and 8 to 70 feet deep. A route, surveyed by the United States government in 1871, proposed to connect the Atrato and the Jurador, flowing into the Pacific, by a canal 48 miles long.

Atrauli (Atrowli), a town of British India, in the United Provinces, 16 miles NE. of Aligarh. Pop. 18,000.

Atrek, a river of Persia, rising in Khorasan, and flowing nearly 350 miles westward to the Caspian Sea, from Shatt downwards along the boundary with the Russian empire.

At′tica, one of the political divisions or states of Hellas or ancient Greece, of which Athens was the capital. Its area was about 640 sq. m.; rather smaller than that of Lanarkshire. To-day Attica forms a nomarchy or government of Greece, with an area of 1200 sq. m., and a pop. of 341,000.

Attleborough, a market-town of Norfolk, 16 miles SW. of Norwich. It had a college of the Holy Cross (1387). Pop. of parish, 2500.

Attleborough, a post-village in Massachusetts, U.S., 31 miles SW. of Boston by rail. Pop. 14,000.

Attock, a town of the Punjab, on the left bank of the Indus, here spanned by a great railway bridge (1883). A fort was established here by the Emperor Akbar in 1581, to defend the passage of the river, but it is no longer a position of strength. The situation, however, of Attock is important, whether in a commercial or in a military view, it being at the head of the steamboat navigation of the Indus, 940 miles from its mouth. Pop. 4000.

Attrek. See ATREK.

Aubagne (O-bân'), a town in the French dep. of Bouches-du-Rhône, on the Huveaune, 10½ miles E. of Marseilles by rail. Pop. 8000.

Aube (Oab), a dep. in the north-east of France, occupying the southern part of the old province of Champagne and a small portion of Burgundy. The western part belongs to the basin of the Seine; the eastern to that of the Aube, which rises near Mount Saule, on the plateau of Langres, and flows 140 miles north-westward by La Ferté, Bar, and Acris, to the Seine. Area, 2310 sq. m. Pop. 241,000.

Aubenas (Oab-na), a town of SE. France, dep. Ardèche, 50 miles NNE. of Alais by rail. It is built on a height rising 688 feet above the river Ardèche, and has a fine old castle. Pop. 4000.

Aubervilliers (O-ber-veel-yay'), in the Seine dep., 5 miles N. of Paris. Pop. 38,000.

Auburn, or LISSOY, a Westmeath village, 7 miles NE. of Athlone. Goldsmith's father was rector here, and it is his 'deserted village;' the name 'Auburn' was taken from his poem.

Auburn, several places in the United States. (1) In the state of New York, 173 miles W. by N. of Albany. The outlet of Owasco Lake flows through the town, furnishing a water-power which is employed in manufactures of agricultural machinery, wool, cotton, silk, carpets, iron, &c. The state prison, founded here in 1816, with over 1000 inmates, has since 1823 been conducted on the 'silent' or 'Auburn' system. There are also a state asylum and a state armoury. Pop. (1870) 17,225; (1880) 21,924; (1910) 34,668.—(2) A town of Maine, on the west bank of the Androscoggin River, opposite Lewiston, and 35 miles N. of Portland by rail. It has manufactures of cotton, furniture, and boots and shoes. Population, above 15,000.

Aubusson (O-büs-son^g), a town in the French dep. of Creuse, in the rocky gorge of the river Creuse, 47 miles ENE. of Limoges. Pop. 7000.

Auch (Oash), capital of the French dep. of Gers, on the river Gers, 44 miles S. of Agen by rail. The Augusta Auscorum of the Romans, it is built on a hill, whose summit is crowned by the cathedral (1489–1662), rich in stained glass and carved woodwork. Pop. 10,000.

Auchendrane, a seat 4 miles S. of Ayr, the scene of Scott's Ayrshire Tragedy.

Auchenheath, a Lanarkshire collier village, 2½ miles N. of Lesmahagow.

Auchensaugh, a Lanarkshire hill, 2½ miles SSE. of Douglas, where in 1712 the Cameronians founded the Reformed Presbyterian Church.

Auchinblae, a Kincardineshire village, 5½ miles NNE. of Lawrencekirk. Pop. 430.

Auchinleck, an Ayrshire village, 15 miles E. of Ayr by rail. Pop. 3000. The parish contains Auchinleck House (locally called 'Place Affleck'), the seat of the Boswells.

Auchmithie, a Forfarshire fishing-village, 3½ miles NNE. of Arbroath. It is the 'Musselcrag' of Scott's Antiquary.

Auchmuty, a Fife village, on the Leven, 1¼ mile W. of Markinch, adjoining Balbirnie Mills.

Auchterarder, a Perthshire village, 14½ miles SW. of Perth by rail. Pop. 2300, largely employed in the woollen manufacture. The opposition to the presentee to Auchterarder parish originated (1834) the struggle which ended in the formation of the Free Church in 1843.

Auchtergaven, a Perthshire parish, 7½ miles N. by W. of Perth. The poet Robert Nicoll was a native.

Auchtermuchty, a Fife royal burgh, 10¼ miles WSW. of Cupar. Pop. 1400.

Auckland, the northern provincial district of New Zealand, includes fully half of North Island, and is about 400 miles long by 200 wide at its widest. The coast-line of nearly 1200 miles is very long in proportion to the area. Volcanic action has deeply left its mark on the surface of Auckland; and the warm lake and geyser scenery of the region about 90 miles SE. below the Bay of Plenty is amongst the most remarkable in the world. The 'Hot Lake' district covers an area 120 miles long by 10 to 15 wide, and includes hot springs, cisterns of hot water, and mud volcanoes; at Rotorua is an admirably equipped bathing-house and sanatorium. The other lakes are Tarawera, Rotoiti, and Rotomahana. The wonderful pink and white terraces near Tarawera Lake were destroyed by a volcanic eruption in 1886. Pop. (1875) 79,104; (1881) 99,451; (1891) 133,267; (1901) 175,870; (1911) 264,520.

Auckland, the largest city in the North Island of New Zealand, on a peninsula 7 miles wide on the Hauraki Gulf. It stands on the south side of Waitemata Harbour, one of the finest harbours in New Zealand; and its splendid wharves and graving-docks offer the most complete facilities for shipping. Auckland is distant from Sydney 1315 miles; from Melbourne, 1650. It possesses also a harbour on the western side of the island in Manukau, only 6 miles across. It has a university college and cathedral, and the foundation stone of a Free Library and Art Gallery was laid in 1885. Shipbuilding, sugar-refining, rope-spinning, and brick-making are among the industries. Pop. (1881) 16,675; (1911) 102,676. Founded in 1840, and named after Lord Auckland, governor-general of India, the town was capital of New Zealand till 1865.

Auckland Islands, a group of islands about 180 miles to the south of New Zealand. The largest of them measures 30 miles by 15. It has two good harbours, and is covered with the richest vegetation. The Auckland Islands are valuable chiefly as a whaling station, but are not peopled. They were annexed by Great Britain in May 1886.

Aude (Oad), a maritime dep. in S. France, part formerly of Languedoc. Area, 2438 sq. m.; population, 300,500. The southern part is occupied by spurs of the Pyrenees, attaining 4037 feet in the Pay de Bugarach; but the greater portion belongs to the valley of the lower Aude (130 miles), falling into the Mediterranean. The chief town is Carcassonne (q.v.).

Audenshaw, a town of Lancashire, 5 miles E. from Manchester. Pop. 8000.

Audh. See Oudh.

Audley, a town of Staffordshire, 5 miles NW. of Hanley, with coal and iron works. Pop. 15,000.

Audley End, Essex, 1½ mile SW. of Saffron Walden, the seat of Lord Braybrooke.

Auerstädt (Ow'er-stet), a village of Prussian Saxony, 10 miles W. of Naumburg. Here, in October 1806, the French defeated the Prussians.

Aughnacloy, a Tyrone town, on the Blackwater, 10 miles SW. of Dungannon. Pop. 1000.

Aughrim. See Aghrim.

Augsburg, a city of Bavaria, capital of the province of Swabia, is situated in the angle between the rivers Wertach and Lech, 37 miles WNW. of Munich. It has a noble street, the Maximilian Strasse, adorned with three bronze fountains (1593–1602); and the principal edifices are the Renaissance town-house (1620), with its splendid 'Golden Hall;' the Perlach Tower, dating from the 11th century; the former episcopal palace, where, on 25th June 1530, the Protestant princes presented the Augsburg Confession to Charles V.; the grand old mansion of the merchant-princes, the Fuggers; the 'Three Moors,' one of the most interesting hostelries in Germany; and the Gothicised Romanesque cathedral (994–1421), with its bronze doors and early glass-paintings. The industry of Augsburg is once more vigorous. Cotton is now the staple manufacture, besides woollens, paper, tobacco, machinery, gold and silver wares, brewing, printing, lithography, and bookselling. Pop. (1871) 51,270; (1910) 102,293; of whom 66 per cent. were Catholics. The Emperor Augustus in 12 B.C. here founded the 'colony' of Augusta Vindelicorum, which in 1276 became a free city of the empire, and which was the centre of German art as represented by the Holbeins, Burgkmair, Altdorfer, &c. The discovery of the Cape route to India, and of America, dried up the sources of Augsburg's prosperity. It ceased to be a free city on the abolition of the German empire in 1806, and was taken possession of by Bavaria.

Augusta, or Agosta, a fortified seaport of Sicily, 11 miles N. of Syracuse by rail. Pop. 15,000. Near it, in 1676, the French under Duquesne gained a great naval victory over a Spanish and Dutch fleet under De Ruyter.

Augusta (1), the capital of Maine, U.S., on the Kennebec, 63 miles NNE. of Portland by rail. A dam, 17 feet high, affords considerable water-power; there are several cotton and other mills; and in 1886 a new system of waterworks was introduced. Augusta contains a U.S. arsenal; and at Togus, 4 miles distant, is one of the national institutions for disabled soldiers. Population, about 12,400.—(2) The third city of Georgia, U.S., on the Savannah River, 231 miles from its mouth, but only 132 from Savannah by rail. It is the head of steamboat navigation on the river, which is here spanned by three bridges, connecting the town with Hamburg, S.C., and which is crossed by a stone dam, 1720 feet in length, from which a canal, 8 miles long and 150 feet wide, supplies water both for domestic use and for the cotton and other mills. Augusta is the seat of the Medical College of Georgia (1832). Pop. 41,000.

Augustenburg, a village of 600 inhabitants on a bay of the island of Alsen (q.v.). Its castle (1776) was formerly the residence of the Dukes of Holstein-Sonderburg-Augustenburg.

Augusto'vo, a town of Russian Poland, on the Netta, a feeder of the Bug, 138 miles NE. of Warsaw. Pop. 14,000.

Augustus, Fort. See Fort Augustus.

Aulapolai', or Alleppi, a seaport, with a lighthouse, in Travancore state, Madras, 33 miles S. of Cochin. Pop. 25,000.

Auldearn, a Nairnshire village, 2½ miles ESE. of Nairn. Near it Montrose won his fourth victory, 9th May 1645. Pop. 300.

Aumale (O-mâl'), an unimportant town of 2000 inhabitants, in the French dep. of Seine-Inférieure, on the Breste. Since 1547 it has given the title of duke to various families.—Aumale, a town of Algeria, 57 miles SE. of Algiers, is a strong military post. Pop. 4000.

Auray (O'ray), a port in the French dep. of Morbihan, 20 miles E. of Lorient by rail. Here is a large deaf and dumb institute; and 2 miles north is the famous place of pilgrimage of St Anne of Auray. Pop. 6000.

Aurich (Ow'rihh), in the Prussian province of Hanover, almost in the centre of East Friesland, 16 miles NE. of Emden by rail. Pop. 7000.

Aurillac (O-reel-yac), capital of the French dep. of Cantal, on the Jourdanne, 116 miles SW. of Clermont. Pop. 15,000.

Aurora (1), a city of Illinois, U.S., on Fox River, at the junction of several railroads, 39 miles WSW. of Chicago. It has machine-shops, flour-mills, manufactories of woollens, cottons, watches, corsets, silver ware, carriages, and extensive railroad workshops. The population is about 30,000.—(2) A city of Missouri, 270 miles SW. of St Louis, in a mining region. Pop. 6500.

Aurungabad, the name of at least four places in India, the most important being in the state of Hyderabad, on the Doodna, a tributary of the Godavery. It has a ruined palace of Aurungzebe, and the mausoleum of his daughter. Pop. 36,850.

Auskerry, an Orkney island, 2½ miles S. of Stronsay.

Aussee, a town in the Salzkammergut of Styria, at the confluence of three mountain-streams, which form the Traun, 23 miles SE. of Ischl by rail. Situated 2171 feet above the level of the sea, it has salt-mines, and mineral springs and baths, and is visited by some 6000 strangers annually. Pop. 1600.

Aussig, a town of Bohemia, on the Elbe, here joined by the Biela, 66 miles NNW. of Prague. It has large chemical-works. Pop. 39,300.

Austerlitz (Czech Slavkov), a town of Moravia, on the Littawa, 12 miles ESE. of Brünn. Pop. 4000. Here, on 2d December 1805, Napoleon defeated the Russians and Austrians.

Austin, the capital of Texas, U.S., on the Colorado River, 166 miles W. by N. of Houston. It has a State Capitol (1887) and a State University. Austin was named after the founder of the state of Texas. Pop. 30,000.

Australa'sia is a term etymologically equal to Southern Asia, but used to indicate Australia and the adjoining islands—Tasmania, New Zealand, Papua or New Guinea, New Caledonia, the New Hebrides, New Ireland, and New Britain. The term would thus exclude the Malay Archipelago, Micronesia, and Polynesia proper; but some authors include these great groups of islands also, making the name therefore equivalent to Oceania. Popularly, on the other hand, it is restricted to the two self-governing British dominions, the Commonwealth of Australia and the Dominion of New Zealand.

Australia, by far the largest island on the earth's surface, and with or without adjoining islands, reckoned one of the continents, lies between 10° 39′ and 39° 11½′ S. lat., and between 113° 5′ and 153° 16′ E. long. It has a length from west to east of about 2400 miles; and a breadth from north to south of 1971 miles; with a total area of 2,944,628 sq. m., about one-fourth less than that of Europe, or more than twenty-five times that of Great Britain and Ireland. By the shortest route, its nearest point is 11,000 miles distant from England. It is separated from New Guinea by Torres Strait, 90 miles broad, and from Tasmania by Bass Strait, 140 miles wide; on the NW., W., and S., it is washed by the Indian Ocean; and on the E., by the South Pacific. This island-continent is, above all other continents, exceedingly compact, with an almost unbroken outline on the east and west. Parallel with the east coast, at a distance of about 60 miles, stretches for 1200 miles the Great Barrier Reef. The name Australia in its present signification was suggested by Captain Flinders, and came into use about 1817.

The island is mainly a plateau with a precipitous face outwards, and at most places bounded by a strip of lower-lying land between that face and the sea-coast. The eastern edge of the plateau averages 2000 feet in height, the western but 1000 feet; while there is in all directions an inclination towards a central depression somewhat south and east of the actual centre of the continent. One great river, the Murray, Australia's only great river, drains by means of its many large tributaries—Darling, Murrumbidgee, &c.—the whole of the south portion of the eastern half of the plateau, most of Victoria, New South Wales, the south of Queensland, and the east of South Australia; and in the SE. corner is the principal mountain range, the Australian Alps (highest points Mount Townsend, 7350 feet, and Mount Kosciusko, 7308) continued northwards into New South Wales by the Blue Mountains, the Liverpool Range, &c. There is no drainage into the interior in the western part of the plateau, which is but slightly inclined: and here the slight and irregular rainfall collects in salt marshes, which sometimes in flood greatly extend their area. Next to the Murray, the most important rivers are the Fitzroy and the Burdekin in Queensland. By far the best part of the continent for European settlement and European agriculture is the south-east—Victoria, New South Wales, and part of South Australia—both on and outside of the plateau. Queensland is rich and fertile, but tropical and sub-tropical. The northern coast strip is largely covered with tropical forests. A portion only of Western Australia is available for agricultural or pastoral occupation, but this has been lately extended. Considerable areas of the interior are irreclaimable sandy desert; but much of the interior area, covered with scrub and prickly plants, is now under irrigation, becoming available for occupation.

The foundation of the plateau is granite, sometimes replaced by palæozoic slates and schists inclined so as to stand almost on edge. Above both are in east and south-east coal-bearing areas, of both mesozoic and palæozoic age. The central depression is of cretaceous age. The higher edges of the plateau are all volcanic, craters, ash cones, and ash beds being still very conspicuous in many places. Gold, discovered in New South Wales in 1851, has since been found in all the Australian colonies, especially Victoria, W. Australia, and New South Wales. In 1851–1910 Australia produced about 100,000,000 oz. valued at over £525,000,000. Of late years the gold produce has much fallen off. There are rich silver-mines in New South Wales, copper-mines in South Australia, and tin-mines in Queensland. There are great coal-fields in New South Wales and Queensland; and iron has been found in several states. Lead, bismuth, antimony, diamonds, and various kinds of precious stones form part of Australia's mineral wealth.

In proportion to its size, Australia, lying mostly within the temperate zone, enjoys on the whole an equable climate, although subject to great occasional irregularities; in general, hot and dry, and remarkably salubrious. Within the tropics, it has its rainy season in summer (November to April); south of the tropics, almost exclusively in winter. The principal mountains, both for extent and height, lying to the east or windward side, receive by far the heaviest tribute of moisture brought by the winds from the Pacific; and, as a rule, the amount of rainfall on the east side is in inverse proportion to the distance from the east coast. The west side has far less rain than the east, and there the rainfall is proportionate to the proximity to the west coast. What moisture is left in the winds after their passage across the highlands, the intense heat rising from the central plains tends to dissipate, instead of allowing it to condense into rain. South Australia, Victoria, and in a less degree, New South Wales, are exposed to hot winds from the interior which rapidly raise the temperature of the lands they visit to 115° or higher, and are followed by an equally sudden fall. Melbourne has a mean temperature of 58°; Sydney, 63°; Adelaide, a little higher; Perth, about the same as at Sydney. Captain Sturt found the mean temperature of the interior for three months over 101° F. in the shade, and the drought such as to unloosen the screws of his boxes, split his combs into thin laminæ, make the leads drop out of his pencils, and his finger-nails become brittle as glass; the season was, however, an exceptional one, and good pastoral country exists within a short distance of what he described as the 'Stony Desert.' The east highlands have a greater proportion of snow than their latitude and height would argue. At 5000 feet of altitude, in certain situations, snow lies all the year round, and many of the higher mountains are covered with snow all the winter.

The worst feature in the climate of Australia is the total uncertainty and inequality of the rainfall in all parts of the continent, menacing the whole country with almost equally distressing alternations of drought and flood. Droughts sometimes completely wither up vegetation over large tracts of land, to the destruction of many thousands of cattle. The ordinary drought itself renders almost all the rivers of Australia, with the exception of the Murray proper, merely intermittent; shrunk for months together into straggling water-holes, with or without some connecting thread of stream. As rivers, they really cease to exist for a longer or shorter period every year. Even the Murray is only navigable at certain seasons of the year. The rainy season, on the other hand, swells these pools into terrific floods, inundating the country, and often most seriously destroying property. Most successful irrigation colonies have been established at Mildura in Victoria, and Renmark in South Australia, both utilising the waste waters of the River Murray. Water for the use of stock in summer is extensively stored in dams, and large tracts of country with no surface-water have been made available for settlement by sinking wells, and there are vast districts where artesian wells have already proved a success.

The vegetation of Australia is altogether unique, standing at a long interval from that of all other quarters of the globe; but it is exceedingly abundant in species. These, it is calculated, number about 10,000—considerably more than are to be found in all Europe. A peculiarity of Australian vegetation is the abundance of 'scrub'—the 'mallee,' 'mulga,' &c. The highlands are rich in wood, such as that of the gum-trees of the genus Eucalyptus, growing to a height of 250 feet, with a girth of 12 to 20 feet; one felled giant measuring as much as 480 feet. Then in the south and west, and even a little into the interior, though less abundantly there, are the valuable shea-oaks, beef-woods, or Casuarinas. The 'wattles' or acacias, abounding everywhere in the country, and comprising over 300 species, are also a most characteristic feature of Australia, with lovely yellow blossoms, and generally fragrant. The Australian bush is fragrant all the year. Australia affords so wide a variety of climate and soil that most European trees and plants have been successfully introduced. The Scotch thistle has become a serious nuisance.

The zoology of Australia is even more peculiar than its botany. The mammalia of other lands are totally wanting here, except some rats and mice, and the dingo or wild dog, while the marsupials or pouch-bearing mammalia of Australia have but the opossums of America to represent them in any other part of the world. The largest of the marsupials are the kangaroo, hare kangaroo, and rat kangaroo. The fruit-eating bat, or flying-fox, is found. Then there are opossums and phalangers. The wombat is the largest of the marsupials, next to the kangaroo. The ant-eater of Western Australia is of the size of a squirrel. The ornithorhynchus, platypus, duck-mole, or water-mole, having no teeth or marsupial pouch, has broad webbed feet, a horny mandible like a duck-bill, and is oviparous. Australia favours the acclimatisation of animal as well as plant life, and the rabbit has proved so prolific as to require special public efforts for its suppression. The camel has done excellent service in the work of exploration.

The birds, if not quite so unique and strange a feature of Australia as are its mammalia, excel those of all other temperate lands for beauty of plumage and fineness of form. Passing over the splendid parrots and cockatoos, we note for their singularity of figure or brilliancy of feather, the regent-bird, rifle-bird, fly-catcher, and lyre-bird. Notable are also honey-suckers, brush-turkeys, the bower-birds, the emu and cassowary, and the Podargi, of enormous mouth—'more-porks,' as they are called, from their singular cry. Altogether, Australia has 650 distinct species of birds to muster against Europe's 500. Of reptiles, Australia has no less than 140 different kinds, its largest lizard measuring from 4 to 6 feet. Nor does Australia want for snakes. Though destitute of both the vipers and pit-vipers, it makes up for this by the Elapidæ (a family including the Indian cobras), constituting two-thirds of the snakes of Australia, all poisonous, though only five kinds are fatally so. The black snake of Australia measures from 5 to 8 feet long. Australia abounds, moreover, in insects, beautiful and peculiar. English singing and game birds have been largely introduced. The common sparrow has multiplied to such an extent that it has become a pest. Axis deer and Angora goats have been acclimatised.

Almost as much as its botany and zoology, the human natives of Australia are isolated and peculiar, separated by a wide remove from the Papuans, the Malays, and the Negroes. Of a dark coffee-brown complexion, rather than actually black, the Australian stands not much short of the average European in height, but is altogether of much slimmer and feebler build; his legs, in particular, are very lean and destitute of calves (a defect common to dark races). His head is long and narrow, with a low brow prominent just above the eyes, but receding thence in a very marked degree. The nose, proceeding from a narrow base, broadens outwardly to a somewhat squat end. The face bulges into high cheek-bones. The mouth is big and uncouth, the upper jaw projecting over the lower, but with fine white teeth. The whole head and face, and indeed the whole person, is covered with a profusion of hair, which, when freed of its usually enclogging oil and dirt, is soft and glossy. The intellect of the Australian, directed almost exclusively to the means of procuring food, operates wholly within the range of the rudest bodily senses; but inside that elementary sphere, displays no little nimbleness and skill. He is unsurpassed in tracking and running down his prey; and his weapons, though of the most primitive kind, are well adapted to assist him in that purpose, whilst his rude culinary and domestic apparatus manifests equal skill. His language, within its very circumscribed sensuous sphere, is fairly expressive and complete; and in the facility with which he learns to chatter foreign languages is noteworthy. Outside this circle, however, all is blank to the Australian. In summer the natives roam about naked, and sense of shame seems almost wholly undeveloped in them. Morality is entirely reduced to the notion of property, wives being one item in a man's chattels the stealing of which has a definite punishment attached to it. Yet the 'black fellows' are capable of loyal affection and gratitude. Without doubt they have often murdered Europeans, but in many cases this was but more or less legitimate reprisal for prior atrocities committed by the convicts or other reckless Europeans. None of them have fixed habitations; caves may be taken advantage of, but usually the best habitation they have is a screen of twigs and bushes, covered with foliage or turf; sometimes, however, logs of wood and turf serve for a few days' or weeks' shelter. By way of food the Australian devours the kangaroo, emu, opossum, wombat, lizards, snakes (of which the head is rejected), frogs, larvæ, white ants, moths, which are usually roasted, fire being produced by rubbing together two pieces of stick. His boomerang is an ingenious throw-stick, and is skilfully used even for knocking down birds on the wing. There is no government among this people outside that of the family, and no laws except traditionary rules about property. In the way of religion they have little save their terror of ghosts and demons, and some superstitious traditional rites applicable to certain epochs in a man's life, more particularly at his burial. Their marriage customs are curious, the fundamental principle being exogamy, the custom which prohibits a man from marrying a woman of his own tribe. They cannot usually count beyond five. Like almost all other savages, the native Australians are rapidly vanishing before the advance of civilisation. In the settled districts some of them are usefully employed as shepherds and stockmen, but the majority prefer nomadic habits. The intermittent use of European clothing induces consumption, while the diseases and vices they acquire from Europeans are another potent factor of their destruction. The lowest estimate of their number, prior to European settlement among them, gives over 150,000; they are now calculated at not more than 100,000.

Some old 15th and 16th century maps show, where the north of Australia is, a territory of various outline named Java Major, or Java the Greater; and it seems probable that after Magellan's death his followers sighted Western Australia in 1522. The present Torres Strait refers to the presence of Torres there in 1606. Dirk Hartog Island in the west carries us back to Dirk Hartog and the year 1616. Arnhem Peninsula is a reminiscence of the Dutch vessel Arnhem, which in 1618 explored the coast of that land. The Dutch ship, Guldene Zeepaard, in 1627 sighted a large part of the south coast from Cape Leeuwin eastwards. The Gulf of Carpentaria was named, probably by Tasman, after Carpentier, governor of the Dutch Indies, 1623-27. All the early explorers brought back a forbidding report of desolate shores thinly occupied by brutal savages. In 1688 Australia was first seen by British eyes in the person of Dampier, who gives name to an archipelago in the NW. Near a century later (1770) we find Captain Cook at this island-continent, on his course of circumnavigation of the globe, exploring the whole eastern coast from Gipps Land on the SE. (in Victoria) to Cape York; and the exploration of the whole coast of Australia was completed by the Beagle (in which Charles Darwin sailed), 1837–43.

Inland exploration began with the first British occupation of New South Wales in 1788, but for the first twenty-five years was confined inside the Blue Mountains, to a district of some 50 miles inland. In 1813, however, that barrier was passed, and the valley of the Fish River and Bathurst Plains were brought within the limits of civilisation. Two years later (1815) the Lachlan River (tributary of the Murrumbidgee) was lighted on. Important later explorations were those of Hume and Sturt (1819–28), Mitchell (1835), Eyre (1839–40), Sturt (1844–45), Leichardt (1843–46), M'Donall Stuart (1862, across the continent from south to north), Burke and Wills (disastrous, same date), Gregory (1861), Jardine (1864). Later still, using the trans-continental telegraph of 1872 as a basis, were the expeditions of Giles, Warburton, and Forrest; and those of Hodgkinson, Giles, Favenc, Hann, Crawford, Stockdale, Carrington, Lindsay, Tenison-Woods, Milman, and Tietkins. These expeditions seem to demonstrate that much of the interior of Australia, between the west of the overland telegraph line and the east of the narrow hilly border of Western Australia, is little better than desert—unmitigated sand, dense scrub, or porcupine grass. A considerable area in the east of Western Australia is yet unexplored; as also are the adjoining parts of the Northern Territory of the Commonwealth of Australia and the interior of Cape York Peninsula.

The first European settlement in Australia was made in 1788 at Botany Bay under Captain Phillip, but was almost immediately transferred to the adjoining Port Jackson, close to where Sydney now is; it comprised in all 1030 persons, of whom 757 were convicts. In 1825 Moreton Bay (now Queensland) was settled as a part of New South Wales, attaining in December 1859 the position of a separate colony. The settlement of Western Australia (the Swan River Settlement, as it was then called) dates from 1829. It continued to be a penal settlement from 1851 to 1868. Port Phillip (now Victoria), then a part of New South Wales, was first colonised in 1835, and on 1st July 1851 was constituted an independent colony. The colonisation of South Australia by British emigrants dates from 1836.

Especially after the discovery of gold in 1851, Australia advanced in all departments of material well-being at a rate surpassing that of any other country on the globe. In 1801 the settlement at and about Sydney had increased to 5547 persons; in 1835 the European settlers of Australia (including Tasmania) amounted to 80,000. By 1851 the population had risen to 350,000. The discovery in that year of the gold-fields caused a sudden and enormous inrush of immigrants from all parts of the world; now Australia alone has over 4,455,000, and Australasia 5,500,000. The population is, of course, almost all of European origin, the predominating element being British. The British-born are no longer the most numerous element in the colonial populations, the native-born being now over three-fourths. Chinese and Germans number about 30,000 and 38,500 respectively; there are some Polynesians ('Kanakas') in Queensland; not to speak of Scandinavians, Americans, and French. The largest cities are Melbourne, capital of Victoria; Sydney, of New South Wales; Adelaide, of South Australia; Brisbane, of Queensland. The federal capital, Canberra, was founded in 1912.

The Commonwealth of Australia, comprising the five Australian 'states' (heretofore colonies) and Tasmania, was sanctioned by the British Parliament on July 9, 1900, and proclaimed in Sydney on January 1, 1901. The Executive is vested in the Governor-general (representing the sovereign), assisted by an Executive Council of seven ministers of state, who must be members of the Federal Parliament. The Legislature consists of the Governor-general, a Senate, and a House of Representatives. The Senate, corresponding to the House of Lords in Britain, has 36 members (6 from each state) elected for six years, half of them being renewed every three years; in certain circumstances it may be dissolved by the Governor-general and entirely re-elected. The House of Representatives, corresponding to the British House of Commons, has 75 members elected for three years, and apportioned among the separate states according to population—New South Wales sending 27; Victoria, 22; Queensland, 9; South Australia, 7; Western Australia, 5; and Tasmania, 5. Members of both Houses receive £300 per annum.

The Federal Parliament legislates on all matters affecting the Commonwealth as a whole, such as commerce, railways, shipping, finance, defence, postal and telegraph services, emigration, &c., leaving more local matters to be dealt with by the state parliaments. Each state has a governor (appointed by the Crown), a Legislative Council, and Legislative Assembly.

There is no state church in Australia. In respect of numbers, Episcopacy is the dominant form of religion, Roman Catholics come second, Presbyterians third, and Methodists fourth. Education has of late been rapidly diffusing itself. In all the states education is free and compulsory, or the primary schools are all so liberally endowed by the government as to place elementary instruction within the reach of all classes; while libraries, museums, botanical gardens, schools of art, mechanics' institutes, &c., are multiplying in all the states under the liberal patronage of the several governments. There are universities in every state, and several have also well-equipped astronomical observatories.

Literary enterprise in Australia is mainly absorbed in journalism. The current book literature is of course mainly that of the old country; and of the literature produced in Australia, by far the greater part is still the work of men born and bred in Britain. James Brunton Stephens, Adam Lindsay Gordon, Marcus Clarke, and 'Rolfe Boldrewood' (Thomas Alexander Browne) were not Australian-born. In literature proper, apart from these, there are but few outstanding names—those of Henry Kendall and Mrs Campbell Praed being perhaps the best known, with those of the Sydney Bulletin school—John Farrell, A. B. Paterson, Edward Dyson, and Henry Lawson. Australian painters were beginning to attract notice early in the 20th century.

The chief and most general staple produce of Australia, for which the country is peculiarly adapted, and which constitutes its largest export, is wool. Over all the highlands and the riverlands of the sea-border—wherever, in fact, there is water—sheep thrive remarkably, except perhaps within the tropics, and the wool is of the finest quality, realising the highest prices in the English market. The exports of wool from Australia have an annual value of from £16,000,000 to £28,000,000. The cereals of Europe and maize have been introduced into the island-continent with the happiest success. Dairying is a prosperous industry. The vine is extensively cultivated. Sugar is a very important product of Queensland; tobacco, cotton, arrowroot, and bananas are also largely grown.

The trade of Australia exhibits a remarkable development. The imports have risen from £35,557,716 in 1874, to £60,014,351 in 1910; the exports in the same period from £36,724,866 to £74,491,150. The exports consist principally of wool, frozen meat, preserved meat, butter, skins of all kinds, hides, wheat, cotton, sugar, and wine. A few years ago Australia was adversely affected by the wave of economic depression that spread over the whole civilised world; and this was made worse by the results of a severe drought. But since then has come a great revival of prosperity, one proof of which is a value of trade per inhabitant that is among the highest of all countries. And though the various states are burdened by a considerable debt, yet the bulk of it has been incurred for remunerative properties, such as the government railways. There is free trade between the different states, only the Commonwealth having power to impose customs and excise duties. A general tariff is levied on imports, preference being given to British products.

A system of compulsory military training has been established; and the Commonwealth is providing a 'fleet unit' to act in conjunction with the British navy.

Since 1870, railways and telegraphs have been increasing rapidly; there is railway connection from Adelaide, viâ Melbourne and Sydney, to Brisbane. Kalgoorlie is to be soon connected with Adelaide; and there are shorter lines in the several colonies. In June 1911 the railway lines of the Commonwealth already working measured 18,000 miles, and 2600 miles were in course of construction. Telegraphically, the states are now all linked together with New Zealand, and with the mother-country viâ Java and India and viâ Canada.

Manufactures suitable to the country are rapidly developing. Magnificent lines of steamers maintain frequent communication with Europe and America, between the various states, and with the Fiji Islands and New Caledonia. Mails have been delivered in Adelaide in twenty-nine days from London viâ Brindisi, and the sea-passage between Adelaide and Plymouth may be covered in about thirty-five days. Mails have been delivered at King George's Sound in less than twenty-four days from London. The length of the voyage in sailing-ships ranges generally from seventy to one hundred days.

The following are some of the statistics of the Australian states, as shown in the official tables for the census year 1911:

Austria, the usual name of the great empire now officially called the AUSTRO-HUNGARIAN MONARCHY, is a Latinised form of the German Oesterreich (Fr. Autriche), meaning 'Eastern Kingdom.' Since 1867, the empire is composed of a union of two states under one emperor, but administratively distinct. The one is Austria, or Cisleithania ('on this side the Leitha,' a tributary of the Danube on the frontiers of the archduchy of Austria and Hungary); the other, Hungary and the lands of the Hungarian crown, or Transleithania. The Austrian dominions form geographically a compact territory. The total area, 260,224 sq. m., is greater than that of any other European state save Russia, and more than twice the area of the United Kingdom. The body of the monarchy lies in the interior of Europe, though it has about 500 miles of sea-coast on the Adriatic. Austria-Hungary borders on Italy, Switzerland, Bavaria, Saxony, Prussia, Russia, Roumania, Servia, and Montenegro. The formerly Turkish provinces of Bosnia and Herzegovina, occupied and administered by Austria-Hungary in accordance with the Treaty of Berlin (1878), were finally annexed in 1908, when the sanjak of Novibazar was evacuated. The following table shows the area and population of the monarchy at the censuses of 1880 and 1910:

In 1910 Vienna had a pop. of 2,031,498; and there were in the monarchy eight other towns above 100,000 (Budapest, Trieste, Prague, Lemberg, Gratz, Cracow, Brün, Szegedin), and twenty-two others above 50,000.

Three-fourths of Austria is mountainous or hilly, being traversed by three great mountain-chains—the Alps, Carpathians, and Sudetes, whose chief ridges are of primitive rock. The Rhætian and Noric Alps stretch from Switzerland to the Danube, and contain the highest points of the Austrian territories, the Ortler Spitze rising to 12,814 feet. The Carpathian Chain, extending for 880 miles, rises on the left bank of the Danube, near Presburg, and sweeping in a curve, first east, and then southward through Transylvania, again meets the Danube; it culminates at 8517 feet. The Sudetes run through the north-east of Moravia and Bohemia, in which last the range is known as the Riesengebirge, or Giant Mountains. Continuous with this range, but beginning on the left bank of the Elbe, are the Erzgebirge, or Ore Mountains, on the confines of Saxony. The chief plains of the Austrian empire are the vast lowlands of Hungary and the plain of Galicia. The chief lakes are Lake Balaton (382 sq. m.) and the Neusiedler See (117), both in Hungary; and remarkable is also the Zirknitz Lake (q.v.) in Illyria.

The leading rivers are: the Danube, which has a course of 850 miles within the Austrian dominions, its navigable affluents being the Inn, Save, Drave, March, Waag, and the Theiss, which drains nearly half of Hungary; the Vistula, with its tributary the Bug; the Elbe, with the Moldau and Eger; the Dniester and Adige.

The climate of Austria varies much on account of the extent and diversity of the surface. In the warmest southern region between 42°–46° lat., rice, olives, oranges, and lemons ripen in the better localities; and wine and maize are produced everywhere. In the middle temperate region from 46°–49°, which has the greatest extent and diversity of surface, wine and maize still thrive to perfection. In the northern region, beyond 49°, except in favoured spots, neither wine nor maize succeeds; but grain, fruit, flax, and hemp thrive excellently.

The mineral wealth of Austria is not surpassed in any European country. Bohemia, Hungary, Styria, Carinthia, Salzburg, and Tyrol take the first place in respect of mineral produce. Except platinum, none of the useful metals is wanting. The value of their yearly produce is estimated at about £13,000,000. Of this sum coal yields about a half, iron a fifth, salt a tenth, and gold and silver together one-fourteenth; whilst copper, zinc, quicksilver, lead, tin, and many other metals, together with precious stones, marble, gypsum, &c., are plentiful. Rock-salt exists in immense beds on both sides of the Carpathians, chiefly at Wieliczka (q.v.), and also in the Salzkammergut region. There are vast deposits of coal in the monarchy, the richest in Moravia and Bohemia; and petroleum abounds in Galicia. Austria-Hungary has some 1600 mineral springs, some of them of European reputation, as the sulphur baths of Baden in Lower Austria, the saline waters of Karlsbad, Marienbad, Franzensbad, Teplitz, &c., all in Bohemia.

Although three-fourths of the surface is mountainous, more than five-sixths is productive, being used either for tillage, meadows, pasture, or forest. Grain of all kinds is cultivated; rice grows in the Banat; potatoes are raised everywhere; fruit grows in profusion; for wine, Austria is second only to France; and other vegetable products are flax and hemp, tobacco, rape-seed. Nearly a third of the productive surface is covered with wood.

Bohemia takes the lead in manufacturing industry, then follow Austria Proper, Moravia and Silesia, and Hungary. Vienna is the chief seat of manufacture for articles of luxury; Moravia, Silesia, and Bohemia for linen, woollen, and glass wares; Styria and Carinthia, for iron and steel wares. The chief manufactured articles of export are those of silk and wool; the only others of consequence are linen twist, glass wares, and cotton goods. The yearly value of manufactured iron is considerable. The glass wares of Bohemia are of special excellence. The manufactures of cotton, of silk, of hemp and flax, are very extensive. The manufacture of tobacco is a state monopoly. Austria is not favourably situated for foreign commerce. High mountains oppose great obstacles on all hands to communication, and separate the producing districts from the only sea that touches the empire; while the chief navigable rivers have their mouths in other countries. The total imports vary in value from £99,000,000 to £120,000,000 a year, some of the principal items being cotton, wool, woollen yarn, cotton yarn, coffee, silk, coal and coke, machinery, furs and hides, tobacco. The exports have an annual value of from £94,000,000 to £103,000,000, half being for agricultural products—grain, sugar, cattle, flour, eggs, feathers, &c.; also timber, minerals, wood-wares.

Nearly two-thirds of the whole commerce of the empire is carried on with Germany. Its next best markets are Roumania, Russia, Italy, and Servia. The direct trade with Great Britain is comparatively small; the Board of Trade returns recognising only the trade by way of the seaboard. Between 1891 and 1909 the exports from Austria-Hungary to Great Britain varied from £1,100,000 to £2,544,000; and the goods imported direct from Great Britain from £1,600,000 to £5,400,000. The length of railways is about 35,000 miles—about a half belonging to state lines.

There are three distinct budgets, one for the whole monarchy, another for Austria Proper, and a third for the kingdom of Hungary. Besides their share of the interest on the national debt, Austria pays a larger and Hungary a smaller sum towards the 'common expenditure of the monarchy;' the precise proportions—to be settled every ten years—have of late been fiercely disputed by the Hungarians; but the agreement was renewed in 1907 for ten years; Austria's proportion being 63·6 to Hungary's 36·4. The budget estimates for the general expenses for the year 1911 showed a total of £19,000,000.—The accounts of Austria Proper generally show large deficits. In 1911 the estimates balanced at £117,430,000, impending loans being placed to the credit of revenue. In 1911 the general debt of the monarchy was £488,119,570, and the special debt of Austria £287,981,904. For Hungary in 1911 the revenue and expenditure balanced at about £70,000,000; the debt (largely for railways) was about £200,000,000. Hungary also pays over £4,000,000 annually to the common expenditure of the monarchy.

The population is very unequally distributed. The most populous districts are those of the south-west and of the north-west. The Alpine regions and those of the Carpathians are sparsest; and generally the density diminishes towards the east. The population of Austria embraces a greater number of races, distinct in origin and language, than that of any other European country except Russia. The Slavs are the most numerous race, amounting to nearly 50 per cent. of the whole population. They form the bulk of the population of Bohemia, Moravia, Carniola, Dalmatia, Croatia, Slavonia, the Woiwodina, the north of Hungary, Galicia, and Bosnia-Herzegovina. They are split up into a number of peoples or tribes, differing greatly in language, religion, culture, and manners; so that their seeming preponderance in the monarchy is thus lost. The chief branches of the Slavic stem are, in the north, the Czechs or Bohemians (the most numerous of all), Ruthenians, and Poles; and in the south, the Slovenians, Croats, Serbs, and Bulgarians. The Germans number nearly 25 per cent., dispersed everywhere, but mainly in the western parts of the monarchy. The Romance peoples (speaking languages derived from that of ancient Rome) amount to fully 8 per cent., and are divided into western and eastern. The western consist of Italians, inhabiting the south of Tyrol, Istria, and Dalmatia; the Ladins (Latins), in some valleys of Tyrol; and the Friulians about Görz, north of Trieste. The eastern Romance people are the Roumanians, who are found in Transylvania, Hungary, the Woiwodina, and the Bukowina. The Magyars, or Hungarians proper, number about 20 per cent.: they are located chiefly in Hungary and Transylvania. The small remaining portion is composed chiefly of Jews, Armenians, and Gypsies. The principal languages are German, Hungarian, and Bohemian; but Polish, Ruthenian, and Croat languages are also spoken.

In 1910 there were 34,000,000 Roman Catholics; 5,500,000 Greeks and Armenians united with the Roman Church; 4,500,000 Orthodox Greeks; 1,800,000 Lutherans; 2,800,000 Calvinists; and 2,260,000 Jews. There are nearly 300 abbeys and above 500 convents in the empire.

Education, whether high or low, is mostly gratuitous. The primary schools in Austria are to a very large extent in the hands of the clergy. The law enforces compulsory attendance at the 'Volks-schulen,' or national schools, of all children between the ages of six and twelve. There is a very great difference between the German provinces and the Slavonic ones in respect of education. In Vorarlberg 82 per cent. of the inhabitants read and write; in Bukowina not quite 10 per cent. There are eleven universities in the empire, at Vienna, Prague, Grätz, Brünn, Innsbruck, Pesth (Budapest), Cracow, Klausenburg, Lemberg, and Czernowitz. Vienna, Grätz, and Innsbruck rank as German universities; Prague has since 1880 a Bohemian and a German university. There are in the whole monarchy over 4000 newspapers and other periodicals (about 380 newspapers), of which nearly half are in German.

Military service is compulsory on all citizens capable of bearing arms. The term of service is twelve years—three in the standing army, seven in the reserve, and two in the landwehr. The army has on a peace footing 396,000 men, and on a war footing 3,500,000. The navy comprises 12 battleships, 9 cruisers, 7 torpedo gunboats, 12 destroyers, 73 torpedo boats, 6 submarines—manned by about 17,000 men, raised to 34,000 in time of war.

Austria is a monarchy hereditary in the House of Hapsburg-Lorraine. In the case of the reigning family dying out, the states of Bohemia and of Hungary have the right of choosing a new king. Since the year 1867 Austria has been reconstructed as a dual monarchy, consisting of a German or 'Cisleithan' empire, and a Magyar or 'Transleithan' kingdom. Each of the two countries has its own laws, parliament, ministers, and government, and deals with the affairs exclusively relating to itself. The ministers for affairs common to the whole monarchy (foreign affairs, finance, army) are not responsible to either parliament, but to the Delegations—a body forming a connecting link between the two portions of the monarchy. These constitute a parliament of 120 members: one-half is chosen by the legislature of Cisleithan Austria, and the other half represents Hungary. The person of the sovereign is another link between the two members of the monarchy.

The Austrian Reichsrath consists of an upper and a lower house. The upper house is composed of the princes of the imperial family who are of age, of upwards of 70 nobles, 10 archbishops, 8 bishops, and 165 life-members nominated by the emperor. The lower house numbers 516 elected members. The executive of Hungary is carried on in the name of 'the king' by a responsible ministry.

The empire of Austria arose from the smallest beginnings at the end of the 8th century. In 796 a Margraviate, called the Eastern Mark (i.e. 'March' or frontier-land), was founded as an outpost of the empire of Charlemagne, in the country between the Enns and the Raab. The name Oesterreich appears first in 996. In 1156 the mark was raised to a duchy; and after coming into the possession of the House of Hapsburg in 1282, it rapidly rose to be a powerful state. The princes of that House extended their dominion by marriage, by purchase, and otherwise, over a number of other states, including the crowns of Bohemia and Hungary; and from 1438 down to the 19th century, they held almost without interruption the throne of the German empire (nominally 'the Holy Roman Empire')—the emperor being the most conspicuous, if not always the most powerful personage amongst the crowned heads of Europe. In 1804 Francis declared himself hereditary Emperor of Austria, and two years afterwards resigned the dignities of German Emperor and King of the Romans. Thenceforward, especially during the troublous times of 1848–50, Austria held the pre-eminence amongst German states; but after the victory of Prussia at Königgrätz (Sadowa), in the short but decisive Austro-Prussian war of 1866, Austria was excluded from Germany—an exclusion made final by the reconstruction of the German empire with the kings of Prussia as hereditary German emperors. In 1867 Austria was itself reconstituted on its present footing as the Austro-Hungarian monarchy.

See Coxe, History of the House of Austria (3 vols. 1847–53; continued by Kelley, 1853); Léger, Histoire de l'Autriche-Hongrie (1879); Sidney Whitman, The Realm of the Habsburgs (1893); and Colquhoun, The Whirlpool of Europe (1907).

Austria, ARCHDUCHY OF, the nucleus of the Austrian empire, lies on both sides of the Danube, from the mouth of the Inn to the borders of Hungary, and embraces an area of 18,052 sq. m., with a population of 4,600,000. It now forms three of the crown-lands of the empire—viz. Lower and Upper Austria (i.e. Austria below, and Austria above, the Enns), and the duchy of Salzburg.

Auteuil (O-tuh'yee^{l}), formerly a country village at the entrance of the Bois de Boulogne, now enclosed within the fortifications of Paris. It was the residence of Boileau and Molière.

Autun (O-tun^{g}; anc. Augustodunum), in the French dep. of Saône-et-Loire, in the Burgundian district of Autunois, on the river Arroux, 31 miles NW. of Châlon by rail. It has a fine cathedral (12th century), and many ruins of Roman temples, gates, triumphal arches, and other antiquities. Cloth, carpets, and velvet are manufactured. Talleyrand was bishop of the diocese, and here Macmahon was born. Pop. 14,000.

Auvergne, a southern central district of France, was before the Revolution a separate province, and coincided nearly with the modern departments of Cantal and Puy-de-Dôme. Of several summits that have apparently been at one time volcanoes, the highest is Mont-Dore (6188 feet). Auvergne produces iron, lead, copper, and coal, and is rich in valuable mineral springs, both cold and hot. Many Auvergnats, speaking their own patois, seek employment in Paris and Belgium.

Auxerre (O-zerr'; anc. Autissiodorum), chief town of the French dep. of Yonne, on the Yonne, 109 miles SE. of Paris. Its noble Gothic cathedral dates from 1215, but was not completed till the 16th century. The principal manufactures are wine (a light Burgundy), candles, chemicals, and hosiery. Pop. 16,300.

Auxonne (O-zonn'), a fortified town in the French dep. of Côte d'Or, on the Saône, 20 miles SE. of Dijon. Pop. 3000.

Ava, a ruined city of Burma, of which it was the capital 1364–1740, and again 1822–38. It stands on the Irawadi, 6 miles SW. of Amarapura. On the opposite bank stands Sagaing (q.v).

Avallon (anc. Aballo), a town in the French dep. of Yonne, 26 miles SE. of Auxerre, on a steep hill of red granite, nearly surrounded by the river Cousin. Pop. 6000.

Avalon, a peninsula forming the eastern part of Newfoundland (q.v.), in which St John's, the capital, is situated.

Avatcha, a bay on the east coast of Kamchatka, by far the best harbour of the peninsula, and containing the smaller bay on which stands the capital, Petropaulovsk (q.v.).

Avebury, or ABURY, a village of Wiltshire, 6½ miles W. of Marlborough. It is the site of the largest megalithic structure in Britain, including a large outer circle, 330 yards in diameter, and two smaller stone circles. The stones that remain are 5 to 20 feet in height above the ground, and 3 to 12 in breadth and thickness. From an entrance to the circle issued the 'Kennet Avenue,' running 1430 yards south-eastward in a perfectly straight line, and 17 yards broad, with a range of blocks on either side similar to those of the circle itself. Of surrounding antiquities may be mentioned a double circle on Hakpen Hill, and a large barrow, or lofty conical mound called Silbury Hill, ¾ mile to the S. It measures 676 yards in circumference, and is 130 feet high.

Aveiro, a town of Portugal, a bishop's see, 40 miles S. of Oporto by rail, on a salt lake or lagoon joined to the sea by a canal. Pop. 10,000.

Avelli'no (anc. Abellinum), chief town of an Italian province at the foot of Monte Vergine, 59 miles E. of Naples by rail. It has a cathedral. Pop. 16,000.

Aventine Hill. See ROME.

Aver'nus (Gr. Aornos, 'birdless;' now Lago d'Averno), a small, nearly circular lake in Campania, Italy, situated between Cumæ, Puteoli, and Baiæ. It is 1½ mile in circumference, and occupies the crater of an extinct volcano. The mephitic vapours arising from it were believed in ancient times to kill the birds that flew over it; hence, according to some, its Greek appellation. Owing to its gloomy and awful aspect, it became the centre of almost all the fables of the ancients respecting the world of shades. Here were located Homer's entrance to the under world, the Elysian fields, the grove of Hecate, and the grotto of the Cumean Sibyl.

Aversa, a town of Italy, 12½ miles by rail N. of Naples. Pop. 24,000.

Avesnes (A-vehn'), a town in the French dep. of Nord, 13 miles E. by rail of Cambrai. Pop. 6000.

Aveyron, a mountainous dep. in the south of France, named from the river which runs 90 miles westward through it to the Tarn, a feeder of the Garonne. Area, 3376 sq. m.; population, 369,000. The capital is Rodez, Avezza'no, a town of South Italy, 22 miles S. of Aquila. Pop. 8000.

Aviglia'no, a town of South Italy, 10 miles NW. of Potenza. Pop. 14,000.

Avignon (Avenio), a city of Provence, capital of the French dep. of Vaucluse, on the left bank of the Rhône, 75 miles NW. of Marseilles. With narrow, crooked streets, 'windy Avignon' still is encircled by lofty crenellated walls (1349–68), except on the north side, where the Rocher des Doms rises steeply from the Rhône to a height of 200 feet. Here is the cathedral, dating from the 11th century, with its papal throne; whilst hard by towers the vast palace of the popes (1339–64). The multitude of churches and convents made Rabelais call Avignon la ville sonnante, 'the city of bells;' and churches there still are in plenty, though that of the Cordeliers, with the tomb of Petrarch's Laura, was demolished in 1791. Near the hôtel-de-ville (1862) are the quaint old Jacquemart belfry and a statue of Crillon, Henry IV.'s brave captain; Petrarch's statue (1874) may also be noticed. The university (1303) was abolished in 1794. Avignon has manufactures of paper, leather, silk, iron, &c. Pop. (recovering) now about 50,000. Avignon was the capital of the ancient Cavares, and presents many remains of the times of the Romans. In the middle ages it formed, with the surrounding district, a county, which the popes bought in 1348. They held it till 1790, when the city with its district was united with France. Pope Clement V. and six of his successors from 1309 to 1378 resided here, as also did the French antipopes (1378–1418). A little cottage was long the loved retreat of John Stuart Mill, the place where he died in 1873.

Av'ila, capital of a Spanish province of Avila, in Old Castile, stands 3000 feet above the sea, at the base of the Sierra de Guadarrama, 71 miles NW. of Madrid by rail. It has a fine Gothic cathedral, a Moorish castle, and massive granite walls 42 feet high and 14 broad, with 86 towers and 10 gateways. Its university (1482) was reduced to a college in 1807. Pop. 12,000. Here St Teresa was born. The province is mountainous. Area, 3000 sq. m.; pop. 209,000.

Aviles (anc. Flavignavia), a seaport of Spain, close to the Bay of Biscay, 19 miles N. of Oviedo. Pop. 13,000.

Avlona (Ital. Valona, anc. Aulon), the best seaport in Albania, stands on an eminence near an inlet of the Adriatic, protected by the island of Sasseno (anc. Saso). It carries on considerable trade with Brindisi, &c. Pop. 6000. Valonia, imported hence to England for tanning, is the acorn-cup of a kind of oak. Up to 1691 the town belonged to the Venetians.

Avo'ca, or OVOCA (Celt. 'meeting of the waters'), a small river of County Wicklow, formed by the union of the Avonmore and Avonbeg. It runs through a very picturesque vale only ¼ mile broad, with wooded banks 300 to 500 feet high, and after a course of 9 miles reaches the sea at Arklow. See AVONDALE.

Av'ola (Abolla), a seaport of Sicily, 13 miles SW. of Syracuse. The famous honey of Hybla comes from this neighbourhood. Pop. 16,000.

Avon (Celt. 'river' or 'stream'), the name of several of the smaller British rivers. (1) The Upper or Warwickshire Avon rises at Naseby in Northamptonshire, runs 96 miles south-west through Warwickshire and Worcestershire, passing Rugby, Warwick, Stratford, and Evesham and joins the Severn at Tewkesbury. It receives several tributaries, including the Swift from Lutterworth.—(2) The Lower or Bristol Avon rises in north-west Wiltshire, and runs 70 miles, first south in Wiltshire, and then west and north-west between Gloucestershire and Somerset, passing Bradford, Bath, and Bristol, to the Bristol Channel. It is navigable for large vessels up to Bristol.—(3) The Wiltshire and Hampshire or East Avon rises in the middle of Wiltshire, and runs south 70 miles through Wiltshire and Hampshire, passing Amesbury, Salisbury, and Ringwood, and entering the English Channel at Christchurch. It is navigable up to Salisbury. In Wales, two rivers named Avon—one rising in Monmouthshire, the other in Glamorganshire—fall into Swansea Bay. In Scotland there are several Avons, affluents of the Spey, Clyde, and Forth, the first flowing from Loch Avon (see A'AN), overlooked by Ben Avon (3843 feet).

Avondale, the Wicklow seat of C. S. Parnell, on the Avonmore, 1 mile S. of Rathdrum.

Avonmouth, in Gloucestershire, at the mouth of the Avon, 6 miles NW. of Bristol, has a pier and extensive docks constructed in 1880–84, and a larger dock opened in 1908.

Avranches (Av-ron^g^sh'), a French town in the dep. of Manche, on the left bank of the Sée, near its mouth in St Michel's Bay, 37 miles E. of St Malo by rail. Till 1801 a bishop's seat, its former cathedral was built in the 18th century on the site of a cathedral consecrated in 1121, in which Henry II. received absolution for Becket's murder. Pop. 8000.

Awbeg, a river of Cork, flowing 30 miles to the Blackwater.

Awe, LOCH, an Argyllshire lake, with Loch Awe station and hotel near its foot, 22 miles E. of Oban. Lying 118 feet above sea-level, it extends 22¾ miles north-eastward, is from 3 furlongs to 3½ miles broad, covers 15½ sq. m., and has a maximum depth of 102 feet. The scenery is most striking at the north-east end—originally the head—of the lake, where the water is studded with numerous wooded islets, overshadowed by towering and rugged mountains, the chief Ben Cruachan (3689 feet). On a rocky peninsula, in the north end of the lake, stands Kilchurn Castle, once a fortress of great strength, built about 1440 by Sir Colin Campbell of Glenorchy. The waters of the lake are carried off at its north-west end by the brawling river Awe, which, after a course of 5 miles, enters Loch Etive at Bunawe. The magnificent 'Pass of Brander,' through which the road and railway run beneath the shoulder of Ben Cruachan, was the scene of a conflict in 1308 between Robert the Bruce and the Macdougals of Lorn, in which that clan was all but exterminated. In 1912 Inverliver estate was bought by government for forestry demonstrations.

Ax, a town in the French dep. of Ariège, at the foot of the Pyrenees, 74 miles SSE. of Toulouse. Pop. 1500. Its 80 hot sulphur-springs range in temperature from 77° to 172° F.

Axbridge, a Somerset village, 10 miles NW. of Wells. Pop. of parish, 1000.

Axe, two rivers of Somerset and of Dorset and Devon, flowing the one 25 miles to the Bristol Channel, the other 21 to the English Channel.

Axholme, ISLE OF, a low level tract of North-west Lincolnshire, cut off by the Trent from the rest of the county. Measuring 18 by 5 miles, it was anciently a forest, and then a marsh, which was drained into the Trent in 1625 and succeeding years by Cornelius Vermuyden, a Dutchman, at a cost of £56,000. Epworth here was the home of the Wesleys.

Axim, an important station and port on the Gold Coast, a little E. of the mouth of the Ancobrah River.

Ax′minster, a town of Devonshire, on the Axe, 27 miles E. of Exeter by rail. From 1755 till 1835 Axminster was famous for the manufacture of Turkey and Persian carpets. Dr Buckland was a native. Pop. of parish, 3000. See Pulman's Book of the Axe (1875).

Axmouth, a Devon fishing village, 6 miles SSW. of Axminster. Pop. 600.

Axum, once capital of an Ethiopian kingdom, is now in the modern Abyssinian province of Tigré, and lies mainly in ruins. Pop. 5000. See a monograph on it by J. T. Bent (1893).

Ayacu′cho (formerly Huamanga or Guamanga), a town of Peru, 220 miles ESE. of Lima. Founded by Pizarro in 1539, it is now a handsome and thriving town. Here, on 9th December 1824, the combined forces of Peru and Colombia totally defeated the last Spanish army that ever set foot on the continent. Pop. 14,000.—The dep. of Ayacucho has an area of about 20,000 sq. m., and a pop. of upwards of 300,000.

Ayamon′té, a fortified town in the Spanish province of Huelva, Andalusia, on the Guadiana, near its mouth. Pop. 7000.

Ayasaluk, a village on the site of the ancient Ephesus (q.v.).

Aylesbury, the chief town of Buckinghamshire, in a fertile vale, on a rivulet flowing to the Tame, 43½ miles NW. of London. Among its buildings are the cruciform parish church, finely restored by Sir G. G. Scott (1849–67), the corn exchange and markets (1865), and the county infirmary (1862). The inhabitants prepare straw-plait, condensed milk, and dairy-produce, and rear fat ducks. Aylesbury was taken from the Britons by the Saxons in 571. Till 1885 it formed with its hundred a parliamentary borough, returning two members. There is a women's prison with a girls' Borstal institute. Pop. 11,000.

Aylesford, a village near the centre of Kent, on the right bank of the Medway, 3½ miles NW. of Maidstone. Remarkable ancient remains are found here, including the dolmen called Kits Coity House (q.v.). Pop. of parish, 2600.

Ayr, the county town of Ayrshire, at the mouth of the river Ayr, 40½ miles SSW. of Glasgow by rail. The Town's Buildings, with a spire 226 feet high, were erected in 1828, and rebuilt in 1901–2. The so-called 'Wallace Tower' is a Gothic edifice of 1834, 113 feet high. There are also the County Buildings, modelled after the temple of Isis in Rome, the Academy (representing a school extant in 1233; reconstituted 1794–98; new building, 1880), and the Carnegie library (1893). Four bridges span the river, and connect Ayr proper with Newton-upon-Ayr and Wallacetown. Of the 'Twa Brigs' of Burns the narrow four-arched 'Auld Brig' (restored 1907–10) dates probably from the end of the 15th century, and the 'New Brig' (1788) was rebuilt in 1879. There are statues of General Smith Neill, the thirteenth Earl of Eglinton, and Burns. In the 12th century church of St John was held Robert Bruce's parliament of 1315. It was turned into a fort by Cromwell, and the lower part of its tower was long a villa, acquired in 1913 by the Marquis of Bute, to save it from the speculative builder. Harbour improvements, including a wet dock and slip dock, have been carried out since 1874 at a cost of over £150,000. The chief export is coal; grain and timber are imported; and there are manufactures of lace and woollen fabrics, carpets, large sawmills, &c. A splendid new water-supply, drawn from Loch Finlas, 20 miles distant, was introduced in 1887. William the Lion made Ayr a royal burgh about 1200; and it unites with Campbeltown, Irvine, Inveraray, and Oban in sending a member to parliament. Pop. (1841) 15,749; (1861) 18,573; (1901) 28,697; (1911) 32,986.

Ayrshire, a large maritime county in the SW. of Scotland, washed on the W. by the Firth of Clyde and the North Channel. Its greatest length is 78 miles; its greatest breadth, 28; and its area is 1132 sq. m., it being seventh in size of the Scottish counties. The general aspect of the county is undulating; Shalloch on Minnoch (2520 feet) in the S. is the highest summit; Loch Doon (5⅜ × ¾ mile) is much the largest of several fresh-water lakes; and the chief rivers—only 20 to 38 miles long—are the Ayr, the 'bonny' Doon, the Garnock, the Irvine, the Girvan, and the Stinchar in the south, with the first 16 miles of the Nith. Ayrshire is rich in valuable minerals, especially coal, ironstone, limestone, and freestone. The three ancient divisions of the county are—Carrick, south of the Doon, mostly wild and hilly; Kyle, between the Doon and the Irvine, containing much rich level land; and Cunninghame, comprising all the country north of the Irvine, mostly fertile. The percentage of cultivated area is 43·2. Dairy-husbandry is carried to high perfection. The Dunlop cheese, almost as celebrated as Stilton, since 1855 has been almost superseded by Cheddar. Manufactures, especially woollen and cotton, are largely carried on to an important extent. Pop. (1801) 84,207; (1881) 217,504; (1911) 268,337. Ayrshire returns two members to parliament. The chief towns are Ayr, Kilmarnock, Girvan, Maybole, Dalry, Kilwinning, Beith, Irvine, Stewarton, Old Cumnock, Ardrossan, Saltcoats, Troon, Mauchline, Galston, Newmilns, Kilbirnie, and Largs. Of antiquities, the most interesting are the ruins of Crossraguel and Kilwinning Abbeys; of 'Alloway's haunted kirk,' with the 'auld clay biggin,' Burns's birthplace, hard by; and of the castles of Turnberry (the family seat of Bruce), Dunure, Loch Doon, Dean, Dundonald, &c. It contains the battlefields of Largs and Loudon Hill; and during the religious persecutions of the Stuarts, it was a stronghold of the Covenanters. See works by J. Paterson (2 vols. 1847–52), and A. Millar (1885).

Ayton, a Berwickshire village, 7¼ miles NW. of Berwick-upon-Tweed. Pop. 600.

Ayuthia, the former capital of Siam, on the Menam, 50 miles N. of Bangkok. Founded in 1357, it was sacked and half destroyed by the Burmese in 1767. Among its magnificent but ruinous buildings are Buddhist temples, especially the 'Golden Mount,' 400 feet high.

Azamgarh ('Azam's Fort'), a town in the United Provinces of India, on the river Tons, 81 miles N. of Benares. It was founded in 1665 by Azam Khan. Pop. 19,000.

Azerbijan′, or ADERBAIJAN, the ancient Media Atropatene, the north-western province of Persia, has an area of about 40,100 sq. m., and a pop. of 2,000,000. The surface is very mountainous, Savalan (an extinct volcano), near Ardebil, reaching over 13,000 feet; whilst Mount Ararat rises on the north-west border. The chief rivers are the Aras or Araxes, the Kara Su, and the Kizil-Uzen. The salt lake Urmia (q.v.), the largest in Persia, is near the western border. Towns are Tabriz (the capital) and Urmia.

Azincourt. See AGINCOURT.

Azo′res, or WESTERN ISLANDS, a Portuguese archipelago in the mid-Atlantic, in 36° 55′—39° 55′ N. lat. and 25° 10′—31° 16′ W. long. Stretching over a distance of 400 miles, their nine islands are divided into three distinct groups—Sta Maria and São Miguel in the SE.; Terceira, São Jorge, Pico, Graciosa, and Fayal in the middle; and Flores and Corvo in the NW. Of these, Flores lies 1176 miles W. of Cape Rocca in Portugal, 1484 SW. of Falmouth, and 1708 ESE. of Halifax. In 1431-53 the Azores were taken possession of by the Portuguese. They were then uninhabited; but Punic coins have been found on Corvo; and the mediæval Arabian geographers seem to have known the Azores as inhabited islands. The Portuguese called them Azores, from açor or azor, a hawk or kite, found in numbers on the islands. Their total area is 919 sq. m., and the pop. 242,000. The area and the maximum altitude of the different islands are as follows: Sta Maria (38 sq. m.; 1889 feet); São Miguel (299 sq. m.; 3854 feet); Terceira (164 sq. m.; 3435 feet); Graciosa (24 sq. m.); São Jorge (91 sq. m.); Pico (173 sq. m.; 7613 feet); Fayal (69 sq. m.); Flores (54 sq. m.; 3087 feet); Corvo (7 sq. m.). The capital is Angra, in Terceira, with a population of 10,000; but Ponta Delgada, in São Miguel, is a larger town (pop. 18,000). The Azores are of volcanic origin, and with the exception of Corvo, Flores, and Graciosa, are still liable to eruptions and violent earthquakes, the worst of twenty-one shocks since 1444 having been those of 1591, 1638, 1719, and 1841. Hot mineral springs are numerous. The coast is generally steep and rugged; the interior abounds in ravines and mountains. Oranges are the chief article of export. The climate is extremely moist, but equable; and though the islands are exposed to severe storms of wind and rain, some of them are visited as winter health-resorts, especially by Americans. The Azores are regarded as a province, not a colony, of Portugal, and as belonging to Europe. See works by Godman (1870), W. F. Walker (1886), and Roundell (1889).

Azo′tus. See ASHDOD.

Azov, a town in the south of Russia, on the left bank of the Don, 7 miles from its mouth. Spite of the silting of the harbour, there is a large export of grain, with fishing and fish-curing. Pop. 29,000.

Azov, SEA OF, named after the town, is a large gulf of the Black Sea, formed by the Crimean peninsula, or rather an inland lake connected with the Black Sea by the Strait of Yenikale or Kertch (anc. Bosporus Cimmerius), 28 miles long, and barely 4 wide at the narrowest. The intricate Siwash or Putrid Sea, which is just a succession of swamps, is cut off from the western portion of the Sea of Azov by the long narrow slip of low sandy land called the Peninsula of Arabat. The ancient name of the Sea of Azov was Palus Mæotis or ‘Mæotic Marsh;’ by the Turks it is called Balik-Denghis, or ‘Fish Sea,’ from its abundance of fish. The water is almost fresh. The whole sea is shallow, from 3 to 52 feet deep; and measuring 235 by 110 miles, it occupies an area of 14,500 sq. m. The largest river emptying into it is the Don.

Azpeitia (Ath-pay′e-te-a), a town in the Spanish prov. Guipuzcoa, on the Urola, 18 miles SW. of San Sebastian. A mile from it is the famous convent of Loyola (1683), now converted into a museum. It comprises a tower of the Santa Casa, in which St Ignatius of Loyola, the great founder of the Jesuits, was born in 1491. Pop. 7000.

BAALBEK, a ruined city of Syria, 35 miles NNW. of Damascus, and 38 SSE. of Tripoli. The name signifies ‘City of Baal,’ the Sun-god, and was by the Greeks, during the Seleucide dynasty, converted into Heliopolis. Baalbek lies 4500 feet above sea-level, at the opening of a small valley into the plain of El-Bukâ′a (Cœle-Syria), on the lowest slope of Anti-Lebanon. It was once the most magnificent of Syrian cities, full of palaces, fountains, and beautiful monuments; now it is famous only for the splendour of its ruins—the Great Temple, a Corinthian edifice, surmounting a Cyclopean substruction or platform; the Temple of Jupiter, larger than the Parthenon at Athens; and a circular building, supported on six granite columns. From the earliest times a chief seat of sun-worship, Baalbek was completely pillaged by Timur Beg in 1400; and its destruction was completed by a terrible earthquake in 1759. It is now a wretched village, with some few hundred inhabitants. See works by Wood and Dawkins (1757), Renan (1864), and Frauberger (1891).

Baba, CAPE (Gr. Lectum), a bold rocky headland near the western point of Anatolia, 12 miles from the northern extremity of Mitylene. The town of Baba here has a pop. of 4000.

Babatag, or BABADAGH, a town of 7000 inhabitants, in the Roumanian Dobrudja, 2½ miles W. of Lake Razim.

Bab-el-Mandeb (i.e. ‘the gate of tears’), the strait between Arabia and the continent of Africa, by which the Red Sea is connected with the Gulf of Aden and the Indian Ocean. The Arabian peninsula here throws out a cape, bearing the same name as the strait, and 865 feet high, 20 miles distant from which the wall-like coast of Africa rises in Râs es Sean to over 400 feet. Within the straits, but nearer to Arabia, lies the bare rocky island of Perim (q.v.), since 1857 occupied by the British as a fort.

Bablock Hythe, a ferry over the Isis or Thames, 4 miles WSW. of Oxford.

Babylonia (Babilu in the Assyrian inscriptions, Babirush in the Persian) was the name given by the Greeks, and after them the Romans, to the low alluvial plain watered by the lower streams of the Tigris and Euphrates, now forming the modern Arab province of Irak-Arabi. In the Old Testament it bears the various names of Shinar, Babel, and ‘the land of the Chaldees.’ For thousands of years before the Christian era it was the seat of a special type of civilisation; the earliest inhabitants we know of were Sumerians and Akkadians, both probably belonging to the Ugro-Finnic branch of the Turanian races. Subsequently, Semitic tribes settled in the country. After long wars with the neighbouring power, Assyria, Babylonia was conquered in 729 B.C. by the Assyrians, and in 712-705 Babylonia became an Assyrian province. In 625 Nabopolassar rebelled and became an independent king, and was succeeded by his son Nebuchadnezzar. And henceforward Babylonia was a separate state till 538, when it was conquered by Cyrus and became a Persian province. For the site of the city of Babylon, see HILLAH.

Bacchiglione (Bak-keel-yo′nay), a river of N. Italy, rising in the Alps, and flowing 90 miles south-eastward, to the Adriatic near Chioggia.

Bacharach (Bahh′a-rahh), a town of Rhenish Prussia, on the Rhine, 30 miles SE. of Coblenz. Pop. 3000. Its name is said to be a corruption of Bacchi ara ('Bacchus' altar'), and the vine is still largely cultivated. Here Blücher crossed the Rhine, January 1, 1814.

Backergunge. See BAKERGANJ.

Bacolor, a town of the island of Luzon, Philippines, 10 miles NW. from Manila. Pop. 10,000.

Bactria, a province of the ancient Persian empire, lying north of the Paropamisus (Hindu Kush) Mountains, on the Upper Oxus.

Ba′cup, a town of Lancashire, on the Spodden rivulet, 19¼ miles N. by E. of Manchester by rail. Constituted a municipal borough in 1882, it has a mechanics' institute (1846, enlarged 1870), a market-hall (1867), a very large co-operative store that cost £22,000, &c. Cotton-spinning and powerloom-weaving are the staple industries; and there are also dye-works, brass and iron foundries, and neighbouring coal-pits and vast stone quarries. Pop. (1798) 1426; (1871) 17,199; (1881) 25,033; (1891) 23,498; (1911) 22,318.

Badagry, a small British port on the Slave Coast, southern Nigeria, long a great slaving port, with 10,000 inhabitants.

Badajoz (Bad-a-jozz′; Spanish pron. Badh-a-hhoath′), capital of a Spanish province, is built on a slight hill crowned by a Moorish castle, on the Guadiana, crossed here by a stone bridge of 28 arches. It is 5 miles from the Portuguese frontier, 174 miles from Lisbon, and 315 from Madrid by rail. Badajoz is a fortress of the first rank, and has an old cathedral built like a fortress, with a splendid organ. Its chief articles of manufacture are hats, soap, coarse woollens, leather, and pottery. Population, 35,000. Badajoz was the Pax Augusta of the Romans, the Bax Augos, Bathaljus of the Moors. As one of the keys of Portugal, it has often been besieged—twice in vain by the British in 1811, but was stormed by Wellington in 1812, after a most murderous resistance by the French, and delivered up to pillage for two days. The province has an area of 8687 sq. m., and a pop. of 563,000.

Badakhshan′, a territory of Central Asia, lying in 36°—38° N. lat., and 69°—72° E. long., with the chain of the Hindu Kush on the S., and the Oxus, or Amu Darya, on the N. It is drained by the Kokcha, a head-stream of that river, and is famous throughout the East as a picturesque hill-country diversified with woods, rich pasture, and fertile, well-cultivated valleys, its surface varying from 500 to 15,600 feet above sea-level. Faizabad (q.v.) is the capital. The inhabitants, estimated at 100,000, are largely Tajiks, an Aryan race speaking Persian, and Mohammedans.

See Yule's Marco Polo (1871); Wood's Journey to the Source of the Oxus (new ed. 1872); and Vambéry's Central Asia (1874).

Badalona, a Spanish seaport, 5 miles NE. of Barcelona. Pop. 20,000.

Baden (Bâh-den), a grand-duchy in the SW. corner of the German empire between Alsace-Lorraine and Würtemberg, separated from Switzerland by the Rhine. Area, 5824 sq. m., less than Yorkshire; pop. (1910) 2,141,832. mainly Catholics. The Schwarzwald, or Black Forest (q.v.), attains a maximum altitude of 4903 feet. Being drained by the Rhine and the Danube, Baden belongs to the basins of two opposite seas; the sources of the Danube, however, drain only some 350 sq. m. The Rhine's chief tributaries are the Neckar, Murg, and Elz. On the north-east the Baden territories are bounded by the Maine. Except a part of the Lake of Constance, Baden has no lake of importance. The Rhine Valley of Baden is one of the warmest and most fruitful districts, not only of Germany, but of Europe. Grain, vegetables of all sorts, tobacco, hemp, rape, opium, &c. are grown, and a large quantity of wine is produced. The principal minerals are the products of the limestone quarries and of the clay and gravel pits, and gypsum, largely used for pavements. Coal, zinc, and manganese are found, and the production of salt and soda is important. Baden is rich in mineral springs; and there are a great number of much-frequented watering-places, as Baden-Baden, Badenweiler, &c.

The manufactures of Baden include ribbons and cotton fabrics, paper, leather, rubber goods, chemicals, machinery, tobacco, chicory, sugar, beer, trinkets, mirrors, wooden clocks, and straw-plaiting. Karlsruhe is the residence of the sovereign; the capitals of the four 'circles' are Constance, Freiburg, Karlsruhe, and Mannheim; and besides, there are three towns each with a population above 20,000.

Baden, a town and fashionable watering-place in the Swiss canton of Aargau, on the Limmat, 14 miles NW. of Zürich by rail. Its sulphur-baths, the Thermæ Helvetica of the Romans, yearly attract some 20,000 visitors. Their temperature is as high as 117° F. Pop. 8000.

Baden-Baden, a town in the grand-duchy of Baden, situated in the pleasant valley of the Oos, at the edge of the Black Forest, 8 miles from the Rhine, and 23 SSW. of Karlsruhe by rail. Pop. about 22,000; but its visitors during the season (May—September) are often four times the number of the settled population. Its thirteen medicinal springs were known to the Romans. They have a temperature of 115° to 150° F., are impregnated with iron, magnesia, lime, and sulphuric and carbonic acids, and are especially recommended in chronic cutaneous diseases, gout, rheumatism, and stomach complaints. The beauty of Baden-Baden has been largely due to its gaming-tables, once the most renowned in Europe, but closed in 1872; besides paying a rent of over £14,000, they devoted a like sum yearly to the beautifying of the promenades and public gardens. The buildings include the Conversationshaus (1824); the new Trinkhalle, or pump-room (1842); the theatre (1862); the Friedrichsbad (1877); the villa occupied by Queen Victoria in 1872 and 1876; the ruined 'old castle' crowning the Schlossberg; and the 'new castle' (1479), destroyed, like the old, by the French in 1689, but restored, and now the summer residence of the grand-duke.

Baden bei Wien (i.e. 'Baden near Vienna;' Bâh-den bī Veane), a watering-place of Austria, on the Schwechat, 17 miles S. by W. of Vienna by rail. It was the Aquæ Pannonicæ of the Romans, and is still famous for its warm mineral springs, which are visited during the season by upwards of 10,000 persons. They are sulphurous, with much carbonic acid gas, have a temperature of 79° to 104° F., and are good for skin diseases, gout, and rheumatism. Pop. 14,000.

Ba'denoch, a Highland district in the south-east part of Inverness-shire, 45 miles long by 19 broad, bounded by Lochaber, Athole, Braemar, and Moray, and traversed by the Spey.

Badenweiler, a Black Forest watering-place in the SW. corner of Baden, 20 miles NNE. of Basel; frequented yearly by some 5000 visitors.

Badghis, a region north of Herat, comprising the country between the Murghab and the Hari-rud rivers, as far northward as the edge of the desert. It lies just to the south of the boundary line between Afghanistan and the Russian territories, as defined in 1887.

Badminton, the seat of the Duke of Beaufort, in the south of Gloucestershire, 7 miles E. of Yate Junction. It is a stately Palladian edifice of 1682, with a fine park.

Badrinath, a peak of the main Himalayan range, Garhwal district, North-western Provinces, India, 22,901 feet above the sea. A shrine of Vishnu stands on one of its shoulders at a height of 10,400 feet, 56 miles NE. of Srinagar.

Baëna, a Spanish town 25 miles SSE. of Cordova. Pop. 16,000.

Baeza, a town of Spain, in the province of Jaen, 9 miles from Baeza station, this being 160 S. of Madrid. The Roman Beatia, and the seat of Moorish califs, with 150,000 inhabitants, it never fairly recovered from its sack by the Castilians in 1228. Here are a quondam university (1533) and the oratory of St Philip de Neri. Pop. 16,000.

Baffin Bay, a gulf, or rather sea, on the NE. coast of North America, extending between Greenland and the great islands NE. of Hudson Bay (of which Baffin Land is rich in coal and iron, with some gold). It is about 800 miles long, with an average breadth of 280. The shores are lofty and precipitous, backed by snow-clad mountains. Baffin Bay communicates with the Atlantic by Davis Strait; and with the Arctic Ocean by Smith and Lancaster Sounds. Discovered in 1562, it was first explored in 1615 by William Baffin, pilot of Bylot's expedition.

Bagamoyo, a village on the coast of German East Africa, opposite the island of Zanzibar, a frequent starting point of expeditions to the interior.

Bagdad, or BAGHDAD, the capital of a province of Asiatic Turkey, on the Tigris, 500 miles from its mouth. It is surrounded by a brick wall, 5 miles in circumference, and 40 feet high, but in some places broken down, and by a deep dry ditch; the river is spanned by a bridge of boats, 220 yards long, and the communication is guarded by a citadel. There are four gates, the finest of which, bearing date 1220, has remained closed since 1638. Bagdad has an extremely picturesque appearance from the outside, being encircled and interspersed with groves of date-trees, through which one may catch the gleam of domes and minarets; but it does not improve on closer inspection. The bazaars exhibit the produce of both Turkish and European markets; but commerce has greatly decreased since Persia began to trade with Europe by way of Trebizond, or of the Persian Gulf on the south. Nevertheless Bagdad still carries on a considerable traffic with Aleppo and Damascus, and has manufactures of red and yellow leather, silks, and cotton stuffs. Dates, wool, grain, and timbac (a substitute for tobacco) are exported, and a number of horses are sent into India. Of the population, estimated at 200,000, the greatest part are Turks and Arabs. In 1831 an inundation destroyed one-half of the town and several thousand lives. Cholera visits it periodically. The 'Bagdad Railway' is to run from Konieh (see ASIA MINOR), viâ Adana and Bagdad, to the Persian Gulf. Since 1836, British steamers have plied on the Tigris between Bagdad and Basra; and here is one of the chief stations of the Anglo-Indian telegraph.

Bagdad in the 9th century was greatly enlarged by Haroun Al-Raschid, and under his son, Al-Mamûn, it became the great seat of Arabic learning and literature. It was conquered by the sultan, Murad IV., in 1638, and ever since has been under the sway of the Porte. The province of Bagdad, comprising great part of the lower basins of the Euphrates and Tigris, falls into the vilâyets of Bagdad (pop. 900,000), Mosul (500,000), and Basra (600,000).

Bagenalstown, a market-town on the Barrow, in the county, and 10 miles S. of the town of Carlow. Pop. 1900.

Baghal, or BHAGUL, a Punjab hill-state in north-west India, on the south bank of the Sutlej. Area, 124 sq. m.; pop. 24,633.

Baghelkhand, a group of native states, under the political superintendence of the governor-general's agent for Central India, lying to the south of the districts of Mirzapur and Allahabad. The total area is 11,324 sq. m.; pop. 1,562,595.

Bagheria, or BAGARIA, a town of Sicily, 8 miles E. by S. of Palermo by rail. Pop. 13,000.

Baghistan. See BEHISTUN.

Bagirmi, or BAGHERMI, a country in French Equatorial Africa, SE. of Lake Tsad. Its area is estimated at 20,000 sq. m.; its pop. at 100,000. The capital is Chekna.

Bagnacavallo (Ban-ya-ca-val'lo), a cathedral city of Italy, 11 miles W. of Ravenna. Pop. 4000.

Bagnara (Ban-yâh'ra), an Italian coast-town, 16 miles NE. of Reggio. Pop. 10,000.

Bagnères (Ban-yehr'), two watering-places both in the Pyrenees, France.—(1) BAGNÈRES DE BIGORRE, on the Adour, in the dep. of Hautes Pyrénées, 1820 feet above sea-level, 13 miles SE. of Tarbes by rail. Known to the Romans as Vicus Aquensis Balneariœ or Aquœ Bigerrorum, it now is visited by 20,000 strangers yearly, and has fourteen baths and over fifty springs (90° to 135° F.), recommended for catarrhal and nervous diseases. Pop. 8000.—(2) BAGNÈRES DE LUCHON, in the dep. of Haute Garonne, 43 miles by road SE. of Bagnères de Bigorre, and 22 by rail S. of Montrejeau Junction. Its cold, tepid, and hot sulphurous waters (up to 130° F.) are recommended in rheumatism, gout, cutaneous diseases, and paralysis, and attract 10,000 visitors annually. Pop. 4000.

Bagni di Lucca (Ban'yee dee Look'ka), a bathing-place of Italy, 17 miles N. of Lucca, and has hot springs of from 96° to 136° F. Pop. 1000.

Bagno a Ripoli (Ban'yo âh Rip'olee), an Italian village, 5 miles from Florence, containing baths.

Bagno in Romagna (Ban'yo in Român'ya), an Italian bathing-place, on the Savio, 35 miles E. by N. of Florence. It has hot springs of temperature 108°-110° F. Pop. 2000.

Bagshot Heath, near Windlesham in Berkshire and Surrey, is a tract of nearly 50 sq. m., 463 feet above sea-level.

Baha'mas, or Lucayos (Span. Los Cayos), a chain of British West Indian islands, stretching nearly 600 miles north-westward from near the north coast of Hayti to the east coast of Florida. The chain extends in N. lat. from 21° 42′ to 27° 34′, and in W. long. from 72° 40′ to 79° 5′. There are 20 larger islands, 653 islets or cays, and 2387 reefs. The chief members of the group, if reckoned from the NW., are: Great Bahama, Abaco, Eleuthera, New Providence, Andros, Cat Island, San Salvador or Watling's Island, Exuma, Long Island, Crooked Island, Acklin, Mariguana, Inagua, Little Inagua. The Caicos (q.v.) and Turk's Island, which geographically belong to the Bahamas, have since 1848 been politically annexed to Jamaica.

The area is 5390 sq. m.; and in 1911 the population was 56,000, about one-fourth Europeans. Of coralline formation, the islands generally are of reef-like shape, long, narrow, and low, the highest hill not exceeding 230 feet. With very little appearance of soil, they derive considerable fertility from the tendency of the porous rock to retain moisture. Sponges are largely found round the shores. Cotton cultivation received a great impulse during the American civil war. The chief agricultural products are bananas, cocoanuts, and other fruits, vegetables, and sisal fibre, sent mainly to the United States. The temperature ranges from 57° to 113° F.; but in the winter the climate is so delightfully temperate as to be often recommended in the United States to sufferers from pulmonary complaints. The annual rainfall is from 43 to 45 inches. In 1866 and 1883 the Bahamas were visited by furious and destructive cyclones.

The Bahamas, Columbus's earliest discovery (1492), were occupied in 1629 by the English, to whom, after various vicissitudes of fortune in the wars with Spain and France, they were ultimately secured by the peace of Versailles (1783). Nassau, in New Providence, is the seat of government. During the American civil war, Nassau became the station for blockade-runners, and thence derived unexampled prosperity; the value of imports and exports rising from £234,029 and £157,350 in 1860, to £5,346,112 and £4,672,398 in 1864. They have greatly declined since; their present annual value, on a four years' average, being £247,000 and £183,000. So far, however, as agriculture is concerned, the impulse then received has been maintained by the Bahamas. Both Baptists and Wesleyans are nearly twice as numerous as members of the Church of England, which was disestablished in 1869. See The Bahama Islands, ed. Shattuck (1905).

Bahar. See Behar.

Bahawalpur, capital of an Indian native state in political connection with the Punjab, lies near the left bank of the Sutlej, which here is crossed by the fine 'Empress' railway bridge. It has manufactures of scarfs, turbans, silks, and chintzes. Pop. 15,000. Area of the state, 17,285 sq. m.; pop. 781,000.

Bahia (Bâ-ee'a), capital of a Brazilian province, consists of an upper and a lower town, situated on a range of hills along the sea-shore. The bay, which is one of the finest in America, is defended by forts, with the island of Itaparica sheltering the entrance. Bahia has a university, and is the seat of an archbishop, who is primate of Brazil. The chief exports are sugar, cotton, coffee, tobacco, rice, &c. Bahia is the oldest city in Brazil, and till 1763 was the capital. The bay was discovered by Amerigo Vespucci in 1503, and the city was founded by a Portuguese navigator named Correa in 1510. Pop. 230,000.—The province has an area of 164,500 sq. m., and a pop. of 2,120,000.

Bahia Blanca, a growing port of the Argentine Republic, in the province of Buenos Ayres. It is situated on the Naposta River, three miles from its entrance into the bay of Bahia Blanca, and has a good harbour. Pop. about 50,000.

Bahia Honda, a harbour on the north coast of Cuba, 60 miles WSW. of Havana, protected by a fort. Pop. 2000.

Bahr, an Arabic word signifying a large body of water, is applied both to lakes and rivers.—Bahr-el-Abiad (the White River), and Bahr-el-Azrak (the Blue River), are the chief branches of the Nile (q.v.).—Bahr-el-Ghazal is the name of the upper branch of the Nile, constituted by the Bahr-el-Arab and many other tributaries, which flows sluggishly eastward to join the Bahr-el-Jebel and so form the Bahr-el-Abiad. The Bahr-el-Ghazal gives name to a province in the SW. of the Egyptian Soudan, bravely held for years by the governor, Frank Lupton.—Bahr-el-Yemen is the Red Sea (q.v.), and Bahr-Lût (Sea of Lot) the Dead Sea (q.v.).

Bahraich, a town of Oudh, India, 70 miles NE. of Lucknow. To the shrine of Masáûd, a warrior and Mussulman saint, there is a great concourse of pilgrims every May. Pop. 27,000.

Bahrein Islands, or Avâl Islands, a group of islands in the Persian Gulf. The most important of these is Bahrein (pop. 40,000), 33 miles long and 10 broad. Manameh, the capital, has a good harbour. The Bahrein Islands are chiefly remarkable for their pearl-fisheries, which employ, during the season, from 900 to 1000 boats, each manned with from 8 to 60 men. The annual value of the pearls is estimated at upwards of £900,000. The islands are inhabited by Arabs, and since 1867 have been under English protection. Pop. 90,000.

Baiæ, a small town of antiquity, on the coast of Campania, 10 miles W. of Naples and opposite Puteoli. The ruins still standing on the desolate coast, or visible beneath the clear waters of the sea, are now the only evidence of its former magnificence.

Baikal (Turkish, Bei-kul, 'rich lake') is, after the Caspian Sea and the Sea of Aral, the largest lake of Asia, with an area of 13,500 sq. m. It is a fresh-water lake, and is situated in the south of Siberia, in the government of Irkutsk, in 51° 20′—55° 30′ N. lat., and 103°—110° E. long., and somewhat resembles a sickle in shape. Its length is 330 miles, and its breadth 9¼ to 40 miles; height above the sea, 1360 feet; mean depth 850 feet, but in some places as much as 4500 feet, more than 3000 feet below sea-level. Its waters are a deep blue, and remarkably clear. Its outlet is by the Lower Angara, a chief tributary of the Yenisei; but the river is inconsiderable in size compared with those which flow into the lake. It has several islands—the largest, Olkhon, 32 miles long. There are numerous hot springs on its shores, and earthquakes are frequent. Formerly the lake—or rather sea—seems to have been much more extensive. The difficult section of the great Siberian railway passing round the south end of the sea was not completed till 1904; the connection being till then carried on by steamers (or across the Baikal ice in winter).

The annual value of its salmon, sturgeon, and other fisheries is estimated at 200,000 roubles. The capture of fresh-water seals is a source of income to the Russian settlers. The surface of the lake is frozen from November to May, but the traffic is carried on over the ice.

Bailen′, or BAYLEN, a town of Andalusia, Spain, 22 miles N. of Jaen. Pop. 9000. Here, on July 19, 1808, the Spaniards won their first and only victory over the French, 18,000 of whom laid down their arms.

Bailieborough, a market-town of Cavan county, 58 miles NW. of Dublin. Pop. 1000.

Bailleul (Ba-yul′), a town in the French dep. of Nord, 19 miles NW. of Lille. The Baliol family hence derived its name. Pop. 11,000.

Baireuth, or BAYREUTH (Bye′roit), capital of the Bavarian province of Upper Franconia, on the Red Maine, 43 miles NNE. of Nuremberg by rail. Its principal buildings are the old palace, dating from 1454; the new palace (1753); the old opera-house (1748); and a magnificent 'national theatre' (1875) for the performance of the operas of Wagner, who, dying at Venice, was in 1883 buried in the garden of his villa here. Jean Paul Richter died here in 1825, and a monument has been erected to his memory. Baireuth's chief articles of industry are cottons, woollens, linen, leather, tobacco, parchment, and porcelain. Population, 35,000, of whom only about 15 per cent. are Catholics. See Milner-Barry's Baireuth and the Franconian Switzerland (1887).

Baitul, or BETUL (Bay-tool′), a town of British India, in the hill-country of the Central Province, 50 miles NE. of Ellichpur. Pop. 5700.

Baja (Bâh′ya), a market-town of Hungary, on the Danube, 90 m. S. of Pesth, with a fine castle, several convents, and brisk trade. Pop. 23,000.

Bajmok (Bye-mok), a village of Hungary, 16 miles SW. of Theresienstadt. Pop. 7000.

Bakarganj, a British district in the Dacca division of India, under the lieutenant-governor of Bengal, contains 3649 sq. m. Barisal, the headquarters, on the Barisal River, is the only town with over 5000 inhabitants. Bakarganj, the former capital, near the junction of the Krishnakati and Khairabad rivers, is now in ruins. Pop. 2,353,965.

Bakau (Ba-kow′), a Roumanian town on the river Bistrisza, 187 miles N. of Bucharest by rail. Pop. 16,000.

Bakchiserai (Turkish, 'Garden Palace'), a town in the Russian government of Taurida, the residence of the ancient princes or khans of the Crimea, 15 miles by rail SW. of the present capital, Simferopol. The palace (1519) of the khans has been restored by the Russian government in the oriental style. Pop. 16,000.

Bakel, a town with a strong fort, in the E. of the French colony of Senegal, on the Senegal River. Pop. 3000.

Baker, MOUNT, a volcano (10,827 feet) of Washington State, U.S., in the Cascade Range, a continuation of the Rocky Mountains, 20 miles from the Canadian frontier. It was very active in 1880.

Bakewell, an ancient market-town in Derbyshire, on the Wye, 25 miles NNW. of Derby. It has warm baths and a mineral spring. Pop. 3000.

Bakhmut, a town of Southern Russia, in the government of Ekaterinoslav, on a tributary of the Donetz. Pop. 20,000.

Bakhtegan, or NIRIS, a shallow salt-lake (74 × 13½ miles) in the Persian province of Farsistan, 47 miles E. of Shiraz.

Bakony Forest, a densely wooded hill-country of Hungary, extending from Lake Balaton northward to the Danube. Immense herds of swine are annually driven hither to feed upon the mast.

Baku, an important seaport of Russian Transcaucasia, on the Apsheron peninsula, on a crescent-shaped bay in the Caspian Sea. Since 1883 it has been connected by rail with Tiflis, and so with Poti and Batoum on the Black Sea, 561 miles distant; and since 1887, by the North Caucasus Railway, with Novorossiak on the Black Sea. The whole soil around Baku is impregnated with petroleum, which, monopolised till 1872, now forms the staple branch of its industry. Some of the fountains ignite spontaneously, a fact which caused Baku to be esteemed as a holy city by the Parsees (see ATESHGA). Most of the petroleum wells are situated on the Balakhani peninsula, 8 or 9 miles to the north. Lines of pipe carry the oil into the 'black town' of Baku, which is full of oil refineries emitting vast volumes of smoke. One well, tapped in 1886, began to spout oil with extraordinary force, deluging the whole district, till the outflow, on the eighth day, had reached a daily rate of 11,000 tuns, or more than the entire produce of the world at the time. Another gigantic naphtha fountain burst out in 1887, rising to a height of 350 feet, and after forming an extensive petroleum lake, forced its way into the sea. How rapidly the industry grew may be judged from the fact that the number of drilled wells increased from 1 in 1871 to 1321 in 1900. Cotton, silk, opium, saffron, and salt are also exported. The Arabian Masudi is the first who mentions Baku, about 943, and he gives an account of a great volcanic mountain in its vicinity, now extinct. Baku was taken by Russia from the Persians in 1806. The harbour, which is strongly fortified, is one of the chief stations of the Russian navy in the Caspian. The population—some 16,000 in 1880—is now about 200,000. Baku is capital of a government of Russian Transcaucasia, with an area of 15,000 sq. m., and a pop. of 1,000,000. See works by Marvin (1884–86).

Ba′la, a town of Merionethshire, North Wales, near the foot of Bala Lake, 12 miles SW. of Corwen by rail. Pop. 1500. Bala Lake measures 4 miles by 1 mile, and sends off the Dee from its foot. From Lake Vyrnwy (q.v.), 10 miles south, Liverpool draws its water-supply.

Balaghat′ ('above the Ghats'), a large tract of elevated country in the south of India, extending from the rivers Toombudra and Krishna in the north to the farthest extremity of Mysore in the south. Also a British district in the Central Provinces. Pop. 330,554.

Balahissar, a village in the south-western part of the province of Angora, in Asia Minor, on the site of the ancient Pessinus, which was famous for its worship of Cybele.

Balakla′va, a small Greek fishing-village with 700 inhabitants, in the Crimea, 8 miles SE. of Sebastopol. The landlocked harbour, which affords secure anchorage for the largest ships, till 1860 was a naval station. Balaklava is the Symbolōn Limēn of Strabo, and the Cembalo of the Genoese (1365–1475), who were expelled by the Turks, as these were in turn by the Russians. During 1854–56 it was the British headquarters, and the famous charge of the Six Hundred (25th October 1854) has made the name glorious as Thermopylæ.

Balasinor, a tributary state of India, in the province of Guzerat, Bombay. Area about 150 sq. m.; pop. 42,000.—The chief town, Balasinor, is 51 miles N. of Baroda. Pop. 9000.

Balasor′, a seaport of Orissa, on the right bank of the Burabalang River, 15 miles from its mouth. Pop. 20,865.

Ba′laton, LAKE (Ger. Platten-See), a lake, the largest in Hungary, 55 miles SW. of Pesth. Lying 426 feet above sea-level, it has a length of 48 miles, a breadth of 10, and an area of 245 sq. m. Its mean depth is 20 feet, but in one part it sinks to 150. It is fed by over thirty streams—the chief the Szala—as well as by numerous springs. Its outlet is by the Sio, which flows to the Sarvitz, a feeder of the Danube. The waters have a slightly brackish taste. Fish of various kinds abound.

Balbriggan, a watering-place in Dublin county, 21 miles N. by E. of Dublin. It manufactures linen, cotton, &c. Pop. 5000.

Balby-with-Hexthorpe, an urban district of Yorkshire, 2 miles SW. of Doncaster, associated with Fox and the 'Friends.' Pop. 11,600.

Balcarres, a Fife mansion near Colinsburgh, where Lady Ann Barnard wrote 'Auld Robin Gray.' It is a seat now of the Earl of Crawford.

Baldock, a town of Hertfordshire, 37 miles N. of London. Pop. 2100.

Baldoon′, a ruin 1¾ mile SSW. of Wigtown, the true scene of Scott's Bride of Lammermoor.

Bâle. See BASEL.

Balearic Isles, a group of islands—Mallorca (Majorca), Minorca, Iviza, Formentera, Cabrera, and several smaller islets—lying off the coast of Valencia. They formed from 1220 to 1344 the kingdom of Mallorca, which was united in 1349 with the crown of Aragon; and they now form a Spanish province, with an area of 1935 sq. m., and a population of 325,000. The Phœnicians visited the Balearic Isles at a very early date, and they were followed by the Greeks, the Carthaginians, and (123 B.C.) the Romans. The Baleares were famous slingers. See Bidwell's Balearic Isles (1876).

Balerno, a Midlothian village, with paper-works, on the Water of Leith, 7 miles SW. of Edinburgh. Pop. 600.

Balfron′, a Stirlingshire village, 19 miles NNW. of Glasgow. Pop. 1000.

Balfrush′ (more correctly Barfurush, 'mart of burdens'), a town in the Persian province of Mazanderan, on the Bhawal, 12 miles from its mouth in the Caspian Sea. It is a centre of trade between Russia and Persia. Pop. 50,000.

Balgownie. See DON (Aberdeenshire).

Balham, part of Streatham (q.v.).

Bali (Bâh′lee), or LITTLE JAVA, one of the Sunda Islands, lying east of Java. It is 75 miles long, 50 broad, and 2300 sq. m. in area; pop. 300,000. A chain of mountains crosses the island from east to west, rising in the volcanic peak of Gunungagung to 12,379 feet. The Balinese are a superior race, and speak a language related to Javanese. Their religion is Brahmanism of an ancient type. Under the Dutch, the nine little principalities of the island are governed by native rulers. Chinese and a few Europeans are the chief traders.

Balize. See BELIZE, HONDURAS.

Balkans, a ridge or series of ridges of mountains in south-eastern Europe (anc. Hæmus; Balkan is Turkish for 'mountain'). They formed the boundary between Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia, extending from Timok, SE. of Sophia, eastward to the Black Sea, and became by their union the backbone of the principality, now kingdom, of Bulgaria. The watershed between the Danube and the Ægean, they have a steep slope southwards, but northwards incline gradually towards the Danube. They are highest in the west, where the mean height is 6500 feet. The ridge is crossed by some 30 passes, of which the Shipka, between Kezanlik and Tirnova, and 4290 feet high, is the most noted in history—especially as the scene of severe fighting in the Russo-Turkish war of 1877–78.—The term BALKAN PENINSULA, frequently occurring in connection with the evergreen 'Eastern Question,' is a usual name for the peninsula in South-eastern Europe running southwards between the Adriatic and the Ægean. The most convenient northern boundary is the Save and the Lower Danube; though historically and politically Roumania and parts of the Austro-Hungarian dominions are closely associated with the regions south of the Danube. Southern Greece is a peninsula upon a peninsula. In a general way the Balkan Peninsula and Balkan States cover the area in Europe directly or indirectly subject, now or within modern times, to the Turks, except Roumania. Its political geography was transformed by the wars of 1912–13. See the articles TURKEY, BULGARIA, SERVIA, MONTENEGRO, ALBANIA, BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA, GREECE, MACEDONIA, THRACE.

Balkh (anc. Bactria), a district of Afghan Turkestan, the most northerly province of Afghanistan. Offsets of the Hindu-Kush traverse it in a NW. direction, and slope down to the low steppes of Bokhara. Its length is 250 miles; its breadth, 120. The natives are Uzbegs.—BALKH, long the chief town, is surrounded by a mud wall; but though bearing the imposing title of 'mother of cities,' it has not in recent times had any of the grandeur of ancient Bactra, on the site of which it is built. It was twice destroyed by Genghis Khan and Timur. A terrible outbreak of cholera in 1877 caused the capital of Afghan Turkestan to be transferred to Mazar, west of Balkh; since which Balkh has been an insignificant village.

Balkhash′ (Kirghiz Tengis; Chinese Sihai), a great inland lake near the eastern borders of Russian Central Asia, between 44° and 47° N. lat., and 73° and 79° E. long. Lying 780 feet above sea-level, it extends 323 miles WSW.; its breadth at the west end is 50 miles, at the east from 9 to 4 miles; the area is 8400 sq. m. The water is clear, but intensely salt. Its principal feeder is the river Ili. It has no outlet.

Ballaarat, or BALLARAT, a thriving town of Victoria, 76 miles WNW. of Melbourne, and 58 NW. of Geelong by rail. It is next in importance to Melbourne, and owes its rise to the discovery of the gold-fields there in June 1851, being the oldest of the considerable gold-fields of Victoria, and in fact the oldest but one of all the gold-fields of the state. Ballaarat is the see of Protestant and Roman Catholic bishops. Amongst the industries are iron-founding, brewing, distilling, with flour and woollen mills. When the surface diggings became exhausted after the first rush in 1851, deposits of gold were found at greater depths, and now there are mines as deep as some English coal-pits, with steam pumping and all the requisite machinery. The 'Welcome Nugget,' the largest ever found, was discovered in 1858 at Bakery Hill. It weighed 2217 oz. 16 dwt., and was sold for £10,500. Pop. 52,600.

Ballabgarh, a town of India, in the Punjab, 21½ miles S. of Delhi. Pop. 7000.

Ballachu'lish, a village of Argyllshire, on the south shore of salt-water Loch Leven, 16½ miles S. of Fort-William. Its quarries of blue roofing clay-slate, commenced about 1760, produce in a busy year 17,000,000 roofing-slates, weighing 30,000 tons. Pop. 1000.

Ballaghaderreen, a town of County Roscommon, 12 miles NW. of Castlereagh. Pop. 1300.

Ballantrae (Ballantray'), a fishing-village at the mouth of the Stinchar, in the S. of Ayrshire, 10 miles WSW. of Pinwherry station. Pop. 700.

Bal'later, a village of Aberdeenshire, on the Dee, 44 miles WSW. of Aberdeen by rail. Near it are the medicinal springs of Pannanich, Balmoral Castle (q.v.), and Ballatrich Farm, connected with Byron's boyhood. Pop. 1250.

Ballenstedt, a town of Anhalt, in the Harz Mountains, 7 miles SE. of Quedlinburg by rail. Its castle was a monastery 940-1525, and from 1765 till 1863 the residence of the dukes of Anhalt-Bernburg. Pop. 6000.

Bal'leny Islands, five small volcanic islands discovered in the Antarctic Ocean, 1839, nearly on the Antarctic circle, and in long. 164° E.

Ballina', a seaport in County Mayo, on the confines of Sligo, on the tidal Moy, 7 miles S. of its entrance into Killala Bay, and 168 miles NW. of Dublin by rail. It has a R. C. cathedral (that of the Bishop of Killala). In 1798 the French landed and took Ballina, but were three weeks afterwards defeated at Killala. Pop. 4700.

Ballinakill, a town of Queen's County, 63 miles SW. of Dublin. Pop. 370.

Ballinamore, a town of County Leitrim, 15 miles NE. of Carrick-on-Shannon. Pop. 650.

Ballinasloe, a town in Connaught on the borders of counties Galway and Roscommon, on the river Suck, 94 miles W. of Dublin. At the great annual fair for five days in October, as many as 60,000 sheep and 6000 horned cattle, besides horses, have been sold. Pop. 5200.

Ballincollig, a town of County Cork, on the Bride, 7 miles W. of Cork. Pop. 800.

Ballingarry, a town in the county, and 16 miles SW. of the town of Limerick. Pop. 460.

Ballinrobe', a town of County Mayo, on the Robe, 17 miles SSE. of Castlebar. Pop. 1600.

Balloch, a village at the foot of Loch Lomond, 20½ miles NW. of Glasgow.

Ballochmyle, an Ayrshire estate, near Mauchline, rendered famous by Burns.

Ballybay, a town of Monaghan, 79 miles NNW. of Dublin. Pop. 1200.

Ballybunnion, a watering-place of Kerry, 9 miles NW. of Listowel.

Ballycas'tle, a seaport of County Antrim, on an open bay opposite Rathlin Isle, 68 miles N. of Belfast by rail. Its harbour and pier cost £150,000, but the former is silted up, and the sea has destroyed the latter. Pop. 1500.

Ballyclare, a town of Antrim, 10½ miles SW. of Larne. Pop. 3400.

Ballyconnell, a village in the county, and 14 miles NNW. of the town of Cavan.

Ballygawley, a Tyrone village, 11 miles WSW. of Dungannon.

Ballyhalbert, a fishing-village of County Down, 13 miles SE. of Newtonards.

Ballyhooly, a village in the county, and 18 miles N. by E. of the city of Cork.

Ballyjamesduff, a market-town in the county, and 11 miles SE. of the town of Cavan. Pop. 600.

Ballylongford, a Kerry village, 8 miles N. of Listowel. Pop. 500.

Ballymahon, a market-town in the county, and 12 miles S. of the town of Longford. Pop. 660.

Ballyme'na, a town of County Antrim, on the Braid, 33 miles NNW. of Belfast by rail. It is one of the greatest linen and flax markets in Ireland, and its vicinity is covered with extensive bleach-fields. Pop. 11,400.

Ballymoney, a market-town of County Antrim, 53 miles NNW. of Belfast by rail. Pop. 3100.

Ballymote, a town in the county, and 14 miles S. of the town of Sligo. Pop. 930.

Ballynahinch, a market-town of County Down, 12½ miles S. of Antrim. Pop. 1700.

Ballyragget, a town in the county, and 10 miles NW. of the town of Kilkenny. Pop. 500.

Ballyshannon, a seaport of County Donegal, at the mouth of the river Erne, on a small inlet running off from Donegal Bay, 157 miles NW. of Dublin by rail. It is celebrated for its salmon-fishing. Pop. 2200.

Ballywalter, a fishing-village of County Down, 10 miles SE. of Newtonards.

Balme, Col de, a mountain pass (7200 feet) between Mont Blanc and the Dent du Midi, taking over the route from Martigny to Chamonix.

Balmer'ino, a small village of Fife, on the Firth of Tay, 3½ miles SW. of Dundee by water. Near it are scanty remains of a Cistercian abbey (1227). See a work by J. Campbell (1867).

Balmo'ral, a royal residence in Braemar, Aberdeenshire, 9 miles W. of Ballater, and 52½ of Aberdeen. Standing 926 feet above sea-level on a natural platform that slopes gently down from the base of Craig-gowan (1437 feet) to the Dee, it commands a magnificent prospect on every side. The estate was acquired by Prince Albert in 1848-52; and the castle rebuilt (1853-55) at a cost of £100,000 in the Scottish Baronial style of architecture.

Balquhidder (Bal-whidd'er), a Perthshire parish, 28 miles NW. of Stirling, with Rob Roy's grave.

Balrampur, a town of Oudh, India, near the frontier of Nepaul. Pop. 15,000.

Balta, a town on the Kodema, an affluent of the Bug, in the government of Podolia, Russia. Pop. 25,000.

Baltic Provinces, the four Russian governments bordering on the Baltic—viz. Courland, Livonia, Esthonia, and Petersburg; or in a restricted sense often the first three. The Baltic provinces once belonged to Sweden, except Courland, which was a dependency of Poland. They came into the possession of Russia partly in the beginning of the 18th century, through the conquests of Peter the Great, partly under Alexander in 1809. No pains have been spared to Russianise them, and since 1876-77 they have lost their remaining privileges, and been thoroughly incorporated in the Russian empire. The inhabitants are mainly Esths and Letts, with many Germans.

Baltic Sea, the great inland sea bordered by Denmark, Germany, Russia, Finland, and Sweden, and communicating with the Kattegat and North Sea by the Sound and the Great and Little Belts. Its length is from 850 to 900 miles; breadth, from 100 to 200; and area, including the Gulfs of Bothnia and Finland, 184,496 sq. m., of which 12,753 are occupied by islands. Its mean depth is 44 fathoms, and the greatest ascertained depth, between Gottland and Courland, 140. The group of the Aland Islands divides the south part of the sea from the north part or Gulf of Bothnia (q.v.). The Gulf of Finland (q.v.), branching off eastwards into Russia, separates Finland from Esthonia. A third gulf is that of Riga or Livonia. The Kurisch and other Haffs are not gulfs, but fresh-water lakes at the mouths of rivers. The water of the Baltic is colder and clearer than that of the ocean, and contains in most places only a fourth of the proportion of salt found in the Atlantic; though the salinity varies in different parts and at different seasons. Ice hinders the navigation from three to five months yearly. Rarely, as in 1658 and 1809, the whole surface is frozen over. Tides, as in all inland seas, are little perceptible—at Copenhagen, about a foot. Upwards of 250 rivers flow into this sea, which, through them and its lakes, drains not much less than one-fifth of all Europe, its drainage area being estimated as 717,000 sq. m. The chief of these rivers are the Oder, Vistula, Niemen, Dwina, Narva, Neva, and Motala. The principal islands are Zealand, Fünen, Bornholm, Samsöe, and Laaland (Danish); Gottland, Oland, and Hveen (Swedish); the Aland Islands (Finnish); and Rügen (Prussian). The Eider Canal, connecting the Baltic near Kiel with the North Sea at Tonningen, facilitated the grain trade; and the two seas are also connected by the Gotha Canal, which joins the lakes of south Sweden. As these were navigable for boats of light draught only, in 1887–95 a great canal, the Kaiser Wilhelm Canal, was constructed from Brunsbüttel, at the mouth of the Elbe, to Holtenau and Kiel, to allow the passage of the largest vessels, being 61 miles long, 29 feet deep, 213 wide at the surface, and 72 at the bottom. The cost was £7,800,000. But as larger vessels have since been built, the depth is to be increased to 36 feet, and the width at the bottom to 144 feet. This work will occupy from seven to ten years, and the cost is estimated at £11,050,000. The most important harbours in the Baltic are: in Denmark, Copenhagen; in Germany, Kiel, Lübeck, Stralsund, Stettin, Danzig, Königsberg, and Memel; in Russia, Riga, Narva, Cronstadt; in Finland, Sveaborg; and in Sweden, Stockholm and Karlskrona.

Baltimore, a fishing-village in County Cork, on Baltimore Bay, 7 miles SW. of Skibbereen. Here in 1887 the Baroness Burdett-Coutts established a technical fishery school. Pop. 450.

Baltimore, a port of entry and the largest city of Maryland, and the seventh city of the United States in population, stands on the northern bank of the river Patapsco, an arm of Chesapeake Bay, 250 miles by ship-channel from the ocean, 96 miles SW. of Philadelphia, and 40 NE. of Washington, D.C., in 39° 17′ N. lat., 76° 37′ W. long. Its site is uneven, and its surroundings are picturesque and pleasant. The plan of the streets is not so strictly uniform as in many American cities. The harbour is spacious and perfectly secure, having a minimum depth of 24 feet, and access from the sea is safe and easy. Baltimore is an important centre of the traffic in bread-stuffs, and is also the seat of extensive and varied industries—cotton and woollen goods, flour, tobacco and cigars, beer, glassware, boots and shoes, iron and steel (including machinery, car-wheels, iron bridges, stoves, furnaces, &c.), clothing, pianos, organs, and the canning of oysters, employing over 2000 hands.

Baltimore is noted for the fine architecture of its public and other buildings, among the finest being the chamber of commerce, the Roman Catholic archiepiscopal cathedral, the custom-house, the Maryland Institute, the academy of music, the city-hall, the Johns Hopkins Hospital, the post-office, and the Peabody Institute. The public monuments (the Washington column is 210 feet high) have given it the name of the 'monumental city.' There are several public squares and parks, the beautiful Druid Hill Park of nearly 700 acres, being the most celebrated. The Johns Hopkins University, endowed with over $3,500,000 by a Quaker philanthropist of that name (1795–1873), was opened in 1876, and ranks as one of the first seats of learning in the country. Founded in 1729, the city was named in honour of Lord Baltimore, the founder of the Maryland colony, and in 1796 was incorporated as a city. Pop. (1790) 13,503; (1830) 80,625; (1860) 212,218; (1880) 332,313; (1890) 434,439; (1910) 558,485.

Baltinglass, a Wicklow market-town, on the Slaney, 10 miles E. of Mageney. Pop. 860.

Baltistan, or LITTLE TIBET, an alpine region of Kashmir, through which the Upper Indus flows. It contains Mount Godwin-Austen, 28,250 feet high, next to Everest the highest on the globe.

Baltjik′, a Roumanian seaport, on the Black Sea, 20 miles NE. of Varna. Near it is ruined Tomi, whither Ovid was exiled. Pop. 5000.

Baluchistan. See BELUCHISTAN.

Balwearie, 2 miles W. by S. of Kirkcaldy, the ruined tower of the 'wizard' Sir Michael Scott.

Bambarra, a region of Upper Senegal-Niger, lying (where 5° W. long. and 12° N. lat. cross one another) on both sides of the Upper Niger. The inhabitants, a branch of the Mandingoes, number about 2,000,000, and are superior to their neighbours in intelligence. The upper classes profess Mohammedanism, but the lower are pagans. The principal towns are Sego, Sansanding, Yamina, and Bammako. In 1881 a French treaty with the sultan of Sego opened the country, which is now French.

Bamberg, a Bavarian city, in Upper Franconia, on the Regnitz, 3 miles above its confluence with the Main, and 33 N. of Nuremberg by rail. Set in the midst of vineyards, orchards, and hop-gardens, and founded about 769, from 1007 to 1802 it was the seat of independent prince-bishops. The magnificent Romanesque cathedral, founded by the Emperor Henry II. in 1004, has five towers, and contains the elaborately carved tomb of the founder and his empress, Cunigunda. Opposite it is the palace (1702) of the former prince-bishops, from one of whose windows Marshal Berthier met his death. St Michael's Benedictine abbey (1009) was in 1803 converted into an almshouse. The ruins of the castle of Altenburg stand on an eminence 1¼ mile from the town. Pop. (1871)

25,738; (1910) 48,063. The manufactures are beer, cotton, cloth, gloves, tobacco, &c.

Bamborough Castle, an ancient fortress on the Northumbrian coast, 5 miles E. of Belford, and 16½ SE. of Berwick. Crowning a basaltic rock, 150 feet high, it was founded about 547 by Ida the 'Flame-bearer,' first king of Northumbria, and named Bebbanburh, after Bebbe, his queen. Forfeited by Tom Forster for his share in the '15, it was purchased by Bishop Crewe, and bequeathed by him in 1721 to trustees for benevolent purposes. In 1894 it was purchased from the trustees by Lord Armstrong, and endowed as an almshouse of cultured poverty. Bamborough village was a royal borough before the Conquest, and in Edward I.'s time returned two members. Grace Darling is buried in the churchyard. See vol. i. of Bateson's History of Northumberland (1893).

Bambouk, a country of Upper Senegal-Niger, lying in the angle formed by the Senegal and Faleme rivers. It has rich iron ore and deposits of gold in its rivers, especially the Faleme. Faranaba and Mandinka are the chief towns. The inhabitants, Mandingoes, are professedly Mohammedans.

Bámián, a mountain-valley in Afghanistan, on the road between Kabul and Turkestan, and near the northern base of the Koh-i-baba range. It lies 8500 feet above sea-level, is drained by a feeder of the Oxus. The inhabitants are Hazáras. The most notable feature of the district is a number of Buddhist figures of enormous size carved in the conglomerate cave-pierced rocks, 200 to 300 feet high, which form the northern side of the valley. Of these there are five; and the two principal were described by a Chinese Buddhist monk about 630 A.D. The largest is 173 feet high, or 3 feet higher than the Nelson Monument in Trafalgar Square.

Bam′mako, capital of Upper Senegal-Niger, on the Upper Niger, fortified by the French in 1883. Pop. 17,000.

Banagher, a town of King's County, on the Shannon, 18 miles SE. of Ballinasloe. Pop. 900.

Banas, or BUNAS, three rivers of India.—(1) In Rajputana, rising in the Aravalli Mountains, and flowing 300 miles NE. and SE. to the Chambal.—(2) A river also rising in the Aravalli Mountains, flowing 180 miles SW. to the Runn of Cutch.—(3) In the Central Provinces and Central India, flowing 70 miles NW. to the Son.

Banat, any district or territory under a Ban or military frontier chief, but specially applied after 1718 to a part of Hungary which had no separate ban or governor, and was bounded by the Theiss, Danube, and Maros. It was formed into an Austrian crown-land in 1849, but was incorporated with Hungary in 1860.

Banbridge, a town in County Down, on the Bann, 76 miles N. of Dublin. It is a seat of the linen manufacture in all its stages. Population, 5100.

Banbury, a town of Oxfordshire, on the Oxford Canal and the Cherwell, 23 miles N. of Oxford, and 78 NW. of London by rail. Its strong castle (c. 1125) was demolished during the Great Rebellion; and in 1469 the Yorkists were defeated in the vicinity. The town is still famous for its cakes and ale; and it manufactures webbing and agricultural implements. The beautiful old 'Globe Room,' at an inn here, was dismantled in 1912. Till 1885 Banbury returned a member to parliament. Population, 13,500, barely one-third being in the town proper.

Banca, an island from 8 to 20 miles broad lying SE. of Sumatra, from which it is separated by the Strait of Banca. It forms a Dutch Residency, with an area of 4500 sq. m., and a pop. of about 115,000, one-fourth Chinese. Gold, iron ore, silver, lead, and amber are found, but tin is the chief mineral. The once dense forests have been terribly thinned for smelting purposes. The capital, Muntok, in the north-west part of the island, has a fort and 3000 inhabitants.

Banchory, a Kincardineshire village, on the Dee, 17 miles WSW. of Aberdeen. Pop. 1600.

Banda, chief town of a district in the United Provinces, India, on the Ken River, 95 miles SW. of Allahabad. It is a great mart for cotton. Pop. 22,974.

Banda Isles, 12 Dutch islands of the Moluccas, 50 miles to the south of Ceram. Area, 17 sq. m.; pop. 8000 (500 Europeans and half-castes). The chief production is the nutmeg. An active volcano, Gunong-Api (1744 feet), rises near the centre of the group, which the Dutch acquired in 1801–14.

Bandajan′, a pass (14,854 feet) over the Himalayas, in Kashmir.

Banda Oriental. See URUGUAY.

Ban-de-la-Roche, or STEINTHAL, a valley of Lower Alsace, in the Vosges Mountains, the scene of the labours of Oberlin.

Bandelkhand. See BUNDELKHAND.

Bandon, or BANDONBRIDGE, a town of County Cork, on the Bandon, 20 miles SW. of Cork by rail. Founded in 1608 as a Protestant colony, it was incorporated by James I., and now belongs chiefly to the Duke of Devonshire. Till 1885 Bandon returned one member to the House of Commons. Pop. (1871) 6131; (1911) 3122.—The river Bandon rises in the Carberry Mountains, and after a course of 40 miles (15 navigable) forms at its mouth the harbour of Kinsale.

Bandong, a flourishing commercial town in the western end of Java, near the volcano Gunong Guntour. Since 1864 it has been the capital of a province, the Preanger Regencies. Pop. 48,000.

Banff (pron. Bamf), the capital of Banffshire, on the Moray Firth, at the mouth of the Deveron, 50 miles NNW. of Aberdeen by rail. On the right bank of the Deveron, 1¼ mile ENE., is the fishing-town of Macduff, included since 1832 in the parliamentary burgh. Scarce a fragment remains of the old castle, in which Archbishop Sharp was born; the present castle is a plain 18th-century edifice. Duff House (built in 1745) was given to the borough by the Duke of Fife in 1907. The public buildings include a town-house (1796), the county buildings (1871), a lunatic asylum (1865), Chalmers's hospital (1862), and a museum, of which Thomas Edward (1814–86), the 'Scotch naturalist,' was long curator. The harbour of Banff is inferior to that of Macduff. With Elgin, Cullen, Inverury, Kintore, and Peterhead, Banff sends one member to parliament. Population, 7200 (nearly half in Macduff).

Banff, a health-resort among the grand scenery of the Canadian Rocky Mountain National Park, in the south-west of Alberta and on the Canadian Pacific Railway, with a hot sulphur spring. Pop. 1000.

Banffshire, a county in the NE. of Scotland, bounded N. by the Moray Firth. Its greatest length is 59 miles, its greatest breadth 31, and its area 646 sq. m. The coast is rocky, but not high, except to the east of Banff. Chief summits are the Bin of Cullen (1050 feet), Ben Rinnes (2755), and, on the Aberdeenshire border, Ben Macdhui (4296). The rivers are the Spey, which bounds a third of the county on the west; and the Deveron, 61 miles long, and mostly included within the county. The former ranks after the Tweed and Tay as a salmon-river. The southern part of Banffshire is in the Highlands, the north being purely Lowland. Banffshire is divided into the districts of Enzie, Boyne, Strathisla, Strathdeveron, Balveny, Glenlivet, and Strathavon. The chief towns and villages are Banff, Macduff, Portsoy, Keith, Cullen, Buckie, Dufftown, Charlestown of Aberlour. Whisky is produced. The county returns one member. The battle of Glenlivet (q.v.) was fought in 1594. Pop. (1801) 37,216; (1841) 49,670; (1911) 61,402.

Bangalore, a fortified town of Mysore, in a district of the same name, lies 3000 feet above sea-level, 216 miles W. of Madras by rail. When Mysore was occupied by Britain in 1831, Bangalore was made the administrative capital of the state; and when in 1881 Mysore was restored to its maharajah, the British cantonment of Bangalore was exempted. In 1791 it was stormed by Lord Cornwallis. There is a great institution for post-graduate science study. Pop. 190,000.

Bangkok, the capital of Siam, stands on the Menam, 20 miles from its mouth, in 13° 38′ N. lat. and 100° 34′ E. long., and stretches for some 6 or 7 miles along both sides of the river, here a wide and noble stream. The pop. is about 630,000, about one-fourth Chinese, in whose hands is centred nearly all the trade, which is large, the exports exceeding £8,000,000, and the imports £5,000,000. The approach to Bangkok by the Menam is exceedingly beautiful, with its temples, gardens, noble trees, and palaces. A large number of the houses float on rafts moored to the banks of the river and its many canals; and the ordinary houses of the city, which are almost wholly of bamboo or other wood, are raised upon piles. The internal traffic is chiefly carried on by means of canals, there being only a few passable streets in the whole city. Bangkok is the constant residence of the king. The palace is surrounded by high walls, and is nearly a mile in circumference. It includes temples, public offices, huge barracks, and a theatre; the famous white elephants have also a place within the palace. The temples are innumerable, and decorated in the most gorgeous style. In the neighbourhood of Bangkok are iron-mines and forests of teak-wood. Among evidences of progress, specially rapid after 1895, may be mentioned the promotion of educational institutions, the erection of steam-mills, the introduction of gas and electricity, telegraph lines to Penang, Burma, and Cambodia, railways to Korat and Paknam (1900), also N. to Me Puak, and S. to Petchaburi (1903). In 1893 French war-ships forced their way, in spite of an ineffective defence, to Bangkok, and secured here a treaty making important concessions to France. See SIAM.

Bangor, a city and seaport of Carnarvonshire, on the Menai Strait, 60 miles W. of Chester by the main railway route from London to Dublin (1850). Its chief trade is derived from the great Penrhyn slate-quarries, 5 miles distant, which employ 2000 men. Bangor unites with Carnarvon, &c. in sending one member. In 525 St Deiniol founded a college here; and in 550 he became the first bishop; his cathedral was thrice destroyed, in 1071, 1282, and 1402. The present cruciform edifice (1496–1532) was ‘unequalled in meanness,’ until in 1869–80 it was restored by Sir Gilbert Scott. In 1883 Bangor received a municipal charter, and the University College of North Wales (1884) was installed in a noble building in 1911. Pop. 11,200.

Bangor, a small seaport and watering-place in County Down, on the south side of the entrance to Belfast Lough, 12 miles ENE. of Belfast. Pop. 7800. St Cungall in 555 founded Bangor Abbey, which in the 9th century had 3000 inmates. See a monograph by the Rev. C. Scott (2d ed. Belfast, 1887).

Bangor, a city and port in the state of Maine, 246 miles NE. of Boston by rail, on the Penobscot, 60 miles from its mouth, and at its confluence with the Kenduskeag, which affords extensive water-power. At spring-tides, here rising 17 feet, the harbour is accessible for the largest vessels, and as the navigation cannot go higher, Bangor is one of the largest lumber depôts in the world. Under English rule the place was known as Kenduskeag; its present name was taken from the well-known psalm-tune, a favourite of one of its ministers, Seth Noble. It was incorporated as a city in 1834. Pop. (1870) 18,289; (1880) 16,856; (1890) 19,103; (1910) 24,802.

Bangor-isco′ed (‘Bangor below the Wood’), a Welsh village on the Dee, in a detached portion of Flintshire, 5 miles SE. of Wrexham. It was once the seat of one of the largest monasteries in Britain, founded before 180 A.D., and containing 2400 monks in the time of St Augustine. Pop. 600.

Bangweo′lo, or BEMBA, a great Central African lake, discovered by Livingstone in 1868, which is 150 miles long by 75 in width, and 3700 feet above the sea. The Chambese, flowing into it, and the Luapula issuing from it, constitute the head-stream of the Congo. The shores are flat, and parts of the lake are mere marsh. On its south shore Livingstone died.

Banialu′ka, a fortified town of Bosnia, on the Verbas, 54 miles SE. of Novi by rail. Pop. 15,000.

Banjermassin′, a former sultanate on the SE. of Borneo, with an area of 5928 sq. m., and a pop. of about 300,000, chiefly Mohammedans. Tributary to Holland since 1787, it was annexed in 1857.—BANJERMASSIN, the capital, is on the island of Tatas; pop. 50,000.

Bankipur, an Indian civil station close to Patna (q.v.), capital of Behar and Orissa.

Banks Land, an island in the west of Arctic America, discovered by Parry in 1819, and explored by Maclure in 1850. There is also a Banks Island off the coast of British Columbia.

Bank′ura, a town, capital of a district in Bengal, on the Dhalkisor River. Pop. 19,000.

Bann, two rivers in the north-east of Ireland—the Upper Bann, flowing into, and the Lower Bann, out of Lough Neagh. The Upper Bann, rising in the Mourne Mountains, runs 25 miles NNW. through Down and Armagh. The Lower Bann flows 40 miles NNW., through Lough Beg, dividing the counties of Antrim and Londonderry. It runs past Coleraine, into the Atlantic Ocean, 4 miles SW. of Portrush. It has important salmon and eel fisheries.

Bannatyne, a Forfarshire seat, 7½ miles NW. of Dundee.

Bannockburn, a Stirlingshire village of 3000 inhabitants, 3 miles SSE. of Stirling, on the Bannock Burn, a little affluent of the Forth. It is a seat of the woollen manufactures, especially of carpets and tartans. Here, on 24th June 1314, Robert Bruce, with 30,000 Scotch, gained a signal victory over Edward II., with 100,000 English. Not far off was fought the battle of Sauchieburn (q.v.). See R. White's Battle of Bannockburn (1871).

Banswara, a hilly, well-wooded state in the south-west of Rajputana. It has an area of 1500 sq. m., and is peopled by wild and turbulent Bheels. In 1818 it passed voluntarily under British protection. Pop. 164,000.—The capital, Banswara, lies 8 miles W. of the Mahi River. Pop. 6000.

Bantam′, a decayed seaport, 61 miles W. of Batavia, in a residency of the same name, which forms the west end of Java. It was the first Dutch establishment in Java (1595), and the seat of government of the residency, until transferred to the more salubrious Serang, 6 miles distant, in 1816.

Bantry, a seaport in the south-west of County Cork, at the head of Bantry Bay, and 44 miles WSW. of Cork. Pop. 3200.—BANTRY BAY runs 25 miles ENE., with a breadth of 4 to 6 miles. It is one of the finest harbours in Europe. Here a French force attempted to land in 1796.

Banyuls-sur-Mer, a watering-place of France in the Pyrénées Orientales, 21 miles SE. of Perpignan by rail. Pop. 3000.

Banyu′mas (Dutch spelling, Banjoemas), a town of Java, on the Serajo, 22 miles from the south coast. Pop. 9000.

Banyuwangi, a seaport on the east coast of Java. Pop. 10,000.

Banz, a former great Benedictine monastery (1071–1803) in Bavaria, on the Main, 3 miles below Lichtenfels.

Bapaume (Ba-pome′), a town in the French dep. of Pas-de-Calais, 12 miles S. of Arras, scene of a German victory on 2-3d January 1871. Pop. 3000.

Bar, a town of Russia, in Podolia, 50 miles E. of Kamenetz-Podolsk. Pop. 12,000.

Baracoa, a decayed seaport near the east end of Cuba. Pop. 6000.

Barataria, a bay of Louisiana, W. of the Mississippi delta, haunted in 1800–14 by a band of pirates.

Barbacena (Bar-ba-say′na), a town of Brazil, 125 miles NW. of Rio de Janeiro. It lies 3500 feet above the sea. Pop. 6000.

Barba′does, one of the Windward Islands, the most easterly of all the West Indies, lies 78 miles E. of St Vincent, in 13° 4′ N. lat., and 59° 37′ W. long. Its length is 21 miles; its greatest breadth, 14½ miles; and its area, 166 sq. m., almost all under cultivation. At Bridgetown, the capital, is the open roadstead of Carlisle Bay, the only harbour, the island being almost encircled by coral-reefs. The interior is generally hilly, Mount Hillaby, the loftiest summit, rising 1104 feet above sea-level. The climate is fairly healthy; the temperature equable; and the average rainfall 57 inches. Shocks of earthquake are sometimes felt, and thunderstorms are frequent and severe. But hurricanes are the grand scourge of Barbadoes, two in 1780 and 1831 having destroyed 4326 and 1591 persons, and property to the value of £1,320,564 and £1,602,800. Barbados is the official spelling. The area of the island is 166 square miles, the population 172,000—about 20,000 white, and the rest coloured. The island has a governor, a nominated Legislative Council, and an elected House of Assembly. The trade and the revenue bear testimony to the benefits of emancipation. Barbadoes was made the see of a bishop in 1824; and the bulk of the population belong to the Anglican communion. It was first colonised by the English in 1625, having previously been depopulated by the Spaniards. See Schomburgk's History of Barbadoes (1848) and Sinckler's Handbook.

Bar′bary, in Northern Africa, comprises the countries known in modern times as Barca, Tripoli Proper, Fezzan, Tunis, Algeria, and Morocco; and in ancient times as Mauritania, Numidia, Africa Propria, and Cyrenaica. It stretches from Egypt to the Atlantic Ocean, and from the Mediterranean to the Desert of Sahara, or between 10° W. and 25° E. long., and 25° to 37° N. lat. The north-west of this region is divided by the Atlas Mountains into two parts. The history of Barbary is a record of successive conquests by Romans, Vandals, Arabs, Turks, French, and Italians. To Europe it was chiefly known as the home of the dreaded Barbary corsairs. See the articles on the several countries of Barbary.

Barbastro, a cathedral city of Spain, on the Vero, 44 miles NW. of Lerida by rail. Pop. 8000.

Barberton, a gold-mining town of the Transvaal, 292 miles N. of Durban. Pop. 6000.

Barbizon (Bar-bee-zon^{g}′), a village close to the Forest of Fontainebleau. It is a great artists' resort, and was the home and death-place of Millet. Corot, Diaz, Daubigny, and Rousseau were other members of the 'Barbizon School' of painters.

Barbu′da, a fertile, densely wooded coral island, one of the Lesser Antilles, 30 miles N. of Antigua, of which it is a dependency. It is 10 miles long, 8 broad, and 60 sq. m. in area. Pop. 900.

Barby, a town of Prussian Saxony, on the Elbe, 15 miles SE. of Magdeburg. Pop. 7000.

Barca, a country extending along the northern coast of Africa, between the Great Syrtis (now Gulf of Sidra) and Egypt. The climate is healthy and agreeable in the more elevated parts, which reach a height of almost 2000 feet, and in those exposed to the sea-breeze. There are none but small streams, but the narrow terrace-like tracts of country are extremely fertile, realising all that is said of the ancient Cyrenaica. But the good soil extends over only about a fourth of Barca: the east exhibits only naked rocks and loose sand. Many ruins in the north-west attest its high state of cultivation in ancient times, when its five prosperous cities bore the title of the Libyan Pentapolis. Subject successively to Egypt, Rome, and the Byzantine empire, it was conquered by the Arabs in 641, and the Italians took it from Turkey in 1911–12. Area, 60,700 sq. m.; pop. 500,000. The capital is Benghazi (q.v.).

Barcellona and Pozzo di Gotto, communes of Sicily, 22 miles WSW. of Messina, standing close together, so as really to form one town. Barcellona has sulphur-baths. Pop. 15,000.

Barcelona, the second largest and the most important manufacturing city in Spain, is beautifully situated on the Mediterranean between the mouths of the Llobregat and the Besos, 228 miles E. of Saragossa and 439 ENE. of Madrid. The castle of Montjuich commands the town from the south, and the arsenals near by comprise infantry and cavalry barracks for 7000 men. Barcelona is divided into two parts—the old town and the new—by the Rambla (river-bed), which has been formed into a beautiful promenade. There is another fine promenade, the Muralla del Mar, or sea-wall. Barcelona has a cathedral (1298), a university (1430; rebuilt 1873) with 2500 students, a theatre (the scene in 1893 of an Anarchist bomb outrage), and manufactures of silk, woollens, cottons, lace, hats, firearms, hardware, &c. The imports are raw cotton, coffee, sugar, wheat, spirits, timber, salt-fish, hides, wax, iron, and coal; the exports fruits, vegetables, wines, silk, oil, and salt. Next to Cadiz, it is the chief port in Spain; in population it is next to Madrid. Pop. (1878) 249,106; (1910, after annexation of suburbs) 560,000.

Barcelona, capital of the former state of Bermudez, Venezuela, near the mouth of the Neveri, 160 miles E. of Caracas. Pop. 10,800.

Bard, a village in the Italian province of Turin, 23 miles SE. of Aosta. When the French crossed the St Bernard in 1800, Bard fortress, manned by 400 Austrians, maintained an eight days' resistance to their further advance.

Bardsey, 9 miles NNE. of Leeds, was the birthplace of the dramatist Congreve.

Bardsey Isle, an island, 2 miles long, in Cardigan Bay, with a ruined monastery.

Bardwan', or BURDWAN (correctly Vardhamâna), a city of Bengal, 67 miles NNW. of Calcutta by rail. In point of architecture, it is a miserable place—an aggregate, as it were, of 73 villages. It contains a palace of the Maharajahs, and a large collection of temples. Pop. 35,080.

Barèges (Ba-rezh'), a small watering-place, with mineral baths, in the French dep. of Hautes-Pyrénées, 4040 feet above sea-level, and 12 miles SE. of Pierrefitte railway station.

Bareilly, or BARELI, the chief city of a district in Rohilkhand, the United Provinces of India, on the Ramganga, 152 miles E. of Delhi. Cotton, grain, and sugar are the staples of commerce; furniture and upholstery the manufactures. Bareilly is the seat of a college attended by over 300 students. Population, 130,000.—Rai Bareilly is a town in Oudh, near Lucknow.

Barfleur (Bar-flör'), a seaport in the French dep. of La Manche, 15 miles E. of Cherbourg. Hence, in 1066, William the Conqueror set out on his invasion of England. On the ill-famed Pointe de Barfleur stands the highest lighthouse in France, 271 feet above the sea. Pop. 1000.

Barfrush. See BALFRUSH.

Barga Pass, a Himalaya hill-pass (15,000 feet) in the north of Bashahr State, Punjab.

Bar Harbor, a fashionable American seaside resort, 46 miles SE. of Bangor, Maine. Pop. 2000.

Barholm, a ruined tower (Scott's 'Ellangowan') on the coast of Kirkcudbrightshire, 5¾ miles SE. of Creetown.

Bari (Bâh'ree), capital of an Italian province, on a peninsula in the Adriatic, 277 miles SE. of Ancona, with a brisk export trade, an old Norman castle, the church of San Nicola (1087), and the older archiepiscopal cathedral. Pop. 103,500.

Baringo, an African lake lying NE. of the Victoria Nyanza, and ½ degree N. of the equator. It is 20 miles long, lies 3000 feet above the sea, and has no outlet, though its water is fresh.

Barisal, headquarters of Bakarganj (q.v.), in a region of the Brahmaputra delta, disturbed by mysterious noises of disputed origin known as 'Barisal guns.' Pop. 16,000.

Barking, a market-town of Essex, on the Roding, 7 miles NE. of London, with market-gardens and jute-factories. Its Benedictine abbey (founded 670), one of the richest convents in the kingdom, has left hardly a trace. Near Barking Creek is one of the great outfalls into the Thames of the (partially purified) London sewage. Pop. (1851) 5076; (1891) 14,301; (1911) 31,302.

Barkly, two towns in South Africa: Barkly East, in the NE., 35 miles E. of Aliwal North, pop. 1600; Barkly West, a diamond-digging centre in 1870–90, on the Vaal, 40 miles NE. of Kimberley, pop. 1500.

Bar-le-Duc, capital of the French dep. of Meuse, 158 miles E. of Paris. It manufactures cottons, and has the ruined castle of the Dukes of Bar. Pop. 15,000.

Barletta, a seaport of Italy, on the Adriatic, 34 miles NW. of Bari by rail. Pop. 45,000.

Barmen, a busy town in the district of Düsseldorf, Rhenish Prussia, extending in the beautiful valley of the Wupper for about 4 miles from Elberfeld (q.v.), with which it forms practically one town, almost to Langenfeld. It is the principal seat of the ribbon-manufacture on the Continent, and produces also cloth, stay-laces, thread, soap, candles, metal wares, buttons, machinery, and pianofortes. There are besides, in the valley, numerous bleach-fields and Turkey-red dye-works. Barmen is a great missionary centre, and possesses the mission-house and seminary of foreign missions belonging to the Rhenish Missionary Society. Pop. (1871) 74,947; (1890) 116,144; (1910) 169,201.

Barmouth, a watering-place of Merionethshire, Wales, at the mouth of the Maw, 10 miles W. of Dolgelly. Opposite, across the river, is Cader Idris, 2914 feet high. Pop. 2100.

Barnard Castle, a market-town in the county of Durham, on the Tees, 15 miles W. of Darlington. On a rocky height are the ruins of a castle built in 1112–32 by Barnard Baliol. Near it is an art museum (1874). Population about 5000.

Barnaul, a town of Western Siberia, on the Obi, 290 miles SSW. of Tomsk. It is a great mining and smelting centre. Pop. 47,000.

Barnes, a Surrey urban district, on the Thames, 7 miles WSW. of Waterloo Station. It has memories of Cowley, Fielding, Handel, Hoare, and the 'Kitcat Club.' Pop. 30,500.

Barnet, a town of Hertfordshire, 11 miles NNW. of London. It has still large fairs. Here, on 14th April 1471, the Yorkists defeated the Lancastrians, killing their leader, Warwick, 'the king-maker.' An obelisk (1740) marks the spot. Pop. 10,500.

Barnsley, a manufacturing town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the river Dearne, 10 miles S. of Wakefield, and 15 N. of Sheffield by rail. Standing high, in the midst of a rich mineral district, it has manufactures of linen, iron, steel, and glass, bleaching and dye works, &c. It was made a municipal borough in 1869. Pop. (1851) 13,437; (1891) 35,427; (1911) 50,614.

Barnstable, a port of entry, with coasting and fishing trade, in Massachusetts, U.S., situated on the south side of Barnstable Bay, 65 miles SE. of Boston. Pop. 4700.

Barn'staple, a town of Devonshire, on the right bank of the tidal Taw, 6 miles from its mouth, and 40 NW. of Exeter by rail. Owing to the silting up of the river, much of the trade of Barnstaple has been transferred to Bideford. It has manufactures of lace and pottery. Athelstan built a castle here; and there are a 14th-century parish church, a town-hall (1855), an Albert memorial tower (1863), &c. Till 1885 Barnstaple returned two members. Population, 14,500.

Baro'da, the second city of Guzerat, and third in the Presidency of Bombay, capital of the territory of the Guicowar (Gáekwár) of Baroda, is 248 miles N. of Bombay by rail. It stands to the east of the Viswamitri, and has several palaces and a considerable trade, occupying an important position between the coast and the interior. Population, 100,000.—The Mahratta state of Baroda, the political control of which in 1875 was transferred from Bombay to the government of India, includes the territories of the Guicowar in various parts of the province of Guzerat. Area of these territories, 8570 sq. m. (larger than Wales). Pop. 2,000,000.

Barossa. See Barrosa.

Barquisimeto (Bar-kee-see-may'to), a town of Venezuela, on an affluent of the Tocuyo, in a fertile and healthy plain, 1700 feet above sea-level. Founded in 1522, it was destroyed in 1812 by a dreadful earthquake. Pop. 40,000.

Barra, an island of Inverness-shire, near the southern extremity of the outer Hebrides, 42 miles W. of Ardnamurchan Point. It is 8 miles long, 2 to 5 broad, and 25 sq. m. in area. A low sandy isthmus, over which the sea nearly breaks at high water, connects the two parts into which Barra is divided. The south or larger part rises to 2000 feet. The population is about 2300, Gaelic-speaking, and largely Catholic, and among the most industrious of Scottish fishermen. A lighthouse (1833) on Barra Head is 680 feet above the sea. Kismull Castle was the ancient seat of the M'Neills; who in 1840 sold the island to Colonel Gordon of Cluny.

Barra, a pleasant suburban town, 3 miles E. of Naples; pop. 10,000.

Barra, a petty Mandingo kingdom of Western Africa, near the mouth of the Gambia, with an estimated pop. of 200,000. It is in the protectorate of Gambia (q.v.).

Barrackpur, a town of Bengal, on the E. bank of the Hooghly, 15 miles up-stream from Calcutta, is a favourite retreat for Europeans. Pop., with Nawabganj, about 20,000.

Barrafranca, a town of Sicily, near Caltanisetta; pop. 10,000.

Barra Head. See Bernera.

Barra Mansa, a town of Brazil, on the Parahiba, 70 miles NW. of Rio de Janeiro; pop. 6000.

Barranquilla (Bar-ran-keel'ya), the chief port of Colombia, near the Magdalena's left bank, 15 miles from the sea; pop. 40,000.

Barre, a manufacturing town in Vermont, U.S., 6 miles SE. of Montpelier; pop. 10,700.

Barren Island, a small active volcano in the Bay of Bengal, lying east of the Andamans.

Barrhead', a town of Renfrewshire, 8¾ miles SW. of Glasgow by rail. Founded about 1773, it has cotton-mills, and bleaching, dyeing, and print works. The poet John Davidson was born here. Pop. 11,400.

Barrier Reef, an immense coral-reef extending along the NE. coast of Australia for over 1000 miles, at a distance from the shore of from 10 to upwards of 100 miles. In many places it rises out of great depths. There are several breaks or passages in it, only one, Raines Inlet, being safe for ships, with a lighthouse. See Saville-Kent, The Great Barrier Reef (1893).

Barro'sa, a Spanish village 16 miles SSE. of Cadiz. Here, on March 5, 1811, General Graham (Lord Lynedoch), with a handful of British, gained a glorious victory over the French.

Barrow, a term applied in honour of Sir John Barrow, to (1) Point Barrow, on the northern coast of Alaska, in 71° 23′ N. lat. and 156° 31′ W. long., long received as the most northerly spot on the American mainland (but see Bellot Strait, Boothia).—(2) Cape Barrow, on the northern coast of Canada, or Coronation Gulf, 68° N. lat., 111° W. long.—(3) Barrow Strait, the earliest of Parry's discoveries, leading to the west out of Lancaster Sound. Besides its main course to Melville Sound, Barrow Strait throws off Prince Regent's Inlet to the south, and Wellington Channel to the north. It averages 50 miles in breadth, extending pretty nearly along the parallel of 74° N., from 85° to 100° W.

Barrow, a river in the south-east of Ireland, rising in the north of Queen's County, on the north-east slope of the Slieve Bloom Mountains, and flowing 100 miles E. and S. past Portarlington, Athy, Carlow, and New Ross, until, having received the Nore and the Suir, it forms the large and secure estuary of Waterford harbour, 9 miles long. It is navigable for ships of 300 tons to New Ross, 25 miles up, and for barges to Athy, 65 miles up, whence the Grand Canal communicates with Dublin.

Barrow Falls, 2 miles S. of Keswick, a double cascade, 122 feet high.

Barrow-in-Furness, a seaport and manufacturing town of North Lancashire, situated on the south-western coast of the peninsula of Furness. By rail it is 36 miles WNW. of Lancaster, and 268 NNW. of London. In 1847 it was a fishing-village of 325 inhabitants; in 1864 the population had risen to 10,608, in 1871 to 18,245, in 1891 to 51,712, and in 1911 to 63,770. This rapid increase, matched in Great Britain by few towns other than those near London, is owing to the discovery in 1840 of extensive deposits of rich hæmatite ore at Park, near Barrow; to the establishment both of mines and smelting-works; and to the opening of railway communication throughout the district. Smelting-works established in 1859 were in 1866 amalgamated with the Bessemer Steel Company, founded three years before. Copper also is obtained in considerable quantity in the neighbourhood; whilst some 20,000 tons of slate are annually quarried. The Dukes of Devonshire and Buccleuch are the principal landowners, and gave name to the first two docks, which, together covering 66 acres, were opened by Mr Gladstone in 1867. The Ramsden and the Cavendish Dock (1877) cover a respective area of 78 and 200 acres, and, like their predecessors, are 24 feet deep. Barrow Island has since 1871 become the seat of vast steel ship-building yards; and huge flax and jute works were erected in 1872 to provide employment for women and girls. There are, besides engineering works, a great steam-mill, furnace-building works, and iron-founding, paper-pulp making, brewing, boiler-making, &c. A bridge (1908) gives access to Walney Island, where live many of those employed in the Vickers shipyards. The great ornament of the place is the town-hall, built in 1887. The interesting ruins of Furness Abbey lie within 2 miles of the town; while on Piel Island there are the ruins of a castle built by the Abbot of Furness. A municipal (1867), county

Barrow-on-Soar, a village of Leicestershire, 3 miles SE. of Loughborough.

Barry, a seaport, with docks and a tidal basin, in Glamorgan, 7 miles SW. of Cardiff; it exports coal, iron, and iron manufactures. Pop. 34,000.

Barry Links, in Forfarshire, 9 miles ENE. of Dundee, a government camp of instruction.

Bar-sur-Aube (Bar-sür-Oab), a town in the French dep. of Aube, 137 miles ESE. of Paris. Pop. 4000.

Bar-sur-Seine (Bar-sür-Sayn), a town in the French dep. Aube, 21 m. SE. of Troyes. Pop. 3000.

Bartfa, or BARTFELD, a town of Hungary, on the river Topla, near the borders of Galicia, with hot baths. Pop. 7000.

Barth (Bart), a seaport of Prussia, at the mouth of the Barth, 21 miles W. of Stralsund. Pop. 9000.

Barton-upon-Humber, an ancient town of Lincolnshire, 8 miles SW. of Hull. Pop. 6700.

Barton-upon-Irwell, a village and township of Lancashire, 5½ miles W. of Manchester. Here was built in 1770 Brindley's famous aqueduct, carrying the Bridgewater Canal across the Irwell, superseded in 1890–93 by a swing bridge of novel and ingenious construction, crossing the Manchester Ship Canal. Pop. of rural district, 9300.

Bas. See BATZ.

Basel (Bâh'zel; Fr. Bâle; old Fr. Basle), a Swiss city and canton. The canton was divided in 1833 into two independent half-cantons, called Basel-town and Basel-country. The urban half-canton consists only of the city, with its precincts, and three villages on the right bank of the Rhine; the remainder forms the half-canton of Basel-country, which borders on Alsace-Lorraine and Baden, and has an area of 178 sq. m.—but little larger than Rutlandshire. The Roman Basilia, after 1032 it formed part of the German empire, but joined the Swiss Confederacy in 1501, having in 1431–43 been the scene of a famous church council. The Rhine, here spanned by three bridges, 200 yards long, divides the city into two parts—Great Basel on the south side, and Little Basel on the north. The minster, a cathedral till 1528, was built between 1010 and 1500. It has two conspicuous towers, 218 feet high. Other buildings are the town-hall (1508); the university (1460); a museum, with thirty-two pictures by the younger Holbein, who lived thirteen years in Basel; and a public university library of 160,000 volumes and 4000 manuscripts. During the Reformation, the university was a central point of spiritual life, and it has numbered among its professors Erasmus and Œcolampadius, both of whom died here, and the mathematicians Euler and Bernouilli, who were natives. It has now some 100 professors and lecturers, and about 500 students. There are manufactures of ribbons, linen, cotton, &c. Pop., mainly Protestant and German-speaking, of Basel-country, 76,000; of Basel-town, 135,000.

Bashahr, one of the Punjab Hill-states. Area, 3320 sq. m.; pop. 74,345.

Bashan, a country of North-eastern Palestine, situated to the east of the Jordan. A volcanic plateau rising in the Jebel-ed-Druz to 6000 feet, it extends 60 miles north and south, and about 40 miles east and west. It is covered with the ruins of the so-called 'giant cities,' which, however, according to Major Conder, date only from the early Christian centuries; their roofs, doors, stairs, and windows are of stone, some of them as perfect as when first built. See Dr Porter's Giant Cities of Bashan (1865).

Bashi, or BATANES ISLANDS, the most northerly small cluster of islets in the Philippine chain of islands, lying between Luzon and Formosa. They consist of three larger (Bayal, Batan, and Saptang) and many smaller islets. Area, 127 sq. m.; pop. 10,000.

Basim, or BASSIM, a town of India, in the province of Berar, 413 miles E. by N. of Bombay. Pop. 12,576.

Basingstoke, a municipal bor. in the north of Hampshire, 48 miles WSW. of London. It is a busy road and railway centre, and has iron-foundries, clothing-factories, and breweries. Basing House (Marquis of Winchester), 1½ mile E., for two years withstood the Roundheads; but Cromwell at last took it by storm and burned it to the ground in 1645. Pop. (1911) 11,540.

Basle. See BASEL.

Basra (also Bassora and Busra), a town of Asiatic Turkey, on the west bank of the Euphrates, 56 miles from its mouth in the Persian Gulf. The river, navigable up to Basra for ships of 500 tons, is there divided into a number of channels, and by evaporation and frequent overflowing makes the climate very unhealthy. The population, once 150,000, had sunk in 1854 to 5000, but the establishment of the English Tigris and Euphrates Steamship Company altogether changed the prospects of Basra, and now it probably contains at least 50,000 inhabitants. Basra is also spoken of as likely to be the terminus of the Bagdad Railway. See ASIA MINOR, BAGDAD.

Bass. See BASS ROCK.

Bassadore, the principal station for British ships in the Persian Gulf, situated at the west end of the island of Kishm.

Bassa'no, a cathedral city of Italy, on the Brenta, 30 miles N. by W. of Padua. Near it Napoleon defeated the Austrians in 1796. Pop. 9000.

Bassas, dangerous ledges of rocks to the SE. of Ceylon, in 6° 11′—6° 22′ N. lat., and in 81° 28′—81° 43′ E. long. On both are lighthouses.

Bassein', (1) a town in Burma, on the Bassein River, one of the mouths of the Irawadi, 75 miles from the sea, but accessible to the largest ships. It is an important centre of the rice trade. It was captured by the British in 1852. Pop. 30,147.—(2) A decayed town, 28 miles N. of Bombay. Ceded to the Portuguese in 1534, it was taken by the Mahrattas in 1765, and in 1780 surrendered to the British. The population has shrunk from 60,000 in 1720 to about one-sixth.

Bassenthwaite, a Cumberland lake, 3 miles NNW. of Keswick. It is 4 miles long, ¾ mile wide, 78 feet deep, and 226 feet above sea-level. Skiddaw towers above it.

Basse-terre (Fr., 'lowland'), three places in the West Indies.—(1) The capital of St Christopher's or St Kitt's, on the west coast; pop. 10,000.—(2) Capital of the French island of Guadeloupe; pop. 9000.—(3) The chief town of Marie Galante, a dependency of Guadeloupe, which is about 12 miles to the NW.

Bassora. See BASRA.

Bass Rock, an island-rock of Haddingtonshire, near the mouth of the Firth of Forth, 2 miles from Canty Bay, and 3¼ miles ENE. of North Berwick. Confronted by the ruins of Tantallon Castle, and composed of volcanic greenstone and trap tuff, it is 1 mile in circumference, and 313 feet high, is inaccessible on all sides but the south, and is denizened by myriads of solan geese and other birds, which give it a snowy appearance in the distance. In 756 St Baldred died in a hermitage on the Bass Rock; in 1671 Charles II. purchased it for £4000, and within its dreary dungeons many Covenanters were confined. Four young Jacobite prisoners captured, and, with twelve more who joined them, held it for King James, from June 1691 till April 1694. In 1701 the fortifications were demolished, and five years afterwards the Bass passed into the possession of the Dalrymples. See an interesting volume by Hugh Miller and four others (1848).

Bass Strait, the isleted channel separating Tasmania from Australia. It runs 180 miles almost due east and west, and has an average breadth of 140 miles. It was named after George Bass, surgeon of H.M.S. Reliance, who in 1798 proved the existence of the channel.

Bastia (Bastee'a), a seaport of Corsica, 95 miles NNE. of Ajaccio by rail. It was founded in 1383 by the Genoese, and till 1811 was the capital of Corsica. Pop. 25,000.

Basutoland, a British possession in South Africa, lying between the Cape, Natal, and Orange Free State Provinces, with an area of 10,300 sq. m.—nearly as large as Belgium—and a population of 1400 Europeans and 400,000 Basutos, a people either belonging to the Bechuana stock or closely allied thereto. The country is one continuous rugged plateau, has the best grain land in South Africa, and admirable pasture; the climate is excellent, the scenery beautiful. Basutoland was annexed to the Cape Province in 1868, but separated from it in 1884; it is governed by a resident commissioner under the High Commissioner for South Africa.

Batangas, a seaport of the Philippine island of Luzon, 50 miles S. of Manilla, on an extensive bay opening into the Strait of Mindoro. It was founded in 1581. Pop. of town and district, 40,000.

Bata'via, properly the name of the island occupied by the ancient Batavi, became at a later date the Latin name for Holland and the whole kingdom of the Netherlands. The name Batavian Republic was borne by the Netherlands from 1795 till 1806.

Batavia, the capital of the Dutch East Indian possessions, stands on the NW. coast of Java, near the mouth of the Tjiliwong. That small and shallow river is connected with a network of canals which intersect the town; and the influence of a vertical sun on the canals made Batavia proverbial as the grave of Europeans. The temperature, though not extreme, is oppressive from its uniformity, the mean of winter being 78·1° F., and that of summer only 78·6°. Latterly, the climate has been improved by draining, and most of the merchants live in the healthier suburbs, farther inland. The old town now contains mainly shops, stores, offices, and the houses of natives and Chinese. During the day, however, it is a busy place; and in it are still the town-house, the exchange, the great poorhouse, a hospital, &c. The bay is spacious, but very shallow towards the shore. Batavia is accessible only to boats; and in 1876–86 the government constructed a great harbour some five miles to the eastward at Tanjong Priok, connected with the capital by road, rail, and canal. To seaward the bay is protected by a range of islands and sandbanks. Its markets present at once all the productions of Asia and all the manufactures of Europe. Exports are coffee, rice, indigo, cinchona, tobacco, hides, arrack, sugar, tin, pepper, teak, tea, and tamarinds; imports, cottons, woollens, silks, machinery, iron goods, and wine. In 1811, while Holland was under France, Batavia was taken by the British, but was restored to its former owners in 1816. The Dutch government has laid a telegraphic cable of 600 miles from Batavia to Singapore. Population, 145,000.

Batavia, a post-village of Western New York, on Tonawanda Creek, 36 miles NE. of Buffalo by rail. Pop. 10,000.

Batchian. See MOLUCCAS.

Bath, the chief city of Somerset, is beautifully situated in the wooded valley of the sinuous Avon, 12 miles ESE. of Bristol, and 107 W. of London. Its houses are built mostly of white freestone—'Bath oolite,' worked in the neighbouring quarries. Set in a natural amphitheatre, with Lansdown Hill (813 feet) to the north, the city has a finer appearance than any other in England. The beauty and sheltered character of its situation, the mildness of its climate, and especially the curative efficacy of its hot chalybeate and radio-active springs, have rendered it a fashionable resort. The springs were known to the Romans, who here in the 1st century A.D. built baths, of which extensive remains have been discovered. The temperature of the springs varies from 97° to 120° F. The water is most useful in bilious, nervous, and scrofulous complaints, palsy, rheumatism, gout, and cutaneous diseases. Besides a beautiful park (1830), Bath has the Assembly Rooms (1771), the Guild-hall (1766), the Pump-room (1797), the Mineral Water Hospital (1737–1861), and the new baths (1887); as well as a concert-hall, with a promenade, above the old Roman bath. The Abbey Church (1499–1616) is a cruciform Late Perpendicular structure, with a fine fan-tracery ceiling in the style of Henry VII.'s chapel, and a central tower 162 feet high. On Lansdown Hill is Beckford's Tower, 130 feet high, built by the eccentric author of Vathek. South of the city is Prior Park, built in 1743 by Ralph Allen, Fielding's friend. Bath returns two members to parliament, and conjointly with Wells is the seat of a diocese. It has no manufactures of importance; but it has given name to a kind of bun, to wheeled invalid-chairs, and perhaps to 'bricks' (made, not at Bath, but at Bridgwater, of sand) for cleaning metal. Coal is found in the neighbourhood. Pop. (extended bounds, 1911) 69,000. Traditionally founded by a British prince, Bladud (863 B.C.), Bath is really of great antiquity. It was a Roman station called Aquæ Sulis, at the intersection of the great Roman ways from London to Wales, and from Lincoln to the south coast of England. Richard I. granted Bath its earliest extant charter. It figures frequently in literature, in the works of Smollett, Fielding, Anstey, Madame D'Arblay, Miss Austen, Dickens, &c. See works by Warner (1800), Scarth (1864), Sir G. Jackson (1873), Peach (1873–86), King and Watts (1885), Barbeau (1904).

Bath, a city and port of entry, Maine, U.S., on the Kennebec River, 35 miles S. of Augusta. Shipbuilding is the chief industry. Bath was incorporated as a town in 1780, and as a city in 1850. Pop. 9400.

Bathgate, a town of Linlithgowshire, 20 miles W. by S. of Edinburgh. Freestone, coal, carboniferous limestone, and bituminous shale have been extensively wrought in the vicinity—the last since 1852. There are also large paraffin and paper works, a distillery, &c. In 1824 the town was constituted a free burgh of barony, in 1865 a police-burgh. Sir James Simpson was a native. Pop. 8200.

Bath'urst, a name applied to various localities in honour of Earl Bathurst, Colonial Secretary (1812–28).—(1) BATHURST in New South Wales, the first county settled beyond the Blue Mountains, is bounded NE. by the Macquarie, and SW. by the Lachlan. The district is agricultural. Mining—principally for gold and copper—is carried on sporadically. The chief town, Bathurst, on the Macquarie River, 96 miles W. of Sydney (144 by rail), erected into a municipality in 1862, contains a government railway workshop, and has manufactures of soap, candles, glue, boots, leather, beer, &c. It is the seat of an Anglican and of a Roman Catholic bishop. Pop. 12,000.—(2) BATHURST ISLAND, off the Northern Territory of Australia, close to the much larger Melville Island.—(3) BATHURST, the principal settlement of the British colony on the Gambia (q.v.). It is situated on St Mary's Isle, a sandbank at the mouth of the river. Pop. 8000.—(4) An island in the Arctic Ocean, intersected by the 100th meridian, and situated immediately beyond the 75th parallel.—(5) BATHURST INLET, an arm of the Arctic Ocean, projecting due south for 75 miles into the North American continent, just touching the Arctic circle and 110° west longitude.—(6) A division in the east of the Cape Province.

Batignolles, a northern suburb of Paris.

Batjan. See MOLUCCAS.

Batley, a manufacturing town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 8 miles SW. of Leeds; since 1868 a municipal borough, associated for parliamentary purposes with Dewsbury, 1 mile distant. Batley is a chief seat of the shoddy and heavy woollen manufactures—army cloths, flushings, pilots, druggets, &c. It has a town-hall (1864–74), a free grammar-school (1612; reconstituted 1874), waterworks (1871–78), &c. Pop. (1851) 9308; (1871) 20,871; (1911, mun. borough) 36,389.

Batn-el-Hajar ('Womb of Rocks'), a stony district of Nubia, stretching along the Nile in the neighbourhood of the third cataract.

Baton Rouge, a city on the east bank of the Mississippi, 129 miles above New Orleans, from 1847 to 1862, and again since 1880, the capital of the state of Louisiana. It has a state university, a national arsenal and barracks, a military hospital, a deaf and dumb asylum, an elegant state-house, &c. Pop. 23,000.

Batoum', a town of Russian Transcaucasia, on the Black Sea, 201 miles W. of Tiflis, and 575 of Baku, by a railway (1883). The Berlin Congress of 1878, in sanctioning the cession of Batoum by Turkey to Russia, stipulated that it should not be made into a naval station; but the Russians have rendered it a second Sebastopol, and in 1886 withdrew its privileges as a free port. The harbour is one of the best on the east coast of the Black Sea. Pop. 33,000, mostly Russians. Batoum was founded as Petra by one of Justinian's generals early in the 6th century A.D., and figures as Vati in the middle ages.

Batshian. See MOLUCCAS.

Battersea, a SW. suburb of London, on the Surrey side of the Thames, here crossed by the Chelsea, Albert, and Battersea bridges. In the parish church (1777) is a monument to Lord Bolingbroke, who was born and died in a house close by. Battersea Park, 185 acres in area, was laid out in 1852–58 at a cost of £318,000. It is now one of the London metropolitan boroughs. Pop. (1911) 167,743. The parliamentary division returns one member.

Battle, a town in Sussex, 6 miles NW. of Hastings. An uninhabited heathland then, Senlac by name, it received its present name from the battle of Hastings, fought here on 14th October 1066, when William the Conqueror overthrew King Harold. To commemorate his victory, he founded in 1067, on the spot where Harold fell, a splendid Benedictine abbey. The so-called Battle Abbey Roll, generally assumed to have been a list of William's followers, but probably of Edward I.'s time or later, is supposed to have perished in the burning of Cowdray House, near Midhurst, in 1793; and the ten copies of it extant have all been grossly tampered with. The abbey, two-thirds a ruin, was bought in 1857 by Lord Harry Vane, afterward Duke of Cleveland. Pop. 3000. See works by J. B. Burke (1848), Mackenzie Walcott (2d ed. 1867), and the Duchess of Cleveland (1889).

Battle Creek, a thriving town of Michigan, on the Kalamazoo River, 45 miles SW. of Lansing. It has flour-mills, iron-foundries, machine-shops, &c. Pop. 25,300.

Battlefield, 3 miles NE. of Shrewsbury, the scene of the battle of Shrewsbury (1403), in which Hotspur was defeated and slain.

Battleford, in Saskatchewan, Canada, at the junction of the Battle River with the Saskatchewan, a junction of the Canadian Northern and other railways. It was capital of the North-west in 1876–83. Pop. 1300.

Batum. See BATOUM.

Baturin', a town of south-west Russia, on the Seim, 50 miles SSW. of Novgorod. Pop. 8000.

Batz, or BAS, a small island in the English Channel, belonging to France, and situated off the north coast of the dep. of Finistère. Its length is about 2½ miles, and its breadth about 1⅞ mile. Pop. 1000.

Bauchi, a province of Nigeria, with alluvial tin.

Bautzen (Bowt'zen; Wendish Budissin), a town in Saxony, on the Spree, 35 miles W. of Görlitz. The chief buildings are a former cathedral (1497), and the castle of Ortenburg, dating from 958, a frequent residence of the kings of Bohemia. The manufactures include woollens, fustian, linen, hosiery, leather, and gunpowder. Population, about 33,000. Here Napoleon won a barren victory over the Russians and Prussians, May 20–21, 1813.

Bavaria (Ger. Bayern), the second state of the German empire. It is divided into two unequal parts, separated by Baden and Hesse-Darmstadt, of which the eastern comprises eleven-twelfths of the whole. Its frontiers touch also on Alsace-Lorraine, Prussia, Bohemia, Austria, and Tyrol—the divisions are Bavaria upper and lower, the Palatinate upper and lower, the three divisions of Franconia, and Swabia. The area, 30,000 sq. m., is a little less than that of Scotland. In 1910 the pop. was 6,876,497; Munich, the capital, had over 600,000 inhabitants, and Nuremberg over 333,000. There are close on 4,900,000 Catholics to 1,942,000 Protestants and 55,000 Jews. Bavaria is walled in on the SE., NE., and NW. by mountains ranging from 3000 feet to close on 10,000 feet in height—highest elevation the Zugspitz in the Noric Alps, 9665 feet high. The interior is intersected in several directions by various less elevated ranges, alternating with extensive plains and fertile valleys. The country is rich in wood, nearly one-third of its surface being covered with forests, mostly of pine and fir. The Rhine flows along the eastern boundary of the Palatinate; the Danube has a navigable course of 270 miles in Bavaria; the north part of the state is in the basin of the Main. The soil is very fertile, and the wealth of the country consists almost wholly of its agricultural produce, including wine and cattle. The chief minerals are salt—a government monopoly—coal, and iron, which is worked almost everywhere. Beer, coarse linens, and woollens are the most important manufactures. The growth of the population of Bavaria was much checked by the law that no marriage should take place until the guardians of the poor were satisfied that the persons wishing to marry had adequate means to support a wife and family—a law which has tended to increase inordinately the number of illegitimate children. The three Bavarian universities are at Munich, Würzburg, and Erlangen, the last being Protestant. Bavaria is a constitutional monarchy, the throne hereditary in the male line. When Bavaria in 1870 became one of the states of the German empire, she still retained certain privileges, including the control of her home affairs, of her postal system, and of her army in time of peace. The army forms three corps of the imperial army, under the command of the king of Bavaria in time of peace, but controlled by the emperor of Germany in war. The legislature consists of a chamber of senators and one of deputies. The revenue of Bavaria is about £35,000,000, which of late has just balanced the total expenditure. The public debt is nearly £120,000,000, about two-thirds of it having been contracted for railways.

Held successively by the Celtic Boii, the Ostrogoths, and the Franks, Bavaria was constituted first a margraviate, then a dukedom by Charlemagne and his successors; and in 1180 the crown was bestowed on a duke of the House of Wittelsbach, ancestor of the still reigning dynasty. The Rhenish Palatinate was added to the ducal dominions in 1216: in 1805 the duke was, for services rendered, made a king by Napoleon I. The Bavarians sided with Austria in 1866, and took an active share in the Franco-German war of 1870–71.

Bawtry, a village in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 8 miles SE. of Doncaster. Pop. of parish, 1000.

Baya'mo, or SAN SALVADOR, a town in the east of Cuba, on the northern slope of the Sierra Maestra. It is connected by railway with Manzanilla. Pop. 5000.

Bayana, or BIANA, a town of India, in the Rajput state of Bhurtpur, 50 miles SW. of Agra. Pop. 8758.

Bayazid', a town of Turkish Armenia, in the province of Erzerum, on a spur of Ala Dagh, 15 miles SW. of the foot of Mount Ararat. From 15,000 prior to 1829 its pop. has dwindled to 3000. In 1877 it was seized by the Russians, but was restored by the Berlin Congress of 1878.

Bay City, the fourth town of Michigan, U.S., on the Saginaw River, 4 miles from Saginaw Bay, and 108 miles NNW. of Detroit. It is an important railway centre, with a large trade in timber and salt, and some shipbuilding. Sugar and alcohol are made from beet grown in the neighbourhood. Pop. (1860) 1583; (1890) 27,839; (1910) 45,166. On the western bank of the river are the consolidated villages of Salzburg, Wenona, and Banks, known as West Bay City. Bay City and West Bay City, which are joined by several bridges, were consolidated in 1905. The village of Essex adjoins the north end of the city.

Bayern. See BAVARIA.

Bayeux (Bah-yuh'), a city of Normandy, in the French dep. Calvados, on the Aure, 15 miles NW. of Caen. In its public library is the famous 'Bayeux Tapestry;' and its cathedral was rebuilt after a fire by William the Conqueror in 1077, though the present edifice dates mainly from 1106 to the 13th century. Pop. 7000.

Bay Islands, a small group in the Bay of Honduras, 150 miles SE. of Balize. The cluster was proclaimed a British colony in 1852, but in 1859 was ceded to Honduras. The chief of the six islands is Roatan (30 by 9 miles; 900 feet high). Pop. 3000.

Bay of Islands, a safe and extensive harbour on the east coast of the northernmost portion of the North Island of New Zealand. It is 11 miles across, and nearly a hundred islands stud its surface. Russell, a considerable port, is on the south side of the bay.

Bayonne, a strongly fortified town in the French dep. of Basses-Pyrénées, at the confluence of the Adour and Nive, 4 miles from the Bay of Biscay, and 63 miles WNW. of Pau by rail. Population (declining), 20,000. Spanish in aspect, yet with a strong Basque admixture, it has a 13th-century cathedral, an inviolate citadel, one of Vauban's masterpieces; and manufactures of brandy, liquorice, chocolate, bottles, &c. Bayonne belonged to the duchy of Aquitaine, then to Gascony, and to the English from 1152 to 1451. In 1814 it was besieged in vain by the British and Spanish allies.

Bayonne, a city of New Jersey, U.S., 6 miles SW. of New York by rail, on the narrow peninsula to the south of Jersey City, between New York and Newark Bays. It has large docks and chemical and other works. Pop. 56,000.

Bayreuth. See BAIREUTH.

Bayswater, the S. part of Paddington.

Baza (Roman Bastia), a town of Spain, 50 miles ENE. of Granada. Pop. 13,000.

Bazardjik, or DOBRITCH, a town of the Dobrudja, 26 miles N. of Varna, Roumanian since 1913; pop. 17,000.—TATAR-BAZARDJIK, a town of Bulgaria, on the Upper Maritza, 23 miles W. of Philippopolis by rail, with warm baths, and 18,000 inhabitants, having greatly increased since the Russo-Turkish war of 1877–78.

Bazeilles (Ba-zel'ye), a village in the French dep. of Ardennes, near the Meuse, 4 miles SSE. of Sedan. A pretty, well-to-do place, it was burnt to the ground by the Bavarians on the day of Sedan (1st Sept. 1870), but was rebuilt, in great measure with British contributions. Pop. 1000.

Beachy Head, the loftiest headland on the south coast of England, projecting into the English Channel, 3½ miles SSW. of Eastbourne, Sussex. It consists of perpendicular chalk-cliffs, 575 feet high, forming the east end of the South Downs. The Belle Toute Lighthouse (1831), 2½ miles to the west, was 285 feet above the sea, but the new one is at the foot of the cliff. Off Beachy Head, a French fleet beat the combined English and Dutch fleets, 30th June 1690.

Beaconsfield, (1) a little town of Buckinghamshire, 10 miles N. of Windsor, the home and the burial-place of Waller and Burke, gave an earl's title to Disraeli. Pop. 2500.—(2) A suburb of Kimberley, S. Africa. Pop. 14,000.—(3) A town 26 miles NW. of Launceston, Tasmania, centre of a gold-mining district. Pop. 5000.

Bearhaven. See CASTLETOWN BEARHAVEN.

Bear Island, County Cork, in Bantry Bay, measures 6½ by 1½ miles.

Bear Lake, GREAT, in the north-west of Canada, in 65°-67° N. lat., and 117°-123° W. long. Lying 246 feet above sea-level, Great Bear Lake is irregular in shape, with an area of 14,000 sq. m., almost twice the area of Wales. It sends forth a river of its own name to the Mackenzie.

Béarn, one of the thirty-two old French provinces now forming the greatest portion of the dep. of Basses-Pyrénées. The inhabitants are chiefly Gascons with a strong Basque infusion, and they speak the purest Gascon dialect. Béarn virtually became a part of France on Henry IV.'s accession (1593), but was only formally incorporated with it in 1620.

Bear River, a stream of Utah, U.S., which rises in the Rocky Mountains, flows NW. into Idaho, then bends round and again returns into Utah, falling into Great Salt Lake.

Beás, one of the 'Five Rivers' of the Punjab, rises in the Snowy Mountains of Kúlu, at 13,320 feet above sea-level, and flows 290 miles SW. to the Sutlej, 30 miles above Ferozpur.

Beatrice, capital of Gage county, Nebraska, on the Big Blue River, 40 miles by rail S. of Lincoln, with limestone quarries, cement-works, flour and lumber mills, factories for agricultural machinery, &c. Pop. 10,000.

Beattock, the junction for Moffat (q.v.).

Beaucaire (Bo-kayr'), a town in the French dep. of Gard, on the Rhone, opposite Tarascon, 14 m. SSW. of Avignon. Vessels enter its harbour by a canal from the Mediterranean. A July fair, once attended by 300,000 strangers, still does a brisk trade in silks, wines, oil, &c. Pop. 7000.

Beauce (Boass), a fertile district of France, partly in the deps. of Loir-et-Cher and Eure-et-Loire, of which the capital is Chartres.—Also a SE. county of Quebec province, Canada.

Beaufort (Bo-forr'), an Angevin town of 4000 inhabitants, in the French dep. of Maine-et-Loire, 19 miles E. of Angers. Its ancient castle came into the hands of the Lancaster family at the end of the 14th century, and gave name to the natural sons of John of Gaunt.

Beaufort (Bo'fort), a port, N. Carolina, U.S., at the mouth of Newport River. Pop. 2500.—Also a port and watering-place of S. Carolina, on Port Royal Island, and terminus of Port Royal Railroad, 14 miles from the ocean. Pop. 2500.

Beaufort, WEST, a town of Cape of Good Hope Province, near the Nieuwveld Mountains, 338 miles NW. of Capetown by rail. Pop. 7000.

Beaugency (Bo-zhong-see'), a town in the French dep. of Loiret, on the Loire, 16 miles SW. of Orleans by rail. Here the Germans defeated the French, December 7-10, 1870. Pop. 3000.

Beaujolais (Bo-zho-lay'), a subdivision of the old French province of Lyonnais, now forming the northern part of the dep. of Rhône, and a small part of Loire.

Beaulieu (Bewley), a village of Hampshire, at the head of a creek, on the verge of the New Forest, 6 miles NE. of Lymington. King John here founded a Cistercian abbey in 1204.

Beauly (pron. Bewley), a village, 10 miles W. of Inverness, with remains of a priory founded in 1232. Beauly Firth (7 by 2 miles) is the upper basin of the Moray Firth, and receives the river Beauly, winding 10 miles NE. Pop. 900.

Beauma'ris, a seaport, watering-place, and chief town of Anglesey, North Wales, near the north entrance to the Menai Strait, 3 miles N. of Bangor. It has the remains of a castle erected by Edward I., and a free grammar-school. Till 1885 it united with Amlwch, Holyhead, and Llangefni in returning one member. Pop. 2200.

Beaumont, a town in Texas, U.S., 84 miles E. of Houston, near which are large deposits of petroleum. Pop. 15,000.

Beaune (Boane), a town in the French dep. Côte d'Or, 23 miles SSW. of Dijon by rail, with a fine 13th-century church; a splendid hospital, founded in 1443 by Nicholas Rollin; and a bronze statue (1849) of Monge the mathematician. It manufactures serges, woollen cloth, and cutlery, and gives name to one of the best Burgundy wines. Pop. 10,000.

Beauvais, the capital of the French dep. Oise, situated in the valley of the Thérain, 55 miles NNW. of Paris. Of its unfinished cathedral, begun in 1225, the choir, 153 feet high, is the loftiest as well as one of the finest specimens of Gothic in France. The industries include the weaving of Gobelins tapestries (since 1664), and the manufacture of cotton, woollen cloths, shawls, and carpets. Population, 17,000. Beauvais was known by the Romans as Cæsaromagus, afterwards as Bellovacum. In 1472 it was besieged by Charles the Bold of Burgundy, with 80,000 men, when the women of Beauvais, under Jeanne Hachette, displayed remarkable valour.

Beaver Dam, a city at the outlet of Beaver Lake, Wisconsin, U.S., 65 miles NW. of Milwaukee, on the Chicago, Milwaukee, and St Paul Railway. It is the centre of a fertile district, and has cotton and woollen mills, ironworks, and machine-shops. Pop. 7000.

Beaver Falls, a borough of Pennsylvania, U.S.. near the Beaver River's junction with the Ohio, 31 miles NW. of Pittsburgh. It has manufactures of iron, steel, machinery, glass, and pottery. Pop. 12,000.

Bebek, a lovely bay on the European side of the Bosporus, with a palace (built 1725).

Beccles, a Suffolk market-town and municipal borough, on the Waveney, 8 miles W. of Lowestoft. It has a fine church with a detached belfry, a good grammar-school, and large printing-works. Pop. 7000.

Bechuanaland (Betchooah'naland), a tract of South Africa, inhabited by the Bechuanas, extending from the Zambesi to the Transvaal border. The Bechuanas, who speak a Bantu language, also occupy a considerable portion of the Transvaal. The part south of the river Molopo is a territory of the Cape Province of the Union; its area is 51,000 sq. m., and its population is about 99,000, of whom some 15,000 only are whites. The protectorate of Bechuanaland outside the territory is in extent about 275,000 sq. m.—more than twice as large as the Transvaal or the United Kingdom—with a population of some 125,000. (For Rhodesia and the British area farther north, see RHODESIA, ZAMBESIA, MATABELELAND, MASHONALAND.) Bechuanaland is a portion of an elevated plateau 4000 to 5000 feet above sea-level, and though so near the tropics, is suitable for the British race. In winter there are sharp frosts, and snow falls in some years. The rains fall in summer, and then only the rivers are full. It is an excellent country for cattle; sheep thrive in some parts, and there are extensive tracts available for cornlands. There are extensive forests to the north-east, and to the west the Kalahari Desert, which only requires wells dug to make it habitable. The enormous quantities of buck which roamed over the land attest the productiveness of the soil. Gold has been found near Sitlagoli, and diamonds were discovered at Vryburg in 1887. The province of Stellaland is principally inhabited by Boers, and the rest of the country by Bechuanas, speaking a Bantu language. Their ancestors are said to have come from the north. They have since 1832 been at enmity with the Matabele, and in later years the Transvaal Boers endeavoured to occupy their country. During the native risings in 1878, the Bechuanas invaded Griqualand West, and were in turn subdued by British volunteers as far as the Molopo. When the British government withdrew from Bechuanaland in 1880, the natives, being helpless, were left to the mercy of the Boers of the Transvaal, whose harsh treatment in 1882 and 1883 led to the Bechuanaland expedition in 1884. The administration of the protectorate was left to three chiefs (Khama, Sebele, Bathoen) under British protection, represented by a resident commissioner under the High Commissioner for South Africa. The headquarters of the protectorate administration are at Mafeking (Cape Province).

Beckenham, a town of Kent, 7 miles S. by E. of London, of which it is a suburb. Pop. 31,700.

Becse, OLD, a Hungarian town, on the Theiss. Pop. 20,000.—NEW BECSE, on the E. bank, 348 miles SSE. of Budapest, has a pop. of 10,000.

Becskerek, a town of Hungary, on the Bega canal, 368 miles SSE. of Budapest by rail. Pop. 26,000.

Bédarieux (Bay-dar-yuh'), a town in the French dep. of Hérault, on the Orb, 27 miles NNW. of Béziers by rail. Pop. 5000.

Beddgelert, a Carnarvonshire village, a great tourist centre, near Aberglaslyn Pass, 12 miles SE. of Carnarvon. 'Gelert's Grave' is marked by a few stones.

Bedford, the county town of Bedfordshire, on the navigable Ouse, 49 miles NNW. of London by rail. The Ouse is spanned here by two bridges—a stone one of five arches, 306 feet long, built in 1811 at a cost of £15,000, and an iron one, built in 1888 at a cost of £6000. The charitable and educational institutions are mostly due to Sir W. Harper, Lord Mayor of London (c. 1496–1573). He in 1566 founded a free school, and endowed it with 13 acres of land in Holborn. The enormously increased value of the property (from £150 to £15,000 a year) enables the trustees to maintain grammar, modern, and preparatory schools for boys, the same class of schools for girls, and almshouses. The chief manufactures are agricultural implements, steam-engines, and machinery, with a large trade in agricultural produce, coal, and iron. An embankment beside the Ouse forms a pretty promenade; and a people's park of 60 acres was opened in 1888. Bedford returns one member to parliament. Population, 39,200. Bedford (Bedican-fortha) was the scene of a battle between the Britons and Saxons in 571. The Danes burned it in 1010. Bunyan, who was born at Elstow, near Bedford, was for twelve years a prisoner in Bedford jail, and ministered to the Nonconformist congregation in Mill Lane from 1672 to his death in 1688. His chapel has been twice rebuilt, in 1707 and 1849; but his chair and other relics of him are preserved; whilst a colossal bronze statue of him by Boehm was erected at the cost of the Duke of Bedford in 1874.

Bedford Level, an extensive tract of flat land in the east of England, embracing nearly all the marshy district called the Fens. It extends inland around the Wash into the six counties of Northampton, Huntingdon, Cambridge, Lincoln, Norfolk, and Suffolk, and has an area of about 750,000 acres. Its inland boundary forms a horseshoe of high lands, and reaches the towns or villages of Brandon, Milton (near Cambridge), Earith, Peterborough, and Bolingbroke. Of the three divisions, the north level lies between the rivers Welland and Nene; the middle, between the Nene and the Old Bedford River; and the south extends to Stoke, Feltwell, and Mildenhall. Intersected by many artificial channels, as well as by the lower parts of the rivers Nene, Cam, Ouse (Great and Little), Welland, Glen, Lark, and Stoke, it receives the waters of the whole or parts of nine counties. A great forest at the coming of the Romans, and by them rendered a fertile inhabited region, this district, owing to incursions of the sea, became a morass in the 13th century, but has been drained since 1634, mainly by the enterprise of Francis, Earl of Bedford, the principal landholder—whence the name. See books by Heathcote (1876) and the Duke of Bedford (1897).

Bedfordshire, a midland county, one of the smallest of English counties in size and in population. Extreme length, 31 miles; breadth, 25; area, 484 sq. m. The general surface is level, with gentle undulations. In the south, a range of chalk-hills, branching from the Chilterns, crosses Bedfordshire in a north-east direction from Dunstable, and another parallel range runs from Ampthill to near the junction of the Ivel with the Ouse. Between the latter ridge and the north-west part of the county, where the land is also somewhat hilly, lies the corn vale of Bedford. No hill much exceeds 500 feet in height. The chief rivers are the Ouse (running through the centre of the county, 17 miles in a direct line, but 45 by its windings), navigable to Bedford; and its tributary, the Ivel, navigable to Shefford. There are extensive market-gardens, especially on the rich deep loams. Bedfordshire is the most exclusively agricultural county in England, its cultivated area being 88·1 per cent., against 79·3 for the whole kingdom. Pop. (1801) 63,393; (1841) 107,936; (1911) 194,588. The principal proprietor is the Duke of Bedford; and his seat, Woburn Abbey, is the chief mansion. Lace-making and straw-plaiting are leading industries, carried on almost entirely by women. Bedfordshire is divided into nine hundreds and 122 parishes. Two members of parliament are returned for the county, one for the Biggleswade, and one for the Luton division. Many British and Roman antiquities exist, as well as the ruins of several monasteries. Three Roman roads crossed the county, and several earthwork camps remain.

Bedlington, a Northumberland township, 5 miles SE. of Morpeth. Here about 1800 Mr Aynsley bred the famous Bedlington terriers.

Bednor′, Bednur, or Nagar, a decayed city, now a village, of Mysore, India, 150 miles NW. of Seringapatam. It was at one time the seat of government of a rajah, and its pop. exceeded 100,000. In 1763 it was taken by Hyder Ali, who pillaged it of property to the estimated value of £12,000,000.

Bedwellty, a mining urban district of Monmouthshire, with ironworks, 7 miles from Pontypool. Pop. 22,500.

Bedworth, a market-town of Warwickshire, 3 miles S. of Nuneaton. Pop. of parish, 10,000.

Bedwyn, a Wiltshire town, 5 miles SW. of Hungerford. Pop. (Great and Little Bedwyn), 1400.

Beer, a Devon fishing-village, 1½ mile SW. of Axmouth.

Beeston, an urban district of Notts, 3 miles from Nottingham. Pop. 11,300.

Beeston Rock, a steep eminence (366 feet) in Cheshire, 2 miles S. of Tarporley, with a ruined castle (1220).

Begharmi. See Bagirmi.

Bègles, a town of France, in the department Gironde, 2 miles S. from Bordeaux. Population, 12,000.

Beg-Shéhr, or Kereli Gŏl, a mountain lake in Asia Minor, 44 miles SW. of Konia. Lying almost 3700 feet above the sea, it is over 30 miles long, from 5 to 10 miles broad, and contains several islands. On its east and north shores are the towns of Begshehr and Kereli.

Behar, or Bahar (also Bihar), once one of the three provinces under the Nawab of Bengal, now (since 1912) forming with Chota Nagpur (q.v.) and Orissa (q.v.) one of the ten great provinces of India. It comprises the two divisions of Patna and Bhagalpur. The area of the whole province is about 113,000 sq. m.; the population 35,000,000. The Ganges divides Behar into two almost equal parts; it is watered besides by several of its important tributaries.—Kooch Behar is a native state near Bhotan, under the lieutenant-governor of Bengal; area, 1300 sq. m.; pop. 593,000. Its capital is also Kooch Behar, or Kuch Behar.

Behar, or Bahar, a town of Behar, 54 miles SE. by S. of Patna. The original city is nearly deserted, and the present town consists of houses scattered about its remains, and interspersed with fields, gardens, and groves. Silk, cotton cloths, and muslin are manufactured here. Pop. 45,000.

Behistun, or Bisutun (anc. Baghistan), the site of an ancient Persian city, 22 miles E. of the city of Kirmanshahan. It is noted for its famous precipitous rock, which on one side rises perpendicularly to the height of 1700 feet, and which bears cuneiform inscriptions of Darius Hystaspes about 515 b.c.

Behring Strait separates Asia from America, and connects the Pacific with the Arctic Ocean. The proof that the two continents were not connected was given by a Cossack named Deschnev, who in 1648 sailed from a harbour in Siberia, in the Polar Ocean, into the Sea of Kamchatka. But his voyage was regarded by Europeans as a fable, until Behring's expedition in 1728. The strait was explored and accurately described by Cook in 1778. The narrowest part is near 66° lat., between East Cape in Asia, and Cape Prince of Wales in America, where the capes approach within 36 miles; about midway are three uninhabited islands. The greatest depth is some 30 fathoms.—Behring Sea, called also the Sea of Kamchatka, is that part of the North Pacific Ocean to the S. of Behring Strait. The right of sealing in Behring Sea, long a source of difficulty between Britain and the United States, was settled by arbitration in 1893.—Behring Island, the most westerly of the Aleutian Islands, has an area of 30 sq. m., and was the place where Vitus Behring, or Bering, the discoverer, was wrecked and died in 1741.

Beilan′, a pass in the northern extremity of Syria, on the east shore of the Gulf of Scanderoon, runs across the mountain-range of Amanus. It is the common route from Cilicia into Syria. The town of Beilan (pop. 5000) is situated near the summit-level of the pass, 1584 feet above the Mediterranean.

Beira (Bay′ee-ra), a Portuguese province; area about 9222 sq. m., and a pop. of 1,517,432. The surface is mountainous; the rivers are the Douro and Tagus. It is divided into the districts of Aveiro, Castello Branco, Coimbra, Guarda, and Vizeu. The capital is Coimbra.

Beira, a small town (pop. 6000) in Portuguese East Africa, near the mouth of the Pungwe River, 12 miles from the point whence the railway to Salisbury, &c., starts.

Beirût. See Beyrout.

Beit-el-Fakih, a town of Yemen, Arabia, near the Red Sea, 87 miles N. of Mocha. Hodeida, on the Red Sea, is the port. Pop. 8000.

Beith, a small town of North Ayrshire, on the borders of Renfrewshire, 18 miles SW. of Glasgow by rail. It has large cabinet-works and the Speir School (1887), resembling the old college at Glasgow. Pop. 5000.

Beja (Bay′zha; Roman Pax Julia), a town in the province of Alemtejo, Portugal, 101 miles SE. of Lisbon by rail. It has a castle and a cathedral. Pop. 10,000.

Bejapur. See Bijapur.

Bejar, a town of Spain, 45 miles S. of Salamanca. Pop. 11,000.

Bekaa. See Cœle-Syria.

Bekes, or Bekesvar, a town of Hungary, at the confluence of the Black and White Körös, 113 miles SE. of Budapest. Pop. 27,000.

Bekes Csaba, a town of Hungary, 7 miles S. of Bekes by rail. Pop. 43,000.

Belbeis (anc. Bubastis Agria), a town on the east arm of the Nile, Lower Egypt, 28 miles NNE. of Cairo. Pop. 11,500.

Belchi′té, a town of Spain, on the Aguas, 22 miles SSE. of Saragossa. Here, on June 18, 1809, the French completely routed the Spanish. Pop. 4000.

Belem′. See Lisbon.

Belem′, or Para′, capital of the Brazilian province of Para (q.v.).

Belfast′, the largest and most prosperous city in Ireland, since 1898 a county apart from Antrim, is situated mainly on the left bank of the Lagan, at its entrance to Belfast Lough (12 × 3 miles). It is 12 miles from the Irish Sea, 101 N. of Dublin, 130 SW. of Glasgow, and 156 NW. of Liverpool. On the Antrim side the picturesque hills, rising almost to the dignity of mountains, have an impressive effect, and the general aspect of the town is bright and animated. Though the seat of the linen industry, with a number of mills and manufactures of several kinds, Belfast has a much more pleasant appearance than most British manufacturing towns. On each side of the spacious lough, which resembles in some respects the Lake of Geneva, are a number of pleasant villas, whilst in the higher suburb of Malone, and along the Lisburn Road, handsome edifices of a similar character have sprung up. A fine large new street called Royal Avenue was in 1884 driven through the centre of the town from York Street to Donegal Place. It contains the new post-office, the Ulster Reform Club, the offices of the Water Commissioners, and the free library. The Queen's College, a handsome brick building, was opened in 1849; and was founded as Queen's University by an Act of 1908. The Presbyterian College in 1881 had, in conjunction with the Magee College of Londonderry, the power conferred on it of granting theological degrees. The Catholics and Methodists have colleges of their own, while a Royal Academical Institution and the Belfast Academy, with other institutions of a similar character, supply great educational facilities. Simultaneously with drainage and other improvements in the town, the Harbour Commissioners have been engaged in greatly improving the quays and the harbour. With this object they had already expended £500,000 when, under an Act of 1883, they obtained power authorising an additional expenditure of about a million of money more. Recent improvements are a through channel and a deep-water quay, new parks, new hospitals, and a Protestant cathedral (1899–1904). The linen trade is by no means the sole staple, several industries having since 1855 greatly developed, notably shipbuilding; others are rope-making, the manufacture of aërated waters, and the whisky trade. At intervals there have been serious riots between the lowest classes of Protestants and Catholics. Belfast is a town of great energy, steadily growing, and handsome beyond most large commercial and manufacturing towns. Amongst famous natives are the physicists Thomas Andrews, Lord Kelvin, and his brother, Professor James Thomson; Sir J. Emerson Tennant; Sir Samuel Ferguson; and the painter Lavery. In 1888 it became a city, in 1892 its mayor became Lord Mayor, and in 1898, much extended in area, it was made 'the county of the city of Belfast.' Pop. (1821) 37,117; (1851) 102,103; (1881) 208,122; (1891) 255,950; (1901) 349,180; (1911) 386,947, of whom 24·1 per cent. are Roman Catholics. See George Benn's History of Belfast (1877).

Bel'fast, a port of entry in Maine, U.S., on the west side of Penobscot Bay. Pop. 5000.

Belford, a town of Northumberland, 15 miles SSE. of Berwick-on-Tweed. Pop. of parish, 740.

Belfort (Bel-forr'), capital of the French remnant of the dep. of Haut-Rhin, 117 m. ENE. of Dijon by rail. From 1870 this remnant (235 sq. m.), taking its name from the town, has been called the Territoire de Belfort (or, alternatively, Haut-Rhin), and consists of those portions of Haut-Rhin which, seized by the Germans during the Franco-German war, were restored to France in 1871. The strategical importance of Belfort was recognised by France on its cession by Austria in 1648, and it was fortified by Vauban. A fortress of the first rank, it maintained, from 3d December 1870 till 16th February 1871, a gallant defence against the Germans. The fortifications have been enormously strengthened since 1874. It has now important cotton manufactures, mostly transferred from Mülhausen after the war. Pop. 40,000; of territory, 101,000.

Belgard, a Prussian town of Pomerania, on the Persante, 16 miles SSW. of Köslin. Pop. 8000.

Belgaum', or Belgam, the chief city of a district in the presidency of Bombay, situated to the E. of the dividing ridge of the West Ghats, at a height of 2500 feet above the sea, 55 miles NE. of Goa. Its fort in 1818 was taken from the Peishwa by the British. The chief articles of commerce are dry fish, salt, dates, cocoa-nuts, coir. Cotton cloth is manufactured here. Pop. 36,800.

Belgiojoso (Bel-ji-o-yo'zo), a town of Lombardy, North Italy, 9 miles E. of Pavia. Pop. 4000.

Belgium (Fr. Belgique), one of the smaller European states, consists of the southern portion of the former kingdom of the Netherlands (as created by the Congress of Vienna), lying between France and Holland, the North Sea and Rhenish Prussia. Its greatest length from north-west to south-east is 173 miles; and its greatest breadth from north to south, 105 miles. The area is 11,373 sq. m., not a third of that of Ireland. Pop. (1880) 5,520,009; (1910) 7,423,784. There are nine provinces—Antwerp, West Flanders, East Flanders, Hainault, Liége, Brabant, Limburg, Luxemburg, and Namur, of which Luxemburg is the largest and Limburg the smallest. Brussels, the capital, is, with its suburbs, the largest town (pop. 665,000); Antwerp is half its size; Liége and Ghent have more than 160,000 inhabitants; and there are twenty other towns with over 20,000. The population of Belgium is of partly Germanic, partly Celtic origin. The Flemings (of Teutonic stock) and Walloons (Celtic in origin) speak each their own dialects of Dutch and French; there are also numbers of Germans, Dutch, and French. East and West Flanders, Antwerp, and Limburg are almost wholly Flemish; and Brabant mainly so. The line between the Flemish and Walloon districts is sharply defined, the Flemish part being the richest and most cultivated. The French language has gained the ascendency in educated society and in the offices of government; but the Flemish dialect prevails numerically in the proportion of nine to eight. Belgium is the most densely peopled country in Europe, the population being 653 to the sq. m. as compared with 470 in the Netherlands and 373 in Great Britain and Ireland. In Brabant the density is 1171 per sq. m.

Belgium is, on the whole, a level, and even low-lying, country; diversified, however, by hilly districts. In the south-east, a western branch of the Ardennes (2000 feet) separates the basins of the Maas and the Moselle. The Campine, composed of marshes, coal-bearing heaths, and irrigated lands, extends along the Dutch frontier. In Flanders dykes have been raised to check the encroachments of the sea. The abundant water-system of Belgium is chiefly supplied by the great navigable rivers Scheldt and Maas, both of which rise in France, and have their embouchures in Holland. These rivers have numerous and important tributaries, and with canals make up 1400 miles of waterways. Of the total area, almost two-thirds are in ordinary cultivation, more than one-eighth is meadow and pasture, one-sixth is under wood, and less than 600,000 acres are waste or water. Good pasturage is found on the slopes and in the valleys of the hilly districts, and in the rich meadows of the low provinces. Beet is largely grown; and the level provinces raise wheat, rye, oats, and barley, leguminous plants, hemp, flax, colza, tobacco, hops, dye-plants, chicory, and a little wine. It has been said that the agriculture of Belgium is gardening on a large scale, so carefully and laboriously is every inch of soil cultivated by the farmers, the vast majority of whom are small holders owning less than one hectare (about 2½ acres) of land. The spade is still the principal implement used. Belgium is famous for its horses. In the Campine, honey, silk, and fine butter are produced. There are valuable fisheries on the coast. Belgium is rich in minerals, which yield great quantities of coal and iron, with lead, copper, zinc, calamine, manganese, alum, peat, marble, limestone, granite, and slate. The chief manufactures are linen, woollens (with carpets), cotton, silk, lace, leather, metals (especially iron and iron goods), paper, glass, porcelain, and beet-sugar. Among the principal articles of export are coal, flax, linen, woollen and cotton goods, glass, firearms, and nails. More than a third of the whole is consigned to France, and most of the remainder to Germany, England, and Holland. The chief imports are cereals and flour, raw textiles, vegetable substances, chemicals, minerals, timber, resin and bitumen, hides, tissues, coffee, animals, meat, yarns, wines. The sea-borne trade is almost entirely in British hands. In 1910 the imports were valued at over £169,118,000, and the exports at over £135,000,000. These sums exclude the value of 'goods in transit,' which may amount to some £90,000,000 more. The commercial intercourse of Belgium with Great Britain in 1910 amounted to £19,195,000 for exports from Belgium, and £17,838,000 for imports into it. In the middle of the 13th century, Flanders, with Bruges as its chief seat of manufactures, had surpassed all its neighbours in industry. After the discovery of America, Antwerp took the place of Bruges. The unhappy period of Spanish oppression and the war in the Netherlands deeply depressed Flemish commerce. But Belgium has long been again a busy and prosperous commercial country, the separation from Holland having been indirectly favourable to the development of Belgian resources. It annexed the Congo Free State in 1908. Belgium employs the French decimal system of weights, measures, and moneys.

The Roman Catholic is the dominant religion. Although full liberty of worship is guaranteed to all, and the ministers of each denomination are paid by the state, almost the entire population are Roman Catholics, the number of Protestants being set down at 15,000, of Jews at 3000. There are over 2400 conventual houses, inhabited by 6000 monks and 31,000 nuns. Diversity of dialects has retarded the formation of an independent national literature to act as the bond of national unity. The Flemish element—the most important—has done much of late to foster the Flemish tongue, and if possible secure its predominance. Painting and architecture formerly flourished in the wealthy old towns of Flanders; and in modern times a revival of art has taken place. There are universities at Ghent, Liége, Brussels, and Louvain, and an elaborate school system, partly secular, partly Catholic.

Military service is compulsory, all males above 19 being liable; and few exemptions are now permitted. The army, on a peace footing, numbers about 42,800 men; in war about 180,000, besides the garde civique, of 47,000 men. The importance of Belgium in a military point of view affords a reason for the maintenance of fortifications at Antwerp, Dendermonde, Namur, Diest, Liége, and other places. The chief arsenal is at Antwerp. In 1911 the revenue of Belgium was £26,119,000, leaving a margin over the expenditure, £26,096,000; while the national debt was under £146,960,000. The interest is more than covered by the revenue from the railways, for which the debt was almost entirely contracted.

The Gallia Belgica of the Romans passed under the sway of the Franks, and fell later to the Burgundian princes. On the death of Charles the Bold in 1477 it passed by marriage to the House of Hapsburg. The Spanish Netherlands remained (unlike the northern provinces which rebelled against Spain and became a Protestant republic) under the Spanish branch of the Hapsburgs, till in 1713 they were transferred to Austria. From 1794 Belgium was under French sway, but on the fall of Napoleon was united with the kingdom of the Netherlands. It rebelled in 1830, and since then has had a separate career as a limited constitutional monarchy. The legislative body consists of two chambers—the Senate, and the Chamber of Representatives, non-resident members of the latter body being paid a small salary during the session. Both are elective bodies.

Belgorod' (Russian Bjelgorod, 'white town'), a town in the Russian government of Kursk, on the Donetz, 412 miles S. of Moscow by rail. It is an archbishop's see, and has manufactures of leather, soap, and woollens, and three important fairs. Pop. 30,000.

Belgrade' (Serb. Bielgorod, 'white town'), the capital of Servia, lies opposite Semlin, at the confluence of the Save and Danube, 215 miles SSE. of Pesth, and 234 miles NNW. of Vranja, by rail. The walls have disappeared since 1862; the last and finest of the five gates was demolished in 1868; and the citadel is hardly up to the requirements of modern warfare. Year by year the town is losing its old Turkish aspect, becoming more modern, more European. The royal palace, the residence of the metropolitan, the national theatre (1871), and the public offices are the principal buildings. Opposite the theatre is a bronze monument (1882) to the murdered Prince Michael III. Belgrade has but trifling manufactures of arms, cutlery, saddlery, silk goods, carpets, &c. It is, however, the entrepôt of the trade between Turkey and Austria. Pop. (1872) 26,674; (1911) 90,890. Belgrade is the Singidunum of Ptolemy. Its position has made it the chief point of communication between Constantinople and Vienna, and the key to Hungary on the south-east. The Greeks held it until 1073, after which it passed through the hands of Hungarians, Greeks again, Bulgarians, Bosnians, and Servians, who sold it in 1426 to the Emperor Sigismund. In 1440 it was unsuccessfully besieged by the Turks; and when stormed (1456), was retaken from the Turks by the heroism of Hunyadi and Capistrano. Of seven more sieges between 1522 and 1789 the chief was in 1717, when the citadel surrendered to Prince Eugene, after he had defeated 200,000 Turks, with a loss to them of 20,000 men. In 1862, after a wanton bombardment from the citadel, it was made the capital of Servia, though the citadel remained with the Turks till 1867.

Belgravia, a district in the southern part of the West End of London.

Belize (Be-leeze'), or BRITISH HONDURAS, a

British colony washed on the E. by the Bay of Honduras, in the Caribbean Sea, and elsewhere surrounded by Guatemala and Mexico. It forms the south-east part of Yucatan, and measuring 180 by 60 miles, has an area of 7560 sq. m., or a little larger than Wales. The population is about 40,500, of whom about 2000 are whites. The river Belize traverses the middle of the country, and the Rio Hondo and the Sarstoon form respectively its north-western and its southern boundary. The Cockscomb Mountains (4000 feet) are the highest eminences, the land all along the coast being low and swampy. The country has a general tropical fertility; its chief exports are mahogany and logwood, besides sugar, coffee, cotton, sarsaparilla, bananas, plantains, and india-rubber. The name Belize is probably a Spanish corruption of the name Wallis, one of the early British settlers; otherwise it is usually referred to the Fr. balise, 'a beacon.' Those early settlers, buccaneers at starting, then logwood-cutters, were frequently attacked by the Spaniards; but after 1798, when they repulsed a fleet and a land-force of 2000 men, their occupation was formally acquiesced in. Since 1862 Belize has ranked as a British colony, with a lieutenant-governor, whose rank was raised in 1884 to that of governor. Belize, the capital, is a depot for British goods for Central America, and has a pop. of about 10,500. See A. R. Gibbs's British Honduras (1883).

Bella, a town of Italy, 17 miles S. of Melfi. Pop. 7000.

Bellaggio (Bellad'jo), an Italian village on the spit between the arms of Lake Como. Pop. 1000.

Bellaire, a town of Ohio, U.S., on the Ohio River, 5 miles below Wheeling, with manufactures of glass, nails, pig-iron, &c. Pop. 10,000.

Bella'ry, the chief town of a district, 305 miles NW. of Madras by rail. One of the principal military stations in the presidency of Madras, its fort crowns a high rock. Pop. 58,250.

Belleek, on the Erne in Fermanagh, from its own clay formerly manufactured fine porcelain (Belleek ware) and pottery.

Bellegarde (Bel-gard'), a second-class fortress of France, in the dep. of Pyrénées-Orientales, built by Louis XIV. in 1679. It is situated on the Spanish confines on the road leading over the Col de Pertuis from Perpignan to Figueras.

Belle Isle, a British island in the Atlantic, 21 miles in circumference, midway between Newfoundland and Labrador. It gives name to the strait on the south-west, 70 miles long, and 11 miles wide at the widest.—There is another small island of the same name in the Bay of Conception, Newfoundland.

Belleisle-en-Mer, an island of the French dep. of Morbihan, 8 miles S. of Quiberon Point. It is 11 miles by 7, and has an area of 330 sq. m. Pop. 9000, chiefly engaged in fishing, and 2000 in the fortified seaport of Le Palais.

Belleville, an eastern suburb of Paris, now enclosed by the line of fortifications.

Belleville, a town in the province of Ontario, Canada, on the Bay of Quinte, Lake Ontario, 48 miles W. of Kingston by rail. Here is Albert University (1857). Pop. 10,000.

Belleville, a city of Illinois, U.S., 16 miles SE. of St Louis. It has manufactures of iron goods, thrashing-machines, and flour. Pop. (1871) 8146; (1910) 21,122.

Belley, a town in the French dep. of Ain, 40 miles E. of Lyons. It has a cathedral dating from 889, and fine lithographic stones are procured in the neighbourhood. Pop. 5000.

Bellingham, a Northumberland village, on the North Tyne, 16 miles NNW. of Hexham. Pop. of parish, 1360.

Bellinzo'na, or BELLENZ, the chief town of the Swiss canton of Ticino, on the river Ticino, 109 miles SSE. of Lucerne by rail. It still has its three old castles. Pop. 6000.

Bellot Strait, the passage on the north coast of North America, which separates North Somerset from Boothia Felix, and connects Prince Regent Inlet with Franklin Channel. Its east entrance was discovered in 1852 by Lieutenant Bellot. It is 20 miles long, and, at its narrowest part, about 1 mile wide, running pretty nearly on the parallel of 72°, between granite shores which rise here and there to 1500 feet. A point on the south shore, 71° 55′ N., 95° W., is the most northerly point of the North American continent.

Bell Rock, or INCHCAPE, a reef of old red sandstone rocks in the German Ocean, 12 miles SE. of Arbroath, and nearly opposite the mouth of the Tay. It is 2000 feet long; at high water of spring-tides it is covered to a depth of 16 feet, at low water is partly uncovered to a height of 4 feet; and for 100 yards around, the sea is only 3 fathoms deep. A lighthouse, 120 feet high, designed by Robert Stevenson and Rennie, was erected in 1807–10, at a cost of £61,331.

Bellshill, a Lanarkshire mining town, 9 miles ESE. of Glasgow. Pop. (with Mossend) 15,000.

Bellu'no, a cathedral city of Northern Italy, on the Piave, 42 miles N. of Treviso. Pop. 20,000.

Belmullet, a Mayo fishing-village, 49 miles NW. of Ballina. Pop. 680.

Beloit, a city of Wisconsin, U.S., on Rock River, 75 miles SW. of Milwaukee. It has a college (1847), foundries, &c. Pop. 15,000.

Belper, a Derbyshire urban district, on the Derwent, 7½ miles N. of Derby. It owes its prosperity to the cotton-works of Messrs Strutt, one of whom was in 1856 created Lord Belper. The manufacture of silk and cotton hosiery is also largely carried on; but nail-making has declined. Pop. 12,000.

Belt, the name given to two straits, the GREAT and the LITTLE BELT, which, with the Sound, connect the Baltic with the Cattegat. The GREAT BELT, nearly 40 miles long, and 10 to nearly 20 miles broad, divides the Danish islands, Zealand and Laaland, from Fünen and Langeland. The LITTLE BELT divides Fünen from Jutland. It is as long as the Great Belt, but narrows from 10 miles to less than a mile. Both the Belts are dangerous to navigation.

Belturbet, an Irish town, on the Erne, 9 miles NW. of Cavan. Pop. 1400.

Beluchistan, or BALUCHISTAN (Belootch'istan), a country of Asia, bounded on the N. by Afghanistan, on the E. by Sind, on the S. by the Arabian Sea, and on the W. by the Persian province of Kerman. The frontier towards Afghanistan is seldom anywhere clearly defined. Beluchistan, which has a coast-line of over 500 miles, corresponds in general with the ancient Gedrosia. The area is about 133,000 sq. m., and the pop., by the census of 1911, is 829,712. Until 1810 Beluchistan was almost entirely a terra incognita to Europeans. Much of the country indeed is still unknown, but it has been crossed by several travellers; the laying of the Indo-Afghan Railway (by Quetta to Chaman, with a branch to Nushki, 1885–94) in the north-east, and the surveys of the Indo-European Telegraph Company in the south, have established its general features. The surface is generally mountainous, more especially towards the north, where branches of the great Suliman Range, running north and south, rise to a height of 12,000 feet. The ranges in the south generally run east and west, parallel with the coast, and the longitudinal valleys between form the principal thoroughfares, there being no regular routes in the country except those through the Bolan and Mula passes to Quetta and Kelát. Even the bottoms of some of the valleys have an elevation of 5700 feet; and the capital, Kelát, situated on the side of one of them, is 6783 feet above the level of the sea. Large deserts, rendered impassable in summer by sand-storms, and swept in winter by benumbing, piercing winds, occupy hundreds of square miles of the country; and the rivers—unless after heavy rains, when those in the north-east frequently inundate great tracts of country—are inconsiderable, few of the streams in the south appearing to be perennial at all. The west is largely a land of drought, with stretches of sand varied by bare hills and treeless valleys. The temperature is one of striking and sudden extremes, 125° F. in the shade having been registered on the coast even in March, although at Kelát, in February, water has been observed to freeze as it was poured on the ground. There are few cattle; sheep, mountain goats, and antelopes are numerous. The camel is the ordinary beast of burden; but in the north-west serviceable horses are bred. The wild animals include the tiger, leopard, wolf, hyena, ape, wild ass, &c., and fish in great quantities are caught off the coast. Wherever there is a sufficiency of water the soil is productive—the lowlands yielding rice, sugar, cotton, indigo, and tobacco; and the higher grounds, wheat, barley, madder, maize, and pulse. The minerals are gold, silver, copper, lead, antimony, iron, tin, sulphur, coal, and sal-ammoniac; and in 1887 valuable petroleum wells were discovered in the north. The only nameworthy towns are the capital, Kelát (q.v.) and Quetta. Gwadar, on the coast, is a fort and a telegraph station.

The inhabitants belong mainly to the races of Brahui and Beluchis. The former are the dominant as well as the aboriginal race, and are hospitable and generous; the latter, a hungry, needy, greedy people, are largely nomadic. The Brahui are usually referred, though doubtfully, to the Dravidian stock. In appearance they are short, sturdy, and strongly built, with round, flat faces, and brown hair. Their dress is a coarse calico tunic, with trousers fastened at the ankles, and a skull-cap with sash of the same colour. The Beluchis are of Iranian descent, with a mingling of Tatar blood, and their language closely resembles the modern Persian; they are both numerically smaller and a more recent element than the Brahui. They are tall, with longer and more prominent features, and are brave, but restless and prone to predatory warfare, in which they frequently show themselves senselessly cruel. Both races are Mohammedans of the Sunni sect. Besides these two races, there are colonies of Persian descent called Dehwars, some Hindus, and scattered families of Luri, a sort of Gypsies of possibly Indian origin. Beluchistan is, in a somewhat indefinite manner, under the authority of the khan of Kelát, who, with a revenue of about £30,000, maintains an army of 3000 men. For his hostility, his capital was held (1839–41) by a British force. In 1877 England obtained by treaty with the khan the right of permanently occupying Quetta (which was annexed, with Bolán also, in 1887), and of having a political agent at Kelát; and the khan practically became a feudatory of the Indian empire, and placed his territory at the disposal of the British government for all military and strategical purposes. With Kelát may be reckoned the Las Bela. The semi-independent Marri and Bugti tribes are administered from Sibi.—British Beluchistan is a chief-commissionership of British India, so constituted in 1887, out of the districts of Pishin, Thal Chotiali, and Sibi, in south-eastern Afghanistan; with Khetran, the Zhob Valley, and other districts added later. British Beluchistan, some 46,000 square miles in area, has 414,000 inhabitants.

See Bellew's From the Indus to the Tigris (1874), works on Beluchistan by Hughes (1877), Macgregor (1882), Floyer (1882), and Oliver (1891), and Thornton's Life of Sir R. Sandeman (1895).

Belvoir Castle (pron. Beever), Leicestershire, 7 miles W. by S. of Grantham, the magnificent seat of the Duke of Rutland.

Bembridge, a village near the east corner of the Isle of Wight, 5 miles SE. of Ryde, giving name to a division of the Tertiary formation. Pop. 1400.

Bemerton, a Wiltshire parish, 1½ mile W. by N. of Salisbury, the scene of George Herbert's ministry.

Benares, a native state of India, constituted in 1911, which includes Bhadohi and Kera Mangraur, both in the Mirzapur district; area, 887 sq. m.; pop. 362,000.

Benares (Be-nâh'rez), or Varanasi, the most sacred city of the Hindus, and one of the chief towns of North India, situated on the northern bank of the Ganges, 420 miles from Calcutta. The Central Hindu College is there. In the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh, it skirts the crescent-like Ganges for 4 miles, and the high bank is lined continuously with broad flights of ghâts or stairs, leading to the innumerable temples and large substantial houses, which present towards the river an imposing array of towers and pinnacles and richly carved façades. Benares, however, is disappointing internally, the streets being mere narrow lanes between lines of tall, dismal houses. Among the chief buildings are the Nepalese Temple; Aurungzebe's mosque, with its two minarets 147 feet high; Raja Jai Singh's observatory; the Gopal Mandir, wealthiest of all the temples; the Bisheswar or Golden Temple of Siva, the holiest of all; and the famous Monkey Temple, in the suburbs. Other points of special interest are the well of Mani Karnika, formed of Vishnu's sweat; the Juana-vapi, or 'pool of knowledge;' and the Lat Bhairo, a portion, it is believed, of one of Asoka's pillars. At the Burning Ghat the bodies of Hindus are reduced to ashes. The city counts 1450 Hindu temples or shrines, most of them small, and 272 Mohammedan mosques. In the European quarter there is the Government College, a large freestone structure, with 700 students; the Prince of Wales's Hospital; and a town-hall. By far the most important European work is the Dufferin railway bridge over the Ganges, opened in 1887, and 3518 feet long. Benares draws immense revenues from the thousands of pilgrims who visit it from all parts of India. It has a considerable trade, not only in country produce, but in English goods, jewellery, and precious stones. Its brass-ware, gold-cloth, and lacquered toys are famous. Pop. (1911) 203,804. A city of great antiquity, Benares (Sansk. Várà-nasi) was for 800 years the headquarters of Buddhism. In the 4th century B.C. it reverted to Brahminism, the ancient faith, of which it has ever since been the metropolis. It has been in the hands of many temporal rulers—the Rajput princes, the Mogul emperors, the Oudh nawabs—being ceded by the latter to the British in 1775.

Benaven'te, a town of Spain, on the Esla, 34 miles N. from Zamora. Here Moore's retreat commenced, 28th December 1808. Pop. 6000.

Benbec'ula, one of the Hebrides, between North and South Uist, 20 miles W. of Skye, belongs to Inverness-shire. Measuring 6 or 7 miles either way, it is nearly 36 sq. m. in area, low and flat, and consists chiefly of bog, sand, and lake, with a very broken coast-line. Nearly three-fourths of the area are under crofts and farms. Pop. 1300.

Bencoo'len, capital of a Dutch residency on the SW. coast of Sumatra. Owing to the surf and coral reefs, landing is difficult; the site is low and swampy, and the houses are mostly built on bamboo piles. Pepper and camphor are the chief exports, but trade has declined. Bencoolen was founded by the English (1686), but was ceded to the Dutch in 1825. Pop. 10,000.

Bender, a strongly fortified town, in the Russian province of Bessarabia, on the Dniester, 82 miles NW. of Odessa by rail. The principal industries are the manufacture of bricks, stoneware, paper, and leather, with agriculture, fishing, and mining. It was captured by the Russians from the Turks in 1770, 1789, 1806, and 1811, and ceded to Russia in 1812. Pop. 40,000.—Bender-Abbas is also another name for the town of Gombroon (q.v.).

Ben'digo (for some time renamed SANDHURST), a town of Victoria, on Bendigo Creek, 101 miles by rail NNW. of Melbourne, in the centre of a rich auriferous country. It owes its rise to the discovery of gold here in 1851. Pop. 43,600.

Bendzin, a manufacturing town in the government of Piotrkov, Russian Poland, 50 miles S. of Czenstochau, with coal-mines in its neighbourhood. Pop. 45,700.

Beneven'to (anc. Beneventum), a city of Italy, on a hill near the confluence of the Calore and Sabato, 61 miles NE. of Naples by rail. It has a citadel, a fine old archiepiscopal cathedral, and a magnificent arch, erected in 114 A.D. to the honour of the Emperor Trajan. From 1053, when it was given to the pope by the Emperor Henry III., until 1860, when it was united with the kingdom of Italy, Benevento was governed through a resident cardinal with the title of Legate. Pop. 24,000.

Benfieldside, a Durham township, 13 miles SW. of Gateshead. Pop. 8400.

Bengal' (old Bangálá), a name given to part of British India, but variously signifying—(1) the old historical presidency which, in pre-mutiny times, comprised the greater portion of Northern India; (2) the modern military division, corresponding in extent to the old presidency; (3) the province as it was till 1905, also called Lower Bengal, comprising Bengal Proper (the division of Calcutta and four other districts), Behar, Orissa, and Chota Nagpore; (4) Bengal as divided in 1905 from Eastern Bengal and Assam, with 141,580 square miles and fifty-four millions of inhabitants; and (5) the presidency, as reconstituted in 1912—that is, Bengal Proper (including Eastern Bengal), but without Behar, Orissa, and Chota Nagpur (made into a separate province). The undivided province before 1905 had an area of 157,000 square miles and seventy-five millions—with the native states, eighty millions. Only some 11,000 were British-born. Bengal comprises the low-lying deltas of the Ganges and Brahmaputra, and the alluvial plains stretching along their lower courses; hemmed in on the N. by the Himalayan ramparts. The distinctive features of Bengal are its immense network of rivers, the magnificent range of the Himalayas, the luxuriant but fever-haunted Terai at the base of the great mountain-chain, and the trackless forests and jungles of the Sundarbans (Sunderbunds), on the sea-face of the delta—the almost undisputed home of the tiger and rhinoceros. As compared with Northern India, Bengal has few very large cities. Calcutta, the capital, is one of the largest cities in the world, having, with suburbs, a pop. of a million and a quarter; the second capital of the province being Dacca, with 108,000. The climate of the plains is similar to that of the Indian seaboard everywhere—hot and humid. But inland in Behar it is much drier, with hot winds in summer; while in ascending the hills, every variety of climate is met with, till the perpetual snow-line is reached. The ordinary range of temperature in the plains is from about 52° F. in the cold season, to 103° in the shade in summer. The people are mostly employed in agriculture, and among the chief products are indigo, jute, the opium poppy, oil-seeds, many varieties of rice, cinchona, tea, turmeric, pepper, the silk mulberry, cotton, sugar, and innumerable grains, spices, and drugs. Opium is a government monopoly; and cinchona is chiefly grown at the government plantation at Darjiling. Bengal has considerable mineral wealth; in Burdwan, coal, iron, and copper are worked. The jute and cotton mills round Calcutta employ over 40,000 hands. Standing far in advance of the rest of India in education, the enlightened classes in Bengal are largely employed in government service. The province has colleges affiliated to the university of Calcutta, besides numerous 'institutions' catalogued as giving university education, and higher and lower schools, engineering, normal, and industrial schools.

Within the province there is a great variety of race, language, religion, and degrees of civilisation. A large proportion of the people are descended from the Aryan stock; but no sharp line can be drawn between those called Hindus and those reckoned aborigines or non-Aryan, as many low-caste Hindus are wholly aboriginal in blood. Bengal in 1905 had 25½ million Moslem inhabitants (mostly in the upper classes), while about 3 millions were semi-savage tribesmen, and 280,000 were returned as Christian converts. Bengalis speaking Bengali numbered 40 millions; Hindustani speakers, 26 millions. The typical Bengalis, in contrast with the Mohammedans, are highly intellectual, but weak in character. In Bengal Proper the Santals are the most notable aboriginal stock; in the feudatory states are the Kolarian or Dravidian Gonds, Kols, and Bhuiyas, with Indo-Chinese tribes. The Mohammedan conquest dates from 1200. As reconstituted in 1912, Bengal has an area of about 70,000 sq. m. and a population of 42,000,000. See INDIA.

Bengal, BAY OF, a triangular portion of the Indian Ocean, between India and the Indo-Chinese peninsula. The bay receives many large rivers—the Ganges, Brahmaputra, Irawadi, Mahanadi, Godavery, Krishna, and Cauvery. On the west coast there is hardly anything worthy of the name of harbour; on the east there are many good ports—Akyab, Gwa, Maulmain, Tavoy River. The numerous islands include the Andaman, Nicobar, and Mergui groups.

Benga′zi (anc. Hesperis), a North African seaport, capital of the Tripolitan district of Barca, on the coast of the Gulf of Sidra. Pop. 35,000.

Benguela (Ben-gay′la), a country of W. Africa, bordering on the Atlantic, forming a district of Angola (Portuguese W. Africa), lying roughly between 10° and 15° S. lat. and 12° and 17° E. long. Its surface is generally mountainous, rising from the coast-line inland in a series of terraces. Sulphur, copper, and petroleum are found in the mountains, and also gold and silver in small quantities.—São Felipe de Benguela, the Portuguese capital of the above region, on a level plain near the sea, in 12° 33′ S. lat., was once a great slave-station. Pop. 2000 natives and a garrison of 100 men. The harbour is good, though difficult of entrance. See From Benguella to Yacca, by Capello and Ivens (1883).

Benhar, East, a Linlithgowshire mining village, 1½ mile NNW. of Fauldhouse.

Beni′, an impetuous river of South America, in the state of Bolivia, rises in the La Paz Cordillera of the Andes, at a height of almost 12,000 feet, and joins the Mamore, after a course of over 1000 miles, to form the Madeira, one of the largest affluents of the Amazon.

Benicar′lo, a town of Spain, 84 miles SW. of Tarragona. Pop. 9000.

Benicia, capital of Solano county, California, and formerly capital of the state, on the Carquinez Strait, 30 miles NE. of San Francisco. It has a commodious harbour, and is the seat of the U.S. Pacific arsenal. Pop. 2400.

Beni-Hassan, a village of Upper Egypt, on the east bank of the Nile, remarkable for its catacombs.

Benin′, a country of Western Africa, lying between the lower Niger and Dahomey. Once a powerful kingdom (under the influence of a barbarous theocracy), it now forms part of British Nigeria. The forests produce valuable timber; and the natives grow rubber under official guidance. The pop. is dense. The capital, Benin, 73 miles inland from the mouth of the Benin River, has a pop. of above 15,000. Gato is a centre for the palm-oil trade. The river Benin is 2 miles wide at its mouth, but has a troublesome bar of mud. Benin was discovered by the Portuguese Alfonso de Aveiro (1486).

Benin, Bight of, that portion of the Gulf of Guinea (q.v.) extending from Cape Formosa to Cape St Paul, with a coast-line of 460 miles.

Beni-Souef′, a town of Central Egypt, on the right bank of the Nile, 70 miles SSW. of Cairo. A branch line of railway has been constructed westward to Medinet el Fayum, and the town is the entrepôt of the fertile Fayum, and has cotton-mills and alabaster quarries. Pop. (1907) 23,357.

Ben Law′ers, a Perthshire mountain, flanking the NW. shore of Loch Tay, and attaining 3984 feet, or with the cairn at the top (rebuilt in 1878), 4004.

Ben Ledi (Leddy), a mountain (2875 feet) of Perthshire, 4½ miles W. by N. of Callander. A jubilee cairn was erected on it in 1887.

Ben Lomond, a Scottish mountain (3192 feet) in the NW. of Stirlingshire, on the east side of Loch Lomond, 13½ miles N. of Dumbarton.

Ben Macdhu′i, a mountain (4296 feet) of South-west Aberdeenshire, one of the Cairngorms, 18 miles WNW. of Castletown-of-Braemar.

Benmore, the name of several Scottish mountains.—(1) Perthshire, 10 miles SW. of Killin, 3843 feet; (2) in Assynt parish, Sutherland, 3234 feet; (3) in Mull island, 3185 feet, &c.

Ben Nevis, a mountain of Inverness-shire, 7 miles SE. of Fort William, by a carriage-road opened in 1880. The loftiest summit in Great Britain, it has a height of 4406 feet, with a tremendous precipice of 1500 feet on the north-east side. Till a road to the top was made in 1883, the ascent was difficult. A meteorological observatory on the summit was in use in 1883–1904, and beside it is now a shelter for travellers.

Ben-Rhydding, a hydropathic establishment (1846), in the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the Wharfe, 12 miles NW. of Leeds. The name is a modern coinage.

Ben Rinnes, a Banffshire mountain (2755 feet).

Bentham, a town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the Wenning, 12 miles WNW. of Settle. Pop. of parish, 2500.

Bentley Priory, a seat in Harrow parish, 3 miles WNW. of Edgware. Queen Adelaide died here.

Be′nuë (spelt also Binuë and Benuwé), an important river of Central Africa, forming the great eastern affluent of the Niger, which it joins 230 miles above its mouth in the Gulf of Guinea. Flowing through wide tracts of fertile territory, and navigable for 700 miles, it is a highway into the heart of the Soudan. Dr Barth describes it as 800 yards wide, with a general depth in its channel of 11 feet, and 'a liability to rise under ordinary circumstances at least 30, or even at times 50, feet higher.' The Benuë was explored by Dr Baikie (1854 and 1862), and by Mr Flegel (1879–83), who reached its sources, in the Adamawa country, in 7° 30′ N. lat. and 13° E. long.

Ben Venue (Venoo′), a Perthshire mountain (2393 feet) flanking Loch Katrine.

Ben Wyvis (Wee′vis or Wi′vis), a lumpish mountain (3429 feet) of Ross-shire, 8 m. NW. of Dingwall.

Benzerta. See Bizerta.

Berar′, a commissionership of India till 1902 under the resident of Hyderabad, and called 'Hyderabad Assigned Districts,' but now in the Central Provinces. It is bounded by Bombay and the Nizam's dominions. Its length from east to west is about 150 miles; area, 17,710 sq. m.; pop. 3,000,000. Berar consists of six districts, assigned to Britain under the treaties of 1853 and 1861 with the bankrupt Nizam of Hyderabad, but leased in perpetuity in 1902. Mainly a broad and fertile valley running east and west, between the Satpura and Ajanta ranges, it is traversed by the Purna, a tributary of the Tapti. Ellichpur was the capital of the old kingdom.

Berat′, a town of Albania, 30 miles NE. of the seaport of Avlona. Pop. 12,000.

Berber, a town on the right bank of the Nile, below the confluence of the Atbara. Pop. 8000.

Ber′bera, a seaport of British Somaliland, with a good harbour, on a bay of the Gulf of Aden. It was conquered by Egypt in 1875, but in July 1884 the British government took possession of it. A great fair brings many thousands of visitors every year.

Berbice (Ber-beess'), the E. division of British Guiana (q.v.), bounded on the E. by the Corentyn and Dutch Guiana. Area, 21,000 sq. m. The Berbice River is navigable for small vessels 175 miles from its mouth. An important affluent is the Canje. New Amsterdam, on the right bank of the Berbice River (pop. 8000), is the chief town and port.

Berchtesgaden (Berhh-tez-gâh'den), a village of Bavaria, on a mountain-slope, 15 miles S. of Salzburg. It has a royal castle (once an abbey) and huge government salt-mines. Pop. 2000.

Berck-sur-mer, a harbour and bathing resort in the French dep. of Pas-de-Calais, 22 miles S. of Boulogne. Pop. 8000.

Berdiansk', a seaport of southern Russia, in the government of Taurida, on the NW. coast of the Sea of Azov. Pop. 33,000.

Berditchef', a town of Russia, 108 miles WSW. of Kiev, with five annual fairs. Pop. 75,000.

Berehaven. See Castleton Berehaven.

Bere Regis, a Dorset town, 8 miles SSW. of Blandford. Pop. of parish, 1000.

Beresina (Ber-e-zee'na), a river of Russia, rising in the N. of the Lithuanian government of Minsk, and flowing 350 miles S. (over 200 navigable) to the Dnieper. It is memorable on account of the disastrous passage of the French army, November 1812, during the retreat from Moscow.

Bereslav, a town in the Russian government of Kherson, on the Dnieper. Pop. 13,000.

Berezna, a town of Russia, in Tchernigov, on a tributary of the Desna. Pop. 12,000.

Berezov', a town of Siberia, in the government of Tobolsk, on a branch of the Obi. Pop. 3000.

Berezovsk, a village in the Russian province of Perm, near Ekaterinburg, gives name to a famous gold-field, wrought since 1744.

Berg, a former German duchy on the Rhine's right bank, now incorporated with the Prussian dominions, between Düsseldorf and Cologne.

Berga, a town of Catalonia, Spain, 52 miles NNW. of Barcelona. Pop. 6000.

Ber'gama (anc. Pergămos), a city of Asia Minor, 40 miles N. of Smyrna. Pop. 6000.

Ber'gamo (anc. Bergomum), a fortified town of Lombardy, 34 miles NE. of Milan by rail. It has a castle, a cathedral, and manufactures of silk, cotton, linen, woollens, and iron goods. Tiraboschi and Donizetti were natives. Pop. 55,500.

Bergedorf (Ber'gay-dorf), a town of Germany (Hamburg), 10 miles SE. of Hamburg. Pop. 15,000.

Bergen (Ber'gen; g hard), a seaport in the west of Norway, and the second city of the kingdom, situated on a promontory at the head of a deep bay. The harbour is safe and commodious, and around it the town is built, presenting a picturesque appearance from the sea, with its cathedral and wooden houses of various colours. It has manufactures of gloves, tobacco, porcelain, leather, soap, and cordage, besides distilleries and shipbuilding yards. Its principal trade, however, is the export of stockfish, herrings, and fish-oil and roe. Since 1883 Bergen has been connected by railway with the north of the Hardangerfjord. The chief imports are brandy, wine, corn, cotton, woollens, hemp, sugar, tobacco, coffee, &c. Bergen, formerly called Björgvin ('the pasture betwixt the mountains'), was founded about 1070 by Olaf Kyrre. Often devastated by fire between 1189 and 1855, it was long the most important trading town of Norway, but has been recently surpassed by Christiania. The castle of Bergenhus was till 1397 the residence of the Norwegian kings. Bergen was the birthplace of Holberg, Dahl, Welhaven, Ole Bull, and Grieg. Pop. 77,000.

Bergen-op-Zoom (Ber-gen-op-Zoam'; g hard), a town of Holland, 21 miles N. by W. of Antwerp, stands on the little river Zoom, at its entrance into the east branch of the Scheldt. It has a harbour, manufactures of brick and earthenwares, and a large trade in anchovies. Strongly fortified until 1767, Bergen-op-Zoom was repeatedly besieged by the Spaniards, French, and English between 1581 and 1814. Pop. 15,000.

Bergerac (Berzh'erak), a town in the French dep. of Dordogne, on the Dordogne, 60 miles E. of Bordeaux by rail. Most of its inhabitants are employed in the surrounding ironworks and paper-mills. Its wines are esteemed. Pop. 10,000.

Bergholt, East, a Suffolk parish, Constable's birthplace, on the Stour, 9 miles SSW. of Ipswich.

Bergues (Berg), a town and fortress in the French dep. of Nord, on the Colme, 5 miles SSE. of Dunkirk. Pop. 4000.

Berhampur, two towns in British India.—(1) in Madras, a military station, 18 miles SW. of Ganjam, and but 9 from the coast. Pop. 25,653. —(2) in Bengal, on the Bhagirathi, 5 miles below Murshidabad. It was long one of the principal military stations in British India, and in 1857 was the scene of the first open act of mutiny. Pop. 24,515.

Beri, (1) a town of India, in the British district of Rohtak, Punjab, 36 miles W. by N. from Delhi. Pop. 9695.—(2) A state in Bundelkhand. Area, 30 sq. m.; pop. 4985.

Berja, a town of Spain, 22 miles W. of Almeria, with lead-mines. Pop. 14,000.

Berkeley, a town of Gloucestershire, on the Avon, 17½ miles SW. of Gloucester by rail. It lies in the Vale of Berkeley, which consists of rich meadow pasture-land, and is celebrated for its 'Double Gloucester' cheese. Berkeley Castle, on an eminence to the south-east, about 1162 was granted by Henry II. to Robert Fitzhardinge, with whose descendants it has since continued, they having held the title of Baron Berkeley from 1295, and of earl and viscount from 1679. Here Edward II. was murdered in 1327. Dr Jenner, the discoverer of vaccination, was a native, and is buried in the parish church. Pop. of parish, 830. See Smyth's Lives of the Berkeleys (1884).

Berkeley, a town of Almeda county, California, overlooking the Bay of San Francisco, is the seat of the state university. Pop. 40,400.

Berkeley Sound, an inlet of the East Falkland Island, near its north-eastern extremity.

Berkhamstead, an urban district of Herts, 28 miles NW. of London, has a public school. Straw-plaiting is carried on, and manufactures of wooden articles and chemicals. Cowper was a native. Pop. 7300.

Berkovitza, a town of Bulgaria, 40 miles NNW. of Sofia, on a tributary of the Danube. Pop. 6000.

Berkshire (Bark'shir), a midland county, bounded by Gloucester, Oxford, Bucks, Surrey, Hampshire, and Wiltshire. Its greatest length is 53 miles; its greatest breadth, 30; and the area, 725 sq. m., or 463,834 acres, nearly one-half of which is under tillage, one-fourth in pasture, and one-sixteenth in wood. Berkshire, which is one of the most beautiful of the English counties, lies in the valley of the Thames, and has an undulating surface, rising in some parts into hills, of which White Horse Hill attains 893 feet. The Thames winds 100 miles along the northern border of the county, whose other rivers are its tributaries—the Kennet, Loddon, and Ock. The Kennet is navigable for 30 miles. The country between the fertile vales of Kennet and the White Horse consists chiefly of sheep-walks; and along the Thames, and to the west of the Ridge Way, or Downs, it is principally dairy and pasture land. The chief crops are oats and wheat. 'Double Gloucester' and 'pine-apple' cheese are sent in large quantities to London. Swine are extensively reared. Berkshire is divided into 20 hundreds, 195 parishes, and 12 poor-law unions. It returns five members to parliament, one for each of the three divisions (Abingdon, Newbury, Wokingham), one for Reading (the county town), and one for Windsor. It contains also the municipal boroughs of Abingdon, Wallingford, Wokingham, Newbury, and Maidenhead, and the market-towns of Faringdon, Hungerford, Wantage, East Ilsley, and Lambourn. British and Roman remains are numerous; of the old castles, the principal is Windsor; of monastic establishments, the abbeys of Abingdon and Reading. There are many Norman churches, erected in the 12th and 13th centuries. In 1836 Berkshire was transferred from the diocese of Salisbury to that of Oxford. Pop. (1801) 110,480; (1841) 161,759; (1911) 271,009. See the Victoria History (1906–12).

Berlad (Bârladu), a town of Lower Moldavia, 84 miles by rail NNW. of Galatz. Pop. 25,000.

Berlen'gas, a group of rocky islands in the Atlantic Ocean, off the west coast of the Portuguese province of Estremadura.

Berlin', the capital of Prussia, and since 1871, of the German empire, and the third largest city of Europe, is situated on a flat sandy plain, in 52° 30′ N. lat., 13° 24′ E. long., and is divided into two nearly equal parts by the sluggish Spree. The inconvenience of its low-lying situation in the midst of the sandy flats of Brandenburg is more than made up for by the great geographical advantages of its position in the heart of Northern Germany. By rail it is 177 miles SE. of Hamburg, 101 NNE. of Leipzig, and 362 ENE. of Cologne; whilst from London it can be reached in 25 hours, Paris in 23½, and Vienna in 15. The advance of the city has been extraordinary. In 1804 the pop. was 182,157; in 1871 it was 826,341; in 1880, 1,122,330; and in 1910, 2,070,695. It was not till the time of the 'Great Elector,' Frederick-William (1640–88), that the town became of consequence. In the 17th century it received many French and Bohemian religious refugees. Under Frederick the Great it continued to prosper. Since the peace of 1815, and still more since the creation of the German Empire, Berlin has grown with remarkable rapidity. Including the suburbs not yet incorporated, it has over 3,000,000 inhabitants. At the centre of the city is the old royal palace, with nearly 700 apartments. Near this are the emperor's palace; the royal library, with over 1,000,000 volumes and 30,000 manuscripts; the old and new museums, the national gallery, the arsenal, the royal theatre, the opera-house, the guard-house, and the university. These are all situated between the Spree and the east end of the street 'Unter den Linden' (so called from its double avenue of limes). The city is adorned throughout with numerous statues of national heroes, the Great Elector, Frederick the Great, and many others. There are more than 20 theatres in Berlin. The university, established in 1809, has had as professors Fichte, Hegel, Schelling, Schleiermacher, Eichhorn, De Wette, Neander, Wolff, Savigny, Niebuhr, the brothers Grimm, Bopp, Ranke, Mommsen, Curtius, Lepsius, Dorner, Virchow, Du Bois-Reymond, Helmholz, Sybel, Van't Hoff, and Harnack. The number of professors and lecturers is over 500, and of students about 8000. Other public institutions are the Academy of Sciences; the Military Academy; the Academy of Architecture; the Academic High School (of art); the School of Mines; the School of Agriculture; the Artillery, Technical, and Engineering Colleges; the Industrial (1881), Ethnological (1886), and other museums; the Academy of Music; and the Observatory. About 82 per cent. of the population are Protestants, 12 per cent. Roman Catholics, and 5 per cent. Jews. Berlin has a cathedral, rebuilt in 1893–95, 100 Protestant and 15 Catholic churches. Of these, the Nicolaikirche (restored in 1880), Marienkirche (with a spire 295 feet high), and Klosterkirche, all of the 13th century, are the oldest; the Petrikirche (with a tower 315 feet high) is the loftiest; and the Michaelskirche (Catholic), Thomaskirche, Zionskirche, Dankeskirche (1884), and Heiligekreuzkirche (1887), are more recent. The New Synagogue (1866) has seats for 3000 persons.

The Old Museum contains antiquarian specimens, a collection of 90,000 coins, a gallery of ancient sculpture, and a picture-gallery with about 1300 paintings. The New Museum contains six magnificent mural paintings by Kaulbach in the grand staircase, a very valuable collection of casts, the Egyptian museum, and 500,000 engravings. The National Gallery includes about 700 works by modern artists. The celebrated Brandenburg Gate leads to the Thiergarten. To the south-west of this lies the Zoological Garden. The Botanical Garden (at Schöneberg) contains 25,000 species. Noteworthy also are the Rathhaus, the royal château of Monbijou, the Ruhmeshalle in the arsenal, the Gothic monument on the Kreuzberg, the Column of Peace in the Belle-Alliance-Platz, the Warriors' Monument, the Column of Victory, the War Office, the new building for the Reichstag, the Exchange, and the Reichsbank. Berlin now ranks among the most important mercantile places of continental Europe, and has large manufacturing industries.

Berlin, a town of Ontario, Canada, 62 miles SW. of Toronto by rail. Pop. 15,200.

Berlin, the name of forty towns, villages, and townships in the United States; one (pop. 12,000) in New Hampshire, 98 miles NW. of Portland; and one (5000) in Wisconsin, on the Fox River, 96 miles NNW. of Milwaukee by rail.

Ber'mondsey, a south-east suburb of London, on the south bank of the Thames, and (since 1899) one of the metropolitan boroughs. Pop. 125,960.

Bermu'das, or Somers' Islands, British possessions in Mid-Atlantic, 2900 miles from Liverpool, and 677 from New York. They were so named from Bermudas, a Spaniard, who first sighted them in 1515, and from Sir George Somers, an Englishman, whose shipwreck here in 1609 was the immediate occasion of their colonisation from Virginia in 1611. This low and lonely archipelago is a mere group of specks; for though it numbers perhaps 100 islets and more than twice that number of rocks, yet it measures only 19 sq. m. in all, the whole occupying a space of about 14 miles in length by little more than 5 in breadth. The islands are composed of blown coral sand, and are surrounded by a living, growing reef of coral—the most northerly of atolls. The great value of this natural fortress as a British naval station, defended by its extensive barrier of reefs and rocks, with only one or two intricate channels, arises from its situation. In 32° 15′ N. lat., and 64° 51′ W. long., the Bermudas occupy, commercially and politically, a singularly commanding position. In the principal or Main Island is the seat of government, Hamilton, on a deep inlet running 2 or 3 miles into the land. St George's contains the picturesque town of the same name, and a landlocked and fortified harbour. Ireland Island is occupied by a dockyard and other naval establishments; and Boaz and Watford Islands have the military depots and garrisons. At Ireland Island also is the celebrated Bermuda Floating Dock, towed out from England in 1869. The minor islands of St David, Cooper, Smith, Nonsuch, Godet, and others, form numerous picturesque and deep creeks and bays. The group forms an almost continuous chain, and with one break there is uninterrupted communication by roads, causeways, and bridges for 22 miles; but from the shape of most of the islands, and the number of lagoons, the communications are largely by water. The climate is tempered by an almost constant sea-breeze, and the air is moist at all seasons. The thermometer never falls below 40° F., and seldom rises above 85°. The islands are becoming a popular holiday and winter resort, especially for Americans. The soil is poor in quality, and not more than a fourth is cultivable at all; still the raising of early vegetables for New York is a great industry. Besides being useful as a naval station, Bermuda was formerly an important convict depot, but since 1862 it has ceased to be so. The colony has a very complete telegraph system. Pop. (1871) 12,121; (1911) 18,994, rather more than two-thirds coloured, and nearly three-fourths members of the Church of England. See works by Lefroy (1882), Ogilvy (1883), Dorr (New York, 1884), and Heilprin (Phil. 1890).

Bermudez, a former state of NE. Venezuela, between the Orinoco and the Caribbean Sea.

Bern, or BERNE, a Swiss canton, bounded on the N. by France. It is the most populous, and next to the Grisons the largest canton of Switzerland; its area being 2650 sq. m., and its pop. (1910) 642,744—more than one-sixth of the total inhabitants of Switzerland. Most of these are Protestant and German-speaking.—BERN, the capital of the canton, and since 1849 of Switzerland, 68 miles by rail SSW. of Basel, is situated on a lofty sandstone promontory formed by the winding Aar, which surrounds it on three sides. It is one of the best and most regularly built towns in Europe, as it is the finest in Switzerland. The houses are massive structures of freestone, resting upon shop-lined arcades. Rills of water flow through the streets. The view of the Alpine peaks from the city is magnificent. The principal public buildings are a Gothic cathedral (1421–1573); the magnificent Federal Council Hall (1857), the mint, the hospital, and the university. Bern has an interesting museum, and a valuable public library of 50,000 volumes. Pop. (1910) 85,264. Bern was founded in 1191, was made a free imperial city in 1218, under Frederick II.; and between 1288 and 1339 successfully resisted the attacks of Rudolf of Hapsburg, Albert his son, and Louis of Bavaria. The 'Disputation of Bern' between Catholics and Reformers in 1528 (January 6–27) prepared the way for the acceptance of the reformed doctrine. On account of the traditionary derivation of its name (Swabian bern, 'a bear'), bears are maintained in a public bear-pit.

Bernalda, a town in South Italy, in the province of Potenza. Pop. 8000.

Bernard, GREAT ST. See ST BERNARD.

Bernay, a French town in the dep. of Eure, 25 miles WNW. of Évreux. Pop. 6000.

Bernburg, a town in the German duchy of Anhalt, till 1863 capital of Anhalt-Bernburg, on the Saale, 23 miles S. of Magdeburg. It manufactures machinery, sugar, spirits, porcelain, &c. Pop. (1871) 15,709; (1910) 33,724.

Berne. See BERN.

Ber′nera, (1) a Ross-shire island, 23 miles W. of Stornoway, on the coast of Lewis. It measures 5⅜ by 3¼ miles, and attains 223 feet. Pop. 730.—(2) An Inverness-shire island, 1 mile N. of North Uist, measuring 5½ by 2 miles. Pop. 500.

Ber′neray, an Inverness-shire island, 14 miles SSW. of Barra. See also BERNERA.

Berni′na, a mountain of the Rhætian Alps, 13,290 feet high, in the Swiss canton of Grisons. Its summit was first attained in 1850. The Bernina Pass (7642 feet), with a carriage-road (1864), leads from Pontresina to Poschiavo.

Berre, ÉTANG DE, a lagoon of France, dep. Bouches-du-Rhône, 45 miles in circumference, with salt-works and eel-fisheries.

Berri, or BERRY, a former province of Central France, now forming Indre and Cher deps.

Bervie, a seaport and one of the Montrose burghs in Kincardineshire, near the mouth of Bervie Water, 13 miles NE. of Montrose by rail. Pop. 1200.

Berwick, NORTH. See NORTH BERWICK.

Berwick-on-Tweed (Ber′rick), at the mouth of the Tweed, 58 miles ESE. of Edinburgh, and 67 N. by W. of Newcastle. The liberties of the borough, called 'Berwick Bounds,' have an area of 8 sq. m., and with Spittal and Tweedmouth, form the 'county of the borough of Berwick-on-Tweed.' Though long boasting to be neither in England nor Scotland, and still possessing separate quarter-sessions and commission of the peace, it is to all intents and purposes part of the county of Northumberland (the adjoining parts of which formed till 1844 a detached portion of Durham); especially since by the Redistribution Act of 1885 Berwick ceased to return two members, and was for election purposes merged in Northumberland. The town is engirt with ramparts of Elizabeth's time, and fragments of Edward I.'s. Tweedmouth and Spittal (the latter a favourite watering-place), on the south side of the Tweed, have since 1835 both been included within the municipality. They are reached by a narrow stone bridge (1609–34) of fifteen arches; and the river is also spanned by Robert Stephenson's magnificent viaduct (1850) of 28 arches, 136 feet high and 2160 long. The public buildings include the town-hall (1760), with a belfry 150 feet high, the corn exchange (1858), and several churches, Presbyterian outnumbering the Anglican. The harbour has been improved by the construction of a wet-dock (1873–76), at a cost of £40,000; there is a considerable coasting trade, but the salmon-fishing has fallen off. For the manufacture of agricultural implements Berwick stands high, and in Spittal there are several large artificial-manure works. Pop. (1841) 12,689; (1911) 13,075. Berwick, in the 12th century, was the chief seaport of Scotland; was captured by Edward I. in 1296, was annexed to England in 1333, after the battle of Halidon Hill, and was finally ceded by Scotland in 1482. See J. Scott's History of Berwick (1888).

Berwickshire (Berrickshir), a Border county of south-east Scotland, bounded by Haddingtonshire, the German Ocean, Berwick-on-Tweed, Northumberland, Roxburghshire, and Midlothian. It extends from east to west 29 miles, from north to south 21 miles, and has an area of 457 sq. m., or 292,535 acres. Berwickshire is divided into three districts—the fertile Merse, the Lammermoors, and Lauderdale. The coast, 19 miles in length, is rocky and bold, rising at St Abb's Head and other points to heights of from 177 to 528 feet above sea-level, and having only two bays, at Eyemouth and Coldingham. The Lammermoors, whose highest summit is Meikle Says Law (1749 feet) on the county boundary, and whose highest wholly in Berwickshire is Seenes Law (1683), consist of Silurian strata, stretching to St Abb's Head. The Blackadder, Whitadder, and Leader are all tributaries of the Tweed, the Eye alone flowing direct to the sea. Pop. (1801) 30,206; (1861) 36,613; (1911) 29,643. Berwickshire returns one member to parliament. Agriculturally, Berwickshire occupies a prominent position, 65·4 per cent. of the entire area being in cultivation, it has suffered proportionally from the recent agricultural depression. The Earlston ginghams excepted, there are no manufactures worth naming. The principal towns are Duns, Greenlaw, Lauder, Eyemouth, Coldstream, and Earlston. The county contains some very interesting examples, though on a comparatively small scale, of Norman or Pointed architecture, at Coldingham, Dryburgh, &c. There are also the remains or sites of Fast, Hume, and Cranshaws castles, and of British and Roman camps and barrows, besides remains of a curious broch-like structure at Edinshall, near Duns.

Berwyn Mountains, a range (2716 feet) on the border of Merioneth and Montgomery shires.

Besançon (Be-zon^{g}son^{g}), a fortified French city, the capital now of the dep. of Doubs, and formerly of Franche-Comté, on the river Doubs, 57 miles E. of Dijon. It was the ancient Vesontio or Besontium; in 58 B.C. Cæsar expelled the Sequani hence, and in the neighbourhood gained a victory over Ariovistus. It finally came into the possession of France in 1674. Several streets still bear old Roman names; and in the neighbourhood are ruins of a triumphal arch, an aqueduct, an amphitheatre, and a large theatre. Among later structures are the 12th-century cathedral, the Palais de Justice (1749), and the half-Gothic, half-Renaissance palace (1534) of Cardinal Granvella. There is also a fine public library. Besançon makes a large percentage of the watches made in France. The industry was introduced from Switzerland about 1818. Other manufactures are porcelain, carpets, iron-wire, Seltzer-water, and beer. Abel Rémusat and Victor Hugo were natives. Pop. 58,000.

Besika Bay (Be-zee'ka), a bay on the north-west coast of Asia Minor, to the south of the entrance of the Dardanelles. The English fleet was stationed here during crises in the Eastern Question, in 1853–54 and 1877–78.

Bessarabia, a government in the south-west of Russia, on the Roumanian frontier. Area, 17,627 sq. m.; pop. 2,441,200. The Dniester flows along the whole of its northern and eastern boundaries; the Pruth separates it from Moldavia on the west; and it has the Danube on the south. In the north-west the country is traversed by well-wooded offshoots of the Carpathian Mountains; generally, however, Bessarabia is flat and fertile. Bessarabia, which fell under the power of the Turks in 1503, was ceded to Russia in 1812. By the Treaty of Paris the portions lying along the Pruth and Danube—3578 sq. m., with some 200,000 inhabitants—were assigned to Moldavia, but by the Berlin Congress of 1878 were again transferred to Russia. See ROUMANIA.

Bessbrook, an Armagh market-town, 2 miles NW. of Newry. Pop. 2900.

Bessèges (Bes-sezh'), a town in the French dep. of Gard, 21 miles N. of Alais. Pop. 7000.

Betanzos (Betan'thoas), a Spanish town, 10 miles SE. of Corunna. Pop. 9000.

Beth'any ('house of dates'), by the natives of Palestine called 'El' Azariyeh' or 'Lazariyeh' ('town of Lazarus'), is situated on the southern slope of the Mount of Olives, 2208 feet above the sea, 2 miles ESE. of Jerusalem. It was the home of Lazarus and his sisters, often visited by the Saviour, and the scene of his ascension. It is now a poor place of some 200 inhabitants, with nothing remarkable except the reputed house of Martha and Mary, and the cave or grave of Lazarus shown by the monks.—Bethany is also the name of three German mission stations in South Africa; one in Great Namaqualand, one in the Orange Free State, and one in the Transvaal.

Bethel ('house of God'), now called Beitin, 11 miles N. of Jerusalem, mentioned in Scripture as the scene of Jacob's dream. The old name of the place was Luz. Here Abraham pitched his tent; at a later date it was a resting-place of the ark, a royal residence, and a seat of idolatrous worship. It is a heap of ruins.

Bethesda, a small town of Carnarvonshire (so named from its Nonconformist chapel), 4½ miles SE. of Bangor. Its inhabitants are mostly employed in the neighbouring Penrhyn slate-quarries. Pop. 4700.

Bethlehem ('house of bread'), the birthplace of Jesus Christ and of King David, and the Ephratah of the history of Jacob, is now a small unwalled village of white stone houses, 6 miles S. of Jerusalem. The population, about 3000 souls, is wholly Christian—Latin, Greek, and Armenian. The Convent of the Nativity, a large square building, resembling a fortress, was built by the Empress Helena, 327 A.D., but destroyed by the Moslems in 1236, and, it is supposed, restored by the Crusaders. Within it is the Church of the Nativity, with a crypt below, where the blessed Virgin is said to have been delivered.

Bethlehem, a post-borough of Northampton county, Pennsylvania, on the Lehigh River, 55 miles N. of Philadelphia by rail, is the principal settlement in America of the Moravians, by whom it was founded in 1741. It has silk, paint, and flour mills, and is noted for its excellent schools. Two bridges connect it with South Bethlehem, the seat of Lehigh University (1866) and other institutions, and possessing iron and steel works. West Bethlehem, till 1904 a borough, separated from Bethlehem by Monocacy Creek, contains silk and planing mills, machine-shops, and dyeworks. Joint pop. 30,000.

Bethnal Green, a north-eastern metropolitan and parliamentary borough with two divisions, once largely peopled by silk-weavers, an offshoot of the Huguenot settlement in Spitalfields, now headquarters of the shoe trade and of tailoring. Its museum is a branch of the Victoria and Albert Museum. Pop. (1911) 128,282.

Bethsaida, a village on the western shore of the Lake of Galilee, the birthplace of Peter and Andrew and Philip. Its site has been identified with a heap of grass-grown ruins.—At the north-eastern extremity of the lake was another Bethsaida, a village, near which the five thousand were fed.

Béthune (Bay-tün'), a town in the dep. of Pas-de-Calais, on a rock overlooking the river Brette, 16 miles NNW. of Arras, with old fortifications by Vauban. It has bleaching-works and manufactures of soap. It belonged in the middle ages to Flanders, but was ceded to France by the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713. Pop. 13,000.

Bev'eland, North and South, two Dutch islands in the Scheldt's estuary. South Beveland is the largest and most fertile of the Zeeland islands, with a pop. of 23,000. North Beveland is low and marshy.

Beveren, a town of Belgium, 5½ miles W. by S. of Antwerp. Lace-making is the principal industry. Pop. 9000.

Beverley, the chief town of the East Riding of Yorkshire, 1 mile W. of the river Hull, with which it communicates by canal, and 8 miles NNW. of the city of Hull. Its trade consists in corn and coal; and tanning and the manufacture of agricultural implements are the staple industries. The superb Gothic minster is 334 feet long and 167 across the transept; the western towers are 200 feet high. The 14th-century North Bar is the sole survivor of four old gates. Beverley arose out of a priory founded by St John of Beverley (d. 721). The name is derived from Beverlac, 'lake of beavers.' Incorporated in 1573, Beverley till 1870 returned two members. Pop. (1851) 10,058; (1891) 12,539; (1911) 13,654.

Beverloo', a village of Belgium, 12 miles NW. of Hasselt. Pop. 1000.

Bexley, a town of Kent, on the Cray, 3 miles W. of Dartford, now a suburb of London. Pop. 16,000.

Beyerland, an island-district, 15 miles long, of South Holland, between the Maas and the Hollandsche Diep.

Beypur', a seaport of Western India, in Malabar district, Madras, near the mouth of the Beypur River, 6 miles S. of Calicut. Since 1858 it is the terminus of a railway across India from Madras viâ Coimbatore. Pop. 7000.

Beyrout, or Beirût (Bay-root'; Old Test. Berothai or Berothah; anc. Berytus), a flourishing town, on the coast of Syria, and at the foot of Lebanon, 55 miles from Damascus and 147 from Jerusalem. It is a great seaport and emporium of most of the trade with the shores of Syria, Palestine, and Cilicia, with a regular service of Egyptian, French, British, and other steamers. Till the harbour was made (1894) seagoing ships could not approach within half a mile of the shore, but shelter was found during stormy weather in St George's Bay, about 3 miles from the town. Commerce has trebled within the last fifty years. About half the total imports are from Great Britain. In 1859 a line of omnibuses was established here, and a French company completed in 1863 a good road to Damascus. In 1895 a railway (across Lebanon) to Damascus was completed; in 1886 gas was introduced. Beyrout is an episcopal see of Greeks and Maronites, and has Catholic and Protestant missions, with an American college. Of 150,000 inhabitants, only 30 per cent. are Mohammedans, and some 5000 are Europeans.

Bhiwani (Bee-wah′nee), a town of the Punjab, 37 miles SE. of Hissar by rail.

Bhopal, the capital of a native state in Central India, 325 miles SW. of Allahabad. Pop. (1911) 56,204.—The state was founded in 1723 by Dost Mohammed Khan, and a treaty of dependence was concluded with Britain in 1818. Area, 6900 sq. m.; pop. 1,000,000.

Bhuj (Boodj), the capital of Cutch (q.v.), 180 miles SE. of Hyderabad. Pop. 30,000.

Bhutan (Boo-tan′), a native state in the eastern Himalayas, bounded by Tibet, Assam, and Sikkim. It is divided into East and West Bhutan; and before the British annexation in 1841 and 1865 of the eighteen Dwars or passes which lead from the plains to the lofty terraces of Bhutan, the area was estimated at 20,000 sq. m.; since, it has been estimated at 17,000 sq. m. The whole surface is mountainous, with summits exceeding 24,000 feet. The central regions, at an elevation of 8000 or 10,000 feet above the sea, are covered with the finest forests of oak and pine, with beech, ash, birch, and maple. The Manás, a tributary of the Brahmaputra, is the chief river. The nominal religion is Buddhism. The government, almost purely ecclesiastical, is in the hands of a rapacious oligarchy. The Dharm Rajah, the nominal head, is treated rather as a god than as a sovereign; while the Deb Rajah, the actual head, is elected every three years by the chiefs from amongst themselves. Polygamy and polyandry are common. The Bhutias are neat joiners, and their houses have the appearance of Swiss chalets. The winter capital is Punakha, on the Bugui River, 96 miles NE. of Darjeeling. The summer capital is Tasichozong (Tassisudon), on the Gudada River, a centre of Lamaism. The original inhabitants, believed to be from Kuch Behar, were called Tephu; they were subdued by a band of Tibetan soldiers 200 years ago, who settled in Bhutan. The Bhutias speak a dialect of Tibetan. In 1772 the rajah of Kuch Behar received assistance from the British government against their invasions. Later raids led to the treaty of 1865, when, in return for a yearly subvention, the Dwars were ceded to the British government, which (since 1910) controls foreign relations. Pop. estimated at 200,000. See a work by White (1909).

Bia′fra, BIGHT OF, a large bay on the west coast of Africa, at the head of the Gulf of Guinea, between Capes Formosa and Lopez. The principal rivers flowing into it are the Niger (q.v.), the New and Old Calabar rivers, the Rio del Rey, the Cameroon, and the Gabun; its islands are Fernando Po and Annobon (Spanish), and St Thomas' and Prince's Islands, or São Thome and Principe (Portuguese).

Biarritz (Bee′ar-reets), a watering-place in the French dep. of Basses-Pyrénées, on the Bay of Biscay, 6 miles SW. of Bayonne. Here, in 1855, Louis Napoleon built the Villa Eugénie for the empress, who already, as Countess de Téba, had been a frequent visitor. During the season (July–September) the place is often visited by 6000 guests. There is a good golf course. Pop. 15,000.

Biberach (Bee′ber-ahh), a town of Würtemberg, on the Reiss, 23 miles SSW. of Ulm. There are manufactures of machinery, artificial flowers, &c. Here the Austrians were defeated by Moreau in 1796, and in 1800 by Saint Cyr. Pop. 9000.

Biberich. See BIEBRICH.

Bicester (Bis′ter), a market-town of Oxfordshire, 12 miles NNE. of Oxford. There are manufactures of rope, clothing, sacking, and pale ale. The ruins of Alia Castra, or Alcester, lie 1½ mile to the south-west, on the ancient Roman Akeman Street. Pop. 3400.

Bicton Park, a Devonshire seat, 4 miles WSW. of Sidmouth, with splendid grounds.

Bidar (Bee′dar), a town in the Nizam's Dominions, near the right bank of the Manjera, a tributary of the Godavery, 75 miles NW. of Hyderabad. Pop. 13,000.

Bidasso′a, a river which, rising in Spain, bounds that country and France, and, after a course of 33 miles, falls into the Bay of Biscay at Fuenterrabia.

Biddeford, a town of Maine, U.S., on the right bank of the Saco River, 6 miles from its mouth in the Atlantic Ocean, and 93 miles NNE. of Boston by rail. It has manufactures of cotton and woollen goods and machinery, and there is a large trade in timber. Pop. 17,200.

Bid′eford, a 'little white seaport town' and municipal borough of North Devon, on the Torridge, 3½ miles above its confluence with the Taw's estuary, and 9 miles SW. of Barnstaple. The name signifies 'by-the-ford,' and is pronounced Bid-de-ford, like that of its American daughter. The old bridge of 24 arches and 226 yards long, which unites the two divisions of Bideford, was widened in 1864. There are manufactures of ropes, sails, earthenware, and leather. Vessels of 500 tons can get up to the quay. Sir Richard Grenville was a native. Population, 9000.

Bihé, a fruitful district and native kingdom of Portuguese West Africa, E. of Benguela, once an important caravan centre, being traversed by the only trans-continental route south of the Congo. Area, 2500 sq. m.; pop. 95,000. Kagnomba, the king's capital, is over 3 miles in circumference. See Major Pinto's How I Crossed Africa (1881).

Bijanaghur. See VIJAYANAGAR.

Bijapur (Beejapoor′), a decayed city in the Bombay Presidency, 160 miles SE. of Poona. It was for centuries the capital of a powerful kingdom; in 1686 was captured by Aurungzebe, in the 18th century passed to the Mahrattas, and became British in 1848. Now lofty walls of hewn stone enclose the desolate fragments of a once vast and populous city. The ruins are almost all Mohammedan, and consist of beautiful mosques, colossal tombs, a fort, &c. Pop. 23,800.

Bijawar, a petty native state in the Bundelkhand Agency. Area, 974 sq. m.; pop. 123,285.

Bijbharu′, or BIJBAHAR, a town of Kashmir, India, on the Jhelum, 25 miles SE. of Srinagar.

Bijnaur′, a town of the United Provinces, 3 miles E. of the Ganges. Sugar, Brahmanical threads, and cotton cloth are manufactured. Pop. 16,147.—The district of Bijnaur, in the N. of the Rohilkhand division, contains more than a dozen towns with a population of over 5000.

Bikaner′, the capital of a Rajput state, lies in a desolate tract, 250 miles WSW. of Delhi. It is surrounded by a battlemented wall of 3½ miles in circuit, and from a distance presents a magnificent appearance; but many of its carved buildings are in narrow and dirty lanes. Pottery, stone-cutting and carving, the making of a white candy and of blankets, are amongst the industries. Pop. 53,000.—The state contains 22,340 sq. m.; pop. 701,000, mainly Játs.

Bilba′o (Span. Beel-bâh′o), a town of Spain, the capital of the province of Vizcaya (Biscay), in a mountain gorge on the Nervion, 8 miles SE. of its mouth at Portugalete, and 63 miles N. by E. of Miranda by rail. Four bridges span the river, which divides the old town from the new. The city is purely commercial. There are docks for building merchant-vessels, and in the vicinity are iron and copper mines. The canalisation of the river in 1886 has since enabled steamers of 700 to 800 tons to come up to the town; but the narrow channel and the heavy sea on the bar still render the port equally difficult to enter or leave. Nevertheless, it is the most important shipping centre of Spain; and in 1911 over 39 per cent. of that shipping was British. The chief imports are coal, coke, codfish, timber, petroleum, tin, sugar, coffee, and colonial goods. The exports, which include red wines and wool, are numerous and unimportant, with the exception of iron-ore, on which the prosperity of the port depends. Population, 92,500. Bilbao was founded in 1300 under the name of Belvao—i.e. 'the fine fort'—and soon attained great prosperity. It suffered severely in the wars with France, first in 1795, and again in 1808. During the Carlist struggles it stood two great sieges, Zumalacarreguy here receiving his death-wound in 1835, whilst in 1874 it was vainly besieged and bombarded by Don Carlos for four months.

Bil′bilis. See CALATAYUD.

Bilin′, a town of Bohemia, on the Bila, 5 miles SW. of Teplitz. Its mineral springs, rich in native carbonate of soda, are largely sought by sufferers from gastric, catarrhal, or scrofulous complaints. Pop. 8000.

Billericay, an Essex market-town, 4 miles E. of Brentwood.

Billingsgate, a fish-market a little below

London Bridge. It was opened in 1558 as a landing-place for provisions; and in 1699 was made 'a free and open market for all sorts of fish.' The present handsome stone building was finished in 1874.

Bil'liton, or BLITONG, an island in the Dutch East Indies, between the SE. of Banca and the SW. of Borneo. It is about 50 miles in length by 45 broad, 1855 sq. m. in area, and has valuable tin deposits. Tandjong is the harbour, Pandang the chief town. Pop. 40,000.

Bir, a town of Asiatic Turkey, on the Euphrates, 80 miles NE. of Aleppo. Pop. 9000.

Birbhum, a district in the Bardwan division of Bengal, with an area of 1756 sq. m. It is one of the greatest copper-fields of the world, though practically untapped as yet.

Birchington, a Kentish coast village, 3¼ miles W. by S. of Margate. Pop. of parish, 2300.

Birkenfeld, a German principality belonging to Oldenburg (q.v.), but surrounded by the Prussian Rhine Province. Area, 194 sq. m.; population (1910) 50,496. The capital, Birkenfeld, has a pop. of 4000.

Birkenhead, a market-town, seaport, municipal, parliamentary, and county borough of Cheshire, lies opposite Liverpool, on the left bank of the Mersey. Birkenhead owes its origin to the Benedictine Priory of Byrkhed, founded in the 11th century. The crypt and other portions of the priory still remain. Birkenhead has only of late risen from comparative obscurity to its present important position. In 1836 it received the grant of a market, in 1861 obtained the privilege of returning a member to parliament, in 1877 was created a municipal borough, and in 1888 a county borough. The main streets are laid out with great regularity, crossing each other at right angles, and about 20 yards wide; but the back streets are narrow and the houses mean. The park, 180 acres in extent, was laid out at a cost of £140,000; and there is another park in Tranmere, called Mersey Park, of 29 acres and £33,000 cost, opened in 1885. The principal public buildings are the market-hall, the new town-hall, the new sessions and police courts, the borough hospital, the free library, and the public baths. A railway bridge over the Mersey at Runcorn, opened for traffic in 1869, shortened by 10 miles the distance between the Liverpool and Birkenhead docks; and the Mersey railway tunnel, 1230 yards long, was opened by the Prince of Wales in 1886. There is also communication with Liverpool by ferry-steamers. The idea of constructing docks here was due to the Messrs Laird, who in 1824 purchased from the Liverpool corporation, at a very low price, a large piece of ground on the borders of the Wallasey Pool. The first dock, however, was not opened till 1847. In 1857 the Birkenhead docks were amalgamated with those of Liverpool, and vested in one public trust, called 'The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.' Including the Great Float, an immense harbour, constructed on the site of Wallasey Pool, with an area of over 140 acres, they extend from Woodside to Seacombe, a distance of about a mile, the total area being about 170 acres, with 9½ miles of quayage. The corn-warehouses at Seacombe constitute a vast pile of buildings, and a great deal of coal is shipped from the port. Birkenhead is celebrated for its shipbuilding yards, some of the largest iron ships afloat having been built here. In the neighbourhood of the docks are the Canada Works for the construction of gigantic bridges, the Britannia Machinery Works, the Birkenhead Forge, &c. There are also oil-cake mills, extensive flour-mills, wagon-works, and several smaller engineering works. St Aidan's College, an Anglican theological college, is in the suburb of Claughton. Pop. (1821) 236; (1861) 54,649; (1891) 99,857; (1901) 110,915; (1911) 130,794.

Birket-el-Hadji ('lake of the pilgrims'), a small lake 10 miles NE. of Cairo, where the Mecca pilgrims assemble and separate.

Birmah. See BURMA.

Birmingham, a city with a Lord Mayor (1896), and a municipal, parliamentary, and county borough, the chief town of the Midlands, is celebrated for its metallic manufactures. It stands near the centre of England, in the NW. of Warwickshire, with suburbs extending into Staffordshire and Worcestershire, 112½ miles NW. of London. It is picturesquely situated on the east slope of three undulating hills, on the Rea and the Tame, and though rather irregularly built, has been greatly improved in this respect within recent years, while its water-supply (from Wales) and sanitary arrangements are admirable. Public parks and gardens are numerous. The public buildings include the Corinthian town-hall (1832–1852), the scene of triennial musical festivals and great political meetings; the market-hall, dating from 1838; the Italian municipal buildings (1874–78); the corn exchange (1847); the Gothic exchange buildings (1863–65); the post-office; and the university buildings. The university (1899) developed out of Queen's College, incorporated in 1867, and the Mason Science College, founded in 1875 by Sir Josiah Mason. Other institutions are the Birmingham and Midland Institute, the corporation museum and art gallery, the school of art, the technical school, the old library, the free library, King Edward VI.'s grammar-schools (entirely remodelled in 1878), and the blue-coat school. There are more than a dozen statues or memorials of Birmingham worthies (including Watt, Priestley, Bright, Chamberlain, Mason, Dawson), and other eminent men. The parish church of St Martin's, erected in 1873, stands on the site of the old building dating from the 13th century. St Philip's became the cathedral on the erection of the diocese of Birmingham in 1904. The Catholic cathedral of St Chad was built from the designs of Pugin. Birmingham has a Roman Catholic archbishop (1911).

In Leland's Itinerary (1538) Birmingham is referred to as the abode of 'smiths and cutlers.' In cutlery goods it has been completely superseded by Sheffield, but in all other kinds of the finer metal manufactures it is unrivalled by any other town in the world. Iron and brass founding are carried on, and steam-engines and various kinds of machinery are made; but the principal manufactures are the finer kinds of gold, silver, copper, brass, steel, mixed metal, plated metal, glass, papier-maché, japanned and electrotyped articles, including firearms, ammunition, swords, metal ornaments, toys, jewellery, coins, buttons, buckles, lamps, pins, steel-pens, tools, arms, and locks. Bicycles, motor-cars, and accessories are made. Specialties, of which an enormous quantity are manufactured, are gun-barrels, steel-pens, buttons, nails, and screws. 'Brummagem' is colloquially used to denote anything sham or fictitious, such as cheap jewellery, now no longer made here so much as in London and in Germany. Near Handsworth, a little to the north of Birmingham, were the famous Soho Works, founded by Watt and Boulton. The Bermingeham of Domesday was later known as Bromwychham (whence Brummagem). During the Civil War the town supplied the Parliamentarians with swords, but it was taken by Prince Rupert in 1643. It suffered severely from the plague in 1665–66. The celebration by a number of Radicals, 14th July 1791, of the capture of the Bastille, was the occasion of a serious riot by the upholders of church and king, who attacked Dr Priestley's house, and destroyed his library. Subsequently Birmingham was prominently associated with the reformers of 1832 and the Chartists, and it was the famous headquarters of what was known as the Liberal 'caucus.'

Baskerville, the printer, carried on his business in Birmingham. Wilmore and Pye, the engravers, David Cox, and Burne-Jones were Birmingham men. Dr Joseph Priestley was a Unitarian minister in Birmingham; here, too, was the chapel of the brilliant lecturer George Dawson. Birmingham, which, Mr Joseph Chamberlain claims, is the best-governed city in the world, was incorporated in 1838, and became a county borough and a city in 1888. In 1867 the number of parliamentary representatives was increased from two to three, and in 1885 it was divided into seven parliamentary districts. Aston Manor was included in 1912. The population in 1770 was 30,806, which by 1801 had increased to 60,822, by 1851 to 232,841, by 1891 to 478,113, and by 1911 (within bounds as extended in 1912) to 840,202.

See Bunce's History of the Corporation (1885); Hutton's History of Birmingham (1781); Langford's Century of Birmingham Life (2 vols. 1868); and Dent's Old and New Birmingham (2 vols. 1879–80), and The Making of Birmingham (1894).

Birmingham, the capital of Jefferson county, Alabama, and the most important seat of the iron industry of the southern states, is situated at the junction of several railways, 95 miles NNW. of Montgomery. It has numerous foundries, mills, factories, and machine-shops; and the development of the iron interests of its immediate vicinity has caused a marvellous growth of the city. Pop. (1910) 132,685.

Birnam, a Perthshire hill, 1324 feet high, near Dunkeld. Birnam Wood, forming part of an ancient royal forest, is immortalised by Shakespeare in Macbeth. Opposite Dunkeld is the pretty village of Birnam; pop. 600.

Birni, a ruinous town, the former capital of Bornu (q.v.), 100 miles W. of Lake Chad.

Birr. See PARSONSTOWN.

Birrenswark. See BRUNSWARK.

Birstal, a woollen manufacturing town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 7 miles SSW. of Leeds. Dr Priestley was born hard by. Pop. 7000.

Biru', a Sahara oasis, 260 miles W. by N. of Timbuktu, with a considerable town and active trade.

Bisaccia (Bisat'cha), a town of Italy, 60 miles E. of Naples. Pop. 7000.

Bisacquino (Bisaquee'no), a town of Sicily, 27 miles S. of Palermo. Pop. 10,000.

Bisalnag'ar, a town of India, in Baroda, 220 miles NW. of Mhow.

Bisalpur', a town of India, in the United Provinces, 24 miles E. of Bareli.

Bis'cay, or VIZCAYA, the most northerly of the Basque Provinces of Spain. Area, 833 sq. m.; pop. 350,000. Chief town, Bilbao (q.v.).

Biscay, BAY OF (Fr. Golfe de Gascogne), that portion of the Atlantic Ocean which sweeps in along the northern shores of the Spanish peninsula from Cape Ortegal to St Jean de Luz, at the western foot of the Pyrénées, and thence curves northward along the west shores of France to the island of Ushant. The depth of water varies from 20 to 200 fathoms. The whole of the south coast is bold and rocky, but great parts of the French shores are low and sandy. Navigation of 'the bay' is frequently rendered dangerous by the prevalence of strong winds, especially westerly ones. Rennel's Current sweeps in from the ocean round the north coast of Spain.

Bisceglia (Bishel'ya), an Italian seaport, on the Adriatic, 21 miles NW. of Bari. Pop. 35,000.

Bischoff, MOUNT, near Waratah, in Tasmania, 60 miles W. of Launceston. Here were discovered in 1872 some of the richest tin-mines in the world, the yield of pure tin from the ore being from 70 to 80 per cent. The mount takes its name from the chairman of a land company (1828). There is railway communication with Emu Bay and Macquarie Harbour. Pop. of Waratah, 2400.

Bischweiler (Bishvī'ler), a town of Alsace, on the Moder, 17 miles N. of Strasburg. Pop. 9000.

Bisham Abbey, a Tudor mansion, in Berkshire, on the Thames, opposite Great Marlow. Elizabeth resided here in Mary's reign.

Bishop-Auckland, a town in the county, and 9½ miles SW. of the city, of Durham, stands on an eminence 140 feet above the confluent Wear and Gaunless. Its abbey-like palace of the bishops of Durham was founded about 1300 by Bishop Antony Bek, and rebuilt by Bishop Cosin about 1665. There are a fine town-hall of 1863 with a spire 100 feet high, engineering-works, and large neighbouring collieries. Pop. (1851) 4400; (1891) 10,527; (1911) 13,834.

Bishop's Castle, a municipal borough (incorporated 1885) of Shropshire, 9½ miles WNW. of Craven Arms junction by a branch line (1865). Till 1832 it returned two members. The bishops of Hereford had a castle here. Pop. 1400.

Bishop-Stortford, a town of Hertfordshire, on the Stort, 12 miles ENE. of Hertford. In Saxon times it was the property of the bishops of London. Pop. 8700.

Bishop's Waltham, a town of Hampshire, 9½ miles SE. of Winchester. It has been immemorially the property of the bishops of Winchester. There are remains of their castle (1135). Pop. of parish, 2500.

Bishopwearmouth. See SUNDERLAND.

Bisigna'no, a cathedral city of South Italy, 10 miles N. of Cosenza by rail. Pop. 5000.

Biskra, a town of Algeria, 150 miles S. of Constantine by rail, in an oasis watered by the Wady Biskra and by springs. The Roman Zaba, under the Moors it became a large town—71,000 people died of the plague in 1663. Pop. 5000.

Bisley, (1) a market-town of Gloucestershire, 3 miles E. of Stroud. Population, 2000.—(2) A common in Surrey, 3½ miles WNW. of Woking, the successor in 1890 to Wimbledon as the place of rifle meetings.

Bismarck, a thriving town, since 1889 capital of North Dakota, U.S., in the centre of the state on the east side of the Missouri, here crossed by the Northern Pacific Railway. Pop. 5500.

Bismarck Archipelago, the official name for New Britain, New Ireland, New Hanover, and several smaller adjoining islands in the South Pacific, since in 1884 they became a German dependency. See NEW BRITAIN, &c.

Bismark, a Prussian town of 4000 inhabitants, 35 miles N. of Magdeburg.

Bissa'gos, or BIJUJA ISLANDS, a group of thirty small volcanic islands, off the west coast of Africa, opposite the estuary of the Geba. Thickly wooded, and many of them densely peopled, they have several fine ports; but the climate is excessively dangerous for Europeans. The islands belong to Portuguese Guinea.

Bissão, an island and Portuguese station closer to the African coast than the Bissagos.

Bistritz, a Transylvanian town on the Bistritza River, 50 miles NE. of Klausenburg. Pop. 10,000.

Bisutun. See BEHISTUN.

Bitche (Ger. Bitsch), a German town of Lorraine, in a wild and wooded pass of the Vosges, 49 miles NNW. of Strasburg. Its citadel crowns a precipitous rock in the middle of the town. The Prussians tried vainly to surprise it in 1793; it resisted the Germans for seven weeks in 1815, and only surrendered three weeks after the close of the war of 1870–71. Pop. 4000.

Bithur', a town in India, on the Ganges, 12 miles NW. of Cawnpore.

Bithynia, an ancient division of Asia Minor, separated from Europe by the Propontis (Sea of Marmora) and the Bosporus.

Bitlis, a town of Turkish Armenia, 120 miles SE. of Erzerum. It lies 5470 feet above the sea, in a deep ravine traversed by the river Bitlis, a head-stream of the Tigris. Pop. 40,000.

Bitolia, or BITOLJ. See MONASTIR.

Bitonto, a cathedral city of Italy, 10 miles WSW. of Bari. Near it the Spaniards defeated the Austrians, 25th May 1734. Pop. 35,000.

Bitter Root Mountains, a range of the Rocky Mountains between Idaho and Montana.

Bizerta, or BENZERTA, a seaport of Tunis, at the head of a bay of the Mediterranean, is the most northerly town in Africa, being 38 miles NW. of Tunis. Pop. 10,000. The ancient Hippo Diarrhytus or Zaritus, Bizerta since 1881 has been held by the French, who have strongly fortified it, and made it a great naval station.

Bjela, a town in the Polish government of Siedlce, on the Krzna River. Pop. 12,000.

Blackadder, a Berwickshire stream, flowing 20 miles to the Whitadder.

Blackburn, a town of Lancashire, 21 miles NNW. of Manchester, and 9 E. of Preston, stands on a stream from which it appears to derive its name, a branch of the Ribble. It had acquired some importance as a market-town in the 16th century, and in the middle of the 17th it was noted for its Blackburn Checks, a kind of linsey-woolsey, afterwards superseded by the Blackburn Grays, so called from their being printed unbleached. During the 18th century the cotton manufacture became the chief industry of the place, which is now the largest and most important cotton manufacturing town in the world, the number of cotton-factories being very great, and many of them employing from 1000 to 2000 operatives. Great improvements in machinery for the cotton manufacture have been made in Blackburn—e.g. the invention of the spinning-jenny by James Hargreaves, a native of the town, in 1767. The chief public buildings are the town-hall (1856), an Italian edifice built at a cost of £30,000; the Gothic exchange (1865); the infirmary (1862); and St Mary's Church, of very ancient foundation, but almost entirely rebuilt (1826–57). There is a corporation park of 50 acres, part of which is 700 feet above sea-level, and commands a wide view; a new Queen's Park of 35 acres was opened on Jubilee day, 1887. The grammar-school was established by Queen Elizabeth in 1567; in 1888 the Prince of Wales laid the foundation-stone of the technical school. Viscount Morley was born here. Blackburn has returned two members since 1832; it received its municipal charter in 1851, and in 1888 became a county borough. Pop. (1831) 36,629; (1861) 63,126; (1891) 120,064; (1911) 133,052. See Abram's History of Blackburn (1878).

Black Country, a region of mines and works on the border of Stafford and Warwick shires, between Wolverhampton and Birmingham.

Black Down, (1) the highest part (1067 feet) of the Mendip Hills, in Somerset; (2) a hill-ridge (900 feet) on the border of Somerset and Devon, near Wellington, crowned by a Wellington obelisk; (3) a hill-ridge (817 feet) of NW. Dorset, near Portisham, with a column to Nelson's Hardy.

Black Forest (Ger. Schwarzwald), a wooded mountain-chain in Baden and Würtemberg, running parallel with the course of the Rhine after its great bend near Basel, often only a few miles distant from it, and also bounded by the Rhine upon the south. The chief rivers rising in the Black Forest are the Danube, Neckar, Murg, Kinzig, Elz, Enz, and Wiessen. The chain attains its greatest elevation in the bare and round-topped Feldberg (4903 feet). The great mass called the Kaiserstuhl (Emperor's Chair), situated near Breisach, is quite isolated. Silver, copper, cobalt, lead, and iron are found in greater or less quantity in the principal chain, which is luxuriantly wooded, its name Schwarzwald being derived from the dark-tinted foliage and immense number of its fir-trees. The district is also rich in mineral waters—e.g. the baths of Baden-Baden (q.v.) and Wildbad (q.v.). On the Rhine side the descent is precipitous, but towards the Danube and the Neckar it is gradual. Among its numerous valleys, the Murgthal is the most famous for its natural beauties; but, indeed, the whole of the country is here rich in picturesque scenery, gemmed with cascades and deep mountain-lakes, around which cluster the legends of many centuries. The rearing of cattle, and the manufacture of wooden clocks and other articles, form the chief industry of the inhabitants. See Seguin's Black Forest (2d ed. 1886).

Blackheath, a high-lying open common of 70 acres, in the borough of Greenwich, 5 miles SE. of London, near Greenwich Park. It is a favourite holiday resort for Londoners. Blackheath was the first place in England where the ancient Scottish game of golf was introduced, most likely in 1608. On it stands Morden College, founded in 1695 by Sir John Morden for decayed Turkey merchants. Of schools innumerable, the chief is the Proprietary (1830). Blackheath was formerly the scene of several insurrections, including those of Wat Tyler (1381), Jack Cade (1450), and the Cornishmen under Lord Audley (1497).

Black Isle, the peninsula in Easter Ross lying between the Beauly and Moray Firths and Cromarty Firth.

Black Mountains, a range (2631 feet) in South Wales, between Brecknock and Carmarthen shires.

Blackness Castle, Linlithgowshire, on the Firth of Forth, 3½ miles ESE. of Bo'ness, was once a state prison, and since 1874 has been the central Scotch ammunition depot.

Blackpool, a flourishing watering-place of Lancashire, on the Irish Sea, between Morecambe Bay and the estuary of the Ribble, 18 miles WNW. of Preston. The population has risen from 1664 in 1851 to 23,846 in 1891, and 58,371 in 1911; but the numbers who resort here during the bathing-season far exceed the permanent residents, the sands being excellent, the views delightful, and the climate bracing. There are three fine piers, one of them with a splendid pavilion; also a series of promenades several miles long, a new one (with gardens adjoining) being opened in 1912. And amongst other attractions are an Eiffel-like tower (1895) 500 feet high, winter-gardens, an aquarium, a free library, theatres, and several large hotels. Blackpool is a municipal (1876) and county (1904) borough.

Blackrod, a Lancashire town, with cotton-mills and collieries, 5 miles SSE. of Chorley. Pop. 4000.

Black Sea, or EUXINE (anc. Pontus Euxinus), is an inland sea lying between Europe and Asia, extending from 41° to 46° 38′ N. lat., and from 27° 30′ to 41° 50′ E. long. Its greatest length from east to west is 720 miles; its greatest breadth, near the west end, 380 miles; and its area, exclusive of the Sea of Azov, is 163,711 sq. m. On the south-western extremity it communicates by the Bosporus, the Sea of Marmora, and the Dardanelles with the Mediterranean, and on the north-east by the Strait of Kertch, or Yenikale, with the Sea of Azov. The Black Sea drains nearly one-fourth of the surface of Europe, and also about 114,000 sq. m. of Asia. Throughout its whole extent it has but one island, and that a small one, lying opposite the mouths of the Danube, called Adassi, or Isle of Serpents, on which is a lighthouse. In the centre its depth ranges between 1000 and 1070 fathoms. All the coasts are high, with good harbours, except between the mouths of the Danube and the Crimea; there the land is low, and the danger of navigation greatly increased in winter by the presence of floating ice; for, from the many large rivers which flow into this sea and that of Azov (Danube, Dniester, Bug, Dnieper, Don, Kuban, and Rion, in Europe; and the Kizil-Irmak and Sakaria, in Asia), the waters are fresher than those of the Mediterranean, and consequently easily frozen. There is no tide in this sea, but the large rivers flowing into it give rise to currents, which are particularly strong in spring when the snows melt. There is a strong flow out through the Bosporus.

From the fall of Constantinople (1453), all but Turkish vessels were excluded from its waters, until the treaty of Kainardji (1774), when the Russians obtained the right to trade in it. Ten years after, Austrian ships were privileged to trade here; and by the Peace of Amiens in 1802 British and French ships were admitted. By the Treaty of Paris (1856) it was opened to the commerce of all nations, and closed to ships of war, while the erection of arsenals was forbidden; but this article was repudiated by Russia in 1870, and in the following March, at a conference in London, the neutralisation of the sea was abrogated.

Blacksod Bay, a bay on the west coast of Ireland, in County Mayo, bounded by the Mullet peninsula.

Blackstairs, a range (2610 feet) between Carlow and Wexford counties.

Boddam, a fishing-village of Aberdeenshire, 3½ miles S. of Peterhead. Pop. 800.

Boden-See. See CONSTANCE, LAKE OF.

Bodmin, the county town of Cornwall, in the middle of the county, 30 miles NNW. of Plymouth. It arose out of a priory, founded in 936 or earlier; and till 1868 returned two members, then till 1885 one. Pop. 5700.

Bodyke, an estate in County Clare, 16 miles N. of Limerick, well known through its evictions (1887).

Body's Island, a long, narrow strip of sand, off North Carolina, with a lighthouse (150 feet), the highest in the United States.

Bœotia, an ancient political division of Greece, now forming a province of the modern kingdom, with an area of 1600 sq. m., and a population of 66,000.

Boghaz-Keui (anc. Pteria), a village of Asia Minor, in Angora province, 150 miles S. of Sinope, with extensive Hittite remains.

Bognor, a Sussex watering-place, 9½ miles SE. of Chichester by rail. Founded in 1786 by a London hatter, Sir R. Hotham, it has an iron pier (1865) 1000 feet long, and a good esplanade. Pop. 8000.

Bogodukhof, a cathedral town of Russia, 43 miles NW. of Kharkoff. Pop. 12,000.

Bogotá, under Spanish rule SANTA FE DE BOGOTA, in South America, the federal capital of the United States of Colombia. It is on a tableland 400 sq. m. in area, and 8694 feet above the sea, which separates the basin of the Magdalena from that of the Orinoco, is bounded on all sides by mountains, lofty enough to give shelter, yet below the line of perpetual snow. This extensive plain—a temperate zone on the verge of the equator, with a salubrious climate and a mean temperature of 60° F.—is exceedingly fertile, being as rich in pasture as in grain. The greater number of its people, however, are sunk in poverty. This is largely due to the difficulty of transport. Bogotá is 65 miles from its port, Honda, the head of navigation on the Magdalena; but a connecting railway has now been constructed in spite of the obstacles caused by lofty mountains. The few manufactures of the place include soap, leather, cloth, and articles made from the precious metals. Bogotá was founded in 1538, and in 1598 became the capital of the Spanish vice-royalty of New Granada; since 1554 it has been the seat of an archbishop. It is regularly and handsomely built, teems with churches, and has likewise an unfinished capitol, a mint, a university, &c. Pop. (1800) 21,464; (1910) 150,300.—The river Bogotá, otherwise called the Funcha, is the single outlet of the waters of the tableland, having found a passage for itself towards the Magdalena. At the cataract of Tequendama the waters plunge over a precipice 625 feet high.

Boguslav, a town of Russia, 70 miles SSE. of Kieff. Pop. 10,000.

Bohemia (Ger. Böhmen), formerly one of the kingdoms of Europe, now forms the most northern province of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. It has an area of 19,980 sq. m., or about two-thirds that of Scotland; pop. (1880) 5,560,819; (1910) 6,774,309. Prague, the capital of the province, and third city of the empire, has over 223,000 inhabitants; Pilsen has about 80,000, Budweis 45,000, and Reichenberg 36,000. The country is surrounded on all sides by lofty mountain-ranges, the principal of which are the Riesengebirge on the north-east, dividing Bohemia from Silesia, highest peak the Schneekoppe (5330 feet); on the north-west, the Erzgebirge (4182); on the south-west, the Böhmerwald (4783). The country belongs to the upper basin of the Elbe, and is well watered by its many affluents, the Moldau, Eger, Iser, &c. The climate is mild and pleasant in the valleys, but raw and cold in the mountainous regions. A remnant of volcanic action still continues in the eruptions of carbonic acid gas which have established so many mineral springs of deserved repute, at Carlsbad, Eger, Marienbad, Teplitz, and elsewhere. The mineral wealth is varied and extensive, consisting of silver, tin, copper, lead, iron, cobalt, bismuth, antimony, alum, sulphur, graphite, and porcelain clay, with some precious and ornamental stones. More coal is produced than in all the rest of the Austrian empire.

The soil is generally fertile; more than one-half of the area is arable land, and forests cover nearly a third. Flax and hops are plentiful, and much fruit is exported. Some wine is produced near the Moldau and the Elbe. Bohemia is a great centre of dyeing and calico-printing, of linen and woollen manufactures. Other important branches of industry are the manufacture of paper, ribbons, lace, chemicals, porcelain-ware, and the Turkish fez. The glass-works of Bohemia are celebrated, and afford employment to some 27,000 persons, and there are many ironworks. Beet-root sugar is manufactured extensively, and so are beer and brandy. Its position secures Bohemia a large transit-trade.

The bulk of the people are Czechs, a Slavonic race, speaking their own Czech tongue, which has an old and varied literature. They dwell chiefly in the centre and east of the country, and number 4¼ millions. The German population, amounting to about one-third, reside mainly in the north-east and in the cities; their influence on industry, trade, and commerce is great in proportion to their numbers. The distinction between Czech and German is very sharply drawn, and the demand of the Czechs for fuller Home Rule than the provincial diet and administration afford, and for the restoration of the crown-rights of the Bohemian kingdom, has maintained a long standing political controversy with the Austrian government. There are about 100,000 Jews. The vast majority of the population belong to the R. C. Church; of the 120,000 Protestants most are Calvinists. Education is much more widely diffused than in any other Austrian province. Since 1882 the university of Prague is divided into a German and a Czech university. The number of students in 1911 was 6739, 1965 of whom attended the German lectures. Bohemia sends 130 members—more than a fourth of the total—to the Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath.

The country derives its name from the Celtic Boii, who were expelled about the Christian era by the Germanic Marcomanni; and by the 5th century, we find the country peopled by the Slavonic Czechs. In 1086 the dukes of Prague were made kings by the emperor, and Bohemia became a state of the German empire. In the 15th century took place the religious movement of John Huss and Jerome of Prague. In 1458, after a long war, the kingdom became elective, and the Hussite George of Podiebrad was chosen king. His successor, the Polish Ladislaus, became also king of Hungary (1490); and on his son's death at the battle of Mohacz (1526), the crowns of both kingdoms passed to Ferdinand of Austria, and the history of Bohemia merges in that of Austria. The withdrawal of religious liberty in 1608 led to the troubles which ended in the election of the Protestant Frederick V. of the Palatinate to be king of Bohemia, and the Thirty Years' War, in which Bohemia suffered so severely, the Hapsburgs being restored, and Protestantism stamped out in blood. There are histories in German by Pelzel (1817), Palacky (1836), Tomek (1882). See also a work by Monroe (1910).

Bois-de-Boulogne. See Boulogne.

Boise (pron. Boiz; formerly called Boisé City), the capital of Idaho, U.S., and a centre of the silver industry, near the Boise River, 520 miles NE. of San Francisco. Pop. 17,000.

Bois-le-Duc (Bwah-leh-Dük'; Dutch 's Hertogenbosch, 'Duke's Forest'), a Dutch city, capital of N. Brabant, at the junction of the Dommel and the Aa, 28 miles SSE. of Utrecht by rail. Strongly fortified till 1876, it is the seat of a Catholic archbishop, and has a very fine cathedral (1312–1498), arsenal, &c. Iron-founding, book-printing, the making of beer, spirits, woollens, cigars, jewellery, linen-thread, ribbons, and cutlery are industries. Bois-le-Duc was founded in 1184 by Godfrey III., Duke of Brabant, in a wood, hence its name. Surrendered to the Dutch in 1629, in 1794 it was taken by the French, in 1814 by the Prussians. Pop. 35,200.

Bojador (Bo-ya-dor'), Cape, a headland on the west coast of Africa, in 26° 7′ N. lat., 14° 29′ W. long. The Portuguese doubled this cape in 1432.

Bojano (Bo-yah'no), an Italian cathedral city, 13 miles SW. of Campobasso. Pop. 5000.

Bokhara (Bok-hah'ra or Bo-hah'ra), the portion of Turkestan under the rule of the khan (or emir) of Bokhara, nominally independent, but practically a vassal state of Russia. It lies between Russian Turkestan on the N., the Pamir on the E., Afghanistan on the S., and the Kara-kum desert on the W. Area, 90,000 sq. m.; pop. 1,250,000. Only in the neighbourhood of the rivers is cultivation possible. The rest of the soil is composed of a stiff arid clay, interspersed with low sand-hills. Bokhara has only three rivers of any importance—the Amu-Daria or Oxus, the Zarafshan, and the Karshi, of which the first reaches the Sea of Aral, the other two are absorbed in the desert sands. Outlying provinces of Bokhara, separated by mountains, are Darwaz, Karategin, Hissar, and Kulab. The climate is healthy, but subject to great extremes of heat and cold. The sands of the Oxus yield gold, and salt, alum, sulphur, and sal-ammoniac are found. The other products include silk and cotton, wheat, barley, beet-root, vegetables, hemp for making bhang, silk, fruits in immense abundance, tobacco, and the sweet gum or manna of the camel's thorn. The industry includes the manufacture of silk-stuffs, cotton-thread, shagreen, jewellery, cutlery, and firearms. Its geographical position secures Bokhara the transit-trade between Russia and the south of Asia; and the Transcaspian Railway has increased its prosperity. The population consists chiefly of the aboriginal Tajiks of Persian, and of the dominant Uzbegs and Turkomans of Turkish origin. Persian slaves are numerous. The army numbers 11,000, since 1885 drilled by Russian officers.

Bokhara, corresponding in the main to the ancient Sogdiana, was conquered in the beginning of the 8th century by the Arabs, who were dispossessed of it in 1232 by Genghis Khan. It fell into the hands of Timur in 1403, and in 1505 was taken by the Uzbegs, its present masters. With the accession of the Khan Nasrullah (1826) the country became an object of rivalry to Britain and Russia, who in vain sent envoys to cultivate his friendship. After the capture of Tashkend by the Russians in 1865, the khan was compelled to oppose them, but was utterly defeated at the battle of Irdjar, May 20, 1866; and in July 1868 a peace was concluded by which Samarkand was ceded to the czar. During the invasion of Khiva in 1873 the khan assisted the Russians, and was rewarded by a large addition to his territory from the Khivan possessions. In 1882 a Russian political agent was appointed.

Bokhara, the capital, is situated on a plain a few miles from the Zarafshan, in the midst of trees and gardens. It is between 8 and 9 miles in circumference, and surrounded by embattled mud walls about 24 feet high, and pierced by eleven gates. On a mound about 300 feet in height, in the centre of the city, is the 'Ark,' or Citadel, within which are the palace of the emir and other government buildings. The mosques, which are said (fabulously) to be 365 in number, form one of the greatest features of Bokhara, which is the centre of religious life in Central Asia. The city has long been celebrated as a seat of learning, and contains about 80 colleges, said to be attended by some 5000 students. Bokhara is still the most important commercial town in Central Asia, although the gradual drying up of the Zarafshan, through the Russian irrigation-works at Samarkand, has lessened the population by about a half. Silks, woollens, and swords are manufactured, and large slave-markets are held; but the most striking feature of the town is its numerous bazaars, filled with the richest wares of Europe and of Asia. Bokhara was in 1888 connected by the Transcaspian Railway with Merv, and so with the Caspian ports. The pop. is estimated at 75,000. See TURKESTAN; the History of Bokhara, by Vambéry; Wolff's Narrative of a Mission to Bokhara (1845); and works on Central Asia by Vambéry (1874–85), Boulger (1879), Lansdell (1885), Curzon (1888), and Curtis (1911).

Bolan' Pass, a narrow, precipitous gorge, ascending nearly 55 miles north-westward to the broad plateau of Dasht-i-Bidaulat, in Beluchistan, and lying pretty directly between Sind and Kandahar. Its entrance and its outlet are respectively 800 and 5800 feet above the sea, it thus having an average gradient of fully 90 feet to the mile. Down the pass pours a torrent, now at many points bridged by a good military road; and in 1885–86 a military railway was laid. In parts of it there are three rails, the central one being toothed to catch a cogwheel on the engine. The route is highly defensible, and is commanded by the fortress at Quetta (since 1877 British), 25 miles from the upper end. It is overhung by eminences attaining a height of 800 feet.

Bolbec, a busy town in the French dep. of Seine-Inférieure, 19 miles ENE. of Havre by rail. It manufactures woollens, linen, cotton, and chemicals. Pop. 10,000.

Bolchov. See BOLKHOV.

Bolgary, a village of 150 houses in the Russian government of Kazan, near the Volga. It occupies the site of Bolgar, the old Bulgarian capital.

Bolgrad, a town in the Russian province of Bessarabia, 28 miles NW. of Ismail, at the head of Lake Yapuch. Pop. 15,000.

Boli, an ancient town of Asia Minor, on the left bank of the river Boli, 136 miles E. by S. of Constantinople. Pop. 5000.

Bolingbroke, a ruined castle, Lincolnshire, 3½ miles W. by S. of Spilsby. Henry IV. was born here.

Bolivar (Bolee'var), the name of several regions of South America.—(1) A state or department of Colombia, W. of the Magdalena, which, in repeated redivisions of the country, has not always held its place.—(2) A state of Venezuela.

Bolivia, a republic on the west side of South America, deriving its name from the liberator Bolivar, and formed in 1825, till which year, as Upper Peru, it had formed part of the viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres. It is enclosed by Peru, Brazil, Paraguay, the Argentine Republic, and Chili. Its coast provinces Bolivia lost to Chili through the war carried on by Bolivia and Peru against Chili in 1879–83. The area of the republic is now 708,000 sq. m., and the population was 1,744,568 in 1900, and estimated at 2,267,935 in 1910. Bolivia contains the greater part of the loftiest and most mountainous district of America, as comprising a section of the Andes system at its broadest extension. The lofty plateau of Oruro, with an average height of 13,000 feet, and about 150 miles broad, is enclosed between the Andes proper (now the western boundary of Bolivia), and the Cordillera Real, to the east. There are also intermediate ranges and isolated groups; of the volcanoes, all the western region, Sahama, Illampu, and Illimani, are over 21,000 feet high. The great plateau falls into two parts, of which the northern is the more inhabited, as containing the Lake of Titicaca and many well-watered valleys round it. The southern and lower tableland is chiefly a desert. The Cordillera Real system descends abruptly, on the north, to the plain of the Amazon: but its eastern edge is a series of terraces, sinking gently to the plains of eastern Bolivia, which in the north belong to the Amazon basin, and in the south to the pampas of the Plata.

Although situated entirely within the tropics, Bolivia, from its varied elevation, possesses a wide range of climate and productions. In the punas (over 11,000 feet high) the climate is cold and dry, and the vegetation scanty. The valleys of the eastern terraces, between 9500 and 11,000 feet, have a temperate climate, and wheat and maize are produced; in those between 5000 and 9500 feet, tropical fruits flourish. East of the inner Cordillera lie the plains under the 5000 feet limit. This district, with its numerous streams, its luxuriant tropical vegetation, its rich forests of valuable trees in the north, and its immense open savannahs in the south, surpasses most countries of South America in fertility and resources. Coffee, rice, cacao, coca, pineapples, bananas, tobacco, cotton, and the valuable cinchona are cultivated; and among other important plants are the copal and caoutchouc trees. In the punas are found the guanaco, llama, alpaca, vicuña, and the chinchilla; in the east, jaguars and tapirs. Mining is the most important industry of the country; for its gold, silver, copper, and tin ores have long been famous, in spite of the excessive cost of transport. The mines of Potosi are estimated to have produced since 1545 over £600,000,000 sterling of silver. Potosi, Oruro, and the richest mine, Huanchaca, still produce large quantities annually. From the landlocked position of the republic, its foreign trade labours under heavy disadvantages, for its great rivers, flowing mainly by the Madeira to the Amazon, and by the Pilcomayo to the Parana, are rendered unnavigable by rapids. More is to be hoped for from the railways, which have reached Bolivia from Chili, Peru, and Argentina; telegraphs also connect Bolivia with the outer world. The exports, chiefly tin and silver, amounted to £6,049,771 in 1910, and the imports to £3,904,187. The exports to Great Britain amounted to £1,434,000 in 1910; the imports from Great Britain exceeded £247,000, being chiefly iron, cotton, woollen, and manufactured goods.

The population of Bolivia is a mixture of half-caste Spaniards and Indians, and a few negroes. The Indians are partly civilised (Quichuas and Aymáras), partly semi-civilised (Chiquitos and Moxos), and partly wild. The religion of the country is Roman Catholic, but others are tolerated. There are five universities; but only 5 per cent. of the children of school age attend the schools.

The executive is vested in a president, with two vice-presidents, and a ministry divided into five departments; while the legislature consists of a congress of two chambers, the Senate and the House of Representatives, both elected by universal suffrage. The public revenue, between £800,000 and £1,083,000, is usually somewhat exceeded by the expenditure. The public debt is set down at about £2,000,000. The seat of the executive government, formerly La Paz, was transferred in 1869 to Oruro, and now changes between Oruro and Sucre. The chief towns are La Paz (78,000), Cochabamba (24,000), Chuquisaca or Sucre (23,000), and Potosi (23,000). Bolivia declared its independence 6th August 1825. Its history has been largely a series of restless and purposeless revolutions. Slavery was abolished in 1836. In 1879 a war broke out between Chili and Bolivia allied with Peru, of which the issue was disastrous to the allies.

Bolkhov, a cathedral city of Russia on the river Nugra, 37 miles N. of Orel. Pop. 30,000.

Bollington, a Cheshire town, 3 miles N. by E. of Macclesfield, with cotton and silk factories. Pop. 5200.

Bologna (Bolon'ya), one of the most ancient cities of Italy, beautifully situated on a fertile plain at the foot of the lower slopes of the Apennines, 82 m. N. of Florence, and 135 SE. of Milan by rail. An irregular hexagon, it is enclosed by a high brick wall, 5 to 6 miles in extent, with twelve gates, and is intersected by the canal of Reno. It has many fine palaces of the nobility; over 70 churches, including the cathedral and San Domenico, with the tomb of St Dominic, richly ornamented by Michael Angelo; and two remarkable leaning towers (c. 1100)—the Asinella, with a height of 274 feet, and a lean of 3⅓ feet, and the Garisenda, with a height of 137 feet, and a lean of 8⅙ feet. The university of Bologna, the oldest in Europe, celebrated its eighth centenary in 1888. Medicine has long superseded law as the principal study, and the discovery of Galvanism by one of its professors has shed a lustre on the university, which was the earliest school for the practice of dissection of the human body. For centuries learned female professors have prelected within its walls. The number of students, stated at 10,000 in 1262, now is only about 1500. Bologna also possesses an academy of music (1805), at which Rossini studied. The university library contains 160,000 vols. and 6000 MSS., and there is besides a city library of 120,000 vols. The Accademia delle Belle Arti is particularly rich in the works of those native artists who founded the Bolognese school of painting. Bologna has given eight popes and more than 200 cardinals to the Church. There are some manufactures, including silk goods, velvet, crape, wax candles, musical instruments, chemical products, paper, cards, and 'polony' sausages. Pop. (1872) 115,957; (1910) 172,639. The Etruscan Felsina, and afterwards as Bononia the chief town of the Boii, Bologna in 180 B.C. was made a Roman colony. After the fall of the Roman empire, it passed into the hands of the Longobards and Franks; by Charlemagne was made a free city, but in 1506 came under the papal supremacy, remaining so till 1860.

Bolor-Tagh, a lofty border-ridge of the Pamir plateau, ranging SW. to NE., which falls abruptly to Kashgaria.

Bolsena (Bolsay'na; anc. Volsinii), a town on the north shore of the Lake of Bolsena (Lacus Volsiniensis), 20 miles NNW. of Viterbo. It now has only 3000 inhabitants; but prior to 280 B.C. it was one of the twelve Etruscan cities.—The lake, about 10 miles long and 8 broad, occupies a volcanic hollow.

Bol'sover, a town of Derbyshire, 6 miles E. of Chesterfield. Bolsover Castle belongs to the Duke of Portland. Pop. (urb. dist.) 11,200.

Bolsward, an old town of Friesland, 15 miles SW. of Leeuwarden. Pop. 8000.

Bolton, or Bolton-le-Moors, an important manufacturing town and parliamentary, municipal, and county borough in South Lancashire, on the Croal, 11 miles NW. of Manchester. It was celebrated as far back as the time of Henry VIII. for its cotton and its woollen manufactures, introduced by Flemish clothiers in the 14th century. Emigrants from France and the Rhenish Palatinate subsequently introduced new branches of manufacture; and the improvements in cotton-spinning of the middle of the 18th century rapidly increased the trade of the town. Though Arkwright was at one time a resident, and Crompton lived all his life in Bolton parish, the opposition of the working-classes long retarded the adoption, in the town, of their inventions—the spinning-frame and the mule. Bolton, containing more than 100 cotton-mills, with about 4 million of spindles, is now one of the principal seats of the cotton manufacture in Lancashire. Muslins, fine calicoes, quiltings, counterpanes, dimities, &c., are manufactured. There are also extensive foundries and ironworks, bleaching-mills, chemical works, paper-mills, and dyeworks, with many neighbouring coal-mines. Bolton has public libraries and a museum, a public park and recreation grounds, a town-hall (1873), which cost £170,250, market-hall, fish-market, exchange, mechanics' institute, &c., and a water-supply from Entwisle Moor, 5 miles away. Bolton was the birthplace of the daily evening press. During the Civil War the Parliament garrisoned Bolton; in 1644 it was stormed by the Earl of Derby, who was beheaded here in 1651 on a spot now marked by his statue. Since 1832 it has returned two members. Pop. (1871) 92,655; (1881) 105,973; (1891) 115,002; (1901) 168,215; (1911) 180,851.

Bolton Abbey, Yorkshire, on the river Wharfe, 6 miles E. of Skipton, and 21 NW. of Leeds. Founded for Augustinian canons about 1150, it is celebrated in Wordsworth's White Doe of Rylstone and The Force of Prayer. The remains range from Early English to Perpendicular; and the nave of the church has been restored for service. The gateway, familiar through Landseer's picture, has been incorporated in Bolton Hall, a seat of the Duke of Devonshire.

Boma, the capital of Belgian Congo (q.v.).

Bo'marsund, a former fortress on Åland Island, commanding the Gulf of Bothnia. In 1854 it was destroyed by an Anglo-French force, after a six days' bombardment. The Treaty of Paris bound Russia not to restore it.

Bombay, the western province of India. Including Sind and Aden (q.v.), it comprises 26 British districts and 19 native or feudatory states, and contains 194,189 sq. m., of which 65,045 are in native states. The Nerbudda River divides the 'presidency' into two portions: in the north is Guzerat, chiefly consisting of alluvial plains, with the Cutch and Kathiawar peninsulas; to the south is the Mahratta country, which includes parts of the Deccan, Carnatic, and Konkan or coast-districts. The small territories of the Portuguese—Goa, Daman, and Diu—have an area of 1062 sq. m. The coast-line is irregular, broken by the gulfs of Cambay and Cutch, with several fine natural harbours, Bombay and Karachi (Kurrachee) being the most important; in the north are the Khirtar, in the south-east are the western Aravalli mountains; the Sahyadris or Western Ghats run almost parallel with the coast; the Satpura range runs east, and forms the watershed between the Tapti and Nerbudda. Sind is fertilised throughout by the Indus; the Subarmati and Mahi flow through North Guzerat; the Nerbudda pursues a western course into the Gulf of Cambay. The Tapti flows through Khandesh, entering the sea above Surat. The Runn of Cutch (q.v.), in the west of Guzerat, covers about 8000 sq. m., and is the great source of salt-supply. There are few minerals, and no coal; iron is mined at Teagar in Dharwar, and there is gold amongst the quartz. Good building-stone is abundant, with limestone and slate. In the dry sandy districts of Sind, the thermometer has reached 130° in the shade; the mean temperature in Lower Sind, during the hottest months, is 98° in the shade. The coast-districts are hot and moist, with a heavy rainfall during the monsoon. The tableland of the Deccan has an agreeable climate, except during the hot months.

Of late years, manufacturing industries have been extremely active in Bombay, which commands the richest cotton-fields in India. The stoppage of the American cotton-supply during the civil war gave a grand impulse to the trade of Bombay, where the first mill had been started in 1854, the exports of cotton during the five years 1861–66 averaging in value £21,582,847 a year. The wealth poured into Bombay at this period led to a vast extension of the trade, which partly continued after the period of inflation had passed. Not only does Bombay now compete with Manchester in the Indian market; it exports its own manufactures. After cotton, the other great staples are opium, wheat, and seeds. The trade in opium is worth nearly five millions sterling annually; but the export to China is being reduced gradually by agreement (see INDIA, CHINA). Although of recent origin, the wheat trade has assumed large proportions. Other principal exports are sugar, tea, raw wool, woollen shawls, fibres, and drugs; while among the imports are machinery, metals, oils, coal, and liquors. Silk-weaving is carried on at Ahmedabad, Surat, Nasik, Yeola, and Poona; carpets are made at Ahmednagar; cutlery, armour, and gold and silver work in Cutch. Pop. (1891) of native states, 8,059,298; of British territory, 18,901,123—reduced by 1901 by famine and plague to 6,908,648 and 18,559,561 respectively; but rising again in 1911 to 7,411,675 and 19,672,642.

Bombay City occupies the entire breadth of the SE. end of Bombay Island or Peninsula, bordering at once on the harbour inside, and on Back Bay outside. The island, now permanently connected by causeways and breakwaters with Salsette Island and the mainland, is over 11 miles long by from 3 to 4 broad. The island-studded harbour is one of the finest in the world; the space available for shipping being about 14 miles in length by 5 broad. Bombay is the most European in appearance of all the cities in India. In the business part there are several streets continuously lined with splendid buildings; while the bazaars, which extend from the fort towards Mazagaon, are traversed by fairly wide streets, extensive lines of tramways passing through even the most crowded parts. Many of the private houses of European residents are built on the suburb of Malabar Hill, the ridge running into the sea forming the west of Back Bay; and at Breach Candy looking seaward. On the esplanade, facing Back Bay, are the secretariat, the university, senate-hall, high court, offices of public works, sailors' home, and statue of Queen Victoria. In the neighbourhood of the fort are the town-hall, the mint, cathedral, and custom-house. The terminus of the Great Indian Peninsular Railway, opened in 1876, cost upwards of £300,000. The harbour is defended by batteries and ironclads. It has an extensive system of quays, wharves, and docks, extended in 1904–11 at a cost of 35,000,000 rupees. Mazagaon Bay, the centre of shipping activity, is at the head of the harbour. The city water-supply, equal to 100,000,000 gallons a day, has since 1892 been drawn from the Tansa valley, 65 miles N. Always favourably situated for foreign trade, Bombay has profited largely by being the first important port reached by vessels from Europe, and by being the terminus of the mail line to India by Suez and Aden, so that it stands next to Calcutta in amount of trade. The chief articles of export are cotton, wheat, shawls, opium, coffee, pepper, ivory, and gums; the chief imports, piece-goods, thread, yarn, metals, wine, beer, tea, and silk. The chief industries of the city are dyeing, tanning, and working in metal. The imports of the province of Bombay in the period 1907–11 varied in annual value from £36,000,000 to £53,000,000; the exports from £31,000,000 to £45,000,000. With its large steam-mills, Bombay in one aspect resembles a city in Lancashire. Pop. (1881) 773,196; (1891) 821,764; (1911) 979,445—about 65 per cent. Hindus. In 1509, about a year before the capture of Goa, the Portuguese visited the island; and by 1532 they had made it their own. In 1661 they ceded it to Charles II. of England, as part of Catharine of Braganza's dowry, and in 1668 he granted it for an annual payment of £10 to the East India Company, which in 1685–1708 transferred its headquarters to Bombay from Surat. Bombay was the birthplace of Dean Farrar, Sir Monier Williams, and Rudyard Kipling. See books by Sir W. Hunter (1892), J. Douglas (1900), and Malabari (1910).

Bommel, a town of Holland, on the Waal, 20 miles SSE. of Utrecht. Pop. 5000.—The Bommelerwaard is a fertile island-district (16 by 6 miles), formed by the Waal and Maas.

Bona (Fr. Bône), a seaport of Algeria, on a bay of the Mediterranean, near the mouth of the Sebus, 220 miles W. of Tunis by rail. It has good bazaars, manufactures of tapestry, saddlery, and native clothing; and a trade in wool, hides, corn, &c. The exposed roadstead has been made into a fair harbour. There are iron and copper mines near Bona, and some scanty remains of Hippo Regius, St Augustine's episcopal seat, destroyed by Calif Osman in 646. Pop. 36,000.

Bonaire. See BUEN-AYRE.

Bonar, a Sutherland village, at the head of Dornoch Firth, 14 miles WNW. of Tain. Pop. 300. Telford's bridge (1812) here was destroyed in 1892, but has been rebuilt.

Bona Vista, a bay, cape, and seaport (pop. 3700) on the east coast of Newfoundland.

Bonchurch, a village, Isle of Wight, 1 mile E. of Ventnor, the burial-place of Sterling and Swinburne. Pop. 500.

Bondu, a country of French Senegal, on the lower Senegal and Falemé rivers, lying between 14°—15° N. lat. and 12°—13° W. long. The Fulah inhabitants are Mohammedans. Pop. variously estimated at from 30,000 to 100,000.

Bo'ness, or BORROWSTOUNNESS, a seaport in Linlithgowshire, on the Firth of Forth, 23 miles WNW. of Edinburgh. It has a wet-dock of 7½ acres (1881), a large shipping trade in coal, and manufactures of salt, soap, malt, vitriol, iron, earthenware, &c. Graham's Dyke, otherwise Antoninus' Wall, traverses the parish. Dugald Stewart spent his last twenty years at Kinneil House (Duke of Hamilton's) in the neighbourhood. Pop. (1851) 2645; (1911) 10,862.

Bonhill, a Dumbartonshire town, with dyeworks, on the Leven's left bank, opposite Alexandria, and 4 miles N. of Dumbarton. Bonhill was the seat of the Smolletts. Pop. 3000.

Boni, a small state in the south-west peninsula of Celebes, now practically Dutch, with an area of 935 sq. m. The inhabitants, called Bugis, have an allied language to the Macassars, and as enterprising merchants and sailors are found in every port of the East Indian Archipelago. The pop. by some estimates amounts to 200,000. The capital, Boni, stands on the east coast of the peninsula.—The GULF OF BONI, 200 miles long, and 40–80 broad, separates the south-east and south-west peninsulas of Celebes.

Bonifacio, STRAIT OF (Bŏneefat'cho), the strait between Corsica and Sardinia, only 7 miles wide at the narrowest. It is named from the Corsican seaport of Bonifacio; pop. 4000.

Bonillo (Boneel'yo), a town of Spain, 34 miles WNW. of Albacete. Pop. 6000.

Bonin', or (Japanese) OGASAWARA ISLANDS, a volcanic group in the Pacific Ocean, 700 miles SSE. of Japan, where 27° N. lat. crosses 142° E. long. Area, 30 sq. m.; pop. 1500. Visited by Quast and Tasman in 1639, they were taken possession of by Britain in 1827; but in 1878 the Japanese reasserted their sovereignty, with the view of making them a penal settlement. The harbour is Port Lloyd.

Bonn (anc. Bonna), a town of Rhenish Prussia, beautifully situated on the left bank of the Rhine (here 600 yards wide), 21 miles SSE. of Cologne by rail. The Minster, said to have been founded by the Empress Helena in 320, but dating chiefly from the 11th and 13th centuries, has five towers, the middle one 311 feet high. Near it is a monument to Beethoven, who was born in the Rheingasse; and at Bonn are buried Niebuhr, Bunsen, and Schumann. The university, founded in 1777–86, in 1802 was transformed into a lyceum, but was re-established in 1818, receiving from government the beautiful electoral palace (1717–30) and other buildings, with an annual revenue of nearly £15,000 sterling. It has 200 professors and lecturers, and some 4000 students. Among its professors have been Niebuhr, A. W. Schlegel, Arndt, Welcker, Dahlmann, Hermes, and Simrock; Prince Albert was a student here. It has a library of about 300,000 volumes, a splendid laboratory (1868), an art museum (1884), a botanic garden, &c. The manufactures—jute, soap, chemicals, &c.—are unimportant. Pop. (1871) 26,030; (1890) 38,805; (1910) 87,967, chiefly Catholic.

Bonny, or BONI, a town and a river of Guinea, now in the (British) Nigeria protectorate. The river forms an eastern debouchure of the Niger, and falls into the Bight of Biafra. On the east side, near its mouth, is the town of Bonny, notorious from the 16th to the 19th century as the rendezvous of slave-trading ships.

Bonnyrigg, a Midlothian town, 7 miles S. of Edinburgh. Pop. 3000.

Bonyhad, a market-town of Hungary, 150 miles S. of Budapest. Pop. 7000.

Bonsall, a Derbyshire village, 2 miles SW. of Matlock. Pop. of urban district, 1200.

Booby Island, a level rock in Torres Strait, in 10° 36′ S. lat., and 141° 53′ E. long., 3 feet above high water, and ¼ mile in diameter.

Boodroom. See BUDRUN.

Boom, a town of Belgium, 10 miles S. of Antwerp, with great brick and tile works, breweries, tanneries, rope-walks, sailcloth manufactures, salt-works, &c. Pop. 20,000.

Boondee. See BUNDI.

Boone, a city of Iowa, 43 miles NW. of Des Moines, in a coal-mining district, with flour-mills, potteries, and tile-works. Pop. 10,000.

Booneville, a city of Missouri, on the Missouri River, 40 miles NW. of Jefferson City. Pop. 4000.

Bootan. See BHUTAN.

Boothia Felix, a peninsula on the north coast of North America, in which is the most northern part of the continent, Murchison Point, 73° 54′ N. lat. It was discovered by Sir John Ross (1829–33), and named, like the neighbouring Boothia Isthmus and Boothia Gulf, after Sir Felix Booth (1775–1850), a London distiller, who had furnished £17,000 for the expedition. Here, on the western coast, near Cape Adelaide, Ross discovered the magnetic pole, 70° 5′ 17″ N. lat., and 96° 46′ 45″ W. long.

Bootle, a municipal (1868) and county borough of Lancashire, to the north of and adjoining Liverpool, which includes a large portion of the Mersey dock system. It has a municipal technical college (1900). Pop. (1861) 6500; (1881) 27,112; (1891) 49,217; (1901) 58,556; (1911) 69,876.

Booton, or BOUTON, an island off the coast of the south-eastern ray of Celebes. The people are Malays. The sultan is in allegiance to the Dutch. Area, 1700 sq. miles; pop. 17,000.

Boppard (anc. Baudobriga), a town of Rhenish Prussia, 10 miles S. of Coblenz. Pop. 8000.

Borås, a town of Sweden, 40 miles E. of Gothenburg. Pop. 21,500.

Bordeaux (Bor-do'), the third seaport of France, and chief town in the dep. of Gironde, is beautifully situated in a plain on the left bank of the Garonne, about 60 miles from its mouth in the Atlantic, and 359 miles SSW. of Paris by rail. Transatlantic steamers can easily ascend with the flood to Bordeaux, which is accessible at all times to vessels of 600 tons. The commerce both by the Garonne and by railways is very extensive, and the long and crescent-shaped harbour has a singularly noble appearance. New docks were begun in 1907. The river is crossed by a bridge 532 yards long, erected in 1811–21. The archiepiscopal cathedral of St André, consecrated in 1096, is remarkable for its beautiful towers, designed and built by English architects during the English occupation. Bordeaux contains faculties of science and letters (rebuilt in 1885–87, and constituting, with those of law and medicine, the university of Bordeaux), schools of theology, art, and navigation, an academy of arts and sciences, a valuable gallery of paintings, a museum, and an observatory. The Grand Théâtre is one of the largest and finest buildings of its kind in France. The public library has upwards of 200,000 volumes. Pop. (1872) 190,682; (1891) 247,890; (1911) 261,678.

The principal branches of industry are the production or preparation of sugar, brandy, liqueurs, vinegar, tobacco, printed calicoes, woollen goods, casks, paper, earthenware, glass bottles, capsules, labels, and chemical products. There are large dockyards and much shipbuilding. The old Canal du Midi connects Bordeaux with the Mediterranean. Except those of Champagne, no French wines have been so much exported to foreign countries as those grown in the dep. of Gironde, especially the Médoc, and known as Bordeaux wines. Some of them are red (known in England as Claret), others white. Brandy, vinegar, fruit, fish, lace, jewellery, ready-made clothing, and skins are also among the principal exports, the largest trade being with England and South America. Bordeaux is an important centre of the French cod-fishing ships for Newfoundland and elsewhere.

Remains of the Roman Burdigala, which was made by Hadrian the capital of Aquitania Secunda, are the so-called 'palace of Gallienus,' really the ruins of a large amphitheatre. Having suffered successively from Vandals, Goths, Franks, and Moors, Bordeaux was taken by Charles Martel in 735; as the capital of the duchy of Guienne, in 1152 passed, by the marriage of Eleanor of Guienne with the future Henry II. of England, under English dominion; and was finally restored to France in 1451. It was the birthplace of the poet Ausonius, Richard II. of England, and Rosa Bonheur.

Bordelais (Bordelay'), the country round about Bordeaux, was a recognised division of Guienne.

Bordentown, a town of New Jersey, on the Delaware, 28 miles ENE. of Philadelphia. It has iron-foundries, machine-shops, shirt-factories, and shipyards. Pop. 4300.

Borders, the tract of country lying immediately on both sides of the frontier line between England and Scotland, which runs diagonally north-east or south-west, between the head of the Solway Firth at the latter extremity, and a point a little north of the mouth of the Tweed at the other extremity; the counties touching upon this line being Cumberland and Northumberland on the English side, and Dumfries, Roxburgh, and Berwick on the Scottish side. The distance between the two extremities is nearly 70 miles as the crow flies; but, following the frontier line in its irregularities, about 110 miles. The line of division is for the most part a natural one. The middle portion, extending 35 miles, is formed by the high barrier of the Cheviot range. Leaving the Cheviots in the south-west, the line descends for nearly 22 miles by Kershope Burn, and the waters of the Liddel, Esk, and Sark, to the Solway Firth. From the north-east extremity of the Cheviots, the windings of the Tweed, for about 13 miles eastward, form the natural boundary. But at a point about 5 miles from the mouth of that river, the line strikes out semicircularly in a north-easterly direction, till it reaches the east coast a few miles north of the town of Berwick-on-Tweed; the space thus enclosed, embracing within it what are known as the 'Liberties' of that town, having been at one time regarded as neutral territory between the two kingdoms. On the western Border, near the Solway, was a corresponding tract of country claimed by both kingdoms, and hence called the 'Debateable Land.' For the history, traditions, minstrelsy, &c., of the Border country, see works by Scott (1803), Veitch (1878), Groome (1887), Borland (1897), Graham (2d ed. 1908).

Bordighera (Bordigay'ra), a winter-resort in the Italian Riviera, on a hill overlooking the Mediterranean, 7 miles WSW. of San Remo by rail. It was founded in 1470, but its modern progress dates from the opening of the Cornice road in 1823, and of railway communication. Pop. 5000.

Bor'eray, a Hebridean island, Inverness-shire, 1 sq. m. in area, 3 miles W. of North Uist. Pop. 90.

Borgerhout, an Antwerp suburb, on the Schyn, has tapestry and tobacco factories, and dye and bleaching works. Pop. 50,000.

Borgo, a name given to a number of towns and villages in Italy and Southern Tyrol, and indicating the growth of the town or village around a castle or castellated rock, the original Borgo. Thus there are the Borgo, the north part of Rome, on the right bank of the Tiber; Borgo-Manero, an Italian town in the province of Novara, with 4821 inhabitants; Borgo San Donnino, in the province of Parma, with 7000; &c.

Borgu, or Bussanga, a country in the basin of the middle Niger (right bank), of which the western (and larger) part is now French and the eastern is included in (British) Nigeria. At Boussa or Bussang (now British) on the Niger Mungo Park lost his life in 1805.

Borissov, a town in the Russian government of Minsk, on the Beresina, 418 miles WSW. of Moscow by rail. Pop. 16,000.

Borkum, an East Frisian island, at the mouth of the Ems, 25 miles NW. of Emden. Pop. 3000, increased in summer by over 20,000 visitors.

Bormio, an Italian village with eight hot sulphur-baths, on the borders of Tyrol, 27 miles NNE. of Tirano. Pop. 2000.

Borna, a town of Saxony, on the Wyhra, 17 miles SSE. of Leipzig by rail. Pop. 10,000.

Borneo, next to Australia and New Guinea the largest island in the world, is situated in the Indian Archipelago, in 7° 3′ N.—4° 10′ S. lat., and 108° 53′—119° 22′ E. long. It is bounded on the E. by the Sea of Celebes and the Macassar Strait, S. by the Sea of Java, W. and N. by the Gulf of Siam and the China Sea. Its length is about 800 miles, with a breadth of 700, and an area of about 284,000 sq. m. The population is estimated at 1,875,000. In the far north rises the magnificent mass of Kinabalu (13,698 feet high), the culminating peak of the Indian Archipelago. Throughout the narrow northern portion of the island there runs a kind of central ridge in a general south-west direction, with highest points ranging from 4000 to 8000 feet; and this can be traced far to the south-west. Of modern volcanic activity there is in Borneo no trace. Many of the rivers are navigable far inland for boats of considerable burden, but their value as waterways is lessened by the bars which usually prevent the entrance of sea-going vessels, and in their upper reaches by frequent rapids and occasional waterfalls. There are many lakes. The climate in the low grounds is humid, hot, and unhealthy for Europeans; but in the higher parts towards the north the temperature is generally moderate, the thermometer at noon varying from 81° to 91° F. Vegetation is extremely luxuriant. The forests produce ironwood, bilian, teak, ebony, sandalwood, gutta-percha, dyewoods, benzoin, wax, dragon's blood, sago, camphor, various resins, vegetable oils, and gums. Nutmegs, cloves, cinnamon, pepper, betel, ginger, rice, rubber, sweet potatoes, yams, cotton, sugar, indigo, tobacco, coffee, pine-apples, coconuts, &c., are cultivated. The mountains and forests contain many monkeys, among them the orang-utan. Tapirs, a small kind of tiger, small Malay bears, swine, wild oxen or banteng, and various kinds of deer abound. The elephant is found in the north, and the rhinoceros in the north-west. The few domesticated animals are buffaloes, fowls, goats, dogs, and cats; horses are seen in Banjermassin. Among the birds are eagles, vultures, Argus-pheasants, peacocks, flamingoes, pigeons, parrots, and the swifts which construct the edible nests prized by the Chinese for making soup. The rivers, lakes, and lagoons swarm with crocodiles, and many kinds of snakes, frogs, lizards, and leeches. Fish are plentiful, and the coasts are rich in tortoises, pearl-mussels, oysters, and trepang. Brilliant butterflies and moths are in great variety. Among the mineral products are coal, gold, and copper; antimony, iron, tin, platina, nickel, diamonds and other precious stones, rock-crystals, porcelain-clay, petroleum, and sulphur.

The population consists of the aboriginal heathen Dayaks or Dyaks, who constitute the great bulk of the population; the Mohammedans or 'Malays;' and the Chinese. The Dyaks live chiefly in the interior. The Malays on the coasts are traders and bold sailors. The Chinese engage in trade and mining, and are unwearied in their efforts to make money and then return to their native country. They have always endeavoured to live as independent republics under chiefs chosen by themselves. The principal exports are gold, coffee, sago, rubber, coal, ratans, gutta-percha, edible nests, cotton, wax, timber, dye-woods, petroleum, paraffin wax, camphor, &c.; the imports, earthenware, iron, steel, and copper work, piece-goods, yarns, woollen and silk fabrics, medicines, provisions, wines, spirits, rice, sugar, tea, tobacco, opium, gambir, gunpowder, &c.

Borneo has never formed a political unity, and there is no native designation for the island as a whole. The name Borneo (Burneï or Bruneï) originally applied to nearly the whole of the north-west of the island, under a sultan with absolute authority. The capital, Bruneï, 20 miles from the coast, on the river of the same name, has about 10,000 inhabitants; the total population of Borneo proper or Bruneï may now be stated at 21,000. Its area was reduced by the erection of Sarawak (q.v.) into a practically independent principality by Sir James Brooke (1841–68), and by the establishment of the British North Borneo Company under the charter of 1881. The company has been successful in developing its territory, which, with an area of 31,000 sq. m., is divided into nine provinces, and has its capital at Sandakan (pop. 6000). The population of the territory is estimated at 200,000. There are many new rubber and tobacco plantations. Since 1888 both Bruneï and Sarawak, as well as the company's territory, have been under British protection. But by far the largest part of the island is ruled directly or indirectly by the Dutch, who have divided it into the Residency of the Western Division of Borneo, and that of the Southern and Eastern, the former having Pontianak (q.v.) as the seat of government, the latter Banjermassin (q.v.). The population of the Dutch portion of the island is about 1,250,000, of whom 1400 are Europeans and 40,000 Chinese. The chief towns in Borneo are Sambas (10,000), Pontianak (9000), Banjermassin (30,000), Bruneï (10,000), and Kuching (12,000).

Bornholm (l pronounced), a rock-bound Danish island in the Baltic, 90 miles E. of Zealand. Area, 226 sq. m. It is traversed by a hill-ridge (511 feet). The capital is Rönne or Rottum, on the west coast, with 7000 inhabitants. Pop. 45,000.

Bornu, or Bornoro, a powerful but declining state of Central Africa, somewhat larger in extent than England, bounded on the E. by Lake Chad, and N. by the Sahara. By treaty with France of 1890 it is within the British sphere of influence, and now forms part of the Nigeria Protectorate. Much of the country is liable to be overflowed in the rainy season, which lasts from October to April. The heat from March to June is excessive, ranging from 104° to 107° F. The two principal rivers are the Shari and the Komaduga Yaobe, both of which fall into Lake Chad. The soil is fertile, yielding plentiful crops of maize, millet, and other tropical produce. Wild beasts are very numerous. The population, which is estimated at about five millions, is mostly of negro race, and called Bornuese or Kanuri. The ruling race, called Shuwas, are of Arab descent and bigoted Mohammedans; but many traces of fetichism remain among the masses. Whatever they have of civilisation is derived from the Arabs. The slave-trade formerly flourished in Bornu. In the beginning of the 19th century, Bornu was conquered by the Fellatahs, whose yoke, however, was soon shaken off. Dr Nachtigal, who visited Bornu in 1870, described it as rapidly decaying. The ruins of Birni, the old capital, on the Yaobe, may still be seen. Kuka or Kukawa, the present capital, on the west shore of Lake Chad, has a pop. of about 60,000. Gornu, to the south-east, is still more populous, and has one of the most important markets of Central Africa.

Boro Budor ('the great Buddha'), the ruin of a splendid Buddhist temple in Java, 20 miles NW. of Jokjokarta. Built probably between 600 and 1430 A.D., it is a pyramid 520 feet square, and 118 high.

Borodino (Borodee'no), a village of Russia, 70 miles W. of Moscow. It is on the Kaluga, an affluent of the Moskwa, and gave name to the great but indecisive battle between Napoleon and the Russians, 7th September 1812. The French name the battle from the Moskwa.

Boroughbridge, a market-town of Yorkshire, on the Ure, 22 miles NW. of York. Edward II., in 1322, defeated the Earl of Lancaster here. Hard by are three great monoliths, the 'Devil's Arrows,' 16 to 22 feet high. Pop. 850.

Borovitchi, a town of Russia, on the river Msta, 98 miles E. of Novgorod. Pop. 12,000.

Borovsk, a town of Russia, 49 miles NNE. of Kaluga. Pop. 11,000.

Borris, a village 17 miles S. of Carlow. Pop. 470.

Borrodale, an Inverness-shire estate, on Loch-na-Nuagh, 35 miles W. by N. of Fort William. Prince Charles Edward landed here (1745).

Borrome'an Islands, a group of four small lovely islands in the western arm of Lago Maggiore, Northern Italy. They are named after the ancient family of Borromeo.

Borrowdale, a beautiful valley of Cumberland, 5 miles S. of Keswick, ascending from the head of Derwentwater towards the Honister Pass. Here is the Bowder Stone, 89 feet in circumference, and 1971 tons in weight. The famous plumbago mine at Seathwaite in Borrowdale was closed in 1850.

Borrowstounness. See Bo'ness.

Borsad, a town of northern Bombay; pop. 13,000.

Borstal, a suburb of Rochester, with a reformatory for 'juvenile-adult' criminals.

Borth, a Cardiganshire watering-place, 8 miles N. of Aberystwith.

Borthwick, a peel-tower with memories of Queen Mary, 13½ miles SSE. of Edinburgh.

Bosa, a cathedral city on the W. coast of Sardinia, 85 miles NNW. of Cagliari. Pop. 7000.

Boscastle, a Cornish coast-village, 20 miles W. of Launceston.

Bos'cobel, on the eastern verge of Shropshire, 37 miles N. of Worcester, was, after the defeat of Worcester (3d September 1651), for two days the hiding-place of Charles II. His 'Royal Oak' is represented by a tree grown from one of its acorns; but Boscobel House still stands.

Bosco Reale (Re-ah'leh), an Italian village, 10 miles ESE. of Naples. Pop. 9000.

Bosna-Serai. See SARAJEVO.

Bosnia and Herzegovina, a province lying between Dalmatia and Slavonia, which has made rapid progress in prosperity since the Berlin Treaty of 1878 transferred it from Turkey to Austria. (Herzegovi'na, locally pron. Hertzegŏv'ĭna, is a Slav word for 'duchy' formed from the German Herzog. These provinces, which had long formed virtually a portion of the dual monarchy, were definitely incorporated in 1908 without any formal treaty. Area, 19,725 sq. m., of which 16,197 belong to Bosnia, and 3528 to Herzegovina; populaton, 1,900,000—one-third Mohammedan. The Dinaric Alps, here attaining a maximum altitude of 7663 feet, form the water-parting between the Adriatic and Danube basins; and four rivers—the Unna, the Vrbas, the Bosna (from which Bosnia takes its name), and the Drina—flow northwards to the Save. Flocks and herds are largely reared. The commerce is largely in the hands of Jews, the majority of whom reside in Sarajevo, the capital, which is now connected by rail both with Budapest and the Adriatic. With the exception of the Jews, Gypsies, and some Osmanli who live in the larger towns of Bosnia, all the inhabitants of the Illyrian Alps are Slavs, and in Herzegovina their characteristics are most strongly marked. The Bosnians themselves, though united by race, are divided by religion, Mussulman against Christian, Greek-Orthodox against Roman Catholic. Hence, in spite of every natural advantage, they were, unlike their Servian brethren, unable to emancipate themselves from the Turkish yoke. Although they form little over a third of the population, the Mussulmans possess more than their share of landed property. The original population were doubtless of Illyrian (Albanian) stock, but were partly extruded, partly Slavonised, during the great Slav migrations of the early Christian centuries. The country was long dependent on Hungary, but became a kingdom some thirty years before the first Turkish invasion (1401). Soon after 1463 Bosnia was permanently conquered by the Turks, and thousands of the inhabitants were carried off as slaves, the boys were trained to be janissaries; the most obstinate Christians emigrated, and the bulk of the remainder accepted Islam more or less completely. Rebellions against the Osmanli power have been frequent, the Christian element became more powerful, and in 1878 the time for an Austrian occupation (bitterly resisted by the Mohammedan natives) seemed to have come. See AUSTRIA.

Bos'porus, or BOSPHORUS (Latinised forms of a Greek word meaning 'ox-ford'), the ancient name of the channel which separates Europe from Asia, and connects the Black Sea (Euxine) with the Sea of Marmora (Propontis). It was so called, according to the legend, from Io, who swam across in the form of a cow. Afterwards, as the same name was bestowed upon other straits, this was designated the Thracian Bosporus. Its shores are elevated, and throughout its length the strait has on either side seven bays or gulfs, with corresponding promontories on the opposite side. One of these gulfs forms the harbour of Constantinople, or, as it is often called, the Golden Horn. Across the Golden Horn is Pera, and opposite the imperial city, on the other side of the Bosporus, is Scutari. The length of the Bosporus is about 17 miles, with a breadth of from little more than ¼ mile to 2 miles, and its average depth is about 30 fathoms. By treaty (1841) none but Turkish war-ships might navigate it without consent of the Sublime Porte. See BLACK SEA and KERTCH.

Bostan' (EL), 'the Garden,' a town of Asiatic Turkey, on the Sihun, 40 miles NW. of Marash. Pop. 10,000.

Boston, a parliamentary and municipal borough and seaport in Lincolnshire, on the Witham, 30 miles SE. of Lincoln and 107 miles NE. of London by rail. Its name is a contraction of 'Botolph's town,' and it is supposed to occupy the site of the Benedictine abbey founded on the Witham by St Botolph in 654, and destroyed in 870 by the Danes. Under the Normans, Boston became a place of importance, in 1204 paying the largest dues (£780) of any English port but London (£836). In Edward III.'s reign many foreign traders settled, and the merchants of the Hanseatic League established a guild in Boston. After their departure, the town declined, and the suppression of the monasteries by Henry VIII. further injured it; but his grant of a charter of incorporation, and Mary's subsequent grant of extensive lands, partly compensated for this. The parish church measures 283 by 99 feet, and is one of the largest without transepts in England. The Perpendicular tower ('Boston Stump') is 263 feet high, and terminates in an octagonal lantern, doubtless intended for a lighthouse by land and by sea. The clearing of the river of silt, the formation of a new channel in 1881, and the opening of a new dock in 1884, have greatly promoted the trade of Boston, for ships of 2000 tons can now reach the heart of the town. The chief exports are coal, machinery, corn, and wool; and the imports consist of timber, maize, cotton-seed, and general merchandise. Boston is a great market for cattle and sheep, and has manufactures of canvas, sail-cloth, ropes, sacking, beer, iron, brass, leather, bricks, whiting, and hats, with some shipbuilding. Fox the martyrologist, Conington, Jean Ingelow, J. Westland Marston, and H. Ingram (founder of the Illustrated London News) were natives. Since 1885 Boston returns only one member to parliament. Pop. (1851) 14,733; (1911) 16,673 (parliamentary borough, 22,090).

Boston, capital of Massachusetts, and fifth in size of the cities of the United States, is situated on an inlet of Massachusetts Bay, called Boston Harbour, at the mouths of the Charles and Mystic rivers, 234 miles NE. of New York by rail. It is connected with Cambridge, on the other side of the Charles, by several bridges. Boston possesses an excellent harbour, protected by several forts, and covering 75 sq. m., with a minimum depth of 23 feet at low tide; it has four fine lighthouses, and is dotted with more than fifty islands. Eight lines of railway converge here. Boston is reputed to be the wealthiest city of America in proportion to its population. The chief imports are sugar, wool, hides (for its large boot and shoe manufactories), chemicals, flax, and cotton goods; the principal exports, meat and dairy products, cattle, breadstuffs, cotton, and tobacco. Its manufactures are very varied; and its wool market comes next after that of London in importance. The Charlestown government navy yard is within the present limits of Boston, and the city, besides being the seat of many varied local manufactories, is the headquarters of heavy railroad, mining, and insurance interests. Boston is exposed to east winds, and pulmonary complaints are very prevalent; but otherwise its climate is healthy. It is one of the best built cities in the United States, prominent among its specimens of elaborate architecture being Trinity Church and the R. C. cathedral, the former erected at a cost of $750,000. The older buildings include the State-house (1795), with a conspicuous gilded dome, the Old State-house (1712), Christ Church (1723), Faneuil Hall (1743), afterwards termed 'The Cradle of Liberty,' and King's Chapel (1754). Among later public buildings and institutions may be noted Tremont Temple, the headquarters of New England Baptists, containing an audience-hall; the Free Public Library; the Post-office and Sub-treasury building, of granite, erected at a cost of about $6,000,000; the Lowell Institute, for the support of free public lectures; besides hospitals, homes, asylums, orphanages, dispensaries, &c. Among the higher institutions of learning are the Boston College (Catholic); the Boston University (Methodist); schools of technology and industrial science; two conservatories of music, schools of law and divinity; and the Massachusetts Medical College, connected with Harvard University, which, though located in Cambridge, is virtually a Boston institution. The 'Hub of the Universe' has long been noted for the interest taken by its citizens in literature, science, and art. It has been the birthplace of many famous men, including Franklin, J. S. Copley the painter, and his son Lord Lyndhurst, Chancellor of England, E. A. Poe, Emerson, Ticknor, Sumner and Parkman, as Cambridge was of Holmes and Lowell; while associated with it and Cambridge have been Hawthorne, Longfellow, Agassiz, Whittier, Motley, Bancroft, Prescott, Channing, T. Parker, Dana, Margaret Fuller, Thoreau, Aldrich, the Alcotts, the Jameses, and Howells. The city possesses some 250 literary, musical, and kindred associations. The number of newspapers and periodicals (including the Atlantic Monthly) here published is about 250. Originally founded in 1630 as Trimountain (from three hills on which it was built), upon the Shawmut peninsula, it was afterwards named Boston, after Boston in Lincolnshire, the native place of some of its colonists. The city now comprises what were formerly the separate towns of Roxbury (annexed in 1867), Dorchester (1869), and Charlestown, West Roxbury, and Brighton (1873). The conspicuous part borne by the town in the early troubles with England brought about the 'Boston Massacre' of 1770, in which several people were killed by the fire of the soldiery; and after the destruction of the British-taxed tea in the harbour (1773), the port was practically closed, and the town occupied by a British force, which, in March 1776, was finally compelled to evacuate the place (see Bunker Hill). From 1830 to 1860 Boston was the headquarters of the movement for the suppression of slavery. The city has suffered from several destructive conflagrations, notably that of 1872. Pop. (1800) 24,937; (1840) 93,383; (1860) 177,840; (1880) 362,839; (1890) 448,447; (1910) 670,585. See Winsor's History of Boston (4 vols. 1880–82).

Boston Spa, a pretty watering-place in the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the Wharfe, 3½ miles NW. of Tadcaster.

Bosworth, or Market Bosworth, a market-town, Leicestershire, 12 miles W. by S. of Leicester. On a moor 2 miles S. Richard III. was defeated and slain (1485). Pop. of parish, 700.

Böször'meny, a town of Hungary, 10 miles NNW. of Debreczin. Pop. 30,000.

Botany Bay, a shallow inlet of New South Wales, 5 miles S. of Sydney, discovered by Cook in 1770, and named by him from the number of new plants in its vicinity. In 1787 Botany Bay received England's first penal colony in the east; and though it was supplanted next year by Port Jackson, a better harbour to the north, it long continued to be the popular designation of the Australian convict settlements generally.

Bothnia, Gulf of, that part of the Baltic Sea (q.v.) which lies to the north of the Aland Islands, having on its eastern shore Finland, on the western and northern Sweden and Lapland. It extends from 60° to 66° N. lat. and 17° to 25° 35′ E. long., its greatest length being 415 miles, and its average breadth 100 miles. Its depth varies from 20 to 50 fathoms, but both along its shores and in the middle are many islets, sandbanks, &c., which render the navigation difficult. In winter it is usually so hard frozen that it can be crossed by sledges.

Bothwell, a Lanarkshire village, on the Clyde's right bank, 8 miles SE. of Glasgow. Bothwell Brig here was the scene of Monmouth's bloody defeat of the Covenanters in 1679; and a mile from the village are the stately ruins of Bothwell Castle, at whose base the Clyde washes the fair scenery of 'Bothwell Bank,' famous for centuries in Scottish song. Held before that by Olifards and Murrays, Bothwell Castle was possessed by the Douglases from 1365 till 1455; and to them it reverted in 1492, being now owned by their representative, the Earl of Home. Bothwellhaugh, 2 miles ESE., gave designation to James Hamilton, assassin of the Regent Moray. Joanna Baillie was a native of Bothwell. Pop. 3500.

Botoshani, a town of Moldavia, on the Shiska, 62 miles NW. of Jassy. Pop. 34,000.

Botzen, or Bozen (Ital. Bolzano), an important trading town of the Austrian Tyrol, on the Eisach, 35 miles NNE. of Trent by the Brenner Railway. It manufactures silk, linen, hosiery, leather, &c. Pop. 15,000.

Bouches-du-Rhône (Boosh-dü-Rōn; 'mouths of the Rhone'), a dep. in the south-east of France, formerly a part of Provence, with an area of 2000 sq. m. It is divided into the three arrondissements of Marseilles, Aix, and Arles. Pop. (1872) 554,911; (1891) 630,622; (1911) 805,932.

Boufarik, a town of Algeria, 23 miles S. of Algiers by rail. Pop. 6000.

Bougie, a port of Algeria, on the Bay of Bougie, 120 miles E. of Algiers. The Saldœ of the Romans, and the 'Little Mecca' of the Arabs, it had sunk to a small village in 1833, when the French captured the place. Their extensive works have since rendered it a strong fortress and a commercial centre. Pop. 10,500.

Bouillon, a duchy, originally German, now part of Belgian Luxemburg, a woody and hilly district in the Ardennes, of about 145 sq. m., belonged to the crusader, Godfrey de Bouillon. The principal town, Bouillon, between steep hills on the Semois, 9 miles NNE. of Sedan, contains his castle. Pop. 4000.

Boulak, or BULAK, a town of Egypt, on the Nile, opposite an island of the same name, 1 mile NW. of Cairo, of which it forms a suburb and the port. Pop. 20,000.

Boulge, a Suffolk parish, 3 miles NNW. of Woodbridge. Edward FitzGerald is buried here.

Boulogne (Boo-loñ'), a SW. suburb of Paris, on the Seine's right bank. It has numerous villas, and over 400 wash-houses on the river, which is here crossed by a fine stone bridge of twelve arches. Population, 57,000. The Bois de Boulogne, the Parisian's favourite place of recreation, is traversed by many walks and drives (see LONGCHAMP). At the entrance of the wood lies Auteuil (q.v.). During the Revolution the trees of the older walks were mostly cut down; but when Napoleon chose St Cloud for his summer residence, new walks were planted and laid off. All traces of the injuries inflicted during the siege of 1870–71 have now disappeared.

Boulogne-sur-Mer, a fortified seaport in the French dep. of Pas-de-Calais, situated at the mouth of the Liane in the English Channel, 27 miles SW. of Calais, and 158 N. by W. of Paris by rail. The town consists of two parts—Upper and Lower Boulogne. The upper town, formerly strongly fortified, contains the hôtel-de-ville, on the site of the castle where Godfrey de Bouillon was born in 1061, and the former cathedral, rebuilt (1827–66) in the Italian style, with a dome 300 feet high, and with a miraculous image of the Virgin. The lower town, the seaport proper, is newer, more populous, and more lively, inhabited chiefly by merchants, mariners, and fishermen. Boulogne has extensive and excellent salt-water baths; and, on account of its fine sands, it is a favourite, though somewhat expensive resort for sea-bathing. The English residents have recently become much less numerous. Pop. (1872) 39,700; (1911) 53,128, actively engaged in the manufacture of linen, cordage, iron, steel pens and buttons, oil, soap, and chemical products. Boulogne is the chief station in France of the North Sea fisheries. It has an active coasting trade, and ranks with Calais as one of the nearest and most frequented places of passage between France and England, steamers plying daily to London, and twice a day to Folkestone. Paris is reached by railway in 4½ hours. About 5000 vessels, most of them English, enter or clear the port annually, and ocean liners call here. The principal imports are woollen, cotton, and silk material; the exports are manufactured fabrics, leather, and wine. A new and vast deep-sea harbour was constructed in 1880–1904. A new dock, deep enough to take the largest vessels, was opened in 1912; and other extensive improvements to the harbour, including a new jetty and a new railway station, were undertaken at or about the same time. The Portus Gesoriacus of the Romans, and later Bononia or Bolonia, Boulogne in 1435 came into the possession of the Duke of Burgundy, and was united with the crown of France by Louis XI. in 1477. It was taken by the English in 1544, and restored to the French in 1550. Here, in 1804, Napoleon encamped 180,000 men and collected 2400 transports, ready at any favourable moment to swoop down on Britain. The poets Churchill and Campbell, and Le Sage, the author of Gil Blas, died here.

Bourbon, ISLE DE. See RÉUNION.

Bourbonnais (Boorbonnay'), in the centre of France, from 1327 to 1523 formed the duchy of Bourbon, and afterwards, as a crown domain, formed a province. It now constitutes the dep. of Allier and part of Cher. The capital was Moulins.

Bourbonne-les-Bains (Boorbonn'-leh-Ban^g), a town in the French dep. of Haute-Marne, 29 miles ENE. of Langres. Its saline springs reach a temperature of over 130° F. Pop. 3500.

Bourboule, a bathing-resort in the French dep. of Puy-de-Dôme, on the Dordogne, with hot mineral springs of 88°–129° F. Pop. 2000.

Bourgas. See BURGAS.

Bourg-en-Bresse (Boorg-on^g-Bress), the chief town of the French dep. of Ain, on the Reyssouze, 37 miles NE. of Lyons. The church of Brou here, built by Margaret of Austria in 1505–36, contains a superb monument to Philibert of Savoy. Bourg manufactures mineral waters and pottery. Pop. 20,000.

Bourges (Boorzh; anc. Avaricum), capital of the French dep. of Cher, at the confluence of the Auron and the Yèvre, 144 miles S. of Paris, and 69 SSE. of Orleans. Its houses are antique, and its streets crooked and dirty. The cathedral (1220–1538) is a splendid Gothic edifice, the interior one of the noblest in France, being 405 feet long and 117 high. A university (1465) was suppressed at the Revolution. The hôtel-de-ville dates from 1443. Brewing is carried on, and there are nurseries. Chosen in 1861 to be an arsenal, Bourges has a cannon-foundry. Louis XI. and Bourdaloue were natives. Pop. 45,700.

Bourget, LE (Boorzhay'), a village 6¼ miles NE. of Paris, during the siege in 1870 the scene of a series of bloody struggles disastrous to the French.—The LAC DU BOURGET, the largest wholly French lake, in Savoie dep., lies 780 feet above sea-level, and measures 7½ by 3 miles.

Bourne, a town of Lincolnshire, 9½ miles W. of Spalding. Lord Burghley, Dr Dodd, and Worth 'of Paris' were natives. Pop. 4300.

Bournemouth, a favourite Hampshire health resort, on Poole Bay, 37 miles SW. of Southampton, and 116 of London. It is included within the parliamentary borough of Christchurch, from which it is 4 miles distant, and is a municipal and county borough. Its rise has been rapid; until 1838 it consisted of but a few fishermen's huts and a coastguard station. It is situated for the most part in the pine-clad valley of the Bourne Brook, the banks of which are laid out as public gardens. The sands extend for 3 miles. The climate is fine, the air soft without being relaxing, and the country around is beautiful. Two piers, one 800, the other 840 feet long, were erected in 1861 and 1879. There are an Undercliff Drive extending to Boscombe, a winter garden, and an art gallery. Of several churches the finest is St Peter's (1864), with memorial windows to Keble, who died at Bournemouth; in its churchyard are the graves of Godwin, Mary Wollstonecraft, and Mary Shelley. Pop. (1861) 1940; (1871) 5906; (1881) 18,607; (1901) 47,100; (1911) 78,674.

Bourneville, a Worcestershire suburb of Birmingham, built since 1879 as a garden city by Mr George Cadbury for the employees in his great cocoa-works, and others, admirably equipped for family and social life.

Boussa, or BUSSANG, a walled town of (British) northern Nigeria, off an island in the Niger, in 10° 20′ N. lat. Mungo Park perished here in 1805. Pop. 10,000.

Bouvines (Boo-vean′), a village in the French dep. of Nord, 8 miles SE. of Lille, the scene of Philip Augustus's victory over Otho IV. in 1214, and of struggles in 1794 between the Austrians and the victorious French army of the north.

Bovino (Bovee′no), a cathedral city of South Italy, 20 m. SSW. of Foggia. Pop. 8000. The imperialists defeated the Spaniards here in 1734.

Bowdon Downs. See ALTRINCHAM.

Bowling, a Dumbartonshire village, on the Clyde, 3½ miles ESE. of Dumbarton. Pop. 1000.

Bowling Green, a town of Kentucky, 114 miles S. by W. of Louisville by rail. Pop. 9200.

Bowmore, a seaport of Islay island, Argyllshire. Pop. 800.

Bowness, (1) a town of Westmorland, on the east side of Lake Windermere, now part of Windermere urban district.—(2) A seaport of Cumberland, on the Solway Firth, 12 miles WNW. of Carlisle. Pop. of parish, 1000.

Box Hill. See DORKING.

Boxtel, a town of Holland, 38 miles S. by E. of Utrecht. An Anglo-Dutch army was here defeated by the French in 1794. Pop. 8000.

Box Tunnel, 3195 yards long, on the Great Western Railway, 5 miles NE. of Bath.

Boyacá, till 1908 a dep. of Colombia, touching Venezuela. Capital, Tunja, with 10,000 inhabitants.

Boyle, a town in County Roscommon, on the river Boyle, above its expansion into Lough Key, 108 miles NW. of Dublin by rail. Pop. 2700.

Boyne, a river of Ireland, rises in the Bog of Allen, and flows 80 miles through Kildare, King's County, Meath, and Louth, past Trim, Navan, and Slane, and enters the Irish Sea 4 miles below Drogheda. It receives the Mattock and Blackwater, and is navigable for vessels of 250 tons to Drogheda, for barges of 70 tons to Navan. In the battle of the Boyne, fought on its banks, 3 miles W. of Drogheda, on 1st July 1690, William III. defeated James II.

Bozen. See BOTZEN.

Bozrah (mod. el-Busaireh), a town of Edom, in the mountain district to the south-east of the Dead Sea, about 300 B.C. capital of the Nabatæans, but now an unimportant village.

Bozzolo (Bot′zolo), a town of North Italy, 14 miles WSW. of Mantua. Pop. 5000.

Bra, a town of North Italy, 31 miles SSE. of Turin by rail. Pop. 11,000.

Brabant′ was the name formerly given to an important province of the Low Countries, extending from the left bank of the Waal to the sources of the Dyle, and from the Maas and the plain of Limburg to the Lower Scheldt. After many changes, Brabant was made a part of the kingdom of Holland, at the Congress of Vienna; but since the revolution of 1830, the three provinces of Brabant have been divided as follows: North or Dutch Brabant, the Belgian province of Antwerp, and South Brabant, also Belgian.

Brabourne, a parish of Kent, 6 miles E. of Ashford.

Brackley, a market-town of Northamptonshire, on the Ouse, 7 miles WNW. of Buckingham. It is a municipal borough, reincorporated in 1886, and till 1832 returned two members. Pop. 2600.

Braddock, a borough of Pennsylvania, on the Monongahela, 10 miles by rail SE. of Pittsburgh, with steel and car works. Here General Braddock fell in 1755. Pop. 20,000.

Bradfield, in Berkshire, 7½ miles W. of Reading, the seat of a public school, St Andrew's College (1850). Pop. of parish, 1600.

Bradford, an important manufacturing town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, on a tributary of the Aire, at the meeting of three vales, 9 miles W. of Leeds, 34 SW. of York, and 191 NNW. of London by rail. Bradford in 1832 was created a parliamentary, in 1847 a municipal, in 1888 a county borough, and in 1897 a city, with a Lord Mayor since 1907. Municipal and parliamentary boroughs were made conterminous in 1885; in 1899 the city was extended to include Idle. For parliamentary purposes it falls into three districts, each returning one member. Bradford is the chief seat in England of the spinning and weaving of worsted yarn, and the great mart for the long wools used in worsted fabrics. It has developed of late worsted coating, velvet, and plush industries. The first mill was built in 1798; there are now more than 300. Coal and iron mines occur near Bradford, and the ironworks at Bowling and Lowmoor are very large and important; the making of machinery is a considerable industry; and there are neighbouring stone quarries. The parish church of St Peter is a fine Perpendicular building, with a tower of later date, and a number of interesting monuments. Bradford has also a town-hall (1873) of medieval design, with campanile and carillon; mechanics' institute (1870); St George's Hall (1853); exchange (1867); markets; grammar-school; technical college (1882); free library (1872); post-office, in the Italian style (1887); the United Independent College (1888); Cartwright Hall (1904), with art gallery and museum; &c. Of parks the older are Peel Park (56 acres), Lister or Manningham Park (56 acres), Horton Park (39 acres), Bowling Park (53 acres), and Bradford Moor Park (15 acres). In the civil wars, the people of Bradford took the parliament side, and twice defeated the royalists, but were afterwards themselves defeated by the Earl of Newcastle. The worsted trade, introduced to Bradford at the end of the 17th century, made rapid progress after the invention of the steam-engine. In a riot at Bradford against the introduction of worsted power-looms in 1826, two of the rioters were shot dead by the defenders of the mill which contained the obnoxious machinery, and many more were wounded. In 1825 a strike for increased wages, in which 20,000 persons were concerned, lasted six months. Its trade suffered severely owing to the McKinley tariff in the United States. This town is the seat of the first English temperance society (1830). Railless electric tramways were introduced in 1911. There are statues of Sir Robert Peel, Richard Oastler, Sir Titus Salt, S. C. Lister, and W. E. Forster. Pop. (1851) 103,778; (1881) 194,495; (1891) 216,361; (1911) of parl. borough, 235,467; of city, 288,458.

Bradford, a Pennsylvanian town, 65 miles S.

of Buffalo, with oil-wells and sawmills. Pop. 14,500.

Bradford-on-Avon (Sax. Bradanford, 'broad ford'), a town of Wiltshire, on the Avon, and on the Kennet and Avon Canal, 9 miles SE. of Bath. Formerly it was the seat of important woollen manufactures, and kerseymeres were first made here. The tiny church (38 feet long) of St Lawrence, built possibly by St Aldhelm between 675 and 709, is the only perfect pre-Norman building now remaining in England. It had been used for two centuries as a school and dwelling-house, when in 1856 it was rescued from profanation. On the summit of Torr Hill are the ruins of a 14th-century chapel of the Virgin; and the town bridge retains its desecrated chapel. At Bradford, Cenwalh, king of the West Saxons, gained a great victory over the Welsh in 652. Pop. 4500.

Brading, a small but ancient town, once a parliamentary borough, in the Isle of Wight, 4 miles S. of Ryde by rail. In its churchyard is buried the 'Dairyman's Daughter;' and in 1880 the remains of a Roman villa, with a tesselated floor, were unearthed near the town. Pop. 1500.

Braemar′, a Highland district occupying the south-west corner of Aberdeenshire (q.v.), in the heart of the Grampian Mountains, and traversed by the upper waters of the Dee. In the east part is Balmoral; and near its centre, 61 miles W. by S. from Aberdeen, is the small village of Castleton of Braemar, where in 1715 the Earl of Mar raised the Pretender's standard. Pop. 500.

Braeriach (Bray-ree′ahh), a summit (4248 feet) of the Cairngorms, on the border of Aberdeen and Inverness shires, third in Great Britain.

Braga, a Portuguese town, in Minho, 34 miles NE. of Oporto by rail. It has the palace of the primate of Portugal, a fine Gothic cathedral (12th century), and manufactures of linen, hats, cutlery, firearms, jewellery, &c. The Bracara Augusta of the Romans, it retains ruins of a temple, an amphitheatre, and an aqueduct. Near it is a celebrated place of pilgrimage. Pop. 30,000.

Bragança, two considerable towns in Brazil.—(1) A seaport, 100 miles NE. of Pará, at the mouth of the Caite. Pop. of town and district, 6000.—(2) An inland city of 10,000 inhabitants, 50 miles NE. of São Paulo.

Braganza, or BRAGANÇA, a Portuguese town, capital of a district in Traz-os-Montes, on the Fervença, 26 miles NW. of Miranda. It is the see of a bishop, and gives name to the late ruling House of Braganza. Pop. 6000.

Brahmanbaria, a town of India, Tipperah district, in the presidency of Bengal, on the Titas River. Pop. 20,000.

Brahmaputra ('son of Brahma'), one of the largest rivers of India, rises, near the Sutlej, in Tibet, and, after partially mingling with the Ganges, flows into the Bay of Bengal. From explorations (1878–82) by one of the Asiatics attached to the Indian Survey, it was certain that a stream of the Tsangpo (or Sanpo) is the highest source of the Brahmaputra. But Sven Hedin in 1907 first definitely traced the Kubi-Tsangpo as the actual source, and found that it springs from a glacier of the Kubi-Gangri Mountains, 15,958 feet above sea-level. The river flows eastward for 1000 miles on the plateau of Tibet; then, turning SE., it pierces the Himalayas to descend to the valleys of Assam. Here known as Dihong, it unites with the Dibong and the Brahmakunda, the three rivers forming the Brahmaputra, which flows SW. and S. The entire length from the latter source exceeds 900 miles; from the former 1800 miles. The united stream bears along a vast body of water, broken by many islands, and throwing off branches; it flows from NE. to SSW. for about 450 miles, leaves Assam near Dhoobri; flows S. round the Garo Hills; for 180 miles its course is through the plain of Bengal, till it joins the Padma, or main stream of the Ganges, at Goalanda. Here the conjoint delta of these rivers begins; the great body of its waters flowing SE. reaches the sea by the estuary known as the Meghna. During the rains the Brahmaputra floods hundreds of sq. m. of country, reaching a height of 30 to 40 feet above its usual level. This supersedes artificial irrigation, and the plains so watered yield abundantly. The Brahmaputra is navigable for steamers to Dibrugarh, 800 miles from the sea. See Sven Hedin, Trans-Himalaya (1909–13).

Brahui. See BELUCHISTAN.

Braidwood, a Lanarkshire village, 7 miles WNW. of Carstairs Junction. Pop. 1000.

Braila, or BRAHILOV, a river-port of Roumania, on the left bank of the Danube, 10 miles above Galatz, and 142 NE. of Bucharest by rail. The seat of a Greek cathedral, it was a free port till 1883, has new docks (1886–92), and exports large quantities of corn and other products. Braila was burned by the Russians in 1711, and Gortschakoff crossed here in 1854. Pop. 65,000.

Braine-le-Comte (Brain-le-Con^{g}t), a town of the Belgian province of Hainault, on the Senne, 19 miles SSW. of Brussels. Pop. 10,000.

Braintree, a market-town of Essex, 45 miles NE. of London by rail. It has manufactures of silk, crape, straw-plait, &c. Pop. 6200.

Brambanan, a district of the province of Surakarta, Java, rich in remains of Buddhist temples.

Bramber, a Sussex village, on the Adur, 4½ miles NNW. of New Shoreham. It has a ruined castle, and till 1832 returned two members.

Brambletye House, a ruined Jacobean mansion, in Sussex, near East Grinstead.

Brampton, a very ancient town of Cumberland, 9 miles ENE. of Carlisle by rail, once a great centre of hand-loom weaving. The moot-hall is a magistrate's office. Near it is Lanercost Abbey (q.v.). Pop. of parish, 2400.

Bran, a feeder of the Tay, with fine falls, near Dunkeld.

Branco, RIO, a river of Northern Brazil, rising in the Parima Mountains, and flowing 400 miles southward to the Rio Negro, of which it is the principal tributary, on its way to the Amazon.

Brandenburg (u as oo), a central province of Prussia, formed the nucleus of the present monarchy, and almost all a low plain. Area, 15,410 sq. m.; population, 4,092,616.—The town of Brandenburg (anc. Brennibor of the Wends), on the Havel, 38 miles WSW. of Berlin, has a castle and a cathedral (14th century), with a fine crypt, on an island in the river. Pop. 53,600.

Brandenburg, NEU. See NEUBRANDENBURG.

Brandeston, a Suffolk parish, on the Deben, 3½ miles SW. of Framlingham. It was the residence of the great lawyer, Charles Austin.

Brandon, a quaint old market-town, mostly on the Suffolk side of the Little Ouse, 7½ miles NW. of Thetford, and 86 NE. of London by rail. In the neighbourhood are Neolithic flint-workings known as the Grimes Graves. Gun-flints are still made here, chiefly for the African market; and the continuity of this industry can be traced at Brandon in unbroken sequence to an early prehistoric period. Pop. of parish, 2400.

Brandon, a city of Manitoba, Canada, on the Canadian Pacific Railway, below the junction of the Assiniboine and Little Saskatchewan rivers, in a prolific wheat-growing district. It was founded in 1881, and in the following year had over 1500 houses. Pop. 14,000.

Brandywine Creek, a stream rising in Chester county, Pennsylvania, flowing south-eastward into Delaware, and emptying into Christiana Creek at Wilmington. Here, September 11, 1777, 13,000 Americans, under Washington, were defeated by 18,000 British, under Lord Howe.

Brantford, a city on the Grand River, Ontario, 24 miles SW. of Hamilton by rail. Pop. 23,000.

Brantwood. See CONISTON LAKE.

Branxholm, a quondam Border castle, Roxburghshire, 3 miles SW. of Hawick.

Brassó. See KRONSTADT.

Brass River, a deltaic arm of the Niger (q.v.).

Brattleboro, in Windham county, Vermont, 110 miles S. of Montpelier. Pop. 7500.

Braunsberg, a town of East Prussia, on the navigable Passarge, 8 miles from its mouth, and 38 SW. of Königsberg by rail. It manufactures machinery, felt, and leather goods. Pop. 15,000.

Bray, (1) a Berkshire parish, on the Thames, 1½ mile S. by E. of Maidenhead. The 'Vicar of Bray' was Simon Aleyn, from 1540 to 1588, during the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth.—(2) A seaside town, partly in Dublin county, but chiefly in Wicklow, 13 miles SE. of Dublin by rail. The beauty of its situation has raised it from a small fishing-village to a watering-place, popularly known as the 'Irish Brighton.' Pop. 7700—doubled in the season.

Bray is a district of Normandy, now the south-eastern part of Seine-Inférieure, famous for its cattle and dairy produce.

Brazil′, a republic of South America, of which it covers nearly half, is little less in area than the whole of Europe, its area being 3,300,000 sq. m., including the Acré territory bought from Bolivia in 1902. It has a length of 2660 miles, and a breadth of 2705 miles between extreme points. It borders on every state in South America except Chili. The name was given by early explorers from thinking that the red dyewood (Brazil-wood) found here was identical with the East Indian dyewood known to them as Brasil. Brazil is a triangular-shaped country, occupying the eastern angle of the continent. It lies almost wholly within the tropics, and is still in great part unexplored and unsettled. On the north and west are the great depressions of the Amazon and Paraguay rivers, which comprise large areas of flood-plains and swamps, heavily wooded, and almost uninhabitable. The northern coast is bordered by low, alluvial bottom-lands and sandy plains, full of lakes, and in places very sterile; while the southern angle of the country is rolling campo land, bordered by a low sandy coast. Above its eastern angle a large area of coast-lands and neighbouring plateau is subject to periodical devastating droughts. The interior of the country, however, is a high plateau, with a general elevation of 1000 to 3000 feet, irregularly ridged by mountains and deeply cut by large rivers. The mountainous ranges of the maritime system form the eastern margin of this plateau, the easternmost of which is known as the Serra do Mar. This range plays an important part in the development of Brazil, for it is a costly barrier to communication with the interior, and turns nearly all the great rivers inland to find outlets through the distant Amazon and La Plata. The mountains are composed almost exclusively of uplifted strata of great geological age, gneiss and metamorphic schists, with granite and other eruptive rocks. The great elevated plains are composed of horizontal strata dating from the Silurian age. Brazil possesses three great river-systems—the Amazon, La Plata, and San Francisco. The Amazon and its tributaries drain fully a half of the country. To the east of the Madeira these tributaries are tableland rivers, broken by rapids and freely navigable for comparatively short distances. West of the Madeira they are lowland rivers, sluggish, bordered by extensive flood-plains, and afford free navigation for long distances. The La Plata system drains nearly one-fifth of the country through its three branches —the Paraguay, Paraná, and Uruguay. The first of these is a lowland river, freely navigable for a long distance, while the other two are tableland rivers, full of obstructions, and without free outlets for their upper-level navigation. The San Francisco is a tableland river, flowing north-east between the Goyaz and maritime mountains, and then, breaking through the latter, south-east to the Atlantic. It is not freely navigable because of the Paulo Affonso Falls. The other coast-rivers are generally short. The climate of Brazil varies greatly—the lowlands of the Amazon and a great part of the coast being hot, humid, and unhealthy, while the tablelands and some districts of the coast swept by the trade-winds are temperate and healthy. The vegetation of Brazil is luxuriant and varied. The vast forests of the Amazon contain hundreds of species of trees, draped and festooned by climbing plants, lianas, orchids, &c. Rosewood, Brazil-wood, and others supply valuable timber; whilst tropical fruits are abundant. The number of species of animals is also very large, but the individuals in each are comparatively few. Beasts of prey are the jaguar, puma, tiger-cat, and ocelot; the other animals include the monkey, tapir, capybara, peccary, ant-eater, sloth, and boa-constrictor. Alligators, turtles, porpoises, and manatees swarm in the Amazon; and among birds the parrots and humming-birds are especially numerous. The population of Brazil is estimated at 21,000,000 to 25,000,000, of whom perhaps 4,000,000 are negroes, 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 Indians, and the remainder pretty equally divided between whites and half-breeds. In the coast-towns the whites predominate. The proportion of non-producers is very large, the natural conditions of the country rendering labour but slightly necessary to meet the ordinary requirements of life. The institution of slavery has had much to do with this state of things. The African slave-trade was prohibited in 1831, but did not actually cease until 1854. In 1871 a gradual emancipation law was adopted, and in 1885 a more thorough one; and finally, by the law of 13th May 1888, immediate and unconditional emancipation was decreed. The Roman Catholic is the established religion, and is supported by the state; but all other sects are tolerated. There are, however, very few Brazilians who are not Roman Catholics. Education is still in a very backward condition. The language is Portuguese, with dialectal varieties.

Since the revolution of 1889, Brazil, as the 'United States of Brazil,' is a federative republic; the capital, Rio de Janeiro, is a federal district; each of the old provinces is a state, and is administered by its own authorities at its own expense; while defence, customs, postage, banking, &c., are the concern of the union. The central executive authority consists of the president, a vice-president, and a ministry. The legislative authority resides in a national congress of two chambers, the chamber of deputies and the senate. Each state has its own administrative, legislative, and judicial authorities. The army is raised by obligatory military service, and consists of about 30,000 men, besides 20,000 gendarmerie. The navy comprises 3 battleships, 3 coast defence armour-clads, 9 torpedo-boats, besides protected cruisers, gunboats, destroyers, and submarines, manned in all by 8500 officers and men. The revenue has since 1900 varied from £15,000,000 to £33,000,000; the expenditure has of late years been—nominally at least—covered by the revenue. The debt, external, internal, and floating, is about £121,000,000.

The industries of Brazil are confined almost exclusively to agriculture, mining, and forest products. Stock-raising has totally failed to keep pace with the domestic consumption of jerked-beef, which is largely imported. The coast fisheries have also been neglected, although Brazil is a large consumer of codfish. The forest products are rubber, maté, nuts, cocoa, medicinal plants, cabinet and dye woods, &c.—the first coming second in importance as an article of export. Of agricultural products, coffee occupies the first place, and furnishes about two-thirds of the total exports. Cotton, tobacco, and sugar are also important. Rice, maize, and many other products are easily grown, but have been overshadowed by coffee, and to some extent discouraged by the high cost of internal transportation. In colonial times the mining industries yielded large results; they are now comparatively unimportant. Gold and diamonds are found in Minas Geraes, Paraná, and Bahia, but the annual production at present is not large. Iron ores of superior quality exist in several provinces, but the scarcity of coal is a serious obstacle. There are deposits of petroleum; monazite sand and manganese ores are exported. The total exports varied in 1900–12 from £35,000,000 to £75,000,000 a year, the imports from £22,000,000 to £63,000,000. The annual exports to Great Britain range from £6,000,000 to £18,000,000; the imports range from £8,000,000 to £17,000,000. The inhabitants of the southern states of the republic are broadly distinguished by their energy from the more indolent northerners. It is in the southern provinces that the numerous German colonies (comprising some 320,000 Germans) are mostly established. Steam communication with Europe was opened in 1850, and telegraphic communication in 1874. The first railway was opened in 1854; Brazil now possesses some 15,000 miles of railway and 36,000 miles of telegraph. The milreis, the unit of the monetary system, fluctuates very much in value—from 2s. 3d. (1890) to 11¾d. (1902).

Brazil was discovered by Pinzon in 1500, and taken possession of, for Portugal, by an expedition under Cabral in the same year. In 1808 the royal family of Portugal, expelled by the French, took refuge in the colony, which became a kingdom in 1815, an empire in 1822. The emperor Dom Pedro II. was expelled in 1889, and a republic established, which was for a time much perturbed by rebellions. From 1891 civil war went on desultorily in some parts of the republic, especially around Rio de Janeiro, in the state of Rio Grande do Sul, and in Minas Geraes. In 1893 the capital was bombarded by the navy in rebel hands, but in 1894 the rebellion collapsed. In spite of a few minor risings, the republic is now permanently established. There has been a revival of prosperity; and many boundary disputes have been settled.

Brazos, a river of Texas, U.S., rising in a tableland called the Staked Plain, in the NW. of the state, and running 950 miles south-eastward to the Gulf of Mexico, 40 miles SW. of Galveston.

Brazza, the largest and most populous of the Dalmatian islands of the Adriatic, with an area of 152 sq. m. and a pop. of 25,000. It rises to 2578 feet, and is richly wooded. San Pietro and Milna are the chief towns.

Breadal'bane, a district of NW. Perthshire, among the Grampians, giving the title of earl to a branch of the Campbells.

Brechin (Bree'hhin), a town of Forfarshire, on the South Esk, 8½ miles W. of Montrose. With Montrose, &c. it returns one member. Linen and paper are manufactured, with bleaching, distilling, and brewing. David I. founded a bishopric here about 1150. Part of the cathedral is now the parish church, at whose south-west angle rises the Round Tower (c. 983, 87 feet high) of a Culdee college, similar to the Irish ones, and to the one at Abernethy, the only other example in Scotland. Brechin Castle, the ancient seat of the Maules, and now of the Earls of Dalhousie, was taken by Edward I. in 1303 after a twenty days' siege. The town itself was burned by Montrose in 1645; and near it Huntly defeated the rebellious Crawfords in 1452. Dr Guthrie was a native. Pop. (1851) 6638; (1911) 8439.

Brecknock, or BRECON, the capital of Brecknockshire, at the confluence of the Usk and Honddu, 183 miles W. by N. of London by rail, and 40 NE. of Swansea. It lies in the midst of fine mountain scenery, and has beautiful public walks, the triple-peaked Brecon Beacons (2910 feet) rising to the south. From 1536 to 1885 Brecon returned one member to parliament. Flannels, coarse woollens, and hats are manufactured. Bernard de Newmarch founded the town, and built a castle here in 1094. Henry VIII. in 1541 converted a Dominican friary into a college, which was rebuilt in 1864; the priory, now the parish church, was restored in 1862. Mrs Siddons was a native. Population about 6000.

Brecknockshire, or BRECON, an inland county of South Wales. The maximum length is 39 miles; its breadth ranges between 11½ and 30 miles; and its area is 733 sq. m., of which only 43 per cent. is cultivated. Brecknockshire is one of the most mountainous counties in South Wales, and has deep, beautiful, and fertile valleys. Two principal mountain-chains, the highest in South Wales, culminating in the Brecon Beacons at 2910 feet, intersect the county in the north and south, and occupy, with their offshoots, a great part of the surface. The chief rivers are the Wye and Usk; and Llangorse Lake covers nearly 1800 acres. The agriculture, though still defective, especially in the higher districts, has been greatly improved by the Brecknockshire Agricultural Society, instituted in 1775. The mineral produce is small, consisting of iron, especially along the south border; coal and limestone are also found in the south and west. The Brecon Canal connects the county with the Bristol Channel. There are several small factories of woollens and worsted hosiery; also several important ironworks, but the ore is chiefly obtained from adjoining counties. Brecknockshire returns one member to parliament. Pop. (1801) 32,325; (1871) 61,627; (1911) 59,287. The chief towns are Brecon (the county town), Builth, Crickhowell, Hay, and Llanelly. There are many remains of British and Roman camps, Roman roads, cairns, cromlechs, mounds, and castles, throughout the county. The Normans wrested the county from the Welsh princes in 1092. Llewelyn, the last British prince of Wales, was killed at Llanafanfechan, near Builth, in 1282. Welsh is still the language of the middle-class and the peasantry. See Jones's History of Brecknockshire (2 vols. 1805–9; new ed. 1898).

Breda, a town of Holland, at the confluence of the navigable Mark and Aa, 60 miles ENE. of Flushing by rail, and 30 NNE. of Antwerp. Its Gothic cathedral (1510) has an octagonal steeple 311 feet high; whilst the castle (1350) received its present shape from William III. (1696), and in 1828 was converted into a military academy. There are manufactures of carpets, linen, hats, soap, leather, &c., and dyeworks, breweries, and rope-walks. The population is about 28,000. Fortified until 1876, Breda was captured by the Spaniards (1581), by the Dutch under Maurice of Orange (1590), by Spinola (1625), again by the Dutch (1632), and twice by the French (1793–95), who were finally driven out in 1813.

Bredfield, a Suffolk parish, Edward FitzGerald's birthplace, 3 miles N. of Woodbridge.

Breede (Bray'deh), a river in the Cape Province, flowing SE. to the Indian Ocean at St Sebastian's Bay, 60 miles NE. of Cape Agulhas. It is navigable for vessels drawing not more than 10 feet of water to a distance of 40 miles.

Bregenz (Bray-gentz'; anc. Brigantium), a town of Austria, capital of the Vorarlberg, on the east shore of the Lake of Constance; it is the terminus of the Arlberg railway (from Innsbruck), with a great tunnel, opened 1884. Pop. 9000.

Breisach, ALT (Brī-sahh; anc. Mons Brisiacus), a town of Baden, situated on an isolated basalt hill (804 feet) on the right side of the Rhine, 14 miles W. of Freiburg. The minster is a 13th-century structure. Pop. 5000.

Breisgau (Brīse'gow), a German district extending along the right bank of the Rhine, from the episcopal territory of Strasburg to Basel, embracing Freiburg and the southern Black Forest. Since 1810 it has been part of Baden.

Breitenfeld (Brī'tenfelt), a Saxon village, 5 miles N. of Leipzig. In the first of three battles here (17th September 1631), Gustavus Adolphus defeated the imperialists under Tilly; the second (2d November 1642) was also a victory of the Swedes over the imperial forces; and the third was one act of the great 'Battle of the Nations' at Leipzig, 16th October 1813.

Bremen (Bray'men), a free city of Germany, on the Weser, 39 miles by rail SSE. of Bremerhaven, and 76 NW. of Hanover. Pop. (1875) 102,177; (1910) 246,827. Bremen is divided into the Old and the New Town—the former on the right, the latter (dating from 1620) on the left bank of the river, which is spanned by four bridges. The ramparts and bastions round the old town have been formed into public promenades. Among the principal buildings are the cathedral (1043–70; reconstructed 13th to 17th centuries), the Gothic town-hall (1409), with its famous wine-cellar, the 'Schütting' or guildhall (1537), the exchange, the museum, the post-office, and the observatory of Dr Olbers, who here discovered Pallas and Vesta. Bremen is a very thriving port, and now ranks as second in Germany for foreign trade. Till 1885–95 large vessels had to stop at Bremerhaven. Bremen carries on an extensive commerce with Great Britain, North and South America, the West Indies, Africa, the East Indies, and China; its great foreign trade, however, is with the United States. Bremen ships about 50 per cent. of all emigrants sailing from Germany, principally to the United States. The chief imports are tobacco, coffee, sugar, cotton, rice, skins, dyewoods, wines, petroleum, timber, and hemp. The exports consist of woollen goods, linens, glass, rags, wool, hemp, hides, oil-cake, colours, and wooden toys. Large quantities of tobacco are re-exported. There are manufactures of woollens and cottons, cigars, paper, and starch, and breweries, distilleries, rice-mills, and sugar-refineries. Bremen is the headquarters of the North German Lloyd Steamship Company (1857).

Bremen first became of historical note in the 8th century, when it was erected into a bishopric by Charlemagne. It soon attained considerable commercial importance, and became one of the principal cities of the Hanseatic League. In 1810 it was incorporated with the French empire, but recovered its independence in 1813, and by the Congress of Vienna was admitted in 1815 as one of the Hanse towns into the Germanic confederation. In 1867 it became a member of the North German confederation, and now it forms part of the German empire. The area of the territory is 99 sq. m.; pop., including the town of Bremen (1910) 298,736.

Bremerhaven (Braymerhâh'fen), the outport of Bremen, on the Weser estuary, nearly 10 miles from the open sea, and 39 NNW. of Bremen. It was founded by Bremen in 1827, and rapidly became a thriving place. A second dock was opened in 1866, a third in 1874; and in 1888 a great port, with docks, was undertaken at Nordenham, on the opposite bank. The Geeste separates it from Geestemünde (q.v.). The population has risen from 3500 in 1850 to over 24,000.

Brenner Pass, a pass (4588 feet) in the Central Tyrol Alps, on the road between Innsbruck and Botzen, connecting Germany with north-east Italy. Open at all seasons of the year, it is the lowest pass over the main chain of the Alps. In 1867 a railway through the pass was opened. The distance from Innsbruck to Botzen in a direct line is only 52 miles, but frequent windings extend the railway to 78 miles. It passes over numerous viaducts and bridges, and through twenty-seven tunnels, one of them 935 yards long.

Brenta (Medoacus Major), a river of North Italy, issuing from a small lake in the Tyrol, and flowing 120 miles southward and eastward to the Gulf of Venice at the haven of Brondolo.

Brentford, the county town of Middlesex, 10 miles W. of Paddington station, at the influx of the Brent to the Thames, which is crossed here by a bridge leading to Kew. Consisting chiefly of one long irregular street, it has gin-distilleries, a brewery, sawmills, a soap-work, the Grand Junction Water-works, &c. There are many market-gardens in the vicinity. Here Edmund Ironside defeated the Danes in 1016; in 1558 six martyrs were burned at the stake; and in 1642 Prince Rupert defeated the Parliamentarians. Pop. 16,500.

Brentwood, a market-town in Essex, 10 miles SW. of Chelmsford by rail. It has a richly endowed grammar-school (1567). Population, 7000.

Brescia (Bresh'ya; anc. Brixia), a city of Lombardy, on the rivers Mella and Garza, 51 miles E. of Milan by rail. It has two cathedrals—the old (dating from the 7th century), and the new (1604–1825); the Tosi Gallery or Town Museum, adorned with frescoes; the 12th-century Broletto Palace; the Biblioteca Quiriniana, with 90,000 volumes, founded in 1750 by Cardinal Quirini; and the Temple of Hercules, which, built by Vespasian, and excavated in 1822, forms a repository for classical antiquities. The cemetery (1810) is regarded as the finest in Italy. A statue of Arnold of Brescia was unveiled in 1882. Brescia manufactures woollens, silk, leather, paper, arms, cutlery, &c., and its wine is of good quality. Pop. 83,000.

Breslau (Brez'low), capital of Prussian Silesia, 150 m. SE. of Frankfort-on-Oder by rail, is situated at the confluence of the Ohlau and Oder. It has a university founded by the Emperor Leopold I. in 1702, with over 2400 students, and a library of 400,000 volumes; a cathedral (1148–1680); and the Protestant church of St Elizabeth, with a steeple 298 feet in height, and a splendid organ. Linen fairs are held, and Breslau is a great wool-mart. It has manufactures of linens, woollens, cotton, silks, lace, jewellery, machines, earthenware, soap, alum, starch, &c., with many distilleries. Breslau is a city of Slavonic origin, and was for many centuries occupied alternately by the Poles and the Bohemians. It afterwards passed to Austria, from which it was taken by Frederick II. of Prussia in 1741. Six years afterwards it was captured by the Austrians after a bloody battle, but retaken by Frederick in about a month. It was often besieged from that time until 1814, when its fortifications were completely demolished; since 1890, however, it has again been made a first-class fortress. Pop. (1870) 207,997; (1900) 422,800; (1910) 511,891.

Bressay, one of the Shetland Isles, separated from Lerwick by Bressay Sound. It is 6 miles long, 1 to 3 broad, and 10¾ sq. m. in area. The coast is rocky, there are several caverns, and the highest point is 724 feet above sea-level. Pop. 600, chiefly fishermen. Bressay Sound is one of the finest natural harbours in the world. In its west centre is the harbour of Lerwick with lighthouse. East of Bressay, with a narrow and dangerous sound between, is a rocky isle, Noss, 6 miles in circuit, rising abruptly from the sea to a height of nearly 600 feet, with a flattish top. A detached rock or holm, on the south-east side, in former years communicated with Noss by means of a cradle or wooden chair run on strong ropes stretched across a yawning gulf.

Brest, a strongly fortified city in the dep. of Finistère, one of the chief naval stations of France, is situated 389 miles by rail W. of Paris, on the north side of the Bay or Road of Brest. One of the finest harbours in Europe, the roadstead is formed by the promontory of Finistère on the north and Kelerun on the south, and is broken up into various bays formed by the mouths of streams as they enter the bay. The only entrance to the bay is by a narrow channel called Le Goulet, which is scarcely a mile wide, and is strongly defended by batteries; the difficulty and danger of access to hostile ships being increased by rocks in the middle of the channel. The roadstead from this entrance to the mouth of the Elon is about 6 miles in length. Under Napoleon III. £600,000 was expended on harbour and fortification works, and a further sum of £1,500,000 between 1883 and 1894. The small river Penfeld flows through the town; on its left bank is the town proper, on its right the suburb of Recouvrance, connected by a splendid iron swing-bridge (1861), 65 feet high, and 347 long. The manufactures include leather, wax-cloth, paper, and rope; the exports are chiefly beer, grain, brandy, and fish. Brest has extensive shipbuilding yards, rope-walks, storehouses, quays, arsenals, and dry-docks; its industry is chiefly confined to the equipment of the navy in its various branches. The splendid position of Brest made it an object of contention to French, English, and Spaniards. In 1631 Cardinal Richelieu resolved to make it a naval station, and commenced the fortifications, which were completed by Vauban, but have since been greatly extended. In 1694 the English under Lord Berkeley were repulsed here with great loss; in 1794 the French fleet was defeated off Brest by the English fleet under Howe. Pop. (1872) 66,272; (1891) 75,854; (1911) 90,540.

Brest Litovsk (Polish Brzesc), a strongly fortified town of Russian Poland, on the Bug, 132 miles ESE. of Warsaw, and 682 WSW. of Moscow. It has vast magazines and military stores, and an extensive trade in its cloth manufactures, Russian leather, soap, and wood. Pop. 54,000.

Bretagne. See BRITTANY.

Bretigny (Breteenyee'), a village in the French dep. of Eure-et-Loir, 20 miles S. of Paris by rail. Here, in 1360, Edward III. concluded a peace with France.

Bretten, a town of Baden, the birthplace of Melanchthon, 16 miles ENE. of Karlsruhe by rail. Pop. 6000.

Brezowa (Brez'ova), a market-town of Hungary, 20 miles NW. of Leopoldstadt. Pop. 6000.

Briançon (Breeon^{g}son$^{g\prime}$; anc. Brigantium), a town in the French dep. of Hautes-Alpes, 162 miles NNE. of Marseilles by rail, on the Durance. It is the highest town in France—4330 feet above sea-level. As the principal arsenal and depot of the French Alps, it is so strongly fortified as to be deemed impregnable. Pop. 5000.

Briansk (Bree-ansk), a town of Russia, on the Desna, 77 miles W. of Orel by rail. Pop. 30,000.

Briare (Breeâhr'), a town in the dep. of Loiret, on the Loire, 102 miles SSE. of Paris by rail. The Canal de Briare (35 miles long), uniting the Loire and Seine, was the first constructed in France (1642). Pop. 4500.

Bridgend, a market-town of Glamorganshire, 17 miles W. of Cardiff, with ironworks and collieries. Pop. 8000.

Bridgenorth. See BRIDGNORTH.

Bridge of Allan, a beautiful village on Allan Water, 3 miles N. of Stirling by tram. Sheltered by the Ochils, it owes its prosperity partly to the mineral saline wells of Airthrey, and partly to its delightful situation and mild climate. Pop. 3000.

Bridge of Earn, a village of Perthshire, on the Earn, 4 miles SSE. of Perth.

Bridge of Weir, a Renfrewshire village, on the Gryfe, 7 miles W. by N. of Paisley. Pop. 2600.

Bridgeport, a city and port of entry of Connecticut, U.S., at the entrance of the Pequannock into an inlet of Long Island Sound. It is 53 miles SW. of Hartford, and 57 NE. of New York. It has a safe harbour for small vessels, a considerable coasting trade, several fine public parks, and a system of street railways. Golden Hill, commanding fine views of the sound and shore, is covered with good residences, many of the inhabitants belonging to New York. The manufactures are extensive, particularly of carriages, harness, machinery, metallic cartridges, and sewing-machines. Pop. (1870) 18,869; (1880) 27,643; (1890) 48,866; (1910) 102,054.

Bridgeton, a city and port of entry in New Jersey, U.S., on Cohansey Creek, 38 miles S. of Philadelphia. It has the West Jersey Academy, South Jersey Institute (1870), a public library, and manufactures of woollen goods, iron, leather, carriages, machinery, and canned fruits. Pop. 14,000.

Bridgetown, the capital of Barbadoes (q.v.), is situated on the west coast of the island along the north side of Carlisle Bay, which forms its roadstead. The inner harbour is protected by a breakwater known as the Mole Head. Founded in 1628, the town took the name Indian Bridge, and later its present appellation, from a rude aboriginal structure which spanned a neighbouring creek. It suffered much from fire in 1666, 1766, and 1845; in 1831 from a hurricane. A railway of 23 miles in length to the parish of St Andrew was completed in 1882. Population, about 17,000.

Bridgewater Canal, a canal in Lancashire and Cheshire, 42 miles long, uniting Worsley with Runcorn and Manchester. It was formed in 1762–72 by the Duke of Bridgewater and Brindley, and bought (1888) by the Manchester Ship Canal Company. It is carried over the Manchester Ship Canal at Barton-upon-Irwell (q.v.) by a great swing-bridge.

Bridgnorth, a municipal borough of Shropshire, 19 miles SE. of Shrewsbury. The Severn divides it into the upper or 'High Town,' and lower or 'Low Town,' the two connected by an inclined railway (1892) with a vertical rise of 111 feet. The High Town is built on a red sandstone rock rising 180 feet above the right bank of the river. This rock was formerly crowned by a royal fortress, a huge leaning fragment being all now left of the keep. Bridgnorth has a grammar-school existing in Henry VIII.'s reign, carpet, worsted, and tanning industries, and agricultural trade. Until 1868 it returned two members, and until 1885 one. The Danes wintered here in 896, and the site of a Saxon castle, built by the princess Ethelfleda, is still distinctly marked. Robert de Belesme (a kinsman of the Conqueror) built the Norman castle, and unsuccessfully defended it against Henry I. It was also besieged by Henry II. and Edward II. The castle was demolished by the Parliamentarians after a three-weeks' siege, during which the 'High Town' was destroyed by fire, one of the few houses surviving being the fine old Tudor mansion, still standing, in which, Bishop Percy was afterwards born (1728). Baxter began his ministry here. The population is about 5800.

Bridgwater, a municipal borough and river-port of Somersetshire, on the Parret, 6 miles in a direct line, and 12 by the river, from the Bristol Channel, and 29 miles SW. of Bristol. It stands on the border of a plain between the Mendip and Quantock Hills, in a well-wooded country. The Parret, which admits vessels of 700 tons up to the town, rises 36 feet at spring-tides, and is subject to a bore, 6 or 8 feet high; a canal gives water communication with Taunton. Bath or scouring bricks, of which Bridgwater has a monopoly, are made here of a mixture of sand and clay found in the river, and there are carriage-works and potteries. The Conqueror granted the manor to one Walter de Douay, and its name thereupon became Burgh-Walter, of which Bridgwater is a mere corruption. A castle was built here in the reign of John, and an Augustinian abbey about 1230. Admiral Blake was a native of Bridgwater, which in the great rebellion was forced by Fairfax to surrender, the castle being dismantled. The battle of Sedgemoor (q.v.) was fought in 1685 near Bridgwater, whose corporation had proclaimed Monmouth as king. Bridgwater formerly returned two members, but was disfranchised in 1870. Population, 16,800. See the history of the town by S. J. Jarman (1889), and that by A. H. Powell (1908).

Bridlington, or Burlington, a town in the East Riding of Yorkshire, 6 miles SW. of Flamborough Head, and 23 SSE. of Scarborough. An old-fashioned place, with narrow irregular streets, it is supposed to have been the site of a Roman station. An Augustinian priory of immense wealth, founded in Henry I.'s reign, is represented by the nave of its splendid church, mixed Early English and Perpendicular in style. On Bridlington Bay, 1 mile SE., is Bridlington Quay, the port of the town, which has risen into repute as a watering-place, with fine sands, a parade, ornamental gardens, a pavilion, a chalybeate mineral spring, and baths. The bay has good anchorage, and the harbour is enclosed by stone piers. In 1643 Henrietta Maria landed here from Holland with arms and ammunition bought with the crown-jewels, when Bridlington was cannonaded for giving her refuge. In 1899 it became a municipality. Pop. 14,000.

Bridport, a municipal borough of Dorsetshire, at the confluence of the Asker and the Brit, 2 miles from the English Channel, and 16½ W. of Dorchester by rail. It stands on an eminence surrounded by hills, and has a town-hall (1785), and a good cruciform parish church. Till 1867 Bridport returned two members to parliament; and till 1885, one. The chief manufactures are ropes and cordage (a 'Bridport dagger' was proverbial for a halter in Leland's day), besides twine, shoe-thread, fishing-nets, and sailcloth. Vessels of 250 tons can enter the harbour, which is 1½ mile below the town. The population is about 6000.

Brieg (Breeg), a town of Prussian Silesia, on the Oder, 27 miles SE. of Breslau by rail. The 13th-century church of St Nicholas has a splendid organ, and towers added in 1884–85. Brieg manufactures machinery, ironwares, sugar, leather, tobacco, &c. Pop. 29,000.

Briel (Breel), or Brielle, sometimes The Brill, a fortified seaport town of South Holland, situated on the north side of the island of Voorne, near the mouth of the Maas. Pop. 4000, chiefly pilots and fishermen. Briel may be considered as the nucleus of the Dutch republic, having been taken from the Spaniards in 1572. De Witt and Tromp were natives.

Brienne-le-Château (Bree-enn'-le-Shâhto'), a town (pop. 2000) in the dep. of Aube, on the Aube, 35 miles ENE. of Troyes. At the military school here (suppressed in 1790) the great Napoleon spent five years. Here, too, he was defeated by the allies in January 1814.

Brienz (Bree-entz'), a Swiss town at the foot of the Bernese Alps, on the NE. shore of the lake of Brienz, 30 miles ESE. of Bern. Pop. 3000.—The lake, 8¾ miles long and 1½ broad, is an expansion of the river Aar, and is believed to have been at one time united with Lake Thun. It lies 1857 feet above the sea, is 859 feet deep at one point, and is surrounded by lofty mountains. The Giessbach Cascades, a series of fine falls, are accessible by a cable tramway.

Brierfield, an urban district, Lancashire, 2¼ miles NE. of Burnley. Pop. 8300.

Brierley Hill, a town of Staffordshire, 2½ miles NE. of Stourbridge. It has numerous collieries, large ironworks, glassworks, brickworks, and potteries. Pop. 12,000.

Brigg, a market-town of Lincolnshire, 24 miles N. of Lincoln. Pop. 3400.

Brighouse, a manufacturing town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 4 miles ESE. of Halifax, a municipal borough since 1893. Pop. 21,000.

Brightlingsea, an Essex seaport, on the Colne's estuary, 8 miles SE. of Colchester. It has oyster-fisheries. Pop. 4400.

Brighton, a parliamentary, municipal, and county borough and fashionable watering-place in Sussex, 50½ miles S. of London by rail (1¼ hour). Its former name, Brighthelmstone (1252–1810), was superseded about 1800 by Brighton, which occurs, however, as early as 1660. The town is built on a slope ascending eastward to a range of high chalk-cliffs; to the west, these hills recede from the coast; and within easy reach in the South Downs is the Devil's Dyke, 5 miles distant. Ancient Brighthelmstone was a mere fishing-village on a level under the cliff. It suffered much at the hands of French, Flemings, and Spaniards, and still more from the sea, whose inroads in 1699, 1703, and 1706 undermined the cliffs and destroyed many houses. Further inroads are prevented by a sea-wall of great strength (60 feet high and 23 feet thick at the base), extending along the east cliffs, and built between 1827 and 1838 at a cost of £100,000. The writings of Dr Richard Russell, a celebrated physician, first drew public attention about 1753 to Brighton as an eligible watering-place, and the discovery of a chalybeate spring in the vicinity increased its popularity. The visit of the Prince of Wales in 1782, and his subsequent yearly residence there, finally opened the eyes of the fashionable world to Brighton's immense attractions, and it thenceforth became the crowded resort of a health-seeking population, in which the opening of the Brighton Railway in 1841 greatly assisted. It was made a parliamentary borough (returning two members) in 1832, a municipal one in 1854; its progress has been very rapid, and the town is still steadily increasing. As becomes a favoured retreat of wealth and aristocracy, Brighton is for the most part extremely well built, consisting of new and elegant streets, squares, and terraces. The public hotels are magnificent; besides these there are the boarding-houses and lodging-houses. A range of splendid houses fronts the sea for upwards of 4 miles, with gardens at the ends, the promenade—asphalted from end to end, and exceptionally well lighted—being almost on a dead level, within a few feet of the sea, for the greater part of its length, but rising at the east end of the town to a height of 60 feet, on the top of the sea-wall already referred to. Beneath this is the Madeira Road, a fine drive and promenade a mile in length, sheltered effectually from the north wind. The population is greatly increased during the fashionable seasons (especially in late summer and autumn) by the influx of visitors, the average number being 50,000, chiefly from London, for which reason it is sometimes called London-super-Mare. Of over twenty churches, St Nicholas, dating from the time of Henry VII., is the only ancient one; Holy Trinity Church has been rendered famous from the ministry of F. W. Robertson. The public buildings include the town-hall, the town-hall in the adjoining township of Hove (part of the parliamentary borough, but a separate municipal borough—q.v.), the unrivalled aquarium (1872), museum of British birds, school of science and art, Brighton college, theatre, and the Sussex county hospital. At Queen's Park, in the east of the town, is the German Spa establishment, and at St Anne's well and public gardens in Hove is a chalybeate spring. In the north of the town is the Preston public park of 62 acres (1884). There is a race-course at Kemp Town. In 1911 it was decided to found a university college.

Near the centre of the town is the Royal Pavilion or Marine Palace, a fantastic oriental or Chinese structure, with domes, minarets, and pinnacles, and Moorish stables, begun for the Prince of Wales in 1784, and finished in 1827. It was purchased in 1850 for £53,000 by the corporation, and with its fine pleasure-grounds it is devoted to the recreation of the inhabitants. The concert-hall known as the 'Dome,' formerly the royal stables, can accommodate 3000 people. Adjoining are the public library and museum and picture-gallery. The famous chain pier (1823), 1136 feet in length, was destroyed in a storm in 1896; the much wider 'West Pier' (1866) is 1115 feet long; and the New Pier and Marine Palace (1900) is 1700 feet long. Pop. (1801) 7339; (1821) 24,429; (1841) 46,661; (1861) 77,693; (1881) 107,546; (1901) 123,478; (1911) 131,237; of parliamentary borough, two members (1911), 162,793. See works by Erredge (1862), J. Bishop (1875–80), Sawyer (1878), Sala (1895), Melville (1909), and on the 'Brighton Road' by C. G. Harper (1892).

Brignoles (Breen-yoll'), a town in the French dep. of Var, 42 m. ESE. of Aix by rail. Pop. 3000.

Brihuega (Bree-way'ga), a town of New Castile, Spain, on the Tajuña, 20 miles ENE. of Guadalajara. Pop. 5000. Here, in 1710, the English general Stanhope was defeated by the Duc de Vendôme, and compelled to surrender.

Brindában, or BINDRABAN, a town of the United Provinces, on the Jumna, 6 miles N. of Muttra. It is one of the holiest cities of the Hindus; and through the munificence of wealthy devotees there are a large number of costly temples and shrines. Here, as at Benares, the immediate margin of the river is occupied by flights of steps, or ghauts. Pop. 22,717.

Brin'disi (anc. Brundisium or Brundusium), a seaport town of Southern Italy, on a small promontory in a bay of the Adriatic, 346 miles SE. of Ancona by rail. It was the principal naval station of the Romans in the Adriatic, with a pop. of 100,000. Horace has made a journey to Brundisium the subject of one of his satires (Sat. i. 5), and Virgil died here (19 B.C.) on his return from Greece. With the decline of the crusades it sank into insignificance, and subsequently it suffered greatly from wars and earthquakes. The principal buildings are the archiepiscopal cathedral (1150), lately restored; and the castle, commenced by the Emperor Frederick II., and finished by Charles V., now a convict prison. After the establishment of the Overland Route to India, Brindisi greatly increased, and as the terminus of the Mont Cenis and other railway routes it became a great point of departure for passengers for the East; but since 1898, though still the mail route, it has yielded to Marseilles in passenger traffic. It is about 44 hours from London by rail. The extensive and well-sheltered harbour has undergone great improvement; and mail steamers can now lie alongside the quays. Pop. 30,000.

Brioude (Bree-ood'), a town in the dep. of Haute-Loire, 44 miles SSE. of Clermont. Pop. 4500.

Brisbane, the capital of Queensland, a seaport and chief seat of trade in the state, is situated about 500 miles N. of Sydney, and 25 miles from the mouth of the Brisbane River, which falls into Moreton Bay. Pop. (1876) 26,911; (1881) 31,109; (1891) 48,738; (1911, within a ten-mile radius) 139,480. North and South Brisbane are connected by an iron bridge, 1080 feet long, destroyed in 1893 and rebuilt in 1897. Notable buildings are the Parliament Houses, Government House, museum, supreme court, post-office, custom-house, Anglican and Catholic cathedrals. There are several parks and botanic gardens. A university was founded in 1910. The export trade, which is large, includes gold, wool, cotton, sugar, tallow, and hides; and the imports, most of the articles in use among a thriving community. Regular steam communication is kept up with the other Australian ports, as well as with London (11,295 miles). The channel of the river has been deepened, and admits of large vessels coming up to Brisbane. Brisbane is the terminus of several local railways, and since 1888 it has had through railway connection with Sydney, Melbourne, and Adelaide—the last link being the bridge over the Hawkesbury River. Brisbane was settled as a penal station in 1825 by Sir T. Brisbane, governor of New South Wales. In 1839 the convict settlement was broken up. The era of progress began in 1842, when the colony was opened to free settlers. At first an appanage of New South Wales, the Moreton Bay district was erected into an independent colony in 1859, when the city was incorporated.—The Brisbane River rises in the Burnett Range, and receives the Bremer and other rivers before its entrance into Moreton Bay, below the town of Brisbane. Its floods in February 1893 did tremendous damage to the city, South Brisbane being practically laid in ruins.

Bristol, a mercantile city, 118 miles W. of London, and 6 from the mouth of the Avon, at its junction with the Frome, is locally partly in Gloucestershire and partly in Somerset, but since 1373 has been itself a county. The castle, rebuilt with a vast keep by Robert, Earl of Gloucester (died 1147), fell into decay, and was demolished in 1654. The cathedral was formerly a church of Augustinian canons (1148); the nave and aisles, pulled down for rebuilding in 15th century, were rebuilt in 1877; the choir is good 14th-century work; fine Norman chapter-house and gateway remain. Bristol, originally in the diocese of Worcester, was created a see and a city in 1540, with the abbey-church of St Augustine's as cathedral, and was united to the see of Gloucester in 1836; its re-erection as a separate see took place in 1897. Of its other churches the most noteworthy is St Mary Redcliff, justly declared by Queen Elizabeth to be the 'fairest and most famous parish church in England.' Mainly rebuilt by William Canynges, merchant (c. 1470), it is vaulted throughout, and is a magnificent specimen of Perpendicular. The truncated spire was completed, 280 feet from ground, and 170 feet from top of tower, in 1872. In the muniment-room is the chest in which Chatterton (1752–70) pretended to have found the Rowley poems. Among the ancient houses of the town are Canynges' house, Redcliff Street, Spicer's (or Back) Hall, and St Peter's Hospital. The principal educational institutions are the university (1909), Clifton College (1862), and the grammar-school (1531); and the charitable foundations, Queen Elizabeth's Hospital (1586), the Red Maids' School (1621), and Colston's School (1704), now removed to Stapleton, Gloucestershire. The City Library (free) dates from 1613. Bristol, which derived its early wealth from exporting slaves to Ireland, received its first charter from Henry II., who also (1171) gave Dublin to the men of Bristol. One of the 'staple' towns (1353), Bristol took a prominent part in discovery and colonisation. In 1497 John Cabot sailed from the port, and was the first to discover North America; his son Sebastian declared that he was born in Bristol, and sailed thence on his voyage of 1498. The city was taken by Prince Rupert in 1643, and by Fairfax in 1645. Colston the philanthropist (1636–1721) founded many charities, and his 'day' is annually kept in Bristol. In the 18th century privateering was largely carried on. Southey was a native of Bristol, and he and Coleridge were much there in their younger days. Burke sat for the city, one of his chief supporters being Champion (1743–91), maker of the famous Bristol china. The first transatlantic steamship, the Great Western, was built in the port in 1838. Strenuous efforts have been made to improve the dock accommodation; in 1809 the Avon for about 3 miles was turned into a floating harbour; in 1883 the corporation purchased large docks at Avonmouth and Portishead; and in 1908 a new dock, costing about £3,000,000, was opened at Avonmouth. The principal imports are grain, provisions, oils, hides, tallow, sugar, and petroleum; the exports coal, salt, tin-plates, cotton piece-goods, chemical products, manufactured oils, and sundries. In 1885 the number of its members of parliament was raised from two to four. Pop. within mun. boundaries (1801) 61,153; (1841) 125,148; (1871) 182,552; (1881) 206,503; (1911) 357,048; of parl. borough (1911) 329,526. The Hotwell, noticed by the Bristol chronicler, William Worcester (died c. 1491), enjoyed some reputation as a fashionable resort during the later half of the 18th century; it is now reviving after decay. Clifton, the parish to which it belongs, has thriven. It is mentioned in Domesday, but has little history till it appears as a 'beautiful village' in 1760; it is now a large and handsome suburb of Bristol, of which it forms part for municipal and parliamentary purposes. It stands above St Vincent's Rocks, which rise majestically from the Avon. The river is spanned 245 feet above high-water by a suspension bridge (1864). Clifton has a zoological and botanical garden (1836), fine arts academy (1858), observatory, museum, libraries, &c. In the neighbourhood are the remains of some Roman camps. See works by Barrett (1789), Seyer (1823), Nicholl and Taylor (1881), Hunt (1887), and Latimer (1887–93).

Bristol, (1) a town of Bucks county, Pennsylvania, on the Delaware River, 20 miles NNE. of Philadelphia. It has manufactures of iron, machinery, flour, felt, worsted, and furniture. Pop. 7000.—(2) A port of entry, and capital of Bristol county, Rhode Island, on Narragansett Bay, 15 miles SSE. of Providence by rail, with shipbuilding and sugar-refining, and manufactures of cotton and rubber goods. Pop. 8600.

Bristol Bay, an arm of Behring Sea, lying immediately to the north of the peninsula of Aliaska.

Bristol Channel, an inlet of the Atlantic Ocean, between South Wales on the north, and Devon and Somerset shires on the south; or it may be regarded as an extension of the estuary of the river Severn. It is about 80 miles long, and 5 to 43 miles broad; the depth ranging from 5 to 40 fathoms. It is the largest inlet or estuary in Britain, having a very irregular coast-line of 220 miles. The chief rivers which flow into it are the Towy, Taff, Usk, Wye, Severn, Avon, Axe, Parret, Taw, and Torridge. The tides in it rise to an extraordinary height—35 to 47 feet. The chief bays and harbours are Caermarthen and Swansea Bays, Cardiff Roads, on the north, and Bideford or Barnstaple, Ilfracombe, Minehead, Porlock, and Bridgwater, on the south.

Briton Ferry, the port of Neath in South Wales; pop. 8500.

Brittany (Fr. Bretagne; anc. Armorica), the great north-western peninsula of France, extending in triangular form into the sea, its base resting on Normandy, Maine, Anjou, and Poitou, its sides washed by the Channel and the Atlantic Ocean. In earlier times it formed, with the name of duchy, one of the provinces of France; now it forms the five deps. of Finistère, Côtes-du-Nord, Morbihan, Ille-et-Vilaine, and Loire-Inférieure, with a total area of 13,130 sq. m., and a population of 3,271,000, more than one-third of whom speak Breton, belonging to the Cymric or southern group of the Celtic languages.

Brive-la-Gaillarde (Breev'-la-Ga-yard'), a town in the French dep. of Corrèze, 55 miles SSE. of Limoges by rail; pop. 20,000.

Brixen, a cathedral city of Tyrol, on the Brenner Railway, 57 miles SSE. of Munich; pop. 7000.

Brixham, a seaport and watering-place of Devonshire, on Tor Bay, 25 miles S. of Exeter. It is picturesque, and fishy as even few fishing-towns. A new breakwater has cost £28,000; and the harbour is to be improved. There are iron-mines, limestone quarries, mineral-paint works, and a bone cave on Windmill Hill, discovered in 1858. William of Orange landed here, November 4, 1688. Population, about 8000.

Brixton is a district of London (SW.), in Lambeth borough.

Broach, BAROACH, or BHARUCH, a town of Guzerat, Bombay Presidency, on the north bank of the Nerbudda, 228 miles N. of Bombay by rail. Anciently one of the chief ports of Western India, and in the 16th century 'a town of weavers making the finest cloth in the world,' Broach was taken by the British in 1772, ceded to Sindhia in 1783, and again retaken by the British in 1803. It carries on a small coasting trade, the principal exports being raw cotton, grain, and seeds. Pop. 50,000 (many Parsees and Jains).

Broadford, a coast-village of Skye, 8 miles WSW. of Kyle Akin ferry.

Broadhaven, a watering-place of Pembrokeshire, 6 miles WSW. of Haverfordwest.

Broadlands. See ROMSEY.

Broadmoor, in SE. Berkshire, 2 miles from Wellington College Station, is the state asylum for 700 criminal lunatics.

Broad Peak, a summit of the Karakorams (27,133 feet).

Broads, THE NORFOLK, a series of inland lakes usually said to be formed by the widening or 'broadening' out of the rivers. More probably their origin is due to a change in the general level of the land surface of the county; for even within historic times the river Yare was an estuary of the sea, in which herrings were caught at the time of Domesday. The broads par excellence are those up the Bure or North River (which empties itself into the sea at Yarmouth), and its tributaries the Ant and the Thurne. On the Bure are the well-known broads of Wroxham, Salhouse, Hoveton, Horning, and Ranworth; on the Ant those of Barton and Sutton; on the Thurne those of Hickling, Martham, and Horsey. The three fine broads of Ormesby, Rollesby, and Filby, though connected and forming a chain, have no practicable outlet to the river; the Yare or Norwich River has no broads on which sailing is possible, but those at Surlingham, Strumpshaw, and Rockland are well worthy a visit, and very accessible by rail; near Lowestoft, on the Waveney, is Oulton Broad. The broads have grown greatly in favour with holiday-makers, so that now on a Saturday, during August and September, perhaps a hundred yachts may be seen at once. See works by Davies (1884), Rye (1887), Suffling (1891), Emerson (1893), and Dutt (1903).

Broadstairs, a Kentish watering-place 1¾ mile NE. of Ramsgate, so named from the breadth of the sea-gate or stair, which was formerly defended by a gate or archway. Near it is a noble orphanage, founded by Mrs Tait. Dickens was a frequent visitor. Pop. 9000.

Broadway, an old-fashioned Worcestershire village, a great artists' haunt, 5½ miles SE. of Evesham. Pop. of parish, 1800.

Brocken (Mons Bructerus of the Romans; popularly Blocksberg), the highest summit (3740 feet) of the Harz Mountains, in Prussian Saxony, 20 miles WSW. of Halberstadt. It holds an important place in folklore as the witches' meeting-place on Walpurgis night, and for the optical illusion known as the 'Spectre of the Brocken.'

Brockenhurst, a New Forest village, Hampshire, 4½ miles N. by W. of Lymington.

Brocket Hall, Herts, on the Lea, 2½ miles N. of Hatfield, has been the seat of Lord Melbourne, Lord Palmerston, and Earl Cowper.

Brockton, formerly called North Bridgewater, a town of Massachusetts, U.S., 20 miles S. of Boston. It manufactures boots. Pop. (1880) 13,608; (1890) 27,294; (1910) 56,878.

Brockville, a town of Ontario, on the left bank of the St Lawrence, 125 miles SW. of Montreal. It is on the Grand Trunk and the Brockville and Ottawa railways, and a port of call for steamers. It took its name from Sir

Isaac Brock (1769–1812), who fell in the battle of Queenstown. Pop. 9400.

Brodick, a coast-village of Arran, 14 miles WSW. of Ardrossan.

Brody, a town of Galicia, 89 miles ENE. of Lemberg by rail. A free town from 1779 to 1879, it has leather and flax manufactures, breweries, refineries, &c. The trade is in the hands of the Jews, who form three-fourths of the inhabitants of this 'German Jerusalem.' Pop. 20,000.

Broken Hill, a town and district in the extreme west of New South Wales, famous for its silver-mines, the output of which from 1882 to 1910 amounted to over £60,000,000; pop. (town), 31,400.

Bromberg, a town of Posen, 6 miles from the Vistula, and 99 SSW. of Danzig. It has iron-foundries, machine-shops, cloth and paper mills, distilleries, breweries, and corn-mills. The Bromberg Canal, 17 miles long, by uniting the Netz and Brahe, connects the Oder and Elbe with the Vistula. Pop. (1843) 8878; (1910) 57,585.

Bromley, a municipal borough of Kent, on the Ravensbourne, 10 miles SE. of London, was long the residence of the bishops of Rochester; pop. 34,000.

Brompton, a district in the borough of Kensington, once specially a quarter for artists, contains a fine consumption hospital and the Oratory.

Brom'sebro, a village and castle of Sweden, 27 miles S. of Kalmar.

Bromsgrove, a Worcestershire urban district, in a richly wooded valley, near the small river Salwarp, 12 miles NNE. of Worcester. It has a grammar-school (1553; refounded 1693), and a fine old church with a spire 189 feet high. The linen manufacture has been superseded by nail and button making. Pop. 9000.

Bromwich. See WEST BROMWICH.

Bromyard, a market-town of Herefordshire, on the Frome, 14 miles NE. of Hereford; pop. of urban district, 1700.

Broni, a town of northern Italy, with mineral springs, 11 miles SE. of Pavia; pop. 6000.

Bron'te, a town of Sicily, at the western base of Mount Etna, 33 miles NW. of Catania. Nelson was Neapolitan Duke of Bronte. Pop. 20,000.

Bronx, a borough of New York City.

Brook Farm, an abortive community established in 1840 on Fourier's principles, 8 miles SW. of Boston, U.S.

Brooklands. See WEYBRIDGE.

Brookline, a suburban town 4 miles SW. of Boston, U.S., with numerous handsome villas and parks; pop. 28,000.

Brooklyn, since 1898 a borough in the enlarged New York City, and capital of King's county, New York, is on the west end of Long Island, opposite (old) New York, from which it is separated by a strait called East River, nearly a mile wide, running from Long Island Sound to New York Bay, and with which it is connected by steam-ferries, and a magnificent suspension bridge (finished 1883), 5989 feet in length by 85 in breadth, and with a river span of 1595½ feet, intended for foot-passage, carriages, and railways. Two lines of elevated railways and numerous lines of horse-cars traverse the streets of Brooklyn, making easy communication between the suburban sections and the ferries. Though it is not a port of entry, the amount of foreign and domestic freight that comes to its warehouses is enormous. Some of these docks are among the most extensive in the United States, covering from 40 to 60 acres each, and are lined with immense storehouses for grain and other freight. At the south-east extremity of the city, upon a high ridge overlooking New York Bay and its environs, is the beautiful Greenwood Cemetery, covering 400 acres; and near at hand are the Ridgewood reservoir and Prospect Park, a public pleasure-ground of 540 acres, which has cost, including two noble boulevards connected with it, extending respectively 3 and 2½ miles to Coney Island and East New York, nearly $12,000,000. The borough possesses a water front of 10 miles, and within its area of 25 sq. m. are carried on the refining of sugar and petroleum, the manufacture of glass, chandlery, clothing, carpets, chemicals, paints, oilcloth, metallic wares, tobacco, steam-boilers, lace, hats, buttons, paper, felt goods, &c., and shipbuilding. The public buildings include the court-house, erected at a cost of $543,000; the hall of records, costing $328,000; the municipal building, costing $200,000; an academy of music, seated for 2400 persons, &c. There is a fine government post-office, and a U. S. navy yard, which occupies 40 acres, with extensive ship-houses, workshops, and military stores, and a dry-dock which cost about $1,000,000. First settled in 1636, the town was organised by the Dutch governor of New Amsterdam in 1646, and named Breukelen from a place of the same name in the Netherlands, 8 miles NW. of Utrecht. It was incorporated as a city in 1834, to which Williamsburg and Bushwick were added in 1855, and in 1886 the town of New Lots (East New York). In 1898 it became part of the larger New York. Pop. (1850) 96,838; (1910) 1,634,351.

Brookwood. See WOKING.

Broom, LOCH. See SUMMER ISLES.

Broomhall, the Earl of Elgin's seat, Fife, 2½ miles S. by W. of Dunfermline.

Brora, a coast-village of Sutherland, at the mouth of the Brora River, 4½ miles NE. of Golspie. Pop. 1000.

Broseley, a Shropshire town, on the Severn, 15 miles SE. of Shrewsbury, now a ward division of the municipal borough of Wenlock.

Brou. See BOURG-EN-BRESSE.

Brough (Bruff), a Westmorland town, 5 miles NNE. of Kirkby Stephen. Pop. 600.

Brougham (Broom), a Westmorland parish, 2 miles SE. of Penrith, with the fine ruin of Brougham Castle, the seat of the Cliffords, and with Brougham Hall, the seat of Lord Brougham and Vaux.

Broughton-in-Furness, a market-town of Lancashire, at the head of the Duddon estuary, 9 miles NW. of Ulverston. Pop. 1100.

Broughty-Ferry, a town of Forfarshire, on the Firth of Tay, absorbed in 1913 by Dundee. Many Dundee merchants occupy fine villas at Broughty-Ferry, which has all the amenities of a favourite watering-place. Its castle (1498) was held by the English 1547–50, and in 1860–61 was repaired as a Tay defence. Pop. (1861) 3513; (1911) 11,058.

Broussa, BRUSA, or BOURSA, the ancient Prusa, where the kings of Bithynia usually resided, situated in Asiatic Turkey, at the foot of Mount Olympus, in Asia Minor, 13 miles S. of the Sea of Marmora. The old citadel stands on a rock in the centre of the town. Both Greeks and Armenians have an archbishop here. The silks of Broussa are much esteemed, but the production of the silk-factories, many of which are in the hands of Europeans, has fallen off. Wine is largely produced by the Greeks, and fruit is exported; carpets and tapestry are also made; and meerschaum clay is obtained from a hill in the vicinity. In ancient times Broussa was famous for its sulphurous thermal baths, which during the terrible earthquakes of 1855 ceased for a time to flow, but soon returned with a fuller current than before. The mosques (one of which, 'the Magnificent,' has a large dome adorned with beautiful coloured tiles) suffered severely from the same earthquakes. The sultan Othman besieged Broussa in 1317; and in 1327 his son Orkhan, the second emperor of Turkey, captured it, and made it the capital of his empire, and it continued so until the taking of Constantinople by Mohammed II. in 1453. The first six Ottoman sultans are buried here. Pop. 110,000.

Brown, Mount, in the Rocky Mountains, near the source of the Columbia River, and on the borders of British Columbia and Alberta, is not, as was thought, 16,000, but 9000 feet high.

Brownhills, a town of Staffordshire, 5 miles N. of Walsall; pop. (urban district), 17,000.

Brownsville, a port of entry, Texas, on the north bank of the Rio Grande, opposite Matamoros, 35 miles from the river's mouth in the Gulf of Mexico. In May 1846 the town was occupied by a few U.S. troops, who maintained their position in the face of a bombardment that lasted a week. Pop. 10,500.

Broxburn, a mining and manufacturing town of Linlithgowshire, on the Union Canal, 10 miles W. of Edinburgh. It is chiefly notable for its shale-oil works. Pop. 7700.

Bruar, a Perthshire stream, with fine falls, 3 miles W. of Blair Athol.

Bruchsal (Brook'sal), a town of Baden, on the Saalbach, 12 miles NE. of Karlsruhe. The prince-bishops of Spires resided here from the 16th century. Machinery, cigars, paper, and soap are manufactured. Pop. 15,400.

Bruck (Brook), (1) a walled town of Austria, on the Leitha, 26 miles SE. of Vienna by rail; pop. 5000.—(2) A town of Upper Styria, on the Mur, 108 miles SW. of Vienna by rail; pop. 6000.—(3) A market-town of Bavaria, 15 miles W. of Munich by rail; pop. 5000.

Brückenau (Brük'en-ow'), a town of Bavaria, on the Sinn, 17 miles NW. of Kissingen. Near it are warm springs.

Bruff, a Limerick village, 6 miles N. of Kilmallock; pop. 650.

Bruges (Brüzh; Flem. Brugge, pron. Brü'ha, 'the bridges'), a city of Belgium, 8 miles from the sea, with which it is connected by canals from Ghent, Sluys, and Ostend, all much inferior to the direct ship-canal from Heyst (Zeebrugge), 26 feet wide (opened in 1907). By rail it is 14 miles E. of Ostend, and 62 WNW. of Brussels. Among the most interesting buildings are Les Halles (1364), a museum and market, with the famous belfry, 353 feet high; the Gothic hôtel-de-ville (1377; restored 1895), with the Chapel of the Holy Blood; the church of Notre Dame, with a spire 442 feet high, a statue of the Virgin (said to be by Michael Angelo), and monuments of Charles the Bold and his daughter Mary, wife of the Emperor Maximilian; the cathedral of St Sauveur, with an ugly brick exterior, but a fine interior, containing the stalls of the knights of the Golden Fleece; and St John's Hospital, with Hans Memlinc's masterpieces adorning the reliquary of St Ursula's arm. Bruges has manufactures of lace, woollens, linen, cotton, leather, soap, starch, and tobacco; and distilleries, sugar and salt refineries, and shipbuilding yards. Population, 54,000, of whom very many are poverty-stricken. Dating from the 3d century, Bruges by 1200 was the central mart of the Hanseatic League, and by 1300 had become the metropolis of the world's commerce, its population then amounting to over 200,000. In 1488 the citizens rose in insurrection, and imprisoned the Archduke Maximilian, and with the harsh measures of repression which ensued commenced the commercial decline of Bruges. Many of the traders and manufacturers, driven forth from their own country by the religious persecutions of the following century, settled in England; in the 16th century, however, the tapestry of Bruges was still celebrated. Taken by the French in 1794, in 1815 the city became a part of the kingdom of the United Netherlands, and in 1830 of the Belgian monarchy. At Bruges lived Jan van Eyck (1428–41), Caxton (1446–76), and Memlinc (1477–94). See books by Weale, Gilliat Smith (1901), Rodenbach (1903).

Brugg (Broogg), a town in the Swiss canton of Aargau, on the Aar, 36 miles ESE. of Basel by rail. Near it is the site of Vindonissa, the chief Roman station in Helvetia; and it was also the cradle of the Hapsburgs, whose ruined castle (1020) crowns a wooded height 2 miles distant. Zimmermann was a native. Pop. 3000.

Brühl (nearly Breal), a town of Rhenish Prussia, 8 miles SSW. of Cologne by rail. It has a splendid 18th-century castle. Pop. 8000.

Brunei, a Mohammedan sultanate under British protection (since 1888) in the NW. of Borneo, whose sultan was formerly overlord of the whole island. Area, 4000 sq. m.; pop. perhaps 25,000 or under. The capital, Brunei, on a river of the same name, is a miserable, dirty town, built on piles, with 10,000 inhabitants.

Brünig, a Swiss pass (3396 feet), forming the shortest and easiest route between the 'Forest Cantons' and the Bernese Oberland. A road was formed in 1857–62, and in 1888 a Brünig branch of the Berne-Lucerne Railway was opened.

Bruni Island (North and South) lies off the south part of the east coast of Tasmania, from which it is separated by D'Entrecasteaux Channel. It is 32 miles long, 1 to 11 miles wide, and 160 sq. m. in area. Coal is mined.

Brünn, a city of the Austrian empire, the capital of Moravia, at the confluence of the Schwarzawa and the Zwittawa, 93 miles N. of Vienna by rail. Behind the city, on an eminence (984 feet), rises the castle of Spielberg, where Silvio Pellico was confined 1822–30. Brünn has an old town-hall, a cathedral, St James's Church, with a tower 305 feet high, and important manufactures of woollens, machinery, linen, leather, chemicals, &c. Pop. (1881) 82,660; (1910) 125,737, 40 per cent. of whom were Czechs.

Brunnen (Broon'nen), the port of the Swiss canton of Schwyz, on the Lake of Lucerne, 17 miles by water, but 28½ by rail ESE. of Lucerne. Here in 1315 the Forest Cantons formed a league.

Brunsbüttel. See Baltic Sea.

Brunswark, a conspicuous hill (920 feet) of S. Dumfriesshire, with Roman camps.

Brunswick, Duchy of (Ger. Braunschweig), a state of northern Germany, consisting of three larger and five smaller distinct parts, with a total area of 1423 sq. m. Pop. (1875) 327,493; (1910) 494,387, mostly Lutherans, and (in the country) speakers of Platt-Deutsch. Of the three larger parts, the principal one, forming the circle of Wolfenbüttel, and including the capital, lies between Prussia and Hanover; the second, extending westward from Prussia to the Weser, divides Hanover into two parts; and the third, forming the Blankenburg district, lies to the south-east, between Hanover, Anhalt, and Prussia. Brunswick belongs mostly to the basin of the Weser, which serves as a boundary on the west. Its surface is mostly mountainous, particularly in the southern portions of the country, but it has nevertheless level tracts of considerable extent. The climate in the lowlands resembles the general climate of Northern Germany; but in the Harz district it is so much colder that harvest is generally a month later than in the plains. Brunswick in 1235, with Lüneburg, was made a duchy. In 1884 the succession passed to the Duke of Cumberland, son of the dethroned George V. of Hanover. As he refused to recognise the constitution of the empire, regents were elected (1885, 1907); but in 1913 the accession of the Duke's son Ernst August was allowed, on his marriage with the kaiser's daughter, his father having renounced his claim.

BRUNSWICK, the capital, stands on the Oker, 143 miles WSW. of Berlin. In the 13th century Brunswick became a member of the Hanseatic League, and soon attained considerable commercial prosperity, but its importance declined with the decay of the League. Most irregularly built, with narrow and crooked streets, it has a cathedral (1173-1469), the church of St Andrew with a steeple 341 feet high, and a fine Gothic Rathhaus. The manufactures include jute, woollen and linen, leather, sewing-machines, &c. A fine avenue of linden-trees leads to the ducal palace, which, destroyed by fire in 1830 and 1865, is now an imposing edifice of 1869. Pop. (1871) 57,833; (1910) 143,534.

Brunswick, (1) a port of entry, Georgia, on St Simon Sound, an inlet of the Atlantic, 186 miles SE. of Macon by rail. Population, about 10,200.—(2) A town of Maine, 29 miles NE. of Portland by rail, at the head of navigation on the Androscoggin River, whose falls or rapids supply water-power for cotton, paper, and other mills. It is the seat of Bowdoin College (1794), a Congregational institution of high standing, at which Nathaniel Hawthorne and Longfellow graduated. Pop. 6600.

Brunswick, NEW. See NEW BRUNSWICK.

Brussels (Fr. Bruxelles), the capital of Belgium, is situated in a fertile plain on the ditch-like Senne, 27 miles S. of Antwerp, and 193 NE. of Paris. It has a circumference of about 5 miles, and is built partly on the side of a hill; though some of the streets are so steep that they can be ascended only by means of stairs, Brussels may on the whole be pronounced one of the finest cities in Europe. The fashionable Upper Town, in which are the royal palace, public offices, chief hotels, &c., is much more healthy than the older Lower Town, which is greatly subject to fogs, owing to its intersection by canals and the Senne, although the stream now passes under an arched covering, which supports a boulevard. But the closely built old streets, with their numerous handsome buildings, formerly belonging to the Brabant nobility, but now occupied by merchants and traders, have a fine picturesque appearance, while some of the public edifices are unrivalled as specimens of Gothic architecture. French is spoken in the upper division; but in the lower Flemish is the current language prevalent, and by many the Walloon dialect is spoken. The walls which formerly surrounded Brussels have been removed, and their place is now occupied by pleasant boulevards extending all around the old town, and shaded by alleys of limes. The Allée Verte—a double avenue along the Scheldt Canal—forms a splendid promenade, and leads toward the country palace of Laeken, 3 miles north of the city. Besides the fine park of 32 acres, in the Upper Town, ornamented with fountains and statues, and surrounded by the palace and other state buildings, Brussels has several other squares or places, among which are: the Place Royale, with its colossal monument of Godfrey of Bouillon; the Grand' Place, in which is the hôtel-de-ville, a splendid Gothic structure of the 15th century, with a spire of open stonework 364 feet high; and the Place des Martyrs, where a memorial has been erected to those who fell here in the revolution of 1830. The statue group of the Counts Egmont and Horn is notable. The cathedral of St Gudule, dating from the 13th century, has many richly painted windows, and a pulpit considered to be the masterpiece of Verbruggen. The Palais des Beaux Arts contains the finest specimens of the Flemish school of painting and a sculpture gallery. The Royal Library adjoining has half a million volumes. The Palais de Justice, built in 1866-83 at a cost of more than £2,000,000, is one of the most magnificent buildings in Europe, dominating the lower town from the terraced slope of the upper town. The royal palace and the national palace (for the chambers) are important buildings. The university (1834) has over 800 students. There are schools of painting and sculpture, and a conservatorium. There is a museum of paintings by the artist Wiertz, many of them on painful and repulsive subjects. Brussels lace is particularly famous. Of the so-called Brussels carpets only a few are manufactured here, most of those of Belgian make being produced at Tournai. There are also manufactures of damask, linen, ribbons, embroidery, paper, jewellery, hats, soap, porcelain, carriages, &c. Pop. (1846) 123,874; (1866) 157,905; (1910, with its eight suburbs) 665,806.

Dating from at least the 8th century, Brussels under Charles V. was made the court-residence in the Netherlands, and became afterwards, under Philip II., the chief arena of the atrocities committed by Alva and the Inquisition. It suffered greatly in the war of Spain against Louis XIV.—in whose reign it was bombarded by Marshal Villeroi, and upwards of 4000 buildings destroyed—and in that of Austria against Louis XV.; but still more from the continual prevalence of party animosities caused by the policy of Austria. Under the mild rule of Maria Theresa, it flourished greatly, and in this time many of its best institutions and public buildings were founded. In 1792 Brussels fell into the hands of the French. It was incorporated with the kingdom of the Netherlands in 1815; in 1830 it became the capital of Belgium.

Brüx, a town of Bohemia, on the Biela, 78 miles NW. of Prague by rail. In its vicinity are coal-mines, and the famous mineral springs of Püllna and Seidlitz. Pop. 26,000.

Brynmawr, an ironworking town of Brecknock, 8 miles WSW. of Abergavenny; pop. 7600.—The American Bryn Mawr, with its college for women (1885), is 10 miles NW. of Philadelphia.

Brzezany, in Galicia, 52 miles SE. of Lemberg; pop. 13,000.

Buachaille Etive, two mountains (3345 and 3129 feet) of Ardchattan parish, Argyllshire.

Bubastis (the Pi-beseth of Ezek. xxx. 17; now Tel Bast), a ruined city of Lower Egypt, on the eastern main-arm of the Nile, near Zagazig. Under the 25th dynasty (725–686 B.C.) the city was a royal residence, but after the Persian conquest it gradually lost its importance. The ruins of its great temple were discovered by M. Naville in 1887.

Bucaramanga, a city in the NE. of Colombia, on the Lebrija River, 3200 feet above sea-level; pop. 20,000.

Buc′cari, or Bakar, a free port of Croatia, on an inlet of the Gulf of Quarnero, 5 miles by rail ESE. of Fiume; pop. 3000.

Buccleuch (Buk-clew′), a small Selkirkshire glen, 18 miles SW. of Selkirk, with the site of a stronghold of the Scotts, who hence took the title of earl (1619) and duke (1663).

Buchan (Buhh′an), the NE. district of Aberdeenshire, between the Ythan and the Deveron. It rises in Mormond Hill to 769 feet; portions of the coast are bold and precipitous, and 6 miles south of Peterhead are the famous Bullers of Buchan, a huge vertical well in the granite margin of the sea, 50 feet in diameter and 100 feet deep, into whose bottom the sea rushes by a natural archway. Buchan contains the towns of Peterhead, Fraserburgh, and Turriff. Buchan Ness is the easternmost promontory of Scotland, 3 miles S. of Peterhead. See history by Pratt (1859), and The Book of Buchan, ed. J. F. Tocher (1910).

Bucharest (Bucuresci), the capital of the former principality of Wallachia and of the present kingdom of Roumania, stands 265 feet above sea-level, in the fertile but treeless plain of the small sluggish Dambovitza. By rail it is 716 miles SE. of Vienna, 40 N. of Giurgevo on the Danube, and 179 NW. of Varna on the Black Sea. A strange meeting-point of East and West, the town as a whole is but meanly built, but the streets are now mostly paved, and lighted with gas. An elaborate system of fortification was undertaken in 1885. The royal palace was rebuilt in 1885; and the Catholic cathedral is a fine edifice of 1875–84. The number of cafés and gambling-tables is excessive; and altogether Bucharest has the unenviable reputation of being the most dissolute capital in Europe, with all the vices but few of the refinements of Paris. There is, however, a university (1864). The corso, or public promenade, is a miniature Hyde Park. Bucharest is the entrepôt for the trade between Austria and the Balkan Peninsula, the chief articles of commerce being textile fabrics, grain, hides, metal, coal, timber, and cattle. Bucharest has been several times besieged; and between 1793 and 1812 suffered twice from earthquakes, twice from inundations, once from fire, and twice from pestilence. Pop. (1866) 141,754; (1910) 293,435.

Buckau (Book′kow), a manufacturing town of Prussian Saxony, in 1887 incorporated with Magdeburg (q.v.).

Buckhaven, a fishing-village of Fife, on the Firth of Forth, 5½ miles E. of Thornton Junction. Pop. (with Methil and Innerleven), 15,149.

Buckie, a fishing-town of Banffshire, 13 miles ENE. of Elgin by rail. Its harbour (1874–80), constructed of concrete at a cost of £60,000, consists of an outer and inner basin, with an area of 9 acres. Pop. 9000.

Buckingham, a municipal borough of Buckinghamshire, almost encircled by the Ouse, 61 miles NW. of London. An ancient place fortified by Edward the Elder (918), it yet has no antiquities, owing to a great fire in 1725. Since 1848 Aylesbury has superseded it as the assize town, and it lost its last member in 1885. The grammar-school was founded in 1548. The bobbin-lace manufacture has declined. Population, 3300.

Buckinghamshire, or Bucks, a south-midland county of England, surrounded by Bedfordshire, Herts, Middlesex, Surrey, Berks, Oxfordshire, and Northamptonshire. Among the smallest of the English counties, it has a maximum length of 57 miles, a varying breadth of 8½ and 27 miles, and an area of 749 sq. m., or 479,360 acres. It is finely diversified with hill and dale, wood and water. To the south is the Chiltern range of chalk-hills, which, entering from Oxfordshire and stretching across the county in a north-easterly direction, are partly covered with heath and wood, and rise near Wendover to a height of 905 feet above sea-level. The chief rivers are the Thames, bordering the county on the south-west, the Ouse, Ousel, Colne, and Thame, the last two falling into the Thames. Buckinghamshire is eminently an agricultural county, 87 per cent. of the entire area being in cultivation. The chief dairy product is butter for the London market; in the fertile vale of Aylesbury, fattening of cattle is extensively carried on; the sheep are noted for their fine and heavy fleeces; and large numbers of ducks are reared. Nearly 40 sq. m. are under woods and plantations, beech and oak being the chief timber-trees. The chief manufactures are paper, straw-plait, and thread-lace. The county returns three members to parliament; Aylesbury, Buckingham, Marlow, and Wycombe having ceased in 1885 to be parliamentary boroughs. It contains some Roman and British remains, as traces of Watling, Icknield, and Akeman Streets or Ways; remains of the religious houses of Missenden, Notley, Burnham, Medmenham, and Ivinghoe; and vestiges of Lavendon and Whitchurch Castles. Bucks is rich too in scenes of historic or biographical interest, as Chalfont St Giles, Horton, Hampden, Milton, Stoke Poges, Olney, Slough, Stowe, Aston Sandford, Beaconsfield, Gregories, Bardenham, and Hughenden. Pop. (1801) 108,132; (1841) 156,439; (1911) 219,551. See county histories by Lipscomb (1847) and Sheahan (1862), and the 'Victoria History' (1905 et seq.).

Buckley, a town in Flint, 3 m. E. of Mold, with manufactures of earthenware, &c.; pop. 6300.

Buck of Cabrach, a Banffshire and Aberdeenshire mountain (2368 feet), 13 miles SW. of Huntly.

Buczacz, a town of Austria, in Galicia, on the Stripa, an affluent of the Dniester, 47 miles ENE. of Stanislau by rail; pop. 12,000.

Bu′dapest, the official designation of the capital of Hungary, which consists of Buda (Ger. Ofen) on the right and Pest or Pesth on the left bank of the Danube, the two cities having formed a single municipality since 1872. See Pesth.

Budaun, a town of India, 140 miles NW. of Lucknow; pop. 50,000.

Buddon Ness, the promontory (95 feet) on the north side of the entrance to the Firth of Tay.

Bude, a watering-place on the north coast of Cornwall, 17 miles NNW. of Launceston; pop. (Stratton and Bude urban district), 3000.

Budleigh Salterton, a sheltered Devon watering-place, at the mouth of the Otter, 5 miles E. of Exmouth; pop. 2200.

Budrun (Boodroon), a seaport of Asiatic Turkey, on the north shore of the Gulf of Kos, 96 miles S. of Smyrna. It is the site of the ancient Halicarnassus, the birthplace of Herodotus and Dionysius. Pop. 6000.

Budweis (Bood'vice; Czech Budejovice), a cathedral city of Bohemia, on the navigable Moldau, 133 miles NW. of Vienna by rail. It manufactures machines, stoneware, lead-pencils, saltpetre, &c. Population, 45,000. Near it is Schloss Frauenberg (1847), Prince Schwarzenberg's seat.

Buenaventura (Bway'naventoo'ra), a town on the Pacific coast of Colombia. Pop. 5000.

Buena Vista (Bway'na Veesta), a village of Mexico, 7 miles S. of Saltillo, where in February 1847, some 5000 U. S. troops defeated 20,000 Mexicans.

Buen-Ayré (Span. Bwayn-Ireh), Fr. Bonaire, a West Indian Island, 60 miles from the coast of Venezuela, and 30 E. of Curaçao, like which it belongs to the Dutch. Area, 100 sq. m.; pop. 6500.

Buenos Aires (Bwaynōs Ī'rez; Eng. pron. usu. Bonos Ai'rez), the largest province of the Argentine Republic, extending along the Atlantic, from the mouth of the Plata to that of the Rio Negro; on the NE. it is washed by the Plata and the Paraná. In administration the province is independent of the central government. Its area is about 118,000 sq. m. (close on that of Great Britain and Ireland), with a pop. (excluding the city, a province by itself) of 1,796,000.—The city of Buenos Aires, the federal capital of the Argentine Republic, stands on the right bank of the Plata, which here, at a distance of 150 miles from the open sea, is 28 miles across, but so shallow that ships drawing 15 feet of water are obliged to anchor 7 or 8 miles from the shore. Monte Video, on the opposite shore, possesses a better harbour; but Buenos Aires has greater facilities in carrying on an inland trade, and undertook, moreover, in 1887, a system of harbour works to bring the largest vessels up to the wharfs; and four new docks have since been added. The city is partitioned into blocks of about 150 yards square, with muddy, uneven roads; still, new houses, generally of brick faced with marble or stucco, are everywhere taking the place of the old comfortless Spanish-American erections, and the value of property has enormously increased. The principal buildings are the cathedral, second in South America to that of Lima alone, the chapel of Santa Felicitas, with elaborate frescoes, Anglican, Lutheran, Methodist, and Presbyterian churches, the university, a military college, the new post-office, the mint and government offices, and some of the palatial railway depots. There are also printing establishments; manufactories of cigars, carpets, cloth, furniture, and boots and shoes; some small dockyards; and an Emigrants' Home. The city is the seat of an archbishopric, and possesses several public libraries and museums, eleven hospitals, and numerous other charitable institutions. The terminus of six railways, it has some 150 miles of tramway lines; there is cable communication with Europe and the United States, and a good telephone service. The drainage is well planned, and the water and gas supply excellent; the climate is not so exceptionally fine as the name of the town ('good airs or breezes') would imply. The exports (one-sixth to England) and imports (about one-half British) are practically those of the Argentine Republic; but there is also a river-trade averaging £3,500,000. Population, 1,320,000. Buenos Aires was founded in 1535, but was twice destroyed by the Indians. In 1806 a British force, which had just captured the city, was obliged to surrender; and in 1807 another, which attempted to recover the place, was repulsed with heavy loss; and these successes over so formidable a foe emboldened the colonists, three years afterwards, to throw off the yoke of Spain. In the insurrection of 1892 the city was bombarded.

Buffalo, a city of New York state, capital of Erie county, is at the east end of Lake Erie, and at the head of Niagara River. It is 295 miles NW. of New York City in a direct line, but 423 by the Erie Railroad; the distance from Chicago is 539 miles. In population and wealth, Buffalo ranks third among the cities of New York. It has a capacious harbour, admitting vessels of 17 feet draught, and with an outer breakwater 4000 feet long, besides other breakwaters, piers, basins, and canals. The harbour is guarded by Fort Porter, which stands two miles out from the heart of the city; close by is the old fort, built in 1812, but now in ruins. The water front of the city extends 8 miles along the lake and river, while Buffalo Creek has been rendered navigable for over a mile. The commercial importance of Buffalo dates from the completion of the Erie Canal in 1825; but since 1862 the lake commerce has yielded to the competition of the railroads. The chief business is the receiving, transferring, and storing of grain, the annual amount of which (including flour) received by lake and railroad is from 70,000,000 to 90,000,000 bushels. The live-stock trade is scarcely second in importance; the iron and steel works rank next to those of Pittsburgh; and the shipments of Pennsylvania coal, which finds a depot here, have greatly increased of late years. The lumber trade is also large, but has been partly diverted to Tonawanda, 10 miles below Buffalo, where more room is afforded. The industrial works comprise four blast-furnaces, large rolling-mills, machine-shops, car-shops, iron shipyards, stove-foundries, tanneries, breweries, flour-mills, and manufactories of agricultural implements. Buffalo is connected with the Niagara Utilisation Company's works for electric lighting and motor power. The navigation of Lake Erie usually opens about the middle of April, the extreme dates being a month earlier and a month later. Buffalo has wide streets, well paved and lighted, and generally lined with trees. It has excellent sewerage, and extensive water-works supplied from Niagara River; and its healthfulness is attested by the low death-rate of 14 per 1000. There are five public squares, and the magnificent park consists of three sections, connected by boulevards, which encircle the city. The city and county hall is an imposing structure of Maine granite, in the form of a double Roman cross, with a tower 245 feet high, surmounted by four statues. The other prominent buildings are the U. S. custom-house and post-office, the public library, the state arsenal, the county penitentiary, and a state asylum for the insane (in North Buffalo). Of the two finest of its 100 churches, St Joseph's Cathedral (Roman Catholic) is a gray Gothic structure; and St Paul's (Episcopal) has been rebuilt since its burning in 1888. Founded in 1801, Buffalo was burned in 1813 by British and Indians. It was incorporated as a city in 1832, and had then a population of 15,000, which had increased in 1860 to 81,130; in 1880 to 155,137; in 1890 to 255,664; in 1900 to 352,387; in 1910 to 423,715.

Bug (Boog), the name of two Russian rivers. The Western Bug rises in Austrian Galicia, and after a course of 470 m., mostly along the eastern frontier of Poland, it joins the Vistula near Warsaw. The Eastern Bug (anc. Hypanis) rises in Podolia, and flows 520 miles south-east into the Dnieper's estuary.

Bugis. See Boni.

Bugulma (Boogoolma), a town in the Russian government of Samara, on the Bugulminka, a tributary of the Kama ; pop. 15,000.

Buguruslan (Boogoorooslan), a town in the Russian government of Samara, on the Kinel, in the Volga steppe ; pop. 20,000.

Buildwas (Bild'was), a Shropshire parish, on the Severn, 4 miles N. of Much Wenlock, with a ruined Cistercian abbey (1135).

Builth (Bilth), a town of Brecknockshire, on the Wye, 14 m. N. of Brecon ; pop. 1700. Builth Wells, 1 mile NW., have mineral properties.

Buitenzorg (Bī'tenzorg), a town in Java, 35 miles S. of Batavia by rail, stands 850 feet above sea-level, has a famous botanical garden, and is a favourite summer-resort ; pop. 34,000.

Bujalance (Boo-ha-lan'thay), a city of Andalusia, Spain 25 miles E. of Cordova ; pop. 10,000.

Bukkur, a fortified island of the Indus, in Sind, between the towns of Rohri and Sukkur.

Bukowina (Booko, 'beechland'), an eastern province of the Austrian empire, surrounded by Galicia, Russia, Moldavia, and Hungary ; area, 4035 sq. m. ; pop. (1869) 513,404 ; (1910) 800,099, of whom 42 per cent. are Ruthenians, 33 Moldavians, and 12 Jews, while 71 per cent. belong to the Greek Church. It is traversed by offsets of the Carpathians, culminating at 6077 feet ; gives rises to many rivers flowing towards the Black Sea ; and abounds in wood, cattle, horses, and minerals. Capital, Czernowitz.

Bulacan, a port of Luzon, Philippines, 20 miles NW. of Manila ; pop. 15,000.

Bulak. See Boulak.

Bulandshahr, a town in the Meerut division of the United Provinces of India ; pop. 20,000.

Bulawayo, chief commercial place in Southern Rhodesia, 290 miles SW. of Salisbury, is the seat of the Rhodesia Museum, and is connected by rail with Beira (1900), Capetown (1897), and Katanga ; white pop. 5000.

Bulgaria, a kingdom in the Balkan Peninsula, between the Danube and the Ægean. It was created, as a principality, by the Treaty of Berlin (1878), and since 1885 has included Eastern Roumelia. The net result of the wars of 1912–13 was the increase of Bulgarian territory from 33,600 sq. m. to about 45,000. The population, increased by about 500,000, was in 1910 4,337,513—over three-fourths Bulgarians, 465,000 Turks, 121,000 Gypsies, 80,000 Roumanians, 43,000 Greeks, and 40,000 Jews. The north of Bulgaria is fertile plain and hilly country ; the south is wooded and mountainous. A fine waterway as her northern boundary and outlet, a Black Sea and Ægean seaboard, a mild climate, an agricultural country capable of much, an abundance of iron and some coal, free institutions, a peasantry possessing the solid qualities and persevering industry of Northern races favour her economic development. The principal exports are cereals, and the imports textiles ; but there are important manufactures of woollens and attar of roses, and the production of wine and tobacco receives considerable attention. The minerals, which include coal as well as iron, copper, and other metals, are comparatively little worked. Sofia is the capital, the other principal towns being Philippopolis, the chief town of Eastern Roumelia, Varna, Rustchuk, Slivno, Plevna, Shumla, Stara-Zagora, Tatar-Bazardjik, Widin, Yamboli, Vratza, Haskovo, Burgas, Razgrad, Koestendil, Sistova, Stanimaka, and Tirnova. Varna and Burgas are ports on the Black Sea, Dedeagatch on the Ægean. The Bulgarians belonged originally to the Ural-Altaic stock, but have adopted a Slavonic dialect. First crossing the Danube in the 6th century A.D., by 1186 they had split up into three principalities, and from 1393 fell under the domination of the Turks. In 1908 Bulgaria became a kingdom, throwing off the suzerainty of Turkey. In 1912–13 Bulgaria, with Greece, Servia, and Montenegro, made war on Turkey, but falling out with her allies and with Roumania in 1913, failed to secure the share she had hoped for in the spoils. From Turkey she gained western and northern Thrace, and ceded to Roumania Silistria and southern Dobrudja. The Bulgarians now extend into Macedonia, Bessarabia, &c., their total number being about 8,000,000.

Bull Run, a small stream in Virginia, gives name to two Confederate victories (1861, 1862).

Bulsar, a seaport of India, on the estuary of the river Bulsar, 115 miles N. of Bombay by rail ; pop. 15,000.

Bulstrode Park, Bucks, 2½ miles ESE. of Beaconsfield, a seat of the Duke of Somerset.

Bultfontein (Booltfontayn), a place with diamond-mines in Griqualand West, E. of Kimberley.

Bulti (Booltee), part of Cashmere (q.v.).

Buncombe, the county of North Carolina whose tedious representative in congress (1819–21) explained when interrupted that he was 'speaking for Buncombe'—hence 'bunkum.'

Buncrana (Bun-krah'na), a Donegal town, on Lough Swilly, 12 m. from Londonderry ; pop. 2000.

Bundaberg, a port and sugar-growing centre of Queensland, 272 miles N. of Brisbane ; pop. 10,000.

Bundelkhand (Boondelkhund), a region of Upper India, between the Chambal and the Jumna. It includes five districts of the United Provinces (Banda, Jalaun, Jhansi, Lalitpur, and Hamirpur) ; also the 'Bundelkhand Agency,' a subdivision of the Central Indian Agency, which is a group of 30 native states. Principal towns—Kalpi, Jhansi, Kalinjar, Banda, Jalaun, Chhatarpur, Datia.

Bundi, a native state of Rajputana ; area, 2225 sq. m. ; population, 219,000, nearly all Hindus. Chief town, Bundi (pop. 20,000).

Bundo'ran, a watering-place on Donegal Bay, 4 miles SW. of Ballyshannon ; pop. 2100.

Bungay, a market-town of Suffolk, on the Waveney, 6 miles W. of Beccles. It grew up around the 12th-century castle of the Bigods, Earls of Norfolk, some ruins of which still remain ; but mostly it is later than the great fire of 1688. It has a large printing establishment. Pop. 3400.

Bunker Hill, an elevation (112 feet) on the peninsula of Charlestown, now part of Boston, Massachusetts, connected by a ridge, 700 yards long, with Breed's Hill (75 feet). The two heights were the scene of the first hard-fought battle of the American Revolution (June 17, 1775), in which the Americans repulsed two attacks by General Gage's forces, and were dislodged only after reinforcements had been brought up and their ammunition was spent. A granite obelisk, 221 feet high, marks the site of the redoubt.

Bunzlau (Boontz'low), a town of Prussian Silesia, 25 miles WNW. of Liegnitz by rail. It manufactures earthenware, woollens, glass, &c. Pop. 16,000, Bunzlau, Jung (Czech Mladá Boleslav), a town of Bohemia, on the Iser, 32 miles NE. of Prague by rail; pop. 16,000.

Burano (Boo-râh'no), an island and town, ·5 miles NE. of Venice. Its lace manufacture, once famous, has been revived. Pop. 9000.

Burdekin, a river of Queensland, draining the district of North Kennedy. It rises not far from the coast, and after an irregular course forms a delta emptying into Bowling Green and Upstart bays. It was discovered by Leichhardt in 1845, and explored by Dalrymple and Smith in 1859–60.

Burford, a town of Oxfordshire, on the Windrush, 18 miles W. by N. of Oxford; pop. of parish, 1000.

Burg (Boorg), a town of Prussian Saxony, 15 miles NE. of Magdeburg by rail. It manufactures woollens, leather, tobacco, &c. Pop. 24,000.

Burgas (Boorgas), a port of Bulgaria, on the Gulf of Burgas, in the Black Sea, 76 miles NE. of Adrianople; pop. 15,000.

Burgdorf (Boorg-dorf; Fr. Berthoud), a Swiss town, 14 miles NE. of Bern by rail. In the old castle here Pestalozzi established his famous school (1798–1804). Pop. 9000.

Burgess Hill, a town of Sussex, 8½ miles N. of Brighton; pop. 5100.

Burgh-by-Sands, a Cumberland parish, 5 miles NNW. of Carlisle. An obelisk marks the death-place of Edward I.

Burgh Castle, a Suffolk parish, 4 miles WSW. of Yarmouth, with a most perfect Roman camp.

Burghead, a fishing-town of Elginshire, on the Moray Firth, 11 miles NW. of Elgin; pop. 1600.

Burghley House, 'by Stamford town,' in Northamptonshire, on the Welland, the splendid Renaissance mansion of the Marquis of Exeter, was commenced in 1575 by Lord Burghley, and has a noble park, carvings by Grinling Gibbons, and a great collection of pictures.

Bürglen, a village in the Swiss canton of Uri, about a mile from Altorf, is the traditional birthplace of William Tell. The supposed site of his house is now occupied by a chapel (1522), on whose walls are represented scenes from his history.

Burgos (Boor'gōs), a city of Spain, the ancient capital of Old Castile, on the river Arlanzon, 225 miles N. of Madrid by rail. Founded in 884, it has a castle, in which our Edward I. was wedded, and Pedro the Cruel born, and an archiepiscopal cathedral (1221), which ranks with those of Toledo and Leon as one of the three great Spanish churches of the Early Pointed period. It is a glorious building, with its twin-spired western façade, its exquisite lantern, and its fifteen chapels so rich in fine sculpture and tombs. Burgos was the birthplace of the Cid, whose bones are preserved at the town-hall. It has manufactures of woollens and linens. The university (1550) is now extinct, but there is a college with twenty-one professors. The city formerly had 50,000 inhabitants; but on the removal of the court to Madrid in the 16th century, it began to decline in importance. It was further greatly injured in 1808 by the French. In 1812 the castle was four times unsuccessfully besieged by Wellington, who, however, took it in the next year, when the French blew it up, and the fortifications. Pop. 31,500.

Burgundy, till 1477 an independent principality of widely varying area in the east and south-east of what is now France, and later a French province (Fr. Bourgogne), which comprised the present departments of Ain, Côte-d'Or, Saône-et-Loire, and Yonne, with parts of adjoining deps. Among its towns were Dijon, Mâcon, Autun, Chalon-sur-Saône, and Bourg. The white and red wines of Burgundy have a great celebrity.

Burhanpur, a town of the Central Provinces, India, on the Tapti, 280 miles NE. of Bombay. The remains of buildings show that the town extended over an area of 5 sq. m. when under the Moguls. The city was taken by General Wellesley in 1803, but it was only in 1860 that Burhanpur came completely under control of the British government. The town contains a palace built by Akbar, and a mosque built by Aurungzebe. Pop. 33,000.

Burley-in-Wharfedale, a village and township in the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the Wharfe, 10 miles N. of Bradford. Pop. 3800.

Burlington, three cities in the United States: (1) The capital of Des Moines county, Iowa, on the right bank of the Mississippi (here crossed by a railway bridge), 207 miles WSW. of Chicago. Laid out in 1834, it is the seat of a Baptist college, and has manufactures of machinery, farming implements, flour, carriages, &c. Pop. (1870) 14,930; (1910) 24,324.—(2) A port of entry of Burlington county, New Jersey, on the Delaware, 7 miles above Philadelphia. It possesses an Episcopalian college (1846), and large manufactories of shoes, ironware, and thread. Pop. 8300.—(3) A port of entry and capital of Chittenden county, Vermont, and the most populous city in the state, beautifully situated on the eastern shore of Lake Champlain, 40 miles WNW. of Montpelier by rail. It has a good harbour, with a breakwater and lighthouse, and has access by canals and the Richelieu River to the Hudson and St Lawrence. It is the seat of the State Agricultural College (1865), and of Vermont University (1800); has cotton, flour, and planing mills, machine-shops, and manufactures of furniture, &c.; and is one of the largest lumber markets in the States. Pop. (1870) 14,387; (1880) 11,365; (1910) 20,463.

Burma, once the chief state in the Indo-Chinese peninsula, is now the largest of all the provinces of the Indian empire. It stretches from 28° lat., on the confines of Tibet, southward for 1100 miles, to 10° lat., far down the Malay Peninsula, and from 103° long., on the Chinese border, for 700 miles westward to the Bay of Bengal. It is conterminous with China and Siam on the east; and for the rest it is bounded by the Indian provinces of Bengal and Assam, and by the ocean. Its total area is 238,738 square miles, of which 81,160 belong to the old province of Lower Burma, 87,390 to Upper Burma, and 68,188 to the Shan States. The country consists of the great basin of the Irawadi and its affluents; the rugged country drained by the Salween and Sittang rivers, on the upper waters of which are situate the Shan States; and the narrow maritime provinces of Arakan and Tenasserim. The deltas of the Irawadi, Salween, Sittang, and Koladan rivers are flat plains, and there are smaller areas of level land at the mouths and on the banks of some of the feeders of the Irawadi. The level cultivable plains probably do not exceed 50,000 sq. m. in all. The rest of Burma is hilly broken country, covered for the most part with forest. The China hills in the north-east reach a height of 15,000 feet. The Shan States occupy a vast upland, cleft by deep chasms, in which flow the Salween and the Cambodia rivers and their feeders. The chief river of Burma is the Irawadi, 1100 miles in length, which is navigable all the year round by river-steamers to Bhamo, 700 miles from the sea, and 50 miles from the Chinese border. The rivers are the chief highways of the country; but during the dry season all, except the very largest and the tidal channels, are too low for navigation. Sometimes the flood-waters of the Irawadi submerge the country for 10 or 15 miles on either side to a depth of 4 to 14 feet. The inundated villages, however, do not suffer, as the houses are all built on piles. The rainfall varies widely in different parts of Burma, from 250 to 20 inches. In the delta and along the coast the rainy season lasts for five, six, or sometimes even seven months. From February to the end of April the climate of the delta is dry and hot (occasionally 100° in the shade). Higher up the Irawadi valley the climate is much hotter and dryer in the summer, but cooler in the winter months. The climate of Burma is more trying to Europeans than that of the plains of India. The forests of Burma contain an abundance of useful and beautiful trees, including teak, bamboo, and trees producing valuable fibre, wood-oil, varnish, tannin, and gums. Among the wild animals of Burma may be mentioned the elephant, three species of rhinoceros, tapir, buffalo, bison, many kinds of deer, small wild cattle, hog, tiger, leopard, bear, and wild dog. Among domestic animals, the buffalo, oxen, elephants, and ponies are all good. No horses are bred, and sheep and goats are rare. Pythons and cobras abound. The variety of birds and of fish is immense. Gold is found in small quantities by washing river-sand; silver is extracted at lead-workings in the Shan States. Iron, copper, lead, and tin exist in great quantity, petroleum is found in several districts. Jade and amber are worked. Coal exists at several places in Upper Burma. The coal found as yet in Lower Burma has proved of poor quality and scanty in quantity. The ruby-mines north of Mandalay yield the best rubies in the world.

At the census of 1911 the population of the whole province was 12,115,217 (against 10,490,624 in 1901), while that of Burma proper (Upper and Lower), exclusive of the Shan States, was 10,610,256. Of these some 7,000,000 are Burmans, 800,000 Karens, the rest being mainly other hill tribes (Chins, Kachins, Singphos, Paloungs, &c.). The Burmans are a short-statured, flat-featured thick-set people of Indo-Mongolic race. They are excitable and fond of fun and laughter, and therefore much given to dramas, dances, and shows. Dacoity or robbery with violence by gangs is common. Burmese women are well treated. Burmans are Buddhists by religion; the most respected class are the Buddhist monks, whose function is to set an example of a correct life, and to instruct the young. They observe the vows of celibacy and poverty, but can return to the world when they please. They shave their heads, wear yellow robes, and live in monasteries. The Shans resemble the Burmans; but being highlanders, are poorer, hardier, and more courageous. The Karens are less clever, but more persevering and methodical than Burmans. There are over 500 parishes of Christian (American Baptist) Karens, containing nearly 200,000 souls. The Burmese language is monosyllabic; it is written from left to right, the shape of the letters being circular. The classical language of Burma is Pali. The name Burma is, according to Yule in Hobson-Jobson, an Englished form of Mram-ma, pronounced by the people Bam-mâ. The primary schools of the country are the Buddhist monasteries, in which every Burman lad must be taught to read and write. Over 60 per cent. of the males in Lower Burma above the age of twelve can read and write.

The external sea-borne trade of Lower Burma is valued at over twenty millions sterling. Most of this trade centres in Rangoon. The chief export items are rice, teak timber, cutch, hides, cotton; while the chief import items are cotton piece-goods and yarns, silk goods, coal, hardware, salt, and metals. Several railways are in operation, including that from Rangoon to Mandalay. Extensions are in progress in several directions; and possible railway communication between Burma and China has been much discussed. The commercial and financial development of Lower Burma under British rule has been great and rapid. The arts in which Burmese excel are wood-carving, silver repoussé work, woven silk fabrics of many colours, and lacquer-ware. Burma is governed under the Viceroy of India, by a chief-commissioner. A Buddhist Burman dynasty was established on the Irawadi at least as early as the 11th century. It was not till 1820 that the Burmese came directly into contact with the British power in Assam, then Burmese. In consequence of Burmese aggression followed by war, Arakan and Tenasserim were ceded in 1826, Pegu in 1852; and in 1886 Upper Burma was incorporated with British India. See works by Forbes (1876), Fytche (1878), Scott ('Shway Yoe,' 1882 and 1886), Phayre (1883), Hall (1902), O'Connor (1904), and Dautremer (trans. 1913).

Burnham, (1) a Somerset watering-place, 7½ miles N. of Bridgwater; pop. 4000.—(2) BURNHAM-ON-CROUCH, an Essex port and yachting-resort near the mouth of the Crouch; pop. 3200.

Burnham Beeches, in Bucks, near Maidenhead, and 25 miles W. of London, the remains of an ancient forest, purchased in 1879 by the London Corporation.

Burnham Thorpe, a Norfolk parish, 4½ miles W. by S. of Wells. Lord Nelson was born in the former rectory.

Burnley, a thriving town of Lancashire, in a narrow vale on the banks of the Brun, near its influx to the Calder, 21 miles E. of Preston, and 27 N. of Manchester. Roman remains have been found, but it is a modern-looking place, a great seat of the woollen and then of the cotton manufacture, with a literary institute and exchange (1855), a market-hall (1868), the Victoria Hospital (1886), a grammar-school, an ancient parish church (restored in 1856), a museum and art gallery (1903), and a technical institute (1909). It manufactures looms and other machinery, has cotton-mills, calico-printing works, iron and brass foundries, breweries, tanneries, and rope-works. There are collieries in the vicinity. Burnley was created a municipal borough in 1861 (the boundary being extended in 1889), a parliamentary borough (returning one member) in 1867, and a county borough in 1888. Pop. (1871) 44,320; (1891) 87,016; (1901) 97,050; (1911) 106,765.

Burnmouth, a Berwickshire fishing-village, 5½ miles NNW. of Berwick-upon-Tweed.

Burntisland, a seaport and watering-place of Fife, on the Firth of Forth, 5 miles N. of Granton by steam-ferry (1848). Backed by the Bin, 632 feet high, it has a quaint parish church (1594), and the old castle of Rossend, where Chastelard incurred his doom. The harbour has been much improved, and coal is shipped in large quantities. Burntisland is one of the four Kirkcaldy burghs. Pop. 4700.

Burra, East and West, two Shetland Isles, 10½ miles SW. of Lerwick; pop. 185 and 665.

Burra Burra, a famous copper-mine in South Australia, 101 miles N. by E. of Adelaide. It was discovered in 1844.

Burrard Inlet, a narrow inlet, 9 miles long, at the SW. corner of British Columbia, a little north of the mouth of the Fraser River. It forms one of the finest harbours on the Pacific coast. See Vancouver.

Burray, an Orkney island, between Pomona and South Ronaldshay; area, 4 sq. m.; pop. 600.

Burriana, a Spanish port, 34 miles N. of Valencia; pop. 12,000.

Burrinjuck, a mountain in SE. New South Wales, near which a huge dam stores the waters of the Murrumbidgee, flooding a valley of 763,000 acres so as to irrigate 200 miles of country.

Burscheid, a town of Prussia, on the Wupper, 20 miles SE. of Düsseldorf; pop. 10,000.

Burslem, a town of Staffordshire, within the parliamentary borough of Hanley, 20 miles N. by W. of Stafford. It is known as the 'mother of the potteries,' the pottery manufacture having been established here about 1644. Porcelain and pottery of all kinds are produced on a large scale, as well as encaustic tiles. There is also a glass manufactory. A fine town-hall, Renaissance in style, with a lofty clock-tower, was erected in 1865. Burslem was the birthplace of Josiah Wedgwood (1730–95); and a Wedgwood Memorial Institute was opened in 1870 to serve as a school of art, free library, and museum. Burslem was made a municipal borough in 1878, and in 1910 became part of the county borough of Stoke-on-Trent. Pop. (1851) 16,954; (1891) 32,000; (1901) 38,850.

Burton-upon-Trent, a municipal and county borough of east Staffordshire and south Derbyshire, 25 miles E. of Stafford, on the river Trent, the ancient bridge over which was superseded in 1864 by one 470 yards long. Burton-upon-Trent owes its rapid extension to the brewing of ale, the staple of the place. The opening of the Midland Railway in 1839 paved the way for future progress. Cotton-spinning was at first the chief industry, but this has been discontinued since 1849. Its rise and progress as a brewing centre has been largely due to the suitability of the water for this purpose. There was some small local trade in beer in the 16th century here; Burton ale had a repute in London in 1630; and a considerable export trade had been established with the Baltic ports by the middle of the 18th century. In 1791 there were nine breweries, in 1851 sixteen, and now there are about twenty, some of them—e.g. those of Bass and Allsopp, being on a scale of unparalleled magnitude. There are, of course, extensive cooperages, and also iron-foundries. A church or monastery was erected by the Trent in the 9th century; Burton Abbey was founded and endowed by Wulfric, Earl of Mercia, in 1002. The town suffered in the Great Rebellion, and has suffered repeatedly by floods, the water standing 4 or 5 feet deep on some streets in 1875. Pop. (1851) 7944; (1911) 48,266.

Burtscheid, a town incorporated in 1897 with Aix-la-Chapelle, has manufactures of woollen cloths and cassimeres, and celebrated sulphur springs and baths, with a temperature of 106° to 155° F.

Buru, or Boeroe, an island of the Malay Archipelago, in the residency of Amboyna, from which it lies 40 miles to the W. Marshy along the coast, and most of it densely wooded, it attains in one peak 8330 feet. Area, 3360 sq. m.; pop. 40,000 to 50,000.

Bury, a flourishing manufacturing town of South-east Lancashire, on a rising ground backed by hills on the north and east, between the Irwell and the Roche, 10 miles NNW. of Manchester. The woollen manufacture introduced by Flemings in the 14th century attained its zenith under Elizabeth, but had greatly declined by 1738, when Bury was merely 'a little market-town,' and it has long been all but eclipsed by the cotton industry. Besides spinning and weaving factories, there are important paper, print, bleach, and dye works, and some large foundries and engine manufactories. In the vicinity are excellent freestone quarries, and abundant coal-mines. Some improvements in the cotton manufacture arose here—notably, the invention by John Kay of the fly-shuttle. Sir Robert Peel (1788–1850) was born at Bury in a cottage near Chamber Hall, his father being a great calico manufacturer. In 1852 a bronze statue of him was erected in the market-square. Bury was made a parliamentary borough (returning one member in 1832, a municipal borough in 1876, and a county borough in 1888 (the boundary was extended in 1885 and 1911). Population, 59,000.

Bury St Edmunds, or St Edmundsbury, a clean, well-built town of West Suffolk, on the little river Lark, 26 miles NW. of Ipswich, and 76 NNE. of London. It was named after Edmund the Martyr, who on Christmas-day 856 was crowned here king of the East Angles, and who in 870 was shot to death at Hoxne by the Danes. His relics were translated hither in 903, and in 1020 Canute reared a Benedictine abbey in his honour, which in time became the richest and most important in England, Glastonbury only excepted. Little now remains but the noble Abbey Gate (1327–77), Decorated in style, and 62 feet high; and the Norman Tower or Church Gate (c. 1090), a quadrangular tower of massive simplicity, 86 feet high. The cruciform church itself, which measured 512 by 212 feet, is represented only by the west front and the piers of the central tower, one of which bears the inscription: 'Near this spot, on 20th November 1214, Cardinal Langton and the Barons swore at St Edmund's altar that they would obtain from King John the ratification of Magna Charta.' St Saviour's Hospital was founded by that notable abbot, Samson, whose life and actions, as recorded by Jocelin de Brakelonde, Carlyle has so vividly recalled in his Past and Present. The poet Lydgate was a monk of Bury St Edmunds; and Bishops Gardiner and Blomfield, Sir Nicholas Bacon, and Crabb Robinson were natives. St Mary's and St James's churches are both fine Gothic edifices of the 15th century; in the former is the tomb of Mary Tudor, the widow of Louis XII. of France. The grammar-school (1550) was rebuilt on a new site in 1883 in Queen Anne style at a cost of £12,000. Donaldson was one of its head-masters, and amongst its scholars have been the Norths, Sancroft, Cumberland, Blomfield, J. M. Kemble, FitzGerald, and Spedding. Defoe, Wollaston, 'Mr Pickwick,' 'Ouida,' and F. W. Robertson were residents. Since 1883

Bury St Edmunds has returned only one member to parliament. Pop. (1801) 7655; (1841) 12,538; (1911) 16,785. See works by Gillingwater (1804) and Thomas Arnold (1893).

Busachino. See BISACQUINO.

Busaco (Boo-sah'ko), a Portuguese ridge north of the river Mondego, 16 miles NNE. of Coimbra. Here, in 1810, Wellington repulsed Massena.

Busby, a town with cotton-mills and print-works, 7 miles S. of Glasgow; pop. 1500.

Bushey, a Hertfordshire urban district, 1¼ mile SE. of Watford; pop. 7000. See TEDDINGTON.—BUSHEY PARK, a royal park, close to Hampton Court, is in Middlesex, 14 miles SW. of London.

Bushire (Boo-sheer'; properly ABUSHEHR, 'father of cities,' also written Bushahr), a principal port of Persia, on a sandy peninsula on the east shore of the Persian Gulf, in the province of Fars. The district is liable to be devastated by earthquakes and the simoom, and is deficient in water; but the situation is highly favourable for commerce. It is the land terminus of the Indo-European telegraph line, and a chief station of the British Indian Steam-navigation Company; and has a large trade both in imports and exports. Pop. 20,000.

Bushmills, an Antrim market-town, on the river Bush, 8 miles NE. of Coleraine; pop. 970.

Busiu, BUSEO, BUZEO, or BUZAU, a Roumanian town, in Wallachia, 60 miles NE. of Bucharest, with a cathedral and much trade; pop. 29,000.

Bussanga. See BORGU.

Bussorah, or BUSRA. See BASRA.

Busto-Arsizio, a town of Italy, 20 miles NW. of Milan; pop. 11,000.

Bute, an island in the Firth of Clyde, separated from Argyllshire by the winding Kyles of Bute, mostly under a mile wide, and about 6 miles distant from Ayrshire, 8 NE. of Arran. It is 15½ miles long, 1¼ to 6¼ broad, and 49 sq. m. in area. The surface to the north is high, rugged, and barren, attaining 875 feet in Kames Hill; in the centre and south it is low and undulating, and comparatively fertile. Of six small lakes, the largest is Loch Fad (2½ by ¼ mile), in a cottage on whose west shore lived Kean and Sheridan Knowles. The climate is milder than in any other part of Scotland, and though moist, less so than on the west coast generally; hence, Bute is much resorted to by invalids. The principal town is Rothesay (q.v.). Most of the island belongs to the Marquis of Bute, whose beautiful seat, Mount-Stuart, 5 miles SSE. of Rothesay, has been rebuilt since the fire of 1877 at a cost of nearly £20,000. Among the antiquities of Bute are Rothesay Castle, Kames Castle (John Sterling's birthplace), Kilmorie Castle, St Blane's Chapel, and Dungyle, a remarkable vitrified fort on a high crag on the south-west coast. From an early period till 1266 Bute was more or less subject to the Norwegians. Pop. (1801) 6106; (1841) 9499; (1891) 11,735; (1911) 11,835.

BUTESHIRE, a county comprising the isles of Bute, Arran, the Cumbraes, Holy Isle, Pladda, Inchmarnock, and other smaller islands. The area of the whole is 225 sq. m., or 143,977 statute acres. Pop. (1871) 16,977; (1911) 18,186. Buteshire returns one member to parliament. The county town is Rothesay, in Bute.

Butler, a town of Pennsylvania, on the Conequenessing Creek, 30 miles N. of Pittsburgh (45 by rail). It has woollen, flour, and planing mills, and plate-glass and carriage factories. The neighbourhood is rich in natural gas, petroleum, and coal and iron fields. The population is now about 20,000.

Butte (Bewt), capital of Silver Bow county, Montana, 72 miles by rail S. by W. of Helena, with silver-mines, quartz-mills, smelters, &c. Pop. (350 in 1870) now 39,000.

Butterley, a seat of ironworks and collieries, in Derbyshire, 10 miles NNE. of Derby. Sir James Outram was born at Butterley Hall.

Buttermere, a Cumberland lake, 9 miles SW. of Keswick. Lying 247 feet above sea-level, it is 1¼ mile long, ¼ mile wide, and 90 feet deep, and is united by a short stream to Crummock Water (240 ft., 2¾ m. by ¾ m., 130 ft. deep), which discharges to the Cocker.

But'tevant, a market-town on the Awbeg, 27 miles N. of Cork; pop. 1800.

Buxar, or BAXAR, a town of Bihar, on the south bank of the Ganges, 411 miles NW. of Calcutta by rail. Here in 1764 Sir Hector Munro defeated Mir Kasim. Pop. 10,000.

Buxton, a town in Derbyshire, 37 miles NW. of Derby, and 25 SSE. of Manchester. It lies 1025 feet above sea-level, in a deep valley surrounded by hills and moors, which have been tastefully planted; and the only approach is a narrow ravine, by which the Wye flows into the Derwent. Buxton has long been famous for its calcareous springs, tepid (82° F.) and cold, and its chalybeate springs. They were probably known to the Romans, and in 1572 were celebrated by one Dr John Jones as 'the ancient baths of Buckstones.' A new spring was discovered recently. The town is visited both in summer and in winter by many thousands of persons, the waters being taken for indigestion, gout, rheumatism, and nervous and cutaneous diseases. Near Buxton are the Diamond Hill, famous for its crystals; and Poole's Hole, a stalactite cavern of great length. Pop. (1871) 3717; (1891) 7424; (1911) 10,024.

Buyuk'dereh, a village on the Bosporus, 10 miles NNE. of Constantinople.

Buzau, Buzeu. See BUSIU.

Byblos, an ancient city of Phœnicia, now a village of 600 inhabitants, called Jubeïl, on a shallow bay at the base of the lower range of the Libanus, midway between Tripoli and Beyrout.

Byland Abbey, a ruined Cistercian monastery in the North Riding of Yorkshire, founded 1137, and chiefly represented by its noble Norman and Early English church, 328 feet long.

Bytown, till 1854 the name of Ottawa (q.v.).

Byzantium. See CONSTANTINOPLE.

CABATUAN, a town in the island of Panay in the Philippines, province Iloilo. Pop. 18,000.

Cabes, or KHABS, a port of Tunis, at the head of its own gulf. Pop. 10,000.

Cabinda, a small Portuguese territory on the west coast of Africa, north of the mouth of the Congo, and bounded on the E. by Belgian Congo. It was delimited in 1886. The capital, Cabinda, was formerly a noted slave port; pop. 8000.

Cabot Strait, the entrance to the Gulf of the St Lawrence, between Newfoundland and Cape Breton.

Cabourg, a village in the French dep. of Calvados, on the Dives, 11 miles SW. of Trouville by rail; pop. 1000.

Cabra, a town of Spain, 37 miles SE. of Cordova; pop. 14,000.

Cabrach. See Buck of Cabrach.

Cabrera, one of the Balearic Isles (q.v.).

Cabul. See Kabul.

Cac'camo, a town of Sicily, 5 miles SW. of Termini; pop. 10,000.

Cáceres (Kah'the-rez), a province of Spain, in the north of Estremadura; area, 8000 sq. m.; population, 395,000.—The capital, Cáceres (anc. Castra Cœcilia), 45 miles N. of Merida by rail, is famous for its bacon and sausages. Here the allied forces defeated the Duke of Berwick's rear-guard, 7th April 1706. Pop. 18,000.

Cachar, a tea-growing district of British India, in the chief-commissionership of Assam, bordering on Manipur; pop. 500,000. Silchar is the headquarters.

Cacongo, or Kakongo, a district of West Africa, immediately N. of the mouth of the Congo. Cabinda (q.v.) is part of it; the rest has been absorbed in Belgian Congo.

Cadenabbia, a health-resort, beautifully situated among orange and citron groves, on the west shore of Lake Como. Its famous Villa Carlotta contains works by Canova and Thorwaldsen.

Cad'er Idris ('Chair of Idris,' a reputed giant), a picturesque mountain (2914 feet) in Merionethshire, Wales, 5 miles SW. of Dolgelly. It consists of an immense ridge of broken precipices, 10 miles long, and 1 to 3 miles broad.

Cadiz (Kay'diz; Span. pron. Kâh'deeth), a great Spanish port, capital of a province in Andalusia, is situated on the Atlantic at the extremity of a narrow tongue of land projecting 5 miles NW. from the Isle of Leon, 95 miles SSW. of Seville by rail. A small channel, with a drawbridge and a railway bridge, separates the island from the mainland; at its northern outlet stands the arsenal of La Carraca, with large docks, 4 miles ESE. of the city. The town, which is walled and defended from the sea both by a series of forts and by low shelving rocks, is about 2 miles in circuit, and presents a remarkably bright appearance, with its shining granite ramparts, and its whitewashed houses crowned with terraces and overhanging turrets. It has few public buildings of note; its two cathedrals being indifferent specimens of architecture, though possessing some excellent Murillos. Cadiz reached its highest prosperity after the discovery of America. Depot of all the commerce with the New World, it declined after the loss of the American colonies of Spain. Since the American war it has given much attention to shipbuilding, and manufactures glass, woollen cloth, leather, soap, hats, gloves, fans, &c. It exports salt, cork, lead, wine, tunny, olive-oil, and fruits. Pop. (1887) 63,277; (1897) 70,180; (1910) 67,174. Built by the Phœnicians, under the name of Gaddir ('fortress'), about 1100 B.C., Cadiz afterwards passed to the Carthaginians; was captured by the Romans, who named it Gades, and under them soon became a city of vast wealth and importance. In 1587 Drake destroyed the Spanish fleet in the bay; nine years later, Cadiz was pillaged and burned by Essex.

Cadore (Kah-do'ray; also Pieve di Cadore), the birthplace of Titian, is a small village of Venetia, at the foot of the Alps, and 22 miles NE. of Belluno.

Cadzow (Kad'yoo). See Hamilton.

Caen (Kon^{g}), chief town of the French dep. of Calvados, and the former capital of Lower Normandy, is situated on the left bank of the navigable Orne, here joined by the Odon, 9 miles from its mouth, 149 W. by N. of Paris, and 83 ESE. of Cherbourg. Among its fifteen churches are St Étienne and La Sainte Trinité, both founded in 1066 by William the Conqueror and his queen Matilda, and containing their graves, which the Huguenots violated in 1562; and St Pierre (1308–1521), with an exquisite spire 242 feet high. The Conqueror's castle, finished by Henry I. of England, was dismantled in 1793, and now serves as a barrack. The faculty or university (1809) is successor to one founded by our Henry VI. in 1436; and in the Hôtel de Ville is a library of 80,000 volumes and a fine collection of paintings. The chief manufacture is lace. Trade is facilitated by a maritime canal connecting the port with the sea. In 1346, and again in 1417, Caen was taken by the English, who held it till 1450. Malherbe, Huet, and Auber were natives (a marble statue of the last was unveiled in 1883); Charlotte Corday lived here; and Beau Brummell died in the lunatic asylum. Pop. (1872) 39,415; (1911) 46,934.

Caergwrle (Ka-er-goor'leh), one of the Flint boroughs, 5 miles NNW. of Wrexham; pop. 1700.

Caerla'verock, a splendid ruined castle near the Nith's mouth, 7 miles SSE. of Dumfries. For over four centuries the seat of the Maxwells, earls of Nithsdale (1620–1716), and still owned by their representative, Lord Herries, it was captured by Edward I. in 1300. Robert Paterson, Scott's 'Old Mortality,' is buried in the churchyard. See Fraser's Book of Caerlaverock (1873).

Caerleon ('castle of the legion;' Lat. Isca Silurum), a town of Monmouthshire, on the Usk, 2½ miles NE. of Newport. It was very early the seat of a see—the only one, it seems, in all Wales—which was transferred to St David's in the 6th century. A Cistercian abbey existed here before the Reformation. Many Roman relics have been found; and there are also remains of an amphitheatre, measuring 222 by 192 feet, and known as King Arthur's Round Table. Pop. 2000. See Lee's Isca Silurum (1845).

Caermarthen, Caernarvon. See Carmarthen, Carnarvon.

Caerphilly, a town of Glamorganshire, 7½ miles N. by W. of Cardiff. It has a fine ruined castle, ironworks, and collieries. Pop. 33,000.

Caerwys, one of the Flint boroughs, 7½ miles E. of St Asaph. Pop. 600.

Cæsare'a (now Kaisarieh), a once splendid seaport on the coast of Syria, 30 miles N. of Joppa, built by Herod about 22 B.C., and named in honour of Cæsar Augustus. It is now a heap of half-buried ruins, with a few fishermen's huts.—Cæsarea Philippi, 95 miles N. of Jerusalem, near the source of the Jordan, received its suffix in honour of Philip the Tetrarch. It is now a heap of ruins, with the small village of Paneas, or Banias, on its site.

Caffraria. See Kaffraria.

Cagliari (pron. Cal'yari), the capital of Sardinia, at the head of a spacious bay, on the south coast of the island. By steamboat it is 34 hours from Leghorn and 27 from Naples, by rail 174 miles S. of Porto Torres. With a lagoon on either hand, it lies at the base and on the slopes of a steep hill, 300 feet high. Its harbour, defended by forts, has been enlarged since 1882; and Cagliari has a university (1596; remodelled 1764), a castle (c. 1217), and a cathedral (1312). Pop. 61,000. Cagliari occupies the site of the Carthaginian Carales, and has a Roman amphitheatre, measuring 95½ by 79 yards.

Caherconlish, a village in the county and 8 miles SE. of the town of Limerick.

Ca′hir, a town in County Tipperary, on the Suir, 11 miles NW. of Clonmel. On a rock in the river is a 12th-century castle. Pop. 2000.

Cahirciveen, or CAHERSIVEEN, a Kerry village, at the mouth of the Caher River, 39 miles WSW. of Killarney. Near it is ruined Carhan House, O'Connell's birthplace. Pop. 1900.

Cahors (Kâ-or′; anc. Divona), the chief town in the French dep. of Lot, on a small rocky peninsula on the river Lot, 71 miles north of Toulouse by rail. It has a 12th-century cathedral, a 14th-century bridge, and many Roman remains, including those of a magnificent aqueduct. Fénelon was a student at the university, which, founded in 1321, was united with that of Toulouse in 1751. Marot and Gambetta were natives. Pop. 10,000.

Caicos (Kī′koes), a group of islands belonging geographically to the Bahamas, but annexed in 1874 to Jamaica; area, with Turks Islands, 223 sq. m.; population, 5600 (300 white).

Cairnbulg, an Aberdeenshire fishing-village, 2½ miles ESE. of Fraserburgh.

Cairngorm, a mountain (4084 feet) of Banff and Inverness-shire, 3 miles NE. of Ben Macdhui. From it are named the yellow rock-crystals found in the neighbourhood. Cairntoul (4241) and Braeriach (4248) are of the same group.

Cairns, a port in Trinity Bay, N. Queensland, in a sugar district, ships tin, gold, silver, lead, copper, timber, and agricultural produce; pop. 6500.

Cairo (Kī′ro), the capital of modern Egypt, is in 30° 6′ N. lat., and 31° 26′ E. long., on the right bank of the Nile, 131 miles by railway from Alexandria, and near the apex of the Delta. In the present day it covers about 11 sq. m. of the sandy plain, and extends from Mount Mukattam to the port of Boulak (Bûlâq); but only a small part of the modern city belongs to the Cairo of history, which consisted originally of little more than an immense palace with its attendant buildings. Modern Cairo is built upon the remains of four distinct cities, founded between 641 and 969 A.D.; but with the last hundred years it has been greatly enlarged on the west side, the space between the old city and the Nile having been covered with villas and palaces of European construction. The mediæval city, however, may still be seen in something of its former picturesqueness in the streets and bazaars, which occupy and surround the site of the original palace-enclosure of El-Kâhira. The quarter bounded by the north and east walls, between the Bâb-en-Nasr ('gate of victory') and the Citadel, is still purely oriental; and it is chiefly in this part that are found the numerous mosques, schools, fountains, and latticed houses which represent the art of the Saracens in its most chaste and perfect form. Here is situated the Azhar University (founded 971), to which 10,000 students annually flock from all parts of the Mohammedan world; here is the mosque of El-Hâkim (990), the beautiful Mâristân and tomb of Kalaûn (1288), and the fine mosques of En-Nâsir (1298), Aksunkur (1347), Sultan Hasan (1358), El-Muayyad (1420), and El-Ghôrî (1503), to mention but a few of these exquisite monuments. The mediæval city, however, is rapidly giving way to the encroachments of western commerce and sanitation. The separate closed quarters of distinct trades are becoming rarer. Very few of the old palaces of the Mamelukes are still standing; the most beautiful features of the decoration of ancient houses and even mosques have been despoiled by the travelling collector; and natural decay, aided by centuries of neglect and ignorant injury, has reduced the remains of a perhaps unrivalled epoch of Saracenic art to those shattered but exquisite ruins, which an official 'Commission for the Preservation of the Monuments' now endeavours, not, indeed, to restore, but if possible to rescue from further demolition and decay.

The modern portion of the city consists partly in a few broad streets or 'boulevards,' which pierce the mediæval quarters, and have destroyed many priceless monuments of art, but chiefly in the western suburb of Ismailîa, formed by new villas, built along broad avenues lined with trees, and extending from the square called the Ezbekîya, near or in which are the principal hotels, the opera-house, theatre, and the European shops, as far as Boulak (q.v.). In this suburb are some of the numerous palaces of the Khedive, notably Abdîn, where all official receptions take place; others are situated on the bank of the Nile, where are also barracks and a hospital. Modern Cairo, including the whole circuit, old and new, is the largest city in Africa. Railways and telegraphs connect it with Alexandria, Ismailîa, Suez, Port Said, and Upper Egypt, from which a railway is pushing southwards to join the South African system. The central station (1893) is a magnificent structure. Steamers ply on the Nile as far as the Second Cataract. Gas, the telephone, electric light, electric tramways, and other modern appliances are in general use. There is a busy trade, but chiefly of the transport kind, consisting of the produce of the interior. Manufactures, except rude pottery, turned woodwork, and silver-smithery, are almost non-existent; and the arts of ancient and mediæval Egypt appear to have been almost forgotten. After 1882 Cairo was the centre of English influence in Egypt. Five new bridges across the Nile were built in 1904–10. Pop. (1882) 374,838; (1907) 654,476. See works by Lane (1896), Reynolds-Ball (1898), S. L. Poole (1892, 1902), Margoliouth (1907).

Cairo (Kā′ro), capital of Alexander county, Illinois, at the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi, 180 miles below St Louis. A steel bridge (1888), costing $5,000,000, connects the railways north and south of the Ohio. The city, Martin Chuzzlewit's 'Eden,' formerly suffered much from inundations, from which it is protected by levées, though some of these burst in 1912. There are numerous factories, and a U.S. marine hospital and custom-house. Pop. (1860) 2188; (1890) 10,324; (1910) 14,548.

Caith′ness, a county in the extreme NE. of the Scottish mainland, 43 miles long, 28 miles in extreme width, and 700 sq. m. in area. Except in the west and south, where the mountain-range dividing Caithness from Sutherland attains in Morven a height of 2313 feet, its general aspect is level and bare, being in great part moorland and treeless. The northern sea-coast is bold and rocky, with Dunnet Head and Duncansby Head, on the west side of which is John o' Groat's House (q.v.). The climate is damp and chilly; auroras are seen almost nightly in winter. Only 23 per cent. of the entire area is in cultivation; and the crops are 20 days later in ripening than in the Lothians. There are herring, ling, cod, salmon, and lobster fisheries; Wick being a chief seat of the herring-fishery. The other exports are cattle, oats, wool, and flagstones, of which, as well as of freestone and slate, Caithness contains quarries, the chief that of Castlehills, 5 miles E. of Thurso. The county returns one member; and Wick is its only parliamentary burgh; another town is Thurso. A railway (1874) connects them with the south. Pop. (1801) 22,609; (1861) 41,111; (1911) 32,010.

Caivano (Kī-vah'no), a town of Italy, 4 miles N. of Naples; pop. 12,000.

Cajabamba (Kahabam'ba), a town of the prov. of Chimborazo, in Ecuador, 102 miles S. of Quito, on the arid plateau of Topi (9480 feet). The former town of Riobamba, founded here in 1533, was in 1797 overwhelmed by an earthquake that cost 30,000 lives. The modern Riobamba (18,000), capital of the province, is near.

Cajamarca (Kahamar'ka), a NW. dep. of Peru, between the western chain of the Andes and the Amazon. A railway connects it with the Pacific. Area, 12,000 sq. m.; pop. 450,000. The capital is Cajamarca; pop. 12,000.

Cakemuir, a Midlothian tower, 2 miles E. of Borthwick, whence Queen Mary fled hither.

Calabar', a coast-district on the Gulf of Guinea, now constituting the south-eastern province of the British protectorate of Nigeria. It extends from the Nun mouth of the Niger to the German Cameroon colony. The surface is low and flat, and the climate unhealthy. Palm-oil, palm-kernels, ebony, ivory, india-rubber, shea butter, and beni-seed are the chief articles of commerce. The Scottish Presbyterians have had a mission here since 1846, which has produced beneficial changes. Of the different tribes, the Efik, who are a negro stock, is the most important. The chief town is Calabar (also called Old Calabar or Duke Town, an important port.—The Calabar River enters the Bight of Biafra by an estuary 9 miles broad, which is mainly the estuary of the Cross River. The Cross River takes its rise in Cameroon, and is navigable by steamers for 200 miles above its mouth.—The New Calabar River is a branch or mouth of the Niger. See books by Goldie (1890) and Mockler-Ferryman (1902).

Calabria, the south-west peninsula of the kingdom of Italy, bounded N. by the province of Basilicata; area, 5800 sq. m.; pop. about 1,400,000. It is traversed throughout its entire length of 160 miles by the forest-clad Apennines, whose valleys afford rich pasture. There is no river of any importance; but the valleys and plains are very fertile, yielding wheat, rice, cotton, liquorice, saffron, the sugar-cane, &c., and also the vine, orange, lemon, olive, fig, and mulberry, in luxuriance. The coast fisheries, particularly of the tunny and anchovy, are important. The 'compartimento,' which is very subject to earthquakes, is divided into the provinces of Cosenza, Catanzaro, and Reggio. In ancient times the name Calabria was given to the south-east peninsula, nearly corresponding to the modern province of Lecce, no portion of which is included in modern Calabria, which answers to the ancient Bruttium. The people are a proud, fiery, and revengeful race, long celebrated as among the fiercest of banditti. See Ross and Cooper's Highlands of Calabria (1888).

Calahorra, a cathedral city of Spain, 30 miles SE. of Logroño by rail. It is the ancient Calagurris, Quintilian's birthplace, celebrated for its obstinate but unsuccessful resistance to Pompey's legate (78 B.C.). Pop. 10,000.

Calais (Fr. pron. Ka-lay'), a port in the dep. of Pas-de-Calais, on the Strait of Dover, here 21 m. wide, by rail is 184 miles N. of Paris. It ranks as a fortress of the first class, the old walls, dividing it from its suburb, Saint Pierre, having been demolished since 1883, and their place supplied by a ring of exterior forts. The gate built by Richelieu in 1635, and immortalised by Hogarth, has disappeared; but the cardinal's citadel (1641) still stands on the west of the town. On the south and east are low marshy grounds, which could be submerged in the event of an invasion. A new harbour, comprising a tidal one of 15 acres and a wet-dock of 27, was opened in 1889. Calais is one of the chief ports of debarkation for travellers from England to France, and has steam communication thrice a day with Dover, with which since 1851 it has also been connected by submarine telegraph. With the air of a Flemish more than of a French town, Calais has not much to boast of in the way of objects of interest. The picturesque hôtel-de-ville was rebuilt in 1750, and restored in 1867. The adjoining Tour de Guet (1214) served as a lighthouse till 1848; the present lighthouse is 190 feet high. A museum (1884) occupies the site of the Hôtel Dessin, where Sterne lodged, and Scott, and Lady Hamilton. A handsome English church was built in 1862. The chief manufacture is tulle or bobbin-net, introduced by English from Nottingham in 1818. Pop. (1872) 39,700; (1911) 72,322. Till 997 a small fishing-village, Calais in 1347, after a twelvemonth's siege, was captured by Edward III. of England, and the self-devotion then shown by six of the citizens forms one of the noblest passages of history. The English retained it until 1558, when it was captured by the Duke of Guise, its garrison of 800 men holding it for a week against his 30,000.

Calais (Kal'lis), a town of Maine, 82 miles ENE. of Bangor, at the head of navigation on the St Croix River. There is some shipbuilding and a large trade in lumber. Pop. 6000.

Calañas (Kalân'yas), a town of Andalusia, Spain, 27 miles N. of Huelva and 13 NE. of Tharsis, with which it was connected by rail in 1887. Here is a large copper-mine. Pop. 8000.

Calascibetta (Ka-lâh-shee-bet'ta), or CALATASCIBETTA, a town of Sicily, 64 miles SE. of Palermo; pop. 10,000.

Calatafimi (Kalatafee'mee), a town of Sicily, 8 miles SW. of Alcamo; named from a ruined Saracenic castle, Kalat-al-Fimi. Here, in 1860, Garibaldi defeated the Neapolitans. Pop. 12,000.

Calatayud (Kalatayood'; Arab. 'Ayud's Castle'), a city of Aragon, Spain, on the Jalon, 152 m. NE. of Madrid by rail. It is built out of the ruins of ancient Bilbilis, the birthplace of Martial, which lay about 2 miles to the east. Pop. 11,000.

Calatrava la Vieja (Kalatrâh'va), a ruined city of Spain, on the Guadiana, 12 miles NE. of Ciudad Real. Its defence against the Moors, in 1158, after being abandoned by the Templars, is famous as originating the Order of the Knights of Calatrava.

Calave'ras, an inland county of California, E. from San Francisco, with a picturesquely varied surface, including hills, cañons, prairies, and forests. It is rich in granite, quartz, limestone, and slate, and copper and gold are mined.

Calcutta, the capital of Bengal and, till 1912, of India, second city of the British empire, stands on the left bank of the Húglí (Hooghly), an arm of the Ganges, about 80 miles from the sea by the river. It was founded in 1686, by the removal hither from Húglí of the factories of the East India Company. Calcutta is the Anglicised form of Kalikata, as this again is the Moslemised form (1596) of Kali-ghat, a famous shrine of the goddess Kali, which still exists to the south of the city. In 1707 Calcutta had acquired some importance as a town, and was made the seat of a presidency. In 1756, however, it was unexpectedly attacked by Suráj-ud-Daulá (Surajah Dowlah), the Nawáb of Bengal, and yielding after a two days' siege, was the scene of the tragedy of the 'Black Hole.' The city remained in the hands of the enemy until seven months afterwards, when Clive recaptured it. In 1772-90 Calcutta superseded Murshidabad as seat of the central government in India; in 1852 it was erected into a municipality. Pop. (1837) 229,700; (1891) 741,144; (1911) 1,222,313, of whom 62 per cent. are Hindus, 32·2 Mohammedans, and 4·4 Christians. The appearance of the city as it is approached by the river is very striking. On the left are the Botanical Gardens, destroyed by the cyclones of 1867 and 1870, but since replanted; and the Bishop's College, a handsome Gothic edifice, now used as an engineering college. On the right are the suburb of Garden Reach, the government dockyards and the arsenal, and the Maidan Esplanade, which has been termed the Hyde Park of India. Here, near the river, lies Fort William, the largest fortress in India, constructed (1757–73) at a cost of £2,000,000, and occupying, with the outworks, an area of 2 sq. m. Facing the Esplanade, among other fine buildings, is the old Government House, formerly residence of the Viceroy of India, a magnificent palace erected (1799–1804) by the Marquis of Wellesley. Beyond this, extending northwards along the river-bank, is the Strand, two miles in length, and 40 feet above low-water, with various ghats or landing-places. It is adorned by many fine buildings, including the custom-house, the new mint, and other government offices, and is lined by a splendid series of jetties for ocean steamers. Among other places of interest are the High Court, the Bengal Government Offices, St Paul's Cathedral, the Scotch church (St Andrew's), the Imperial Museum, the town-hall, Bank of Bengal, Jesuits' College, Medical College, university (1857), the domed post-office, and the Treasury. Calcutta has three theatres, several large European hotels, two fine clubs—the Bengal and United Service, four daily English newspapers, and a number of monuments throughout the city, the most noticeable being those to the Marquis of Wellesley, Sir James Outram, and Sir David Ochterlony, the last a column 165 feet high. Of Calcutta's own sons the greatest is W. M. Thackeray.

Although the European quarter of the town is distinguished for its fine public buildings and commodious dwelling-houses, the quarters occupied by the natives present a very different appearance, their houses being in most instances built of mud or bamboo and mats, and the streets narrow and unpaved. Calcutta has been said to be a city of palaces in front and of pig-styes behind. Great havoc was done in the native quarter by the cyclone of 1864, which destroyed 40,700 native houses; and those of 1867 and 1870 were likewise very destructive. Considerable improvements have now been effected; new and wider streets have been opened through crowded quarters; brick houses are fast replacing the huts, and an extensive system of drainage has been carried out to the no small advantage of the inhabitants. The water-supply of Calcutta has been very much improved (1865–88), the large tanks interspersed throughout the city having been superseded by an excellent supply drawn from the Húglí, 15 miles above Calcutta. The result of this has been a marked improvement in the health of the city. Electricity and gas have taken the place of the oil-lamps which till far on in the 19th century lighted the streets at night. Tramways have been extensively introduced, and steam tramways run to some of the suburbs. A canal girds a part of the city beyond the Circular Road. In Howrah and other villages on the right bank of the river are warehouses, iron-works, timber-yards, large jute-mills, &c. Calcutta may be regarded as the great commercial capital of Asia; and its communications by rail and steamboat afford great facilities for its extensive commerce. Navigation on the Húglí has been greatly improved, and an extensive scheme of docks constructed at Kidderpur, at a cost of nearly 3 millions sterling. The river, adjacent to the city, varies in breadth from a quarter of a mile to nearly a mile. Ships of 5000 tons ascend to Calcutta in the usual course, the main difficulty to shipping being the James and Mary shoal, half-way down the river.

Calder, Mid, a Midlothian village, 11½ miles WSW. of Edinburgh. Near it is Calder House, where Knox celebrated the Lord's Supper (1556). Pop. 600.—West Calder, a mining-town, 16 miles WSW. of Edinburgh. Pop. 2600.

Caldron Linn, waterfalls on the Devon, 2¾ miles ENE. of Dollar.

Caledonian Canal, a chain of natural lakes united by artificial canals, running straight across Scotland south-westward from the North Sea to the Atlantic, through Glenmore, or the Great Glen of Albin, in Inverness-shire. The sea and fresh-water lochs in this line are the Moray Firth and Lochs Dochfour, Ness, Oich, Lochy, and Linnhe. Suggested by Watt in 1773, and carried out from Telford's plans in 1803–23, at a total cost up to 1849 of £1,311,270, the canal was designed to avoid the dangerous and tedious navigation of ships, especially coasting-vessels, round by the Pentland Firth; the distance between Kinnaird's Head and the Sound of Mull by this route being 500 miles, but by the canal only 250, with an average saving of 9½ days for sailing-vessels. From the head of the Moray Firth to that of Loch Linnhe, its length is 60½ miles, 37½ miles being natural, and 23 miles artificial. Each cut is 120 feet broad at surface, 50 at bottom, and 17 deep. The highest part is Loch Oich (105 feet); and there are in all 28 locks. Ships of 500 to 600 tons can pass through. The annual expenditure exceeds as a rule the income.

Calf of Man, an island, 1 sq. m. in area, and 360 feet high, at the southern extremity of the Isle of Man.

Cal'gary, a university city in the province of Alberta, Canada, with station on the Canadian Pacific Railway, 840 miles W. of Winnipeg, stands 3380 feet above sea-level, between the Bow and Elbow rivers. It dates from 1884. Pop. 44,000. —There is a bay of this name on the north-west coast of the island of Mull in Scotland.

Cali (Kalee'; in full Santiago de Cali), a town of Colombia, 3300 feet above the sea, 50 miles SE. of Buenaventura by rail; pop. 30,000.

Cal'icut, a seaport of Malabar, Madras Presidency, 6 miles N. of Beypur terminus, and 566

SSE. of Bombay. It was the first spot in India visited overland by Covilham (1486) and round the Cape by Vasco da Gama (1498), being then the chief emporium on the coast. So populous and powerful was it, that it twice repulsed the Portuguese, slaying their commander in 1509, and expelling Albuquerque himself in 1510. In 1792, when it fell into the hands of the English, it was little better than a ruin; but since then it has made progress in trade and population, though the anchorage is an open roadstead. The cotton cloth at first exported hence was called 'calico.' Pop. (1881) 57,085; (1911) 78,417. See Logan's Malabar (Madras, 1887).

California, a state of the American Union, bounded by Oregon, Nevada, Arizona, the Mexican territory of Lower or Old California, and the Pacific Ocean. The parallels of 32° 28′ and 42° N. lat. respectively mark its S. and N. limits. The state has an area of 155,980 sq. m. It is thus larger than any other state or territory, except Texas and Alaska, larger than Italy, or Prussia, or Hungary, and more than a fourth larger than the whole of the United Kingdom. The aspect of the country is extremely varied. Along the eastern border of the state extend the ranges of the Sierra Nevada, which connects with the Cascade Range its northward extension. The scenery in this part of the state is often (as in the wonderful Yosemite and Hetch-Hetchy valleys) very striking. There are twelve peaks which exceed 10,000 feet in height; Mount Whitney (14,898 feet) being higher than any other in the United States outside of Alaska. West of the Sierra Nevada lies the central valley of California, drained by the Sacramento River, and the San Joaquin. The eastern slope of the great valley is very gradual, while the opposite side of the Sierras has a sharp and precipitous descent towards the great basin of Nevada. The Coast Mountains consist of a number of ill-defined ridges. To the south of the San Joaquin Valley a transverse ridge connects the coast-ranges with the Sierra, separating to some extent Southern California from the rest of the state. The coast-line is mostly high and rocky, with only a few bays and harbours. California presents a great variety of climatic conditions. In the north-west the rainfall is excessive, and in the north the winters are rather severe than mild; the coast region of the northern half of the state is damp, with cool or cold nights, even in summer. But Southern California, in temperature and productions, has a semi-tropical character; and the serenity of its climate has made it famous as a resort for invalids. In the south the scanty rainfall and the extreme summer heat detract from an otherwise perfect climate. In general it may be said that the winters in California are mild, and the summers dry, and not intensely hot, though often very dusty. There are practically but two seasons—a more or less rainy winter, and a nearly rainless summer. Extremes of temperature are much less marked than in the states east of the Rocky Mountains. In the interior the thermometer sometimes reaches 120° in summer.

The gold production of the state, at one time enormous, for many years declined, but has of late again increased; in the years 1848–64 the annual product was $56,000,000; in 1910 it was worth over $20,000,000. Among the valuable minerals obtainable are quicksilver, lead, silver, borax, rock-salt, marbles, asphalt, potash-salts, native soda, sulphur, kaolin, and many others; petroleum is abundant; coal is not extensively wrought. Copper, iron, chromium, antimony, and other metals abound. But the mineral wealth of the state is not more remarkable than its agricultural resources, wheat, alfalfa or lucerne, the vine, and all manner of fruits growing luxuriantly. In many sections irrigation facilitates agriculture. The distillation of brandy, sugar-refining, shipbuilding, the packing of meats, silk-growing, and bee-keeping are profitable industries. The fisheries are of growing importance. The principal exports are wheat, barley, wool, wines, brandy, honey, hops, timber, provisions, metals, ores, borax, and other minerals; fish and furs, largely from Alaska; dried, preserved, and green fruits, including oranges, prunes, raisins, and almonds. The Lick observatory at Mount Hamilton belongs to the state university at Berkeley; there is another university at Palo Alto. Pop. (1850) 92,597; (1860) 379,994; (1870) 560,247; (1880) 864,694; (1890) 1,208,130; (1910) 2,377,549. Chinese immigration was stopped by restrictive legislation in 1882–92. The principal cities are San Francisco (q.v.), Los Angeles, Oakland, and Sacramento, capital of the state. The prosperity of the state was greatly stimulated by the opening of the Union Pacific Railway in 1869. In April 1906 a disastrous earthquake and the resultant fires destroyed a great part of San Francisco and injured many other towns.

California was formerly part of Mexico; and between 1769 and 1776 the Franciscans made several settlements here. In 1846, during the war between the United States and Mexico, it was occupied by the former country, and annexed in 1848. The gold discoveries later in 1848 caused a rush of immigrants to the territory, which in 1850 became a state of the Union.

LOWER or OLD CALIFORNIA is a peninsula and a territory of Mexico, continuous southward from the state of California. Its area is 61,562 sq. m. The climate is exceedingly dry, and the surface mountainous, and excepting in some of the valleys, agriculture is hardly practicable. The whale-fishery and pearl-fishery are of some value. Some mining is done, and salt, sugar, orchil, and a little wine produced. Pop. 52,244.

The GULF OF CALIFORNIA, an arm of the Pacific Ocean, which divides the peninsula above described from the rest of Mexico, is 700 miles in length, and varies in width from 40 to 100 miles.

Callander, a Perthshire village, a great tourist centre, on the Teith, 16 miles NW. of Stirling by rail; pop. 1500.

Callao (Span. pron. Kal-yâh'o), the port of Lima, Peru, 7 m. SW. of Lima, on a small bay, possesses a floating-dock, while fine harbour-works, embracing an area of 520 acres, with extensive pier and dock accommodation, were completed in 1875; and the spacious roadstead, sheltered by the island of San Lorenzo, is one of the safest in the world. The huge old Spanish fortress is used for custom-house offices. There are sugar-refineries, ironworks, and sawmills; and the exports are wool, sugar, specie, copper, cotton, bark, hides, guano, and cubic nitre. Pop. 31,000. The present Callao dates only from 1746, when the original city, a little to the south, was destroyed by an earthquake and an invasion of the sea. It was bombarded in 1880 during the war between Chili and Peru.

Callendar, a mansion ¾ mile ESE. of Falkirk, with memories of Queen Mary, Prince Charles Edward, &c. In the grounds is a well-preserved section of the northern Roman wall.

Callernish, a district on the west coast of the island of Lewis, 16 miles from Stornoway, remarkable for its four stone circles.

Callington, a Cornish market-town, 11 miles S. of Launceston. Pop. of urban district, 1700.

Calmar. See KALMAR.

Calne (Kaun), an old market-town of Wiltshire, 6 miles ESE. of Chippenham by a branch-line (1863). It has a town-hall (1882), a free grammar-school (1660), and a large bacon-curing industry. A municipal borough, Calne returned one member till 1885. Pop. 3500.

Caltabelotta (Arabic Kalaat-el-Ballût, 'castle of the cork-trees'), a town of Sicily, 10 miles NE. of Sciacca, with an ancient castle crowning a steep rock above a stream. Pop. 7000.

Caltagirone (Kaltajeero'nay), a city of Sicily, on two hills (2013 feet), 38 miles SW. of Catania. Pop. 40,000.

Caltanisetta, a fortified town of Sicily, 83 miles SE. of Palermo by rail. It has a cathedral, mineral springs, and sulphur-works. Pop. 41,000.

Calton Hill. See EDINBURGH.

Calumet, a mining locality of Houghton county, Michigan, on a peninsula of Lake Superior, 42 m. N. of L'Anse by rail. The Calumet and Hecla copper-mine is one of the richest in the world.

Calvados (Kal-vad'os), a maritime dep. of Normandy. The principal rivers are the Touques, Orne, Dives, Seulles, Aure, and Vire. The coast is formed partly by bold ridges, partly by sand-downs, cliffs, and reefs; the dangerous reef extending for 16 miles between the mouths of the Orne and the Vire was called Calvados, after the Salvador, a vessel in the Spanish Armada shipwrecked here, and from it the dep. takes its name. Towns are Caen (the capital), Bayeux, Falaix, Honfleur, Lisieux, and Trouville. Area, 2130 sq. m.; pop. (1861) 480,992; (1911) 396,318.

Calvi (Kal'vee), a seaport of Corsica, on a peninsula in the Gulf of Calvi, 38 miles WSW. of Bastia. Captured by the English after a siege of fifty-one days in 1794 (when Nelson lost an eye), it was retaken by the Corsicans next year. Pop. 2000.

Calw, or KALW (Kalv), a town of Würtemberg, 35 miles WSW. of Stuttgart. Pop. 5000.

Cam, or GRANTA, a sluggish narrow river, which, rising in Essex, flows 40 miles NW. and NE. through Cambridgeshire, and falls into the Ouse 3½ miles above Ely.

Camargue. See BOUCHES DU RHÔNE.

Cambaluc (Khan-Baligh, 'city of the emperor'), the name by which Marco made Pekin (q.v.) known to Europe.

Cambay (Khambhát), the port and capital of a small Indian feudatory state of Bombay presidency, lies in the north-west portion of the peninsula, at the head of the Gulf of Cambay, 52 miles S. of Ahmedabad. Many ruins still attest its former magnificence, the main cause of its decay having been the gradual obstruction of its seaward navigation. It exports agate, cornelian, and onyx ornaments. Pop. 31,390. The area of Cambay state is 350 sq. m.; pop. 79,722.—The Gulf of Cambay, 80 miles long and 25 broad, was formerly a great commercial resort.

Camberwell, a metropolitan and parliamentary borough (three members) of London. Pop. of metr. bor. (1911) 261,357.

Cambodia, or CAMBOJA (Fr. Cambodge), nominally a kingdom in Indo-China under a French protectorate, but practically a French dependency, on the lower course of the Mekong, between Siam, Annam, and French Cochin-China, and comprising an area of 48,000 sq. m. The coast offers but one river-trading port, Kampot. The mountains of the north and west (some of them over 3000 feet high) generally contain iron, limestone, sandstone, and more sparingly, copper. The greater part, however, of Cambodia consists of alluvial plains, completely inundated during the rainy season. In the north-east are forest-clad tracts. The principal river is the Mekong, Cambodia or Tonlé-Tom, with its tributaries and branching mouths; a kind of backwater is the Tonlé-Sap, expanding into the Great Lake, 100 miles by 25 miles in area, with a depth of 65 feet at its maximum. The climate is divided into the rainy season from April to October, but interrupted in August, and the dry from October to April. The thermometer ranges from 70° to 104° F. The natural products are rice, tobacco, salt fish, betel, cotton, maize, pepper, cinnamon, vanilla, cardamoms, sugar-cane, indigo, manioc, ramee, sesame, gutta-percha, &c. The forests contain excellent timber. Crocodiles are found in the rivers. The population is about 1,500,000, mainly of the Cambodian stock, with 100,000 Annamites, 150,000 Chinese, 40,000 Malays, and a few hundreds of Frenchmen. Pnom-Penh, the capital, at the junction of the 'Four Arms' of the river, has a population of 55,000. The Cambodians approach the Malay and Indian types, are less Mongoloid and more nearly resemble the Caucasian type than their neighbours; they speak a monosyllabic language. The principal industry is the fishing of the Great Lake. In Kompong-Soai are manufactures of iron. The commerce of Cambodia passes mainly through Saïgon by the river Mekhong. The religion of Cambodia is a development of Buddhism, in which the worship of ancestors forms a large part. The most remarkable feature of Cambodia is the splendid ruins of Khmer architecture. The temples and palaces of Angkor (the old capital, north of the Great Lake, abandoned in the 14th century), which were known to Portuguese missionaries in the 16th century, have since 1858 been explored by French and other travellers, and are even less remarkable for their magnitude and number than for their artistic value. They are believed to range from the beginning of our era to the 15th and 16th centuries, the finest dating from between the 8th and 14th.

The ancient kingdom of Cambodia or Khmer formerly extended over a large part of Indo-China. Buddhism would appear to have been introduced in the 4th century. In the 16th and 17th centuries Portuguese, Spaniards, and Dutch successively set up their factories at the mouth of the Mekong. In the 17th century the capital was Cambodia or Pontaipret, a place now much decayed, on the Mekong, opposite the mouth of the Tonlé-Sap. The Khmer kingdom has been dismembered since the 17th century, by Annam first, and then in 1812 by Siam. In 1863 France concluded a treaty placing Cambodia under a French protectorate, and since 1887 it is practically a province like Annam (q.v.) of French Indo-China. See works by Mouhot (trans. 1864), Vincent (1873), Thomson (1875), and others.

Camborne, a Cornish town, 12 miles WSW. of Truro by rail. Round it are productive copper, tin, and lead mines. Pop. 16,000.

Cambrai (anc. Camaracum), a city and first-class fortress of the French dep. of Nord, on the Scheldt, 128 miles NNE. of Paris by rail. Among the principal public buildings are the town-house, archiepiscopal palace, and cathedral (rebuilt after the fire of 1859), with a monument to Fénelon. The town also contains a college, theological seminary, and library, with 40,000 vols. and 1200 MSS. The manufactures are cambric—so named from Cambrai—linen thread, lace, sugar, soap, leather, &c. Pop. 25,000. The League of Cambrai was formed in 1508 by the pope, the emperor, and the kings of France and Spain.

Cambridge (Kaim'brij), county town of Cambridgeshire, lies on the Cam, 58 miles N. by E. of London, and 76 NE. of Oxford. Two important Roman roads, Akeman Street and the Via Devana, here cross the valley of the Cam, and were guarded by the station Camboritum, the outlines of which can still be clearly traced on the north side of the river. In its centre is the partly artificial mound, now known as Castle Hill, which is probably a relic of a yet older British city. The Saxon town of Grantabrygge occupied the site of Camboritum, and it was here that the Norman castle was built. The present town, as distinguished from the university, has not many features of interest. It possesses a guildhall, corn exchange, free public library, and jail. There is also a fine county hospital founded under the will of Dr Addenbrooke in 1743, and an extensive recreation ground named Parker's Piece. Of the churches St Benedict's or Benets has a tower which is a fine specimen of the so-called Saxon architecture, and the church of the Holy Sepulchre is the oldest of the four round churches in England, having been built in 1101 in imitation of the church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. It was restored by the Camden Society in 1841. The parish church of Great St Mary's is also the church of the university, at which all academic services are held. In 1887–90 there was built a fine R. C. church, with a spire 215 feet high. The country round Cambridge is somewhat flat and dull; but on the west side the grounds known as 'the Backs' of the colleges are very beautiful, consisting of gardens, meadows, and avenues. The Cam flows through them, and is crossed by nine bridges. Above Cambridge the Cam is a small but picturesque stream. Below Cambridge it is dull and ugly, but is used for boat-racing. Since 1885 the borough of Cambridge has sent one member to parliament, instead of two as formerly. Pop. (1851) 27,815; (1871) 30,078; (1911) 51,136, of whom 40,028 were within the municipal borough.

The university, dating from about the 12th century, comprises the following colleges in the order of their antiquity: St Peter's, Clare, Pembroke, Caius, Trinity Hall, Corpus Christi, King's, Queens', St Catharine's, Jesus, Christ's, St John's, Magdalene, Trinity, Emmanuel, Sidney Sussex, Downing, Selwyn. Ridley Hall (a theological training-college), Westminster (Presbyterian) College, and Girton and Newnham colleges for women are no part of the university. Teachers number 120, students 3000. Chief among college buildings are King's (1441), with its noble Perpendicular chapel; Trinity, with its courts, its hall, and its library by Wren; and John's, with its splendid new chapel (1869) by Scott. There are also the library, Senate house, Fitzwilliam museum, observatory, union, &c. See works by J. Bass Mullinger (3 vols. 1873–1911), and Willis and Clark (4 vols. 1886), besides Humphry's short Guide (5th ed. 1890).

Among its 'wranglers' (those who constitute the first-class after the public mathematical honour examinations) have been the great English mathematicians for many generations. But amongst the eminent men Cambridge has sent forth have been men as various as Cranmer, Ridley, Latimer, Parker, Tillotson, Tenison, Jeremy Taylor, Isaac Barrow, Paley, Cudworth, Wollaston, Bentley, Porson, Lord Bacon, Harvey, Sir Isaac Newton, Lord Burghley, Falkland, Strafford, Oliver Cromwell, Pitt, Palmerston, Fuller, Pepys, H. Walpole, Wilberforce, Macaulay, Thackeray, Lytton, Darwin, Marlowe, Fletcher, Spenser, Milton, Ben Jonson, Waller, Herrick, Dryden, Cowley, Gray, Byron, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Tennyson.

Cambridge, a city of Massachusetts, virtually a suburb of Boston (q.v.), from which it is separated by the Charles River, is principally distinguished as the seat of Harvard University; it was the home of Longfellow, Lowell, Wendell Holmes, and many other men of letters. Cambridge was first settled in 1630, and is therefore one of the oldest towns in New England. It early became noted for its printing industry, and the manufacture of books is now one of its leading industries; besides which there are large manufactories of furniture, glass, ironware, tinware, bricks, chemicals, net and twine, sugar, soap, and rubber. Within the limits of the city are comprised the different localities of Old Cambridge, or Cambridge proper, which is distinctively the seat of the university; East Cambridge or Lechmere Point, a manufacturing district; Cambridgeport, where is located the city hall, numerous churches, several banks, a convent, and some manufactories; and North Cambridge, which is principally devoted to residences. Here Washington assumed command in 1775. The famous cemetery of Mount Auburn is partly in Cambridge and partly in Watertown. Pop. of Cambridge, 105,000.

Cambridgeshire, an inland eastern county of England, 48 miles long, 11¼ to 33 miles broad, and 864 sq. m. in area (with the Isle of Ely, 372 sq. m.). 92 per cent. of that area consists of arable land, meadow, and pasture, the rest being fens. The surface, except in the south, which is somewhat elevated and on the chalk formations, is flat and thinly wooded, with villages and churches here and there on slight elevations called 'eys' or islands. In a country less level the much-vaunted Gog-Magog Hills, 4 miles SE. of Cambridge, would escape observation. The northern portion of Cambridgeshire forms part of the Bedford Level (q.v.). The chief of the sluggish rivers are the Ouse, which crosses the middle of the county from west to east, with its tributary the Cam; the Nene, which borders the county on the north; and the Lark. These are all navigable to a certain extent. The chief towns are Cambridge, Ely, Wisbeach, March, Thorney, Linton, Soham, Newmarket, and Royston. Cambridgeshire returns three members to parliament, one for each of the Chesterton, Newmarket, and Wisbeach divisions. Pop. (1801) 89,346; (1841) 164,459; (1871) 186,906; (1911) 198,074. Of four great dykes or earthworks the chief is the Devil's Ditch, extending 7 miles south-eastward from Reach to Wood-Ditton. It is 18 feet high on the east side, and was certainly of pre-Roman workmanship, as it is cut through by Roman roads. See works by Holl (1882) and Babington (1883).

Cambuskenneth, a ruined abbey (1147), on the Forth, near Stirling. James III. and his queen are buried here.

Cambuslang, a mining town of Lanarkshire, 4 miles SE. of Glasgow. Here a revival, known as the 'Camb'slang Wark,' was held, under Whitefield, in 1741. Pop. 20,000.

Cambusnethan. See Wishaw.

Camden, a city and port of entry of New Jersey, on the left bank of the Delaware River, opposite Philadelphia, with which it is connected by steam-ferries. It has shipyards and dry-docks, foundries, cotton and woollen mills, and manufactures of machinery, ironwares, paints, oilcloths, &c. Pop. 94,500.

Camden Place, a Kentish seat, 2 miles ENE. of Bromley. Here lived and died the antiquary Camden.

Camden Town, a north suburb of London.

Camelford, a quaint little Cornish town, near the source of the Camel ('crooked brook'), 15 miles W. of Launceston. Within 3 miles of it is the traditional scene of King Arthur's last battle; also near are the great slate-quarries of Delabole. 'Ossian' Macpherson was member for Camelford, which was disfranchised in 1832. Pop. of Lanteglos parish, 1300.

Cam'elon. See Falkirk.

Camerino (Kamayree'no; anc. Camerinum), a town of Central Italy, on a spur of the Apennines, 41 miles SW. of Ancona. It has an archiepiscopal cathedral occupying the site of a temple to Jupiter, and a university (1727). Pop. 13,000.

Cameroon (often Cameroons; in German spelt Kamerun), a German colony on the west coast of Africa, extending from the Rio del Rey, a little east of the Old Calabar River, southwards to Corisco Bay, enclosing Rio Muni, and bounded by French Equatorial Africa. On the north-west the boundary is a line from the Rio del Rey to near Yola on the Benuë, and thence to Lake Chad. The arrangements as to the boundary towards the interior agreed on by Germany and Britain in 1893 were hotly contested by the French. By an agreement with France in 1911, the eastern and southern boundaries were changed in Germany's favour, a small area in the north being ceded to France. The area has been estimated at 300,000 sq. m., and the pop. at 3,800,000. The name is derived from the Cameroon River (Port. camarão, 'a shrimp'), which enters the Bight of Biafra opposite Fernando Po by an estuary over 20 miles wide. The low mangrove swamps that clothe its banks render the climate very trying to Europeans; but much of the interior is high-lying and healthy. The natives belong to the Bantu group, the Duallas living nearest the coast. In 1884 the German flag was hoisted at Cameroon, and by 1893 the revenue decidedly exceeded the expenditure. The country is very fertile; ebony, red-wood, and palm-trees clothing the Cameroon, which also has long been noted as an 'oil river,' and for its cotton and ivory; while many tropical fruits grow wild. North-west of the estuary lie the Cameroon Mountains, a volcanic group, which attain a height of 13,746 feet in the peak Mongo ma Lobah ('mount of the gods'), first scaled by Burton and Mann in 1862.

Campagna, a cathedral city of Italy, 13 miles E. of Salerno. Pop. 10,000.

Campagna di Roma (Kampan'ya dee Rom'a), an undulating, mostly uncultivated plain of Italy, surrounding Rome, including the greatest part of ancient Latium, with a length of about 90 miles, and an extreme breadth inland, to the Alban and Sabine hills, of 40 miles. A broad strip of sandy plain skirts the Mediterranean, with a thick fringe of pines. The ground is almost entirely volcanic, the lakes being formed by craters of extinct volcanoes, and the broad Tiber winds across the plain between banks of tufa, of which the Seven Hills of Rome are composed. Of late, drainage, eucalyptus plantations, and the use of mosquito-netting have greatly reduced malaria.

Campanha, a town of Brazil, 150 miles NW. of Rio de Janeiro. Pop. 6000.

Campania, anciently a province on the west coast of Italy, having Capua as its capital, and now subdivided into the provinces of Benevento, Naples, Salerno, Avellino, and Caserta. It was one of the most productive plains in the world.

Campbell Island, a lonely island to the south of New Zealand, in 52° 34′ S. lat., and 169° 12′ E. long. Though 1498 feet high, and only 85 sq. m. in area, it is yet valuable for its harbours. Discovered in 1810, it served as an observatory during the Transit of Venus in 1874.

Campbelltown, an Inverness-shire village, on the Moray Firth, 12 miles NE. of Inverness. Pop. 670.

Campbeltown, a royal burgh and seaport of Argyllshire, on the E. coast of the Kintyre peninsula, 83 miles SW. of Glasgow by water. It curves round the head of a sea-loch (2¾ × ¾ mile), which is sheltered by Davarr Island (300 feet high), and forms a magnificent harbour. The place is an important fishing centre, and has upwards of twenty whisky distilleries. With the other Ayr burghs it returns one member to parliament. Dr Norman Macleod was a native. Pop. 7600.

Campden, a Gloucestershire market-town, 9½ miles ESE. of Evesham. Pop. of Chipping Campden parish, 1700.

Campeachy (San Francisco de Campeche), a seaport on the west side of the peninsula of Yucatan. It has a citadel, university, naval academy, and shipbuilding docks. The haven is safe, but very shallow, and the trade, principally in logwood and wax, has greatly fallen off; while cigars and palm-leaf hats are almost the only manufactures. Founded in the middle of the 16th century, it was taken, occupied, and burned by buccaneers in 1685. Pop. 17,000.

Camperdown (Dutch Camperduin), a broad tract of low dunes in North Holland, 25 miles N. of Haarlem. Off here Admiral Duncan defeated the Dutch fleet under Admiral Winter, October 11, 1797.

Campinas, São Carlos de (Kampee'nas), a town of Brazil, 44 m. NW. of São Paulo. Pop. 28,000.

Campine (Kam'peen), a coal-mining district in the provinces of Antwerp and Limburg in Belgium, barren except where irrigated.

Campobasso, a town of South Italy, in the Apennines, 52 miles N. of Benevento; pop. 14,400.

Campobello, two towns of Sicily. (1) Campobello di Licata, 17 miles N. of Licata by rail, with sulphur-mines. Pop. 9000.—(2) Campobello di Mazzaro, 32 miles SSE. of Trapani by rail. Pop. 10,000.

Campo-Formio, a village of Northern Italy, 6 miles SW. of Udine. Here peace was concluded on 17th October 1797 between Austria and the French Republic.

Campos, São Salvador dos, a town in the Brazilian province of Rio de Janeiro, on the Parahyba, 30 miles from its mouth. Pop. 35,000.

Campsie, a Stirlingshire parish, 12 miles N. by E. of Glasgow. The Campsie Fells (1894 feet) are part of the Lennox Hills. Norman Macleod is buried in the graveyard.

Campvere (now Vere, Veere, or Ter-Vere), a small fortified Dutch town on the north-east of the island of Walcheren, with a port on the Veergat, which separates Walcheren from North Beveland. The town has fallen into decay; but its former prosperity is indicated by such large edifices as the town-house and cathedral church. Pop. about 900. From 1444 till 1795 it was the seat of a Scottish factory, the only staple port between Scotland and the Netherlands.

Cana, OF GALILEE, the scene of our Lord's first miracle, and the birthplace of Nathanael, was situated in the neighbourhood of Capernaum, to the W. of the Sea of Galilee.

Canaan ('low-land'), the name originally applied to the low coast-land of Palestine on the Mediterranean, inhabited by the Canaanites (strictly so called), as opposed to the mountain-land. Later it became extended to the whole country, yet only to the part west of the Jordan, the part east of Jordan being contrasted with it as the 'Land of Gilead.'

Canada (probably derived from an Indian word kannatha, meaning a village, but understood by the first French discoverers to apply to the country at large), a British dominion occupying the northern part of North America. Canada originally comprised the vast territory extending as far west as the Mississippi, and including the great lakes, which was ceded to Great Britain by France in 1763. Subsequently, at the termination of the War of Independence, it was limited to the region now occupied by the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, described prior to 1867 as Upper and Lower Canada respectively. The Dominion of Canada is a confederation of the colonies of British North America, constituted in 1867. Upper and Lower Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick were the first to unite. The Hudson Bay Territory was acquired from the company, a portion of it formed into the province of Manitoba, the remainder designated the North-west Territories, and both were admitted into the confederation in 1870. Part of the North-west Territories was subsequently divided into districts—Keewatin in 1876, and Assiniboia, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and Athabasca in 1882. The latter four were in 1905 rearranged into the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. In 1871 British Columbia, and in 1873 Prince Edward Island, became parties to the Union, which now includes the whole of British North America, except Newfoundland.

Canada is bounded on the north by the Arctic Ocean, on the west by the Pacific Ocean and Alaska, on the east by Newfoundland and the Atlantic Ocean, and on the south by the United States. The most striking physical features of Canada are the Rocky Mountains, the Laurentian Range (which forms the watershed between Hudson Bay and the St Lawrence, and varies in height from 1000 to 3000 feet), and the chain of immense fresh-water lakes. The eastern portions of Canada are generally well timbered, as are also British Columbia and the west generally north of the Saskatchewan. Westward of the Red River, between the 49th and 55th parallels of latitude, there is an immense fertile plain suitable for general agriculture and grazing (the eastern end being about 800 feet, and the western about 3000 feet, above the level of the sea), extending nearly to the Rocky Mountains. This range consists of triple chains with valleys between; the most easterly has the greatest elevation near the 52d parallel, the highest peaks being Mount Robson (13,700), Mount Athabasca (13,700), and Mount Columbia (12,700). The coast chain includes Mount Logan (19,540) in Yukon. Canada is well watered, the map presenting a network of lakes and rivers. The system of the St Lawrence alone, with the great lakes Superior, Huron, Michigan, Erie, and Ontario (between the last are the celebrated falls of Niagara), drains an area in Canada of 330,000 sq. m. With their outlet the lakes form the greatest fresh-water way in the world. Other important lakes are Winnipeg, Winnipegosis, Manitoba, Lake of the Woods, Great Slave, Great Bear, and Athabasca. Other rivers are the Saskatchewan and the Winnipeg, flowing into Lake Winnipeg, and the Nelson, flowing from it into Hudson Bay; the Assiniboine and the Red River, which flow into Lake Winnipeg; the Albany and the Churchill, emptying into Hudson Bay; the Athabasca and the Peace rivers, flowing into Lake Athabasca, and the Slave River, from it into Great Slave Lake; the Mackenzie, fed from both the Great Slave and the Great Bear lakes, and emptying into the Arctic Ocean; the Fraser and Thompson, in British Columbia, emptying into the Pacific; the Ottawa and the Saguenay, emptying into the St Lawrence; and the St John, in New Brunswick, which it partly separates from the State of Maine. The principal islands of the Dominion are: on the east, Cape Breton, Prince Edward and Magdalen islands, and Anticosti, in the Gulf of St Lawrence; and on the west coast, Vancouver Island and Queen Charlotte Islands. All the great Arctic islands, except Greenland, belong to Canada.

The cold in winter, and the heat in summer are greater than in Great Britain, but the climate is a healthy one. Spring commences two or three weeks later than in England, but the conditions for the rapid growth of produce—warm sunshine and a sufficiency of rain—are so favourable that the crops of the two countries are about equally advanced by the middle of July. The winter may be said to continue from the middle of November to the end of March, or about four and a half months. British Columbia probably possesses the finest climate in North America. In some inland parts of Canada the maximum temperature may be from 90° to 96°, and the minimum from 20° to 26° below zero. But although there are these extremes, the air is always dry, bracing, and exhilarating. All the grain and fruit crops grown in England flourish in Canada; and many species raised in England under glass, such as grapes, peaches, melons, and tomatoes, ripen in southern Canada in the open air. Canada is nearly as large as the whole of Europe, and about 750,000 sq. m. larger than the United States without Alaska. The census figures for 1911 were:

	Area, sq. m.	Pop.
Prince Edward Island	2,184	93,728
Nova Scotia	21,428	492,338
New Brunswick	27,985	351,889
Quebec	351,873	2,002,712
Ontario	260,862	2,523,274
Manitoba	73,732	455,614
British Columbia	355,855	392,480
Alberta	255,285	374,663
Saskatchewan	251,700	492,432
Yukon (Territory)	207,076	8,512
North-west Territories	1,921,685	17,196

In 1912 parts of the North-west Territories were transferred to Manitoba, Ontario, and Quebec. In 1901, 386,545 were natives of the United Kingdom, 19,338 of other parts of the British empire, 127,899 of the United States, 31,231 of Russia, 27,300 of Germany; 1,649,371 were French-speaking. There were 108,112 Indians. The chief towns are Montreal (470,500), Toronto (376,500), Winnipeg (136,000), Vancouver (100,400), Ottawa, capital of the Dominion (87,000), Hamilton (82,000), Quebec (78,200), Halifax (46,600), London (46,300), Calgary (43,700). Catholics were in 1911 2,833,041, Presbyterians 1,115,325, Anglicans 1,043,017, Methodists 1,079,892, and Baptists 382,666. English is generally spoken in the Dominion, but in some parts of the province of Quebec, French is the only language understood. In the Dominion, Quebec, and Manitoba parliaments, members may address the House in either language. The French spoken by the habitants, as the French-Canadians are called, is a patois which in many respects resembles the French of the 17th century more closely than the French of modern Paris. The principal universities are, in the order in which they were founded, as follows: Dalhousie (N.S.), 1820; M'Gill (Que.), 1821; New Brunswick, 1828; Toronto (Ont.), 1828; Queen's, Kingston (Ont.), 1841; Laval (Que.), 1852; Manitoba, 1877. There are about twenty universities in all. The government also established (1874) the Royal Military College at Kingston (Ont.). As regards the liquor traffic, local option prevails; by an Act of the Dominion Parliament in 1882, marriage with a deceased wife's sister was legalised; religious liberty prevails; there is practically free and unsectarian education, and a free and liberal franchise; members of parliament are paid for their services; the parliaments are quinquennial, with redistribution of seats after each census; and there is no system for legalising pauperism, although orphans and the helpless and aged of both sexes are not neglected.

Between the years 1879 and 1911 the annual value of Canadian imports varied from $81,965,000 (1879) to $472,247,500; while that of exports rose from $71,451,000 (1879) to $301,358,500 (1910). In 1910-11 the exports to Great Britain were $137,000,000, and to the United States $119,400,000; while the imports from Britain were $110,600,000, and from the United States $294,400,000. Chief imports are iron manufactures, wool manufactures, coal and coke, sugar, cotton and cotton manufactures, bread-stuffs, silks, chemicals; exports are lumber and other forest-products ($52,200,000, including wood-pulp), cheese ($20,740,000), cattle, wheat and wheat flour ($59,375,000), barley, and other agricultural products, cod and other fish, coal, and minerals. These figures do not give an accurate idea of the total trade of Canada; they only embrace the outside trade, and do not include the large business which takes place between the provinces. Canadian fisheries are, as regards the area available, the largest in the world, embracing nearly 5600 miles of sea-coast, in addition to inland seas, innumerable lakes, and a great number of rivers teeming with fish; and there are twelve fish-breeding establishments in different parts of the Dominion. The total value of the produce of the fisheries varies from $21,000,000 to over $30,000,000 annually.

The minerals are chiefly coal, silver, nickel, gold, copper, iron, asbestos, lead, salt, mineral oils, and gypsum. Gold is or has been worked in Nova Scotia, Quebec, and Ontario, and largely in Yukon (Klondike) and British Columbia, where there are yet immense fields to open up. Silver-mines are worked in Ontario; those at Cobalt (producing also cobalt, nickel, and arsenic) have been the richest yet discovered in Canada. Iron ore is found all over the Dominion. Copper has been mined to a considerable extent both in Quebec and Ontario, and the deposits of the ore are of great extent. There are very large coal-deposits in Nova Scotia. The coast of British Columbia is rich in coal of a good quality. Coal is known to exist over a vast region stretching from 150 to 200 miles east of the Rocky Mountains, and north from the frontier for about 1000 miles. The total value of the mining produce of Canada is over $100,000,000 annually.

The forest-products of Canada constitute one of her most important sources of wealth. They find their way to all parts of the world—to the United States, to the United Kingdom, and to the Australian Commonwealth. Canadian cattle are of good quality, many pedigree and highly priced cattle having been imported for the improvement of the flocks and herds. Herds of Shorthorns, Herefords, Galloways, Polled Angus, and Jerseys are to be found in many parts of Canada. Great progress has been made in dairy-farming, and the factory system has been latterly introduced in the older provinces. There are factories for making cheese, and creameries for butter. Agriculture is the leading interest of the country. Mixed farming is generally carried on, the growing of grain and fruit, stock-raising, and dairy-farming being more or less combined. Great progress has recently been made in the development of manufactures. The 'national policy' comprises a high protective system, but since 1901 gives a preference to Britain.

There are over 26,000 miles of railway in Canada. The Canadian Pacific Railway was completed in 1885; by it the distance from Liverpool to Japan and China is shorter by 1000 miles than viâ New York and San Francisco. The Grand Trunk Pacific system will soon connect New Brunswick with British Columbia, and the Dominion government is building a line to the north of the Canadian Pacific. The railway is not only of importance locally to Canada, as connecting the various provinces and opening up the vast North-west for settlement, but it is of imperial importance as providing a new route to Australasia and the East, available for commerce, and for military and naval purposes. The canals of Canada are works of great utility and importance. The channel of the St Lawrence has been deepened, and vessels of 5000 and 6000 tons now reach Montreal, 700 miles from the Atlantic Ocean. There is a system of canals to overcome the St Lawrence rapids, and the difference in the levels of the great lakes (600 feet) which affords uninterrupted navigation from the Strait of Belleisle to the head of Lake Superior, a distance of 2384 miles, of which 71¾ miles are canals. A scheme has been proposed for a new route between Britain and North-west Canada through Hudson Bay, with a railway from Port Nelson to Manitoba. There are regular lines of steamers between Canada and Britain, and from Vancouver to Australia and China and Japan. The postal and telegraph systems are very complete, and the Pacific cable from Vancouver to Australia was completed in 1902.

The revenue of the Dominion in the years 1887 to 1911 varied from $35,754,000 (1887) to over $117,000,000; the expenditure from $35,658,000 to $88,000,000. The constitution of Canada is contained in the British North America Act of 1867. The government of Canada is federal. The provinces have local legislatures, and they also elect the Federal Parliament which sits at Ottawa.

The Executive Government and authority of and over Canada is vested in the crown of Great Britain. The governor-general for the time being, whose emoluments are paid out of the Canadian revenue, carries on the government in the name of the sovereign, with the assistance of a council, known as the cabinet, consisting of the heads of the various departments, which is responsible to the House of Commons. The Dominion Parliament consists of an upper house, styled the Senate (87 members), and the House of Commons (231 from 1916). The senators are nominated for life by the governor in council. The commons are elected every five years, unless the House be dissolved before its course has run; and there is a special franchise distinct from that in force for the provincial assemblies. At the head of each of the provinces is a lieutenant-governor, appointed by the governor in council, and paid by the Dominion, who is the link between the provinces and the Federal Government. Quebec and Nova Scotia have each a two-chamber legislature; New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba, British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, Alberta, and Saskatchewan only single-chamber assemblies. The executive in each province is responsible to the local legislature. The North-west Territories are administered by a commissioner and a council of four, the territory of Yukon by a commissioner and an executive council of ten. There is also a very perfect system of municipal government throughout the Dominion. Both the counties and townships have their local councils, which regulate the taxation for roads, schools, and other purposes, so that every man directly votes for the taxes he is called upon to pay. Local taxation is very light.

In 1534 Jacques Cartier landed near Gaspé and took possession of Canada for the king of France; but little was done by way of settlement till 1608, when Champlain founded Quebec. From this time till 1763 Canada, from Acadia (Nova Scotia) to Lake Superior and down the Mississippi to the Gulf of Mexico, was held to be French territory. The struggle between Great Britain and France for supremacy was long and bitter, but ended in 1763 with the Treaty of Paris, by which all the French dominions in Canada were ceded to Britain, save the small islands of St Pierre and Miquelon, retained as fishing stations. Hudson Bay territory, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland, had passed to England by the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713. Through the American War of Independence, what is now Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was lost in 1783 to the United States, no longer British colonies. Quebec was in 1791 divided into Lower and Upper Canada. A rebellion took place in 1837–38, and the provinces were reunited in 1840. Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick were separated from Nova Scotia in 1770 and 1784. British Columbia was made a crown colony in 1858, and Vancouver Island joined to it in 1866. The confederation of all the British North American provinces—except Newfoundland—took place in 1867–71, and the prosperity of the Dominion was only temporarily disturbed by the Red River rebellion of 1869. The fishery rights have repeatedly been a source of difficulty between Canada and the mother-country on the one hand and the United States on the other, and the dispute about sealing in Behring Sea and off the Alaskan coasts was only settled by arbitration in 1893. The Alaska boundary dispute was settled in 1903. A proposed reciprocity agreement with the United States led to the fall of the Liberal government in 1911. In 1912–14 the Liberals were sharply divided from the Conservatives and the government as to the way in which Canada should share in the naval defence of the Empire; the Liberals favouring two distinct Canadian units, one Atlantic and one Pacific, and greater local autonomy in administration.

Canandaigua, capital of Ontario county, N.Y., at the N. end of Lake Canandaigua; pop. 8000.

Canary Islands, a Spanish group in the Atlantic Ocean, where 15° W. long. crosses 29° N. lat.; the nearest is only 62½ geographical miles from the NW. coast of Africa. There are seven large and several small islets, with a joint area of 2808 sq. m., and a population of 420,000. The principal islands, proceeding from east to west, are Lanzarote (323 sq. m.), Fuerteventura (326), Gran Canaria (758), Tenerife (877), Gomera (169), Palma (718), and Hierro or Ferro (82). The coasts are steep and rocky, and the surface is diversified with high mountains, narrow gorges, and deep valleys, the loftiest summit being the Peak of Tenerife (12,200 feet). All the islands are volcanic, and everywhere show plain marks of their origin, in the shape of cones, craters, beds of tuff and pumice, and streams of lava; but eruptions have taken place within the historical period only in Tenerife, Palma, and Lanzarote. There are no rivers, and on several of the islands water is very scarce. Upwards of 900 species of wild flowering plants have been found on these islands—420 of them peculiar to the group, and 48 others common to it and to the other North Atlantic islands, but found nowhere else. The flora as a whole is mainly of a South European character, with a large infusion of African genera. As to the cultivated plants, the warmth of the lowest region allows of the growth of the sugar-cane, sweet potato, bananas, date-palm, &c.; whilst above, to the height of 3000 feet, the vine and various cereals are cultivated in a climate resembling that of the south of Europe. Minerals are few and of little importance. The temperature near the sea is genial. The mean annual rainfall amounts to 14 inches. In consequence of the higher temperature, the less rainfall, and drier atmosphere compared with Madeira, and of the much increased facilities for reaching the islands, Orotava and Las Palmas are coming into note as winter-resorts for invalids. A few years ago cochineal was the staple production, but the competition of aniline dyes has been severely felt, and cochineal, no longer bringing in a good profit, has fallen into neglect. The cultivation of the vine (almost ruined after 1853 by the grape disease) and sugar-cane is extending; wine being exported to the European continent, and sugar to Spain. Tobacco is also grown. Submarine cables connect the islands both with the continent of Europe and the African coast.

The Canaries, the Fortunate Islands of the ancients, were rediscovered in 1334, when a French vessel was driven amongst them by a storm. In 1404 the Norman Jean de Bethencourt, having obtained assistance from Spain, mastered four of the islands. His successor having sold his rights to Spain, the king sent a force in 1477 to conquer the Guanches, a brave and intelligent race, tall and comparatively fair. In 1495 the last of the islands was finally annexed to Spain, of which they now form a province.

Candia is the name of a town of Crete (once the capital), and was long the only name by which the island was known in Western Europe. The city of Candia stands on the north coast of the island, north of Mount Ida. Its harbour is sanded up. Pop. 25,200. See CRETE.

Candy. See KANDY.

Canea (anc. Cydonia), present capital and chief commercial town of Crete, on the north-west coast, with a fine harbour. Pop. 24,500.

Canelones (Kan-ay-lo′nez), a dep. of Uruguay. Area, 1827 sq. m.; pop. 100,000. Capital, Guadelupe, 30 m. N. of Monte Video by rail; pop. 3000.

Canicatti, a town of Sicily, on the Naro, 24 miles ENE. of Girgenti by rail. Pop. 20,000.

Canna, one of the Inverness-shire Hebrides, 12 miles SW. of Skye, and 3 NW. of Rum. It rises to 800 feet, and is 4½ miles long, 1 mile broad, and 4½ sq. m. in area. With the adjoining island of Sanday (1 sq. m.) its population in 1841 was 225; it is now under 100, mostly Catholic.

Cannæ, an ancient town of Apulia, Southern Italy, near the mouth of the Aufidus (now Ofanto), and 1½ mile N. of the modern Canosa. Here, in 216 B.C., Hannibal defeated the Romans with prodigious slaughter.

Cannanore, a seaport and cantonment of Malabar, Madras, 50 miles N. of Calicut. Pop. 27,818.

Cannes (Kânn), a watering-place in the dep. of Alpes-Maritimes, charmingly situated on a bay of the Mediterranean, 19 miles SW. of Nice by rail. Though founded by the Romans, it was but a place of 3000 inhabitants, when in 1815 Napoleon landed near it from Elba; nor was it till 1836 that Lord Brougham first selected it as a health-resort. Alexis de Tocqueville, Prosper Merimée, Louis Blanc, Victor Cousin, Auerbach, J. B. Dumas, and the Duke of Albany have died in Cannes; and in 1887 Queen Victoria came to Cannes to visit the place, and to see the beautiful Albany Memorial Church of St George of England, erected with funds raised by the Prince of Wales. Cannes is celebrated for the salubrity of its climate. Low wooded hills shelter it from the north, and it occupies the centre of the great curved bay, 14 miles across, of which Cap Roux and Cap d'Antibes form the extremities. It has a small port, and a trade in flowers, becoming yearly of greater importance. There are farms of violets, roses, oranges, tuberoses, jessamine, and cassia. Population, 24,000, sometimes doubled by winter visitors.

Cannock, a town of Staffordshire, 8 miles NNW. of Walsall. Cannock Chase abounds in important iron industries. Pop. (1851) 2099; (1871) 6650; (1911) 28,586.

Cannstatt, a town of Würtemberg, incorporated in 1904 with Stuttgart. Of Roman origin, it has much-frequented mineral springs, and manufactures of iron, cottons, tobacco, &c. Pop. (1875) 15,064; (1900) 26,500.

Canonbie, a Dumfriesshire Border parish on the Esk, 16 miles N. by E. of Carlisle. Coal is found.

Canosa (anc. Canusium), a town of Southern Italy, 13 miles SW. of Barletta. It has a castle-crowned hill and a cathedral (1101–1825). Pop. 25,000. See CANNÆ.

Canossa, a ruined castle of Italy, 12 miles SW. of Reggio. Here the Emperor Henry IV. in 1077 made submission to Pope Gregory VII.

Canso, CAPE, the eastern extremity of Nova Scotia, at the entrance of Chedabucto Bay. Canso Strait, 17 miles long and 2½ wide, separates Nova Scotia from Cape Breton.

Cantal, an inland dep. of Southern France, formed out of the south portion of the old province of Auvergne. Area, 2200. sq. m.; pop. 223,000.

Canterbury, a municipal, parliamentary, and county borough, and the seat of the metropolitan see of all England, in East Kent, 56 miles ESE. of London by road (62 by rail), and 16 NW. of Dover. Standing in a plain on the banks of the Stour, amid gently swelling hills, it occupies the site of the Roman Durovernum and Saxon Cantwarabyrig ('borough of the men of Kent'), and from its position on the great London highroad must always have been a place of importance. There are some remains of the ancient walls (1¾ mile in circuit and 20 feet high), and the West Gate (c. 1380) is the survivor of six. Near the city wall is a large artificial mound, the Dane John (probably Donjon), and connected with this mound is a public garden, laid out in 1790, from the top of which is a fine view of the country around. The much-mutilated castle, whose Norman keep resembled Rochester's, was once degraded to a gas-work; the guildhall (1439; rebuilt 1697) has been refaced with modern brick; and the Chequers Inn, where Chaucer's pilgrims lodged, lost its 'dormitory of the hundred beds' by fire in 1865.

But the great glory of Canterbury is its magnificent cathedral, whose precincts are entered through a splendid Perpendicular gateway (1517). It was founded in 597 by St Augustine; enlarged by Archbishop Odo (942–959); totally destroyed by fire (1067); rebuilt by Archbishop Lanfranc and Priors Ernulf and Conrad (1070–1130): this building it was that witnessed the murder of Becket (29th December 1170); bereft of its choir by fire (1174); partly rebuilt by William of Sens, and another William, an Englishman; and transformed as to the nave and nave-transepts by Prior Chillenden into the Perpendicular style of that period (1378–1411). The central or 'Bell Harry' tower was carried up (1495) to about double its original height; also in the Perpendicular style, it is 235 feet high. The north-west or Arundel steeple was taken down and rebuilt in 1834–40; like the south-west or Dunstan steeple (1413–44), it is 130 feet high. The north transept is called the Martyrdom transept, for here took place the murder of Becket. In 1220, fifty years later, his remains were translated from the crypt to a shrine in the newly erected Trinity Chapel, eastward of the choir. That shrine was demolished in 1538; but in 1888 a stone coffin, with remains of a skeleton, supposed to be Becket's, was discovered in the crypt, and reinterred there after careful examination. In 1643 the building was 'purified,' as it was called, by order of parliament; still very many most interesting monuments remain—such as the tombs of Stephen Langton, the Black Prince, Henry IV., and Archbishops Peckham, Meopham, Stratford, Sudbury, Courtenay, Chicheley, Stafford, Kemp, Bourchier, Morton, Warham, and Cardinal Pole. The fifty-one statues that since 1863 have adorned the south porch and the western entrance include 19 of Canterbury's 94 archbishops, 21 English sovereigns, 3 deans, Erasmus, &c. Of stained glass there are some fine old specimens, and some new ones of very varied merit. The total length of the cathedral is 522 feet, by 154 in breadth at the eastern transept. Its predominant styles are Transition-Norman and Perpendicular. The large and lofty crypt was in 1561 given up by Elizabeth to a congregation of French and Flemish Protestant refugees, whose successors meet in the Black Prince's Chantry. In 1872 the church narrowly escaped destruction for the fourth time by fire, the outer roof being burned, over all the east portion of the choir.

To the north of the cathedral are the Cloisters, 144 feet square; the Chapter-house (1411); the New Library and the Howley Library; the beautiful Green Court; the Deanery (1517); and the King's School (1541). Marlowe, who was a native, and a drinking fountain to whose memory was erected in 1891, and Dr Harvey, went to school here. These occupy the site, and in part the buildings, of the Benedictine Priory of Christ's Church. The remains of the Abbey of St Augustine, to the east, were in 1844–48 transformed into an Anglican missionary college. Of fourteen old churches, St Martin's has a font, said to be the very one in which Ethelbert was baptised by St Augustine, whilst St Dunstan's contains the monuments of the Ropers, and, in a vault, the head of Sir Thomas More. The Clergy Orphan School occupies a conspicuous position on St Thomas's Hill, a mile out of the city; the Simon Langton Schools were opened in 1882. There are, besides, several hospitals, large barracks, a corn exchange, and an art gallery presented to the city in 1882 by one of her sons, Sidney Cooper, R.A. There is also a free library and museum. Canterbury has a large trade in grain and hops. Races used to be run on Barham Downs, but they were eclipsed in importance by the Canterbury 'cricket week.' Since 1885 the city has returned only one member. Pop. (1851) 18,388; (1911) 24,626. See works by Willis (2 vols. 1845–69), Dean Stanley (new ed. 1904), Dean Hook (12 vols. 1860–76), R. Jenkins (1880), Teignmouth Shore (1907), and Taylor (1912).

Canterbury, a provincial district of New Zealand (q.v.), in the centre of the South Island, with an area of 14,039 sq. m.; till 1876 it was a province, with Christchurch as its capital, and Lyttelton as its port. The district was settled in 1850 by the Canterbury Association, a society of peers, bishops, and commoners interested in the colonisation of New Zealand. It has a coastline of 200 miles, a breadth of 150, and is well watered by numerous rivers. Coal, iron ore, fireclays, quartz, and gold exist, and coal-mines are in operation. On the eastern side of the great range of hills are the far-famed Canterbury Plains, the great sheep district of the Dominion. There is railway connection between Christchurch and Dunedin, with various branch lines. The staple trade is in wool and grain. Canterbury has an Anglican and a Roman Catholic bishop. The medicinal hot springs at Hanmar Plain in Amuri district have considerable celebrity. Mount Cook (13,200 feet) is the highest mountain in New Zealand. Pop. (1871) 46,801; (1891) 128,392; (1911) 173,185.

Canton, a large commercial city and port in the south of China, and capital of the province of Kwang-tung (of which the name Canton is merely a corruption), is situated in 23° 7′ 10″ N. lat., and 113° 14′ 30″ E. long., on the north or left side of the Shu-kiang, or Pearl River, in a rich alluvial plain, 70 miles N. of Macao, at the mouth of the estuary of the Canton River, and 90 NW. of Hong-kong. The city is surrounded by walls 25 to 40 feet high and 20 thick, with an esplanade inside, six miles in circumference; and it is divided by a partition wall running east and west into two unequal parts, the north or old city, much the larger, and the south or new city. There are twelve outer gates, four gates in partition wall, and two water gates; shut and guarded by night. The entire circuit, including suburbs, is nearly 10 miles. At the south-west corner of the suburbs, south of the river, are the Hongs or European quarter, divided from the river by a quay, 100 yards wide, called Respondentia Walk. The streets, more than 600, are in general less than 8 feet wide, and very crooked. The houses along the water-side are built on piles, and subject to inundations. There are two pagodas, the 'Plain Pagoda,' erected ten centuries ago, 160 feet high, and an octagonal nine-storied pagoda, 175 feet high, erected more than 1300 years ago; and 124 temples or Joss-houses. The Honam temple covers, with its grounds, 7 acres, and has 175 priests attached. The 'Temple of Filial Duty' has 200 priests, supported by 3500 acres of glebe-lands. The priests and nuns in Canton number more than 2000, nine-tenths of them Buddhists. The 'Temple of Five Hundred Genii' has 500 statues of various sizes in honour of Buddha and his disciples. Examination Hall, in the old city, is 1330 feet by 583 feet, covers 16 acres, and has 8653 cells. Nearly half the craft on the river are fixed residences, and the population on land and water can hardly be less than a million and a half. The climate of Canton may be pronounced healthy. The average temperature ranges from 42° to 96° F.; though falls of snow occurred in 1835 and 1861. The average rainfall is 70 inches. Pop. 1,000,000.

The admirable situation of Canton, with a safe and commodious anchorage for the largest vessels, explains how, from an early period, it was a favourite port with foreign merchants. The earliest notices date back to two centuries B.C.; and the Arabs made regular voyages hither as early as the 9th century A.D. The Portuguese found their way to it in 1517, and were followed by the Dutch a hundred years later. These in turn were supplanted by the English before the close of the 17th century, and an immense trade was carried on by the agents of the East India Company, whose monopoly ceased in April 1834. In 1842 Canton became one of the five 'treaty ports' open to foreign commerce. The city was captured by the allied French and English forces in December 1857, and continued to be garrisoned by them till October 1861. The chief exports are tea, silk, porcelain, matting, sugar, and cassia; the chief imports, cotton, woollen, and metal goods, food-stuffs, kerosene, &c.

Canton River is a name given to the chief channel by which the united waters of the Si-kiang and the Pe-kiang rivers reach the sea through the delta. Shu-kiang or Pearl River is another name for part of this waterway; and Boca Tigre (q.v.), Bocca Tigris, or Boque, a part of it below Canton, where the estuary is compressed between escarped hills.

Canton, capital of Stark county, Ohio, on Nimishillen Creek, 56 miles SSE. of Cleveland, with foundries, iron and steel works, paper and wool mills. Pop. 50,000.

Cape Breton (Brit'un), a rocky Canadian island of irregular form, at the eastern extremity of Nova Scotia, from which it is separated by the Gut of Canso, one mile broad. Measuring 100 by 85 miles, it has an area of 3120 sq. m., with a pop. of 122,000. The coast is greatly indented, and an inlet, the Bras d'Or, entering the island on the east, forms a lake (50 by 20 miles) which renders most of the interior accessible by water, and which, now continued by a ship-canal (½ mile) to St Peter's Bay, on the south coast, bisects the island. The climate is moist, but milder than that of the adjoining continent; the principal exports are timber, fish, iron ore, and coal. Originally French, it was taken and retaken by the English in 1745–58; and in 1819 became part of the province of Nova Scotia. The towns are Sydney, Arichat, and Port Hood, the once strongly fortified Louisbourg is now a village. There are important iron and steel industries.

Cape Coast Castle, a British settlement in the Gold Coast Colony, Upper Guinea, 315 miles W. of Lagos. It lies in a chasm, and is defended by the great castle and by three small forts on the hills behind. Ceded by the Dutch in 1665, from 1672 it was possessed by several companies till 1843, when it was taken over by government. In 1875 it was superseded by Accra as capital of the Gold Coast. L. E. Landon died here in 1838. Pop. 11,000.

Cape Cod, a narrow peninsula of Massachusetts, in form like the letter L, which, with a length of 65 miles, forms the south-east boundary of the great bay of that state. A canal across the neck was constructed in 1910–13.

Cape Province, formerly COLONY OF THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE, is a province of the Union of South Africa situated at the southern extremity of the continent. It is bounded on the N. by German South-west Africa, the Bechuanaland Protectorate, the Orange Free State, and British Basutoland; on the S. by the Southern Ocean; on the E. by Natal; and on the W. by the Atlantic Ocean. Neither Basutoland (q.v.), the Bechuana Protectorate, nor the territories of the South Africa Company (see MATABELELAND, MASHONALAND, ZAMBESIA) are part of the province. All sections are under the authority of the High Commissioner for British South Africa, who is also Governor-General of the Union. Pondoland was annexed to the Cape Colony in 1894, and in 1895 the crown colony of British Bechuanaland was also incorporated. The total area of the Cape Province is now estimated at 277,000 sq. m.

The Cape Province is deficient in navigable rivers and in landlocked arms of the sea. The best natural harbour, Saldanha Bay, is unused on account of the aridity of the land around it. Table Bay, the principal harbour, is naturally much exposed on the north-west; but has been protected by a breakwater (see CAPETOWN). False Bay, lying to the east of the Cape of Good Hope, includes Simon's Bay, which is the imperial naval station. Algoa Bay has Port Elizabeth on its western shore. Running parallel to the coast-line of the Cape Province, and at an average distance from it of about 150 miles, there is a range of mountains which forms the watershed of the country, and is known as the Stormberg, the Sneeuberg, the Nieuwveld Mountains, the Roggeveld Mountains, and Kamiesberg. The Eastern Province, along with the Cape peninsula, is on the whole better watered than the interior portion of the Western Province, which is largely covered with the Karroo or steppe, dreary-looking, but of great value to the sheep-farmer. Beyond the belt of country skirting the sea-coast agriculture can only be successful where there is a suppy of water for irrigation.

The climate of the Cape Province and of the interior of Southern Africa generally is one of the finest in the world, and eminently suited for Europeans. As a health-resort the Cape has long been favourably known. The climate on the coast is superior to that of England. But it is after the traveller leaves this well-watered belt that he finds himself in a rare and yet balmy atmosphere which is exhilarating to the healthy, and most beneficial to those subject to lung-complaints, especially if they have arrived in the country at a sufficiently early stage. At Wynberg, near Capetown, the mean temperature in winter is 55°, in summer 63°, the summer maximum being 96°. On the elevated plateau at Aliwal North, the winter mean is 48·8°, summer mean 67·4°, summer maximum 102°. In 1911 the area and population were as follows:

Cape proper	206,860	1,552,137
East Griqualand	7,594	249,038
Tembuland	4,117	236,056
Transkei	2,552	188,715
Walfish Bay	430	3,223
Pondoland	3,918	234,317
Bechuanaland	51,254	99,538

In 1904 the census (delayed by the war) showed 579,741 whites and 1,830,074 coloured, a total of 2,409,815. In 1911 there were 583,177 whites and 1,979,847 coloured (natives, Malays, Indians, &c.). The natives of the Cape Province are steadily increasing. There are two main groups of natives—the yellow-coloured and oblique-eyed Gariepine people (named from the Gariep or Orange River); and the darker, and far more numerous Bantu family. The Gariepine family includes Hottentots, Korannas, Namaquas, and Bushmen. The Bantus are subdivided into numerous tribes, Kaffirs, Zulus, Basuto, Bechuana, Matebele, Mashona, &c. The earliest settlers were from various countries in North Europe, being the servants of the Dutch East India Company; to these were added 150 Huguenot refugees in 1688. In 1820 English and Scotch settlers were placed by government on land in the Eastern Province; and after the Crimean war the German Legion was settled in King Williamstown district. The discovery of diamonds caused a rush to Griqualand West. The eastern portion of the Cape is, roughly speaking, an English country. The western part is mainly occupied by Dutch-speaking descendants of the early settlers. There are 8000 miles of road in the Cape proper. The railway system extended in 1911 to 3400 miles of government line (besides a few short private lines), belonging to three main systems, Western, Midland, and Eastern. Capetown is now connected through Mafeking with Rhodesia, Beira, and Belgian Congo, and, by the line running through the Orange Free State, with Johannesburg in the Transvaal, which again is connected with the east coast at Delagoa Bay. There are over 8000 miles of telegraph line.

A few elephants and buffaloes are still 'preserved' in the Knysna and Zitzikama forests, but the hippopotamus, rhinoceros, giraffe, eland, quagga, gnu, and other large game, are, with the lion, no longer to be seen within the Cape Province. Smaller antelopes are still found, with baboons, monkeys, wild cats, porcupines, jerboas, hyraxes, ant-eaters, tiger-cats, leopards, jackals, and wild dogs. The variety of birds is also great, and some are peculiar, such as the secretary-bird, the honey-bird, the weaver-bird, and the ostrich. Reptiles still abound; the alligator is chiefly found beyond the province, but the monitor, the cobra di capello, puff-adder, and other snakes occur within its bounds. Insect life is also abundant. It is probable that no single country in the world has contributed so largely to European conservatories and gardens as the Cape of Good Hope—sending such handsome flowering shrubs as the pelargoniums, heaths, proteas, and the lovely bulbous plants of irideæ, amaryllideæ, and liliaceæ.

The chief exports from the colony are diamonds and wool. Cattle are also extensively raised, especially in the grassy districts of the Eastern Province. Pneumonia, known as 'lung-sickness,' was introduced from Holland in 1857, and has never since been eradicated. In the northern parts of the colony, and more especially in the countries beyond the colony, horses are subject during the summer months to a climatic disease known as 'the horse-sickness.' Ostrich-feathers have long been an article of export from the Cape, and in 1864 ostrich-farming was commenced at the Cape, and is now one of the leading industries. Viticulture was introduced by Dutch settlers in 1653, and developed by the Huguenot refugees. In 1900 there were about 83,000,000 vines in the Cape Colony, producing nearly 5,000,000 gallons of wine and over 1,100,000 gallons of brandy. The climate of the south-western part of the colony is said to excel that of any other country for viticulture. Tobacco is extensively grown in certain districts. The climate of the colony is favourable to the growth of fruit in great variety.

Woollen fabrics, leather, furniture, and soap are produced. Fishing is carried on in all the bays which indent the coast. Guano deposits are found on the small islands along the west coast. The diamond-fields of Kimberley, and its huge mines, have (since 1867) become the most important centre of the industry in the world. The finest South African diamond is the 'Porter-Rhodes diamond,' found in 1880, and valued at £60,000. Diamonds are far the largest single item of export from the colony, having nearly three times the value of the wool exported. Gold is found in various districts. Copper is found throughout the district of Namaqualand. Coal is at present worked only in two or three spots. Iron ores are abundant in several places; and lead, zincblende, manganese, as well as valuable stones, such as garnets, agates, crocidolites, jaspers, chalcedonies, amethysts, &c., are found, as well as fine marbles and granite.

In its last eleven months of separate existence (1909–10), the colony had a revenue of £7,747,332 (double that of 1887), and an expenditure £7,611,298. The public debt taken over by the Union was £48,240,000. The imports were valued at £17,789,200; the exports, of which the principal items were diamonds and wool, with hides, ostrich-feathers, angora goats' hair, copper ore, and wine, at £46,577,000. The total value of diamonds exported from 1867 to 1909 was £153,856,299.

In 1910 the colonial government was abolished, and the colony became, with the Transvaal, the Orange Free State, and Natal, an original province of the Union of South Africa. The executive of the Union is in the hands of the Governor-General in council. Parliament meets in Capetown, and consists of a House of Assembly and a Senate, the latter partly elected by the provincial councils, partly nominated. Rhodesia, Basutoland, the Bechuanaland Protectorate, and Swaziland have not entered the Union; but the South Africa Act provides for the admission of Rhodesia as a province, and the taking over of the government of the others by the Union at some future date. Each province has an administrator and a provincial council with restricted powers, for the Union is not a federation. The franchise varies from province to province. The Cape allows blacks to qualify as voters for the Union parliament and the provincial council. The Cape is divided into eighty divisions or counties, in each of which there is a divisional council elected every three years, which is empowered to levy rates and manage the business of the division. The chairman is the civil commissioner of the division, and is usually also the resident magistrate. The large towns are under mayors and town councils; smaller towns have municipal councils; and villages have management boards. There is an appeal from the courts to the supreme court of South Africa. Education is provided for by 4000 state-aided schools, the enrolled pupils numbering 200,000, besides many private and mission schools. The University of the Cape of Good Hope was founded in 1873, and received a royal charter in 1877.

The Cape of Good Hope was discovered by the Portuguese navigator Bartholomew Diaz in 1486. It was not till 1652 that the Dutch East India Company took possession of Table Bay and fortified it, not at first with purposes of colonisation, but for the supply of the Company's vessels on their way to and from the East Indies. Colonisation soon began; and when in the 18th-century wars the French conquered Holland, an English fleet was sent to hold the Cape for the allies. It was restored to Holland at the peace of Amiens in 1802, but was retaken by Britain in 1806, after some fighting. Since 1814 it has been definitively British. In 1825 an executive council, and in 1835 a legislative council, were established; in 1853 a regular colonial parliament came into being. Responsible government was conceded in 1872; and the chief difficulties have been Kaffir wars, the harmonising of the interests of Dutch and British elements, and intercolonial disputes leading to the Union of 1909–10.

Cape Haytiën, or Le Cap, a seaport on the north coast of Hayti, 90 miles N. of Port au Prince. Pop. 30,000.

Cape Horn, &c. See Horn (Cape), &c.

Cape of Good Hope, popularly regarded as the most southerly promontory of Africa, though it is half a degree N. of Cape Agulhas. This celebrated promontory is in 34° 22′ S. lat., and 18° 29′ E. long., being the termination of Table Mountain (3582 feet). On the north it forms Table Bay; on the west it shuts in False Bay and Simon's Bay. 'The Cape' was actually reached and doubled by the Portuguese Diaz, driven out of his reckoning by tempests, in 1486—six years before Columbus saw America. The cape Diaz had from his experiences on the voyage named 'Cape of all the Storms' John II. of Portugal renamed Cabo de Buena Esperanza ('Cape of Good Hope'). But it was only in 1497 that Vasco da Gama took advantage of the discovery, rounding the Cape on his adventurous voyage from Lisbon to Calicut.

Cape River, or Rio de Segovia, a river of Nicaragua, flowing nearly 300 miles north-eastward to the Caribbean Sea, and forming part of the boundary with Honduras.

Capernaüm ('village of Nahum'), a prosperous place in the time of Christ, identified generally with Tell Hum, on the NW. coast of the Sea of Galilee, but by Conder with Khan Minieh, in the NE. corner of the plain of Gennesaret.

Capetown, capital of the Cape Province and legislative capital of the Union of South Africa, lies between the north base of Table Mountain and Table Bay. The view of the town from bay or mountain is most imposing. For years the early history of Capetown and of the Cape Colony were one and the same. The town was laid out by its Dutch founders (1652) with mathematical preciseness—the main thoroughfares crossing one another at right angles. The houses of old Capetown are mostly flat-roofed and whitewashed. A few church towers rise here and there, and break the monotony, with an occasional mill-chimney. Beautiful government gardens in the heart of Capetown serve the purposes of a public park. There is a fine oak avenue, extending ¾ mile through the gardens. The old Government House, now a picture-gallery, on the left side of the gardens as one goes townwards, is a heavy 17th-century building, altered and added to from time to time. Other edifices are the handsome Union Houses of Parliament, the City Hall, the dignified Anglican cathedral (ded. 1913), the public library, museums, the Fine Arts Gallery, the law courts, the government offices, the old castle, the town-house, the Standard Bank, the railway station, and the Commercial Exchange. The old 'stoeps,' or railed-off verandas, which blocked the side pavements, disappeared with the 19th century. The town is well drained and paved, has a good water-supply, electric tramways, and a suburban railway. The earliest conception of the Europeans in settling at the Cape was to make it a place of call for passing vessels belonging to their own nation. In a higher sense, the Capetown Harbour Board, in erecting the breakwater and constructing the docks, made Table Bay a place of call for passing vessels of all nations. The docks were opened in 1870, the graving-dock in 1882; the harbour is controlled by the Harbour and Railway Board of the Union. Pop. 67,000, or with suburbs about 200,000.

Cape Verde, the most westerly headland in Africa, between the rivers Gambia and Senegal, in 14° 53′ N. lat., 17° 34′ W. long. The Portuguese discovered it in 1443.

Cape Verde Islands (Ilhas do Cabo Verde), a group of Portuguese islands, lying 350 miles W. of Cape Verde. They comprise ten inhabited islands, the chief being Santiago, São Antão, Fogo, Brava, and São Nicolão. Their total area is about 1480 sq. m.; and since 1820 the population has increased from less than 50,000 to about 150,000. The islands are all very mountainous, and owe their origin to the action of submarine volcanoes. The highest peak (9157 feet) in Fogo was active so recently as 1847. The climate is unhealthy during the rainy season (August to October), and long droughts have given rise to great famines, as in 1730–33 and 1831–33, which latter cost 30,500 lives. Though water is deficient, vegetation is luxuriant. Coffee, jatropha, millet, and tamarinds are grown, as are sugar-cane, manioc, yams, maize, tobacco, oranges, cotton, and indigo; the woods have begun to increase; and cattle-breeding is an important industry. Turtles are abundant in the surrounding seas; amber and archil are found on the coasts; and much salt is still procured from the lagoons. The inhabitants, who are mostly negroes and mulattoes, indolent but harmless, speak a bastard Portuguese. They are all Catholics. Porto Grande, in São Vicente, is an important coaling station for British steamers. The islands were discovered in 1441–56 by the Portuguese. Slavery was abolished between 1854 and 1878. See Darwin's Volcanic Islands (1844), and Ellis's West African Islands (1885).

Cape Wrath (said to be from Scand. hvarf, 'turning'), a grand pyramidal promontory of granite gneiss, forming the north-west extremity of Scotland and of Sutherland, 69 miles NW. of Lairg. It is 523 feet high, and on it is a lighthouse (1828), seen 27 miles off.

Capheaton, Northumberland, the seat of the Swinburnes, 11 miles WSW. of Morpeth.

Capo d'Istria, a fortified seaport of Austria, on a rocky island in the Gulf of Trieste, 9½ miles SSW. of Trieste. Connected with the mainland by a stone causeway, nearly half a mile long, it has a modern cathedral, and a Gothic townhall on the site of a Roman temple. Pop. 10,000.

Cappadocia, an ancient district, in its widest sense including the whole north-eastern part of Asia Minor from Mount Taurus to the Euxine.

Cappamore, a village in the county, and 12 miles SE. of the town, of Limerick. Pop. 500.

Cappel, a village in the Swiss canton of Zurich, 4½ miles N. of Zug. Here Zwingli was killed in conflict with the Catholics, 11th October 1531.

Cappoquin, a town of County Waterford, on the Blackwater, 151 miles SSW. of Dublin. Pop. 1000.

Caprera (Ka-pray′ra), one of the small Buccinari Islands, in the Strait of Bonifacio, off the northern extremity of Sardinia. Measuring 6 by 2 miles, and 10½ sq. m. in area, it is rocky and bare, and was formerly the abode only of wild goats—whence its name (Lat. and Ital. capra, 'a goat')—and rabbits. It was the much-loved home of Garibaldi from 1854 till his death here in 1882. He was buried behind his house. In 1885 the island was purchased from his heirs by the Italian government.

Capri (Kâh′pree; anc. Capreæ), a charming Mediterranean island, at the entrance of the Bay of Naples, 3¾ miles from Cape Campanella, and 21 S. of Naples. Only 3¾ sq. m. in area, it yet displays a rich variety of beautiful scenery, and consists of two mountain masses 1918 and 860 feet high.

On a shelving rock at the base of the eastern and lower mountain stands the town of Capri, with walls, gates, and drawbridges, and a pop. of 4000. Till 1876 it communicated with Anacapri, on the western tableland, by a rock-hewn flight of 536 steps; now, however, there is a carriage-road between the two places. The coast is precipitous, with only two safe landing-places, both near Capri. The island was the scene of the last infamous debaucheries of the Emperor Tiberius. Ruins are still found of Roman baths, aqueducts, and villas. The wine of Capri, both red and white, is well known; and delicious quails, alighting on the island during their migrations to and from Africa, are taken in nets. To the west of the town of Capri is the Grotta Azzurra (Blue Grotto), a remarkable cavern, 118 feet long, 98 wide, and 40 high, but entered from the sea by a narrow opening not more than 3 feet high. See Gregorovius, Island of Capri (trans. Boston 1879); Alan Walters, A Lotos-Eater in Capri (1893).

Capua, a fortified city of Italy, on the Volturno, 27 miles N. of Naples by rail. It has a fine cathedral, an antiquarian museum (1874), and a tower commemorating the sanguinary storming of the city by Cæsar Borgia in 1501. Pop. 15,000.—The ancient Capua, which for wealth and population ranked second only to Rome and Carthage, and in which Hannibal's men became enervated (216 B.C.), was situated 3½ miles SE. of the present city, its site being occupied by the modern town of Santa Maria di Capua Vetere. It was finally destroyed by the Saracens in 840. Among its Roman antiquities is a well-preserved amphitheatre, capable of holding 60,000 spectators.

Carabo′bo, a state of Venezuela, between the Caribbean Sea and the state of Zamora. Area, 2000 sq. m.; pop. about 200,000. The capital is Valencia; and the chief port, Puerto Cabello.

Carácas, the capital of the republic of Venezuela, is situated in 10° 31′ N. lat., and 67° 5′ W. long., 6 miles (24 by rail) S. of La Guaira, its port. Built on the southern slope of the Avila (8635 feet), it is 3025 feet above sea-level, is regularly laid out, and well supplied with parks and gardens, water and gas, telephones, newspapers, tramways, and railways. The most notable edifices are the Federal Palaces and other official buildings, including the president's 'Yellow House;' the university; the Exhibition Palace; the cathedral; the magnificent basilica of St Ann (£200,000); and over a score of hospitals and charitable institutions. Population, 95,000. The neighbourhood is subject to earthquakes; in that of 1812, 12,000 citizens perished.

Caramania, a name sometimes given to part of the central tableland of Asia Minor, from the town of Karaman (pop. 7000), lying at the northern base of Mount Taurus. It is mostly in the province of Konieh.

Caravaca, a town of Spain, 40 miles NNW. of Murcia. Pop. 16,000.

Caravaggio (Karavad′jo), a town of north Italy, 19 miles SSE. of Bergamo by rail. It has a famous church, to which pilgrimages are made, and was the birthplace of three painters, all surnamed Caravaggio. Pop. 10,000.

Caravellas, a Brazilian port, 475 miles NE. of Rio de Janeiro, on the Caravellas, 5 miles from its mouth. Pop. 4000.

Carberry, a hill 3 miles SE. of Musselburgh, where Queen Mary surrendered (1567).

Carbondale, a town of Pennsylvania, on the Lackawanna River, 16 miles NNE. of Scranton by rail, with foundries and planing-mills, and rich beds of anthracite coal. Population 15,000.

Carcagen′te, a town of Spain, on the Jucar, 25 miles SSW. of Valencia by rail. Pop. 15,000.

Carcassonne (the Carcaso of Cæsar), a town in the French dep. of Aude, on the river Aude, and the Canal du Midi, 56 miles SE. of Toulouse by rail. The river, here spanned by two bridges of 1184 and 1846 feet, divides it into the old and the new town; the former, built on a height, is much more picturesque, its ramparts and towers dating partly from the time of the Visigoths, and partly, like the many-towered castle, from the 11th or 13th century. In 1210 this old town suffered greatly at the hands of Simon de Montfort, who here burned 400 Albigenses. In 1356 it effectually resisted the Black Prince. Cloth-making is the staple industry; there are also manufactures of paper, leather, and soap. Pop. 30,000. See works by Viollet le Duc (1858) and Boyer (1884).

Car′chemish (mod. Jerablûs), an ancient city on the Upper Euphrates, NE. of the modern Aleppo, was long the northern capital of the Hittites.

Car′denas, a seaport of Cuba, on the north coast, 75 miles E. of Havana, with which it is connected by rail. Pop. 30,000.

Cardiff (Caer-Taff, 'fort of the Taff'), a municipal, parliamentary, and county borough and seaport, the county town of Glamorganshire, South Wales, on the river Taff, a new bridge over which was opened in 1890 by the Duke of Clarence, 56 miles SW. of Gloucester, and 170 W. of London. Its progress in recent years is the most remarkable, the population rising from 2000 in 1801 to 10,077 in 1841, 82,761 in 1881, and 182,259 in 1911. Since 1905 the mayor is called Lord Mayor. An ancient municipal borough, with Cowbridge and Llantrissant it returns one member to parliament. Among the public buildings are the infirmary, town-hall, free library and museum, jail, law-courts, county buildings, the university college for South Wales (1883; new buildings, 1909), the Roman Catholic pro-cathedral, baths, and numerous halls. The National Museum of Wales has been erected in Cathays Park, which is set aside for public buildings.

The port of Cardiff is the outlet for the large mineral and manufactured produce of the central portion of the South Wales mineral field, in which are the populous districts of Merthyr-Tydvil, Rhymney, Aberdare, and the Rhondda Valley. The town is also one of the chief stations on the Great Western line from London to Milford Haven. The Bute Docks, with an area of 173 acres, constructed at the expense of the Bute estate, have cost nearly four millions sterling, and belong to the Cardiff Railway Company. There is also a tidal harbour, with a low-water pier 1400 feet in length. The imports to Cardiff include copper ore, live cattle, salted provisions, foreign fruit and vegetables, corn and flour, &c. The Penarth Docks, about one mile to the westward, form another outlet for the trade of the district. The Barry Docks (1888), of 114 acres, add enormously to the shipping facilities of Cardiff. The growth of Cardiff began with the opening of the canal from Merthyr-Tydvil to the sea (1794); the first dock was opened only in 1839; the second or East Dock dates from 1854. The corporation, which has spent great sums in improving the streets, in 1879 acquired the waterworks, and in 1888 secured a new supply from the Brecknockshire Beacons, since greatly augmented.

The ancient city of Llandaff (q.v.), now a mere village, is almost connected with Cardiff. Cardiff Castle (1110) is partly now in ruins, and partly occupied by the Marquis of Bute, who has spent large sums in rebuilding it, and to whom nearly the whole of the modern town belongs. Robert, Duke of Normandy, died in the castle, after twenty-eight years' captivity; and Cromwell (1648) got possession of it through treachery.

Cardigan (anc. Aberteifi; then Ceredigion—pron. Ker-e-dee'gi-on, g hard), a county town, municipal borough, and seaport on the Teifi, 3 miles from its mouth, and 117 miles NW. of Cardiff by rail. Pop. (1851) 3876; (1911) 3578. With Aberystwith, &c., it till 1885 returned one member to parliament. Remains of a castle (1160) crown a low cliff on the Teifi. The town suffered much in the struggles between the Welsh and the Normans. The Teifi is said to have been the last British resort of the beaver.

Cardigan Bay, a semicircular bend of St George's Channel, on the west coast of Wales, 54 miles wide from north to south, and 35 miles deep, with a sweep of coast of 130 miles. It has 3 to 30 fathoms water, with three reefs.

Cardiganshire, a maritime county in South Wales, on Cardigan Bay, with a crescent-shaped coast-line of 48 miles, a maximum width of 32 miles, and an area of 693 sq. m. On the Montgomeryshire border is Plinlimmon (2469 feet); and a rugged, bleak range of hills runs through the middle of the county from the south-west to the north-east, between the coast and the Teifi; but on other parts there are rich flat tracts. The chief rivers are the Teifi, Aeron, Claerwen, Ystwith, and Rheidol. The 'sweet shire of Cardigan' contains some romantic waterfalls, especially the Rheidol Falls and the Devil's Bridge, and above twenty small lakes or llyns, noted for their wild beauty. Rich veins of copper, lead, zinc, and silver occur. Cardiganshire is an agricultural county, 62 per cent. of its total area being cultivated; and the rearing of live-stock is a leading industry. There are some manufactures of coarse woollens and gloves, stockings and hats. Cardigan is the county town; other towns being Aberystwith, Lampeter, New Quay, Aberayron, Tregaron. Cardiganshire returns one member. Pop. (1801) 42,956; (1841) 68,766; (1861) 72,245; (1911) 59,879. The antiquities include many prehistoric, British, and Roman remains, and the ruined abbey of Strata Florida (1164), 16 miles SE. of Aberystwith. The women still wear the Welsh costume. In 1843–44 Cardiganshire was disturbed by the Rebecca riots. See Meyrick's History of Cardiganshire (1810).

Cardona, a town of Spain, 44 miles NW. of Barcelona, on the Cardoner, and close to a celebrated mountain of salt. Pop. 4000.

Cardross, a village of Dumbartonshire, on the Firth of Clyde, 3½ miles WNW. of Dumbarton. Bruce died at Cardross Castle (1329), which stood between the village and Dumbarton. Pop. 1800.

Carelia. See KARELIA.

Carhan House. See CAHIRSIVEEN.

Caribbean Sea, lying between the Antilles and the South and Central American mainland, and communicating with the Gulf of Mexico by the Yucatan Channel, 120 miles wide.

Cariboo, a district and gold-field in British Columbia, in the great bend of the Fraser River.

Carignano (Karinyah'no), a town of Piedmont, on the Po, 11 miles S. of Turin. Pop. 5000.

Carimat'a, a name applied to the strait between Borneo and Billiton; also to a cluster of a hundred islets and reefs (area, 57 sq. m.; pop. 500) in that strait; and lastly, to the principal member of the group (highest point 2600 feet high).

Carini (Karee'nee), a town of Sicily, 12 miles W. by N. of Palermo. Pop. 15,000.

Carinthia (Ger. Kärnthen), a crown-land of the Austrian empire, forming part of the old kingdom of Illyria, with an area of 4005 sq. m., and a pop. of (1869) 337,694; (1910) 396,200. The principal river is the Drave; and the loftiest point is the Grossglockner (12,450 feet), the general aspect of the country being mountainous. Only 15 per cent. of the area is devoted to tillage. Horses and cattle are reared and exported. The principal products are mineral. Klagenfurt is the capital of Carinthia, which came into the possession of Austria in 1335. Only 30 per cent. of the population are Slavs (Slovenians), the remainder being Germans; and but 5 per cent. are Protestants.

Carisbrooke, a village in the Isle of Wight, 1 mile SW. of Newport. In its ruined castle Charles I. was imprisoned (1647–48), as were also his children Prince Henry and the Princess Elizabeth, the latter of whom died here. From the castle well, 200 feet deep, the water is drawn by a donkey inside a wheel.

Carlaverock. See CAERLAVEROCK.

Carlingford, a seaport of County Louth, 69 miles N. of Dublin. Close by rises Carlingford Mountain (1935 feet). Carlingford Lough is 10 miles long, and 2 wide. Pop. 600.

Carlisle, the county town of Cumberland, stands on a gentle eminence in a wide-spreading plain, at the influx of the Caldew and Petteril to the Eden—three streams that nearly encircle it. It is 299 miles NNW. of London, 101 miles S. of Edinburgh, 22½ E. by N. of its seaport, Silloth, and 66 W. by S. of Newcastle. In spite of its hoar antiquity, 'merry' Carlisle as a whole is disappointingly modern, its gates having vanished, and almost the whole of the walls. The castle was founded in 1092, and now serves as a barrack. The remains of its Norman keep form a massive tower; but the part in which Mary, Queen of Scots, was imprisoned (1568) was demolished in 1835. The cathedral, ranging in date between 1092 and 1419, comprises every variety of style from Norman to Perpendicular. The fragment of the Norman nave, long used as a parish church, is cut off from the choir, which, mainly Decorated in style, is one of the finest choirs in England, the exquisite tracery of its nine-light east window being of matchless beauty. There are monuments and other memorials to Paley, Dean Close, and Archbishop Tait's five children; and in Carlisle Cathedral Scott married Miss Carpenter (1797). The Eden, which has salmon fisheries, is crossed by a handsome five-arch bridge (1851). The manufactures include cotton, calico, hats, iron, and fancy biscuits; but the prosperity of the place mainly depends on its being a great railway centre. An ancient municipal borough, Carlisle since 1885 has returned only one member. Pop. (1801) 10,221; (1851) 26,310; (1911) 46,420. The Luguvallum of the Romans, and Caer-Luel (hence Carlisle) of the Britons, the town was destroyed by the Danes in 875, and restored by William Rufus in 1092.

From its position as a Border fortress, it has a wealth of martial memories—none more famous than the rescue of 'Kinmont Willie' by Buccleuch from Carlisle Castle in 1596. During the Great Rebellion it twice surrendered to the Parliamentarians (1645–48); and in the '45 it was held by the Jacobites, thirty-one of whom were afterwards executed on Harraby Hill. See works by M. Creighton (1889) and R. S. Ferguson (1890).

Carlisle, capital of Cumberland county, Pennsylvania, 19 miles WSW. of Harrisburg by rail. It is the seat of Dickinson College (Methodist), and has United States barracks, machine-shops, a foundry, and manufactures of railway cars, carpets, window sashes, carriages, and shoes. It was shelled by the Confederates, July 1, 1863. Pop. 10,000.

Carlo'vitz (in England, however, usually Car'lovitz), a town of the Austrian empire, in Slavonia, on the right bank of the Danube, 30 miles NW. of Belgrade. It has a Greek cathedral, and is noted for its red wine. Pop. 5500.

Carlow, a small inland county of Leinster, Ireland, with an area of 346 sq. m. Except for Mount Leinster (2610 feet), on the south-east border, it is a triangular fertile level, or gently undulating plain, between the Wicklow and Wexford range of hills on the east, and the highlands beyond the Barrow on the west. The chief rivers are the Barrow and Slaney. On the west side of the county begins the great coal district of Leinster. Barely one-third of the entire area is under oats, wheat, potatoes, and other crops. There are many dairies on the plains. Along the Barrow, which falls more than a foot per mile, are many large corn-mills. Pop. (1841) 86,228; (1871) 51,472; (1911) 36,252, 89·2 per cent. Catholics. Since 1885 the county has returned but one member to parliament. The chief towns are Carlow, Bagenalstown, and Tullow.

CARLOW, the county town, stands at the influx of the Burren to the Barrow, 56 miles SW. of Dublin by rail. It has a Catholic cathedral, remains of De Lacy's castle (1180), the county court-house, extensive flour-mills, and is the emporium for the agricultural produce of the district. Till 1885 it returned a member. Pop. 6600.

Carlsbad, a town in Bohemia, on the Tepl, near its influx to the Eger, 116 miles W. by N. of Prague by rail. It is widely celebrated for its hot mineral springs (117° to 167° F.), and is frequented during the season (April to October) by 30,000 visitors from all parts of Europe, many of high social standing. Set in most lovely scenery, the town is well built, and appears to stand on a vast caldron of boiling water, which is kept from bursting only by the safety-valves the springs provide. Joseph I. made Carlsbad a free town. Pop. 20,000. See works by Kraus (Lond. new ed. 1888) and Merrylees (1886).

Carlsburg. See KARLSBURG.

Carlshamn, a fortified seaport on the south coast of Sweden, 30 miles W. of Carlskrona. Pop. 7000.

Carlskrona, the capital of a Swedish province, is built on five rocky islets in the Baltic, 240 miles (by rail 350) SSW. of Stockholm. It was founded in 1680 by Charles XI., who made it the great naval station of Sweden, instead of Stockholm. It has a magnificent harbour. Pop. (1875) 16,877; (1910) 27,448.

Carlsruhe (Karls-roo'eh), cap. of Baden, is 5 m. E. of the Rhine, and 39 WNW. of Stuttgart, 34 SSW. of Heidelberg. Founded in 1715, and built in the form of a fan, with thirty-two streets radiating from the palace, it has many fine buildings—the palace itself (1776), parliament-house (1845), theatre (1853), town-hall (1821), and museum (1852), with the ducal library of 150,000 vols. Before the palace stands a bronze statue of the city's founder, the Margrave Charles William; and in the market-place is a stone pyramid enclosing his remains. The manufactures include engines, railway carriages, jewellery, carpets, chemicals, and cloth. Pop. (1875) 42,895; (1910) 134,313.

Carlstad, a Swedish town on the Tingvalla island, near the east shore of Lake Wener, 205 miles WSW. of Stockholm by rail. Greatly improved since the fire of 1865, it has a cathedral and two bridges connecting it with the mainland. Pop. 17,000.

Carlstadt, a fortified town of Croatia, Austro-Hungary, 32 miles SW. of Agram by rail. Pop. 10,000.—CARLSTADT, in Bavaria, on the Main, 15 miles NNW. of Würzburg. Pop. 4000.

Carlton, a town of Notts, 3½ miles ENE. of Nottingham. Pop. (1861) 2559; (1911) 15,581.

Carluke, a mining town of Lanarkshire, 2¼ miles E. of the Clyde, and 19¼ SE. of Glasgow by rail. General Roy, the antiquary, was a native. Pop. 5000.

Carmagnola, a town of North Italy, 18 miles S. of Turin by rail. Pop. 5000.

Carmania, the old name of Kerman (q.v.).

Carmarthen (Welsh Caer Fyrddyn, the Maridunum of Ptolemy), the capital of Carmarthenshire, on the navigable Towy, 9 miles from Carmarthen Bay, and 39 NW. of Swansea. Steele is buried in the old parish church; a ruined castle of the Welsh princes was in 1787 incorporated in a new county jail; and Generals Picton and Nott, both natives, are commemorated by an obelisk and a bronze statue. Near the town are tin and iron works; and Carmarthen exports tinplates, slates, domestic produce, &c. It unites with Llanelly in returning one member. Pop. 10,000.

Carmarthenshire, a maritime county of South Wales, washed on the south by Carmarthen Bay, a semicircular inlet of the Bristol Channel, and bounded on the other sides by Pembroke, Cardigan, Brecknock, and Glamorgan shires. The largest of all the Welsh counties, it has a maximum length and breadth of 45½ and 26 miles, and an area of 947 sq. m., of which 70·8 per cent. is under cultivation. The county is mountainous in the north and east, Carmarthen Van or Beacon (2596 feet) being the highest summit. The coast is marshy; the chief river is the Towy, which has a course of 65 miles, five-sixths in Carmarthenshire, and yields plenty of salmon, trout, eels, and lamprey. On this river is the celebrated vale of the Towy, 30 miles long, with an average breadth of 2 miles. The mineral productions of the county are iron, coal, copper, lead, slates, lime, dark-blue marble. These, with tinned iron, grain, cattle, horses, sheep, and butter, are exported. The principal towns are Carmarthen, Llanelly, Llandilo-vawr, Llandovery, and Newcastle-Emlyn. The chief manufactures are woollens and leather. Pop. (1801) 67,317; (1841) 106,326; (1911) 160,406, largely Welsh-speaking. Carmarthenshire returns two members. It was the birthplace of the 'Rebecca' Riots (1843–44) against turnpike-gates.

Carmaux, a French town and great coal-mining centre in the department of Tarn, 10 miles N. of Albi. Population 10,000. There have been great strikes here.

Carmel (Mar Elyas, 'Saint Elijah'), a richly wooded limestone-ridge (1887 feet) which runs from SE. to NW. for 14 miles, forming the only great promontory on the low coast of Palestine.

Carmo'na, an ancient town of Andalusia, Spain, 27 miles ENE. of Seville by rail. Pop. 20,000.

Carnac, a village in the French dep. of Morbihan, 20 miles SE. of Lorient. It is remarkable for the number and variety of the Celtic monuments and Gallo-Roman ruins, consisting of menhirs, dolmens, and tumuli, with which the neighbourhood is studded. The principal group of menhirs is situated on a sterile moor near the seashore, and consists of 1000 or more rude monoliths of granite, rising, many of them, to a height of 18 feet, though a large proportion do not exceed 3 feet. They are arranged in eleven roughly parallel rows, with two slight breaks, extend from east to west about 1¼ mile in length, and have at one end a curved row of 18 stones, the extremities of which touch the outer horizontal rows. See Miln's Excavations at Carnac (1877–81), Worsfold's French Stonehenge (1901).

Carnarvon (Caer-yn-ar-Fon, 'fort opposite Mon, or Anglesey'), the capital of Carnarvonshire, stands near the south end of the Menai Strait, on the right bank of the Seiont, 69 miles W. of Chester. Carnarvon Castle, the building of which was commenced by Edward I. in 1283, is one of the noblest ruins in the kingdom, the walls, 7 to 9 feet thick, being still entire, and enclosing an oblong of three acres. The gateway under the great square tower has four portcullises. The city walls, with several of the gates, still exist, but are now within the town. A municipal borough, Carnarvon unites with Pwllheli, Nevin, Criccieth, Conway, and Bangor to return one member to parliament. The harbour admits ships of 400 tons. The chief exports are slates, stones, and ores. There are also iron and brass foundries. Carnarvon is a bathing-place, and is much frequented by tourists. Population 9000. Half a mile from Carnarvon are the remains, covering seven acres, of Segontium, or Caer Seiont, a Roman station or city. There is a Roman fort on the left bank of the Seiont, still almost complete, with walls 11 feet high and 6 feet thick. Carnarvon was the seat of the native princes of North Wales down to 873. In 1284 was born here the first Anglo-Norman Prince of Wales, afterwards the unhappy Edward II.

Carnarvonshire, a maritime county of North Wales, bounded E. and SE. by Denbigh and Merioneth shires, and on all other sides by the Irish Sea and the Menai Strait. With a maximum length and breadth of 34 and 23 miles, it has an area of 379 sq. m., of which 50·7 per cent. is under cultivation. The surface is grandly mountainous, attaining a maximum altitude in Snowdon (3571 feet), in the centre of the county, the loftiest summit south of the Scottish Border. Carnarvon Bay is 34 miles across, and 16 deep; it communicates with the Irish Sea through the Menai Strait, which is 14 miles long, and 200 yards to 2 miles broad. The rivers of Carnarvon are numerous, but small. The chief is the Conway, which is navigable for 10 miles, and runs along the east border. Almost all the streams flow through small lakes or tarns—of which there are 50 or 60 in the county—around the central or Snowdon group of mountains. There are many fine cataracts on these streams. The mineral products include copper, lead, zinc, coal, roofing and writing slates; the Penrhyn slate-quarries employing many thousands of workmen. The chief towns are Carnarvon, Bangor, Pwllheli, Conway, Nevin, and Criccieth; besides which boroughs, several flourishing towns and tourist centres have come into prominence—Llandudno, Tremadoc, Bethesda, Bettws-y-Coed, Llanberis, and Beddgelert. The county returns two members. Pop. (1801) 41,521; (1881) 119,349; (1891) 118,204; (1911) 125,043.

Carnat'ic, a region extending 600 miles along the east or Coromandel coast of India, now included in the province of Madras.

Carndonagh (Karndo'na), a town of Donegal, 20 miles N. of Londonderry. Pop. 700.

Carniola (Ger. Krain), a south-west crownland of the Austrian empire, united thereto since, has an area of 3856 sq. m., and a pop. of 526,000, 6 per cent. Germans, 3 per cent. Croats, the rest being Slavs of the Slovenian branch. It is traversed in the north by a continuation of the Carinthian Alps, and in the south by the Julian Alps, the loftiest summit being the Terglou (9393 feet), between the two sources of the Save, which is the principal river. The chief minerals are iron, quicksilver, and brown coal; the quicksilver mines of Idria are, next to Almaden, the most important in Europe. Laibach is the capital.

Carnlough, an Antrim fishing-village, 6 miles SE. of Cushendall station. Pop. 500.

Carnoustie (Karnoos'tie), a coast-town of Forfarshire, 11 miles ENE. of Dundee. It has fine golf-links. Pop. 5000.

Carolina. See NORTH and SOUTH CAROLINA.

Caroline Islands, a group in the Western Pacific, lying between the Marshall and Pelew Islands, with an area of about 270 sq. m., and a pop. of some 20,000; but the Pelew (q.v.) group is generally included in the Caroline Archipelago (area, 560 sq. m.; pop. 40,000), which thus stretches across 32 degrees of longitude and 9 of latitude. There are some 500 small atolls in the archipelago, but three-fourths of both area and population are included in the five volcanic islands of Babelthouap, Yap, Rouk, Ponapé (Ascension), and Kusari (Strong Island). The climate is moist, but not unhealthy, and is tempered by cooling breezes. The people are strongly built, gentle, amiable, and intelligent; they are bold sailors, and carry on a brisk trade with the Ladrones to the north, where they have several settlements. Copra is largely exported. The islands were discovered in 1527 by the Portuguese, and called Sequeira; in 1686 they were annexed and rechristened in honour of Charles II. by the Spaniards, who, however, shortly changed the name to New Philippines. In 1885 the hoisting of the German flag on Yap gave rise to a sharp dispute with Spain, which was submitted to the arbitration of the pope, who decided in favour of Spain. But in 1899 the islands were sold to Germany, Spain retaining a coaling-station.—A British Caroline Island near the Marquesas is only 2 sq. m. in area.

Carouge (Karoozh'), a Swiss town 1¾ mile S. of the city of Geneva. Pop. 7400.

Carpathian Mountains, an Austro-Hungarian range, the second great range of Central Europe, extend 880 miles in a great semicircle from Presburg on the Danube to Orsova on the same river. Negoi, the culminating peak, has an elevation of 8517 feet. The range is generally clothed with wood to a height of more than 4000 feet, and with steep precipices, narrow ravines, extinct craters, and cones of volcanic origin, exhibits scenes of grandeur rarely exceeded. See works by Crosse (1878) and Muriel Dowie (1891).

Carpentaria, GULF OF, a great indentation of the north coast of Australia, said to derive its name from the river Carpentier, so named by Carstensz in 1623, in honour of Pieter Carpentier, governor-general of the Dutch Indies. It contains many islands. To the east (where it is bounded by Cape York Peninsula), south, and west are Queensland and the Northern Territory of the Commonwealth. On the east it receives the Mitchell and Van Diemen Rivers; at the south the Flinders, Leichhardt, and Albert; and on the west the Roper.

Carpentras (Karpon^{g}trass'), a town in the French dep. of Vaucluse, on the Auzon, 17 miles NE. of Avignon by rail. It has a Roman triumphal arch, a cathedral (1405), the stately Porte d'Orange of the 14th century, a massive aqueduct (1734), and manufactures of cottons, woollens, &c. It was the ancient Carpentoracte. Pop. 10,000.

Carpi (Kar'pee), (1) a cathedral city of north Italy, 10 miles N. of Modena by rail. Pop. 8000. —(2) A village 28 miles SE. of Verona, where Prince Eugene defeated the French in 1701.

Carrara (Kar-râh'ra), a town of north Italy, on the Avenza, near its mouth in the Mediterranean, 30 miles NW. of Leghorn by rail. It is surrounded by the marble hills (part of the Apennine system) in which are some 400 marble-quarries, though very few furnish the marble used for statuary. Pop. 40,000. See the Century Magazine for 1882.

Carrick, the southern division of Ayrshire (q.v.). The Prince of Wales is Earl of Carrick.

Carrickfergus, a seaport on the north side of Belfast Lough, and the south-east border of County Antrim, 9½ miles N. of Belfast, and 12 miles S. of Larne by rail. Its picturesque castle-keep (90 feet), supposed to have been erected by De Courcy in the 12th century, stands on a headland 30 feet high. But one gateway now remains of the ancient city walls. Here William III. landed before the battle of the Boyne, and here Thurot made an abortive landing in 1760. Flax-spinning is carried on, and there is an oyster-fishery. Till 1885 Carrickfergus was a parliamentary borough. Pop. 4000.

Carrickmacross, a Monaghan market-town, 51 miles NW. of Dublin. Pop. 2000.

Carrick-on-Shannon, the capital of County Leitrim, on the Shannon, 98 miles NW. of Dublin by rail. Pop. 1000.

Carrick-on-Suir (Shure), a town of Tipperary and Waterford counties, on the navigable Suir, 14 miles E. of Clonmel, and 149 SW. of Dublin by rail. It has woollen, linen, and flax factories, and neighbouring slate-quarries. There are remains of a castle (1309) of the Butler family, a branch of which took the titles of Viscount and Earl of Carrick. A stone bridge connects it with the suburb of Carrickbeg in County Waterford. Pop. 5600.

Carriden, a coast parish of Linlithgowshire, on the Firth of Forth, at the eastern termination of the Roman wall of Antonine.

Carrollton, since 1873 part of New Orleans.

Carron, a Stirlingshire village, on the river Carron, 2 miles NNW. of Falkirk. Its great ironworks (1760) till 1852 produced 'carronades,' &c., and now turn out stoves, grates, boilers, pipes, &c. Pop. 2000.

Carse, a Scottish term for low lands adjoining rivers, as the Carse of Gowrie, between Perth and Dundee, and the Carse of Forth, near Falkirk.

Carsebreck, the great curling centre of Scotland, 11 miles NNE. of Stirling.

Carshalton, a Surrey urban district, 3 miles W. by S. of Croydon. Pop. 11,600.

Carson City, capital of Nevada state, U.S., near the foot of the Sierra Nevada, 178 miles ENE. of San Francisco. It has gold and silver mines, and a U.S. mint. Pop. 2100.

Carstairs', a village of Lanarkshire, 1 mile NW. from which is Carstairs Junction on the Caledonian Railway, 28½ miles SW. of Edinburgh, and 31 ESE. of Glasgow. Pop. of civil parish, 2000.

Cart, a Renfrewshire feeder of the Clyde, formed by the confluence of the Black Cart (9 miles) and White Cart (18½), the latter of which has been made navigable to Paisley (q.v.).

Cartagena (Kartahay'na), a fortified seaport of Spain, on a bay of the Mediterranean, 326 miles SE. of Madrid by rail. The hill-protected harbour is one of the best in the Mediterranean, its entrance narrow, and commanded by a fortified island on the south. Cartagena was formerly the largest naval arsenal not only in Spain but in Europe. It presents a Moorish aspect in its streets, its cathedral, and its ruined castle, and has manufactures of ropes, sailcloth, and glass, besides extensive blast-furnaces and smelting-works. Population, 100,000. Cartagena was built by Hasdrubal 242 B.C., under the name of New Carthage. It formed the headquarters of the Carthaginians in Spain, but in 210 B.C. was captured by P. Scipio, and became of importance under the Romans, who employed 40,000 men daily in the neighbouring mines. It was sacked by the Goths, and did not again attain any note until Philip II.'s reign. From July 1873 to January 1874 it was held by a communist junta.

Cartagena, one of the principal cities of Colombia, stands on a sandy island, to the SW. of the mouth of the Magdalena, and communicates by four bridges with its suburb, Jetsemani, on the mainland. It has a fine cathedral, a university, and the best harbour on the coast. Its trade has greatly fallen off since the rise of Sabanilla; but much was expected from the reopening of a canal connecting it with Calamar, on the Magdalena. Founded in 1533, it was burned by Drake in 1585, but in 1741 repulsed an attack by Admiral Vernon. Pop. 30,000.

Cartago (Kartah'go), (1) a river and landlocked bay or lagoon, communicating with the Caribbean Sea, near the northern extremity of the Mosquito Coast.—(2) A town of Costa Rica, 12 miles E. of the present capital, San José, on a plain to the south of the constantly smoking volcano of Irazú (11,500 feet). Pop. 8000. Founded in 1522, the place had 23,000 inhabitants in 1823, and was capital of the state till 1841, when it was all but destroyed by an earthquake.—(3) A town in Colombia, founded in 1540, on the Rio Viejo, 3 miles above its junction with the Cauca. Pop. 9000.

Carterville, an E. suburb of Webb City (q.v.).

Carthage was a city on the north coast of Africa, the capital of one of the great empires of the ancient world. It was situated on a peninsula at the north-east corner of the region now known as Tunis, and was founded, most probably, about the middle of the 9th century B.C., by Phœnicians.

The name Carthage is a corruption of Kirjath, the Canaanite word for a town, which occurs in Scripture in such names as Kirjath-Baal and Kirjath-Jearim. The city, called Carthāgo by the Romans, and Karchēdon by the Greeks, was known to its own inhabitants as Kirjath-Hadeshath, or the New Town, to distinguish it either from Tyre or from the earlier Phœnician colony of Utica. It was destroyed by the Romans in 146 B.C., its pop. numbering 700,000. See works by Bosworth Smith (1879) and Church (1886).

Carthage, Cape, a headland of North Africa, jutting out into the Mediterranean, in 36° 52′ N. lat., 10° 22′ E. long., with traces of the ancient city of Carthage to the north of the Tunis lagoon.

Casas Grandes, an old Indian town of Mexico, 125 miles SW. of El Paso, surrounded with ruins of ancient buildings, which seem to indicate a former population of 20,000 to 30,000.

Casbin. See Kazvin.

Cascade Range, a chain of mountains in Oregon and Washington, U.S., and in British Columbia. It takes its name from the great cascades of the river Columbia, which are situated at the point where that stream cañons through the range by a pass 4000 feet deep. The course of the mountain-chain in the United States is from north to south nearly parallel to the Pacific, and about 110 to 160 miles distant from it. Southward it is continuous with the Sierra Nevada of California; northward it connects with the range which forms the boundary between British Columbia and Alaska. The chain throughout most of its course is heavily wooded, chiefly with evergreen conifers. Mount Jefferson is 10,200 feet high, and Mount Hood 11,225 feet. The principal peaks in Washington state are Mounts Baker (10,700 feet), Mount Rainier or Tacoma (14,444 feet), and St Helen's (12,000 feet). In this region volcanic action is not quite extinct. In the British Columbian portion the range comes nearer the coast.

Caserta, a town of Italy, 20½ miles NNE. of Naples by rail. Its magnificent palace, one of the finest in Europe, was founded by Charles III. in 1752. Pop. 33,500.

Cashel, a town in County Tipperary (till 1870 a parliamentary borough), 100 miles SW. of Dublin and 5 miles SE. of its railway station. It is the see of a Protestant bishop, and of a Roman Catholic archbishop. It is irregularly built on the south and east slopes of the isolated Rock of Cashel (300 feet), rising abruptly from a rich and extensive plain. The Rock is crowned by the ruins of a cathedral (1169), a stone-roofed chapel (1127), the palace of the Munster kings, a round tower, 90 feet high and 56 in circumference; and an old cross. At Cashel in 1172 Henry II. received the homage of the king of Limerick. Pop. 2800.

Cashgar. See Kashgar.

Cashmere, or Kashmir, a native state embracing an irregular-shaped mountainous region, part of the Himalayan system, in the extreme north of India. Much of it is mere desert, but within its borders are included the valleys of many snow-fed streams. Chief among these is the beautiful valley of the Upper Jhelum at Srinagar—'the Vale of Cashmere' of Moore's Lalla Rookh. It extends for about 120 miles from NW. to SE., with a mean breadth of 75 miles, at a distance of 130 miles by road from Rawal Pindi, in the Punjab. The flat part of the valley is not more than 80 miles long by 20 wide, with a variable elevation above sea-level of from 5000 to 7000 feet. In it are two lakes, the Dul and the Wulur. Nothing can well exceed the fertile beauty of this valley, almost surrounded as it is by snow-capped mountains, whose lower spurs descend gently in terraced slopes. These terraces are abundantly irrigated for the purpose of rice cultivation, rice being the staple crop throughout Cashmere. On the margins of the lakes, and scattered through the whole extent of the valley, are magnificent groves of chinar or plane-trees, here and there laid out with great regularity and taste to form gardens and country-seats which used to be the favourite resorts of the Mogul emperors two centuries ago. Other features of Cashmere are its avenues of poplars, and the floating-gardens of the lakes. Srinagar is a quaint and picturesque old town, built almost entirely of wood, said to have been founded at the beginning of the 6th century. Its industries are chiefly shawl-weaving and lacquer-work, with silver and copper work. The restrictions formerly placed on the residence of Europeans in Cashmere territory have been modified, and Cashmere is now visited by thousands of Europeans during the hot months of the year, a well-known summer station being Gulmerg, which is higher and cooler than Srinagar. Good roads have been made, and a railway is projected. The natural productiveness of the valleys is remarkable. Fruit of almost every description is found nearly wild in the lower valleys, and the vine is now largely cultivated for the manufacture of wine. Notwithstanding this fertility and the general cheapness of food-supply, Cashmere is occasionally subject to the scourge of famine. Much has been written about the fine physique of the Cashmere men and the beauty of Cashmere women, but they are really a corrupt and degraded race.

Cashmere was conquered by Akbar in 1586, and became part of the Mogul empire. It was overrun by the Sikhs in 1819. Ghulab Singh, the feudatory of the Sikhs, made a treaty with Britain in 1846, by which he recognised British supremacy. In 1887 a land settlement (under pressure from the Indian government) abolished serfdom; trade greatly increased. The population of Cashmere with its dependencies (Ladakh, Jamu, Gilgit, Chitrál, &c.) was in 1911 over 3,158,000 Mohammedans, Buddhists, and Hindus, of whom 1,200,000 were in Cashmere proper. Thirteen dialects are spoken; the Kashmíri is very closely related to Sanskrit.

Casoria, a town of Italy, 6 miles N. of Naples by rail. Pop. 10,000.

Cas'pe, a town of Spain, 53 miles SE. of Saragossa. Pop. 10,000.

Caspian Sea, an inland sea or great salt lake, the largest in the world, on the boundary between Europe and Asia, extending from 36° 40′ to 47° 20′ N. lat., and 46° 50′ to 55° 10′ E. long. Its length from north to south is 680 miles, and its breadth varies between 130 and 270 miles. Its total area is estimated at 170,000 sq. m. It has no tides, but navigation is dangerous because of violent storms. Its level differs much at different seasons, owing to evaporation and the variable amount of water brought by its tributaries. It is very shallow in the north—only 14 feet at a distance of 10 miles, and 72 feet at a distance of 130 miles from the mouth of the Volga. In its middle it is intersected by a submarine ridge. The greatest depth found in the northern basin is 2526 feet, and in the southern (close by the southern shore), 3096. The Caspian receives the waters of the Volga, Ural, Emba, Terek, Kura, and Atrek. The water is salt, but much less so than that of the ocean. The northern parts are covered with ice during winter. Fish abounds, and very valuable sturgeon and salmon fisheries are carried on. A canal uniting the upper tributaries of the Volga with those of Lake Ladoga and the Düna connects the Caspian with the Baltic. The sea is now surrounded on three sides by Russian territory, the southern shore still remaining Persian. The Russians have a fleet stationed upon it, and lines of steamers, for which the petroleum of Baku forms an economical fuel. The chief Russian towns on its shores are Astrakhan, Derbend, Baku, and Krasnovodsk, from near which a railway runs by Askabad towards Merv, and thence by Bokhara to Samarkand, with an extension to Tashkand in Turkestan.

Cassandra (anc. Pallene), the most western of the three tongues of the Chalcidice peninsula, between the gulfs of Salonica and Cassandra. The latter (anc. Toronaicus Sinus) extends 35 miles north-westward, and is 8 to 16 miles broad.

Cassel, or Kassel, chief town of the Prussian province of Hesse-Nassau, and the old capital of the former electorate of Hesse-Cassel, on the navigable Fulda, 120 miles by rail NNE. of Frankfort-on-Main, and 233 WSW. of Berlin. Population, over 153,000. The oldest part consists of a few very narrow, crooked streets, close to the river; the more modern parts are situated on gentle hills. The 'upper new town' was founded by French refugees in 1688. In the Friedrichs-Platz, the largest square in any German town, stand the Elector's palace, the military school, and the Museum Fridericianum (1769–79), with a library of 200,000 volumes. The large new law-courts were erected in 1880 on the site of the Kattenburg, a costly and ambitious palace projected in 1820, which, however, remained unfinished till 1869, when its materials were used in the construction of the new picture-gallery (1877), which contains 1400 paintings. Cassel carries on manufactures of locomotives and steam-engines, carriages, philosophical and mathematical instruments, cotton and linen fabrics, plate, and sugar. The gardens of Wilhelmshöhe (1787–96)—which was assigned to Napoleon III. as a residence after his fall at Sedan, in September 1870—with their splendid fountains and cascades, and the colossal statue of Hercules, within the hollow of whose club eight persons can stand at one time, are 3 miles from Cassel.

Cassillis (Kassils), Ayrshire, seat of the Marquis of Ailsa, on the Doon, 4 miles NE. of Maybole.

Castile (Kast-eel'; Span. Castilla), the central district of Spain, divided by the Castilian Sierras (8730 feet) into Old and New Castile. The former district—so called because it was first recovered from the Arabs—extends north to the Bay of Biscay, is walled in on all other sides by mountain-ranges, and rises to the height of 2500 to 3000 feet in the form of an elevated plateau, mostly trackless, treeless, and dreary. It is now divided into the eight provinces of Palencia, Valladolid, Avila, Segovia, Soria, Burgos, Logroño, and Santander. The plateau of New Castile, to the south, is also enclosed by mountains, and though lying 1800 feet lower than Old Castile, presents many similar characteristics of soil and scenery. It embraces the provinces of Madrid, Toledo, Guadalajara, Ciudad Real, and Cuenca. Castilian is the literary language of Spain. Area of Old Castile, 25,280 sq. m.; pop. 1,800,000; area of New Castile, 27,935 sq. m.; pop. 2,000,000; total, 53,215 sq. m., with 3,800,000 inhabitants.

Pop. 600.—(2) A Liddesdale parish, Roxburghshire, 21 miles S. by W. of Hawick. For Castleton of Braemar, see BRAEMAR.

Castletown (Manx Balley Cashtal), a seaport of the Isle of Man, on Castletown Bay, 11 miles SW. of Douglas by rail. The grounds of Rushen Abbey (11th century), near the station, are now market-gardens. Hard by is the small building where the House of Keys assembled for about 170 years. Brewing, tanning, and lime-burning are carried on. Near Castletown is King William's College (1833), an Elizabethan pile, rebuilt after the fire of 1844, and enlarged in 1862. Pop. 2000.

Castletown Berehaven, a Cork seaport, 20 miles W. of Bantry. Pop. 1000.

Castletownsend, a Cork seaport, 6 miles SE. of Skibbereen. Pop. 550.

Castlewellan, a Down market-town, 19 miles NE. of Newry. Pop. 800.

Castres (Kâstr), a town in the French dep. of Tarn, on the river Agout, 46 miles (72 by rail) E. of Toulouse. It rose up around a Benedictine abbey (647), and in the 16th century became a Huguenot stronghold, but its fortifications were demolished in 1629. It has beautiful promenades, a quondam cathedral, and manufactures of fine wool dyed goods, leather, paper, soap, &c. Pop. 25,000.

Castri. See DELPHI.

Castro, the modern name of the capital of several islands of the Grecian Archipelago—Lesbos, Samothrace, Melos, Lemnos, &c.

Castro del Rio, a town of Andalusia, Spain, 23 miles SE. of Cordova. Pop. 15,000.

Castrogiovanni (Kastrojovân'nee; anc. Enna), a town of Sicily, 56 miles E. of Catania by rail, on a fertile plateau, which rises precipitously to a height of 3270 feet above sea-level. Pop. 25,000.

Castro Urdiales (Oordiâh'les), on the N. coast of Spain, 30 m. ESE. of Santander. Pop. 15,000.

Castrovil'lari, a town of south Italy, 34 miles N. of Cosenza. Pop. 10,000.

Castuera (Kastooay'ra), a town of Estremadura, Spain, 68 miles ESE. of Badajoz. Pop. 7000.

Catalonia (Span. Cataluña), an old principality of Spain, triangular in shape, occupying the north-east portion of the peninsula, and now divided into the provinces of Barcelona, Tarragona, Lerida, and Gerona. Total area, 12,500 sq. m.; pop. 2,000,000. Catalonia is the principal manufacturing province of the kingdom—is, in fact, 'the Lancashire of Spain.' The language, costume, and habits of the inhabitants, who regard with contempt and pity the Spaniards of the surrounding provinces, are quite distinct from those of the rest of Spain, whose people they greatly surpass in energy, industry, and intelligence. Even the educated classes speak the rough Catalan dialect, more nearly akin to Provençal than to Castilian. Catalonia became an integral portion of the Spanish monarchy in 1479, though never a very peaceable one.

Catamarca, a western province of the Argentine Republic, sinking SE. from the Andes to the Salt Marshes which separate it from Cordoba. Its capital, Catamarca (pop. 8000), is 82 miles NE. of Rioja.

Catania (Katâh'nia; anc. Catăna), a seaport of Sicily, near the foot of Etna, 59 miles by rail SSW. of Messina, and 54 NNW. of Syracuse. By eruptions and earthquakes, it has been several times almost entirely destroyed—especially in 1669 and 1693; but out of its ruins it has always risen with increased beauty, and it is now the finest city in Sicily. The harbour was choked by a stream of lava in 1693, and is still unsafe, in spite of a costly mole. Among the chief buildings are the Benedictine convent of San Nicola, secularised in 1866; the cathedral (1091); and the university (1445). Catania has manufactures of silk and linen goods, and of articles in amber, lava, wood, &c. Among the remains of ancient times are those of a theatre, a temple of Ceres, Roman baths, and an aqueduct. Pop. (commune) 212,000.

Catanzaro (Katantzâh'ro), a city of S. Italy, on a rocky hill 6 m. from the Gulf of Squillace, and 326 SE. of Naples by rail. It has a cathedral, a ruined castle of Robert Guiscard, and manufactures of silks, velvets, and woollens. Pop. 34,000.

Cateau, Le, or Cateau-Cambrésis (Kâhto'-Kon^g-brezee'), a town in the French dep. of Nord, 14 m. ESE. of Cambrai. Here in 1559 a treaty was concluded between France and Spain. Pop. 10,000.

Caterham, a Surrey urban district, with barracks, 7 miles S. of Croydon. Pop. 11,000.

Catharines. See Aleutian Islands.

Cathay, an old name for China (q.v.), current in Europe in the middle ages.

Cathcart, Old, a Renfrewshire town, absorbed by Glasgow in 1912.

Cat Island. See Bahamas.

Catrail, or Picts' Work, an earthwork extending 50 miles from near Galashiels, through the counties of Selkirk and Roxburgh, to Peel Fell in the Cheviots. See Blackwood's Maga. (1888).

Cat'rine, an Ayrshire town, on the Ayr, 2½ miles ESE. of Mauchline, with a cotton-mill. Pop. 2300.

Catskill, a village of New York, U.S., on the Hudson, 34 miles SSE. of Albany. Pop. 6000.

Catskill Mountains, a group of well-wooded mountains in the state of New York, U.S., west of the Hudson River, and south of the Mohawk. Belonging to the Appalachian system, they cover some 5000 sq. m., chiefly in Greene County, N.Y. Some peaks reach nearly 4000 feet in height. The mountains generally have steep and often precipitous ascents, and their summits are broad and rocky. The deep valleys or 'cloves' of the region are remarkable for their almost perpendicular walls. See Searing's Land of Rip Van Winkle (1885).

Catstane, a monolith, 3½ miles WNW. of Corstorphine.

Cat'taro, a strongly fortified Austrian port in Dalmatia, lies at the head of the Gulf of Cattaro, 40 miles SE. of Ragusa, under the steep Montenegrin hills. It has a cathedral, a naval school, and a pop. of 5500. At one time the capital of a small republic, the town in 1420 joined the republic of Venice, and was handed over to Austria in 1814. The Gulf of Cattaro, an inlet of the Adriatic, 19 miles long, consists of three basins or lakes, connected by straits ½ mile broad.

Cat'tegat, or Kattegat, the bay or arm of the sea between the east coast of Jutland and the west coast of Sweden, to the north of the Danish islands. It is connected with the Baltic Sea by the Great and Little Belt (q.v.), and by the Sound; and the Skager Rack connects it with the North Sea. Its length is about 150 miles, and its greatest breadth 85.

Catto'lica, a town of Sicily, 14 miles NW. of Girgenti. Pop. 10,000.

Caub (Kowb), a town in the Prussian province of Hesse-Nassau, on the right bank of the Rhine, 30 miles WNW. of Wiesbaden by rail. Pop. 2500.

Cauca (Kow'ka), a river of Colombia, flowing 600 miles N. to the Magdalena. It gave name till 1909 to the largest of the states, traversed by the Andean coast-range, and extending along the Pacific from Panama to Ecuador. Area, 260,000 sq. m.; pop. (1887) 465,690. Capital, Popayán.

Caucasus, a great mountain-range that forms the backbone of a well-marked geographical region, nearly corresponding with the Russian governor-generalship or lieutenancy of Caucasia. It occupies the isthmus between the Black Sea and the Caspian, its general direction being from west-north-west to east-south-east. From the peninsula of Taman on the Black Sea, to the peninsula of Apsheron on the Caspian, it has a length of about 750 miles. The breadth, including the secondary ranges and spurs, is about 150 miles, but that of the higher Caucasus does not exceed 70 miles. This range is sometimes treated as the boundary line between Europe and Asia, but the region is really Asiatic in character (see Asia, p. 52). The higher and central part of the range is formed of parallel chains, not separated by deep and wide valleys, but remarkably connected by elevated plateaus, which are traversed by narrow fissures of extreme depth. The highest peaks are in the most central ridge or chain, at least six of them well over 16,000 feet, much exceeding the highest Alps. Mount Elburz attains an elevation of 18,538 feet above the sea, Dikh-tau of 16,923, and Kazbek of 16,541. Here the line of perpetual snow is between 10,000 and 11,000 feet high; but the whole amount of perpetual snow is not great, nor are the glaciers very large or numerous. For more than 100 miles' length of the main ridge there are no passes lower than 10,000 feet. The spurs and outlying mountains or hills are of less extent and importance than those of almost any other mountain-range of similar magnitude, subsiding as they do until they are only about 200 feet high along the shores of the Black Sea. Some parts are entirely destitute of wood, but other parts are very densely wooded, and the secondary ranges near the Black Sea exhibit most magnificent forests of oak, beech, ash, maple, and walnut; grain is cultivated in some parts to a height of 8000 feet, while in the lower valleys rice, tobacco, cotton, indigo, &c. are produced. The climate, though generally healthy, is very different on the northern and southern sides of the range, the vine growing wild on the south. The south declivity of the mountains towards Georgia presents much exceedingly beautiful and romantic scenery.

There are no active volcanoes in Mount Caucasus, but every evidence of volcanic action. Elburz and Kazbek are both of volcanic origin. There are hot springs and mud volcanoes at each end of the range, and there are also famous petroleum wells in the peninsula of Apsheron (see BAKU). Mineral springs also occur in many places, notably at Vladikavkaz. The bison, or aurochs, bears, wolves, and jackals are among the animals. Lead, iron, sulphur, coal, and copper are found.

The waters of the Caucasus flow into four principal rivers—the Kuban and the Rion or Faz (the Phasis of the ancients), which flow into the Black Sea; and the Terek and the Kur, which flow into the Caspian. Kuban and Terek are north, Rion and Kur or Kura south of the mountains. The Russians have with great labour carried a military road through the tremendous fissure or ravine of the Dariel gorge, about halfway from the Black Sea to the Caspian. The road passes over a height of about 8000 feet, and is protected by many forts. The only other road is by the Pass of Derbend, near the Caspian Sea. The term 'Caucasian' was at one time used for all the finer types of the fair-skinned division of mankind, but the 'Caucasian race' of Blumenbach has long been divided into the two groups, Aryan or Indo-European and Semitic; and it is very doubtful if the most of the Caucasian peoples belong to either of these stocks. The Ossetes, numbering perhaps 120,000, are distinctly Aryan; the southern or Kartveli group of Caucasian tribes (including the Georgians), the eastern group (including the Tchetchens and Lesghians), and the western group (including Circassians and Abkhasians), speak languages mutually unintelligible and of doubtful affinities.

The resistance which the Caucasian peoples for more than half a century offered to the arms of Russia attracted to them the attention of the world. But with the capture in 1859 of Shamyl, the prophet chief of the Lesghians, the power of the Caucasians was shattered; by 1870 it was completely broken. The bulk of the Circassians and Abkhasians migrated to Turkish territories in Asia or Europe. The ancient divisions of the country, Georgia, Imeritia, Svanetia, Mingrelia, &c., based on tribal distinctions, have disappeared from the Russian administrative system, in which the main range of Caucasus divides the province into Ciscaucasia, north of the mountains, and Transcaucasia to the south of them; the former comprising the governments of Stavropol, Kuban, Terek; the latter, those of Daghestan (really north of Caucasus), Tiflis, Kutaïs, Elisabetpol, Baku, Kars, and Erivan. Total area, 308,000 sq. m.; pop. 6,290,000. The chief town in Ciscaucasia is Vladikavkaz; in Transcaucasia, Tiflis. The old capital of Georgia was Mtzkhet, a good specimen of a Georgian word. See works by Freshfield (1869), Cuninghame (1872), Bryce (1878), Phillipps-Wolley (1883), 'Wanderer' (1883), Abercromby (1890), and Curtis (1911).

Caudebec (Koad-bek'), two places in Seine-Inférieure. Caudebec lès Elbeuf, 12 miles S. by W. of Rouen, has a population of 10,000, and manufactures cloth. Caudebec-en-Caux, a pretty antique village of 2000 inhabitants, is on the Seine, 31 miles WNW. of Rouen.

Caura (Kow'ra), a river of Venezuela flowing NNW. to the Orinico. On both sides stretches the former territory of Caura (22,485 sq. m.).

Cauterets (Koa-te-ray'), a French watering-place in the dep. of Hautes-Pyrénées, lies 3250 feet above sea-level, in the valley of the Laverdan, 42 miles SSE. of Pau. The stationary population is only about 1000, but it is annually swelled in summer by 15,000 to 20,000 visitors, for whose accommodation numerous sumptuous hotels and bathing-establishments have been built. Its twenty-five sulphurous springs (60° to 131° F.) have been known from Roman times; though their modern reputation dates from the 16th century, when Margaret, sister of Francis I., held her literary court and wrote much of her Heptameron at Cauterets.

Cauvery. See KAVERI.

Cava dei Tirreni, a cathedral city of Italy, in a lovely valley, 5½ miles NW. of Salerno by rail. Pop. 10,000. About a mile distant is a Benedictine monastery celebrated for its archives.

Cavaillon (Ka-va-yon^{g}'), a town in the French dep. of Vaucluse, 18 miles SE. of Avignon, with a cathedral and Roman remains. Pop. 10,000.

Cav'an, an inland county in the south of Ulster. It lies in the narrowest part of Ireland, 18 miles from the Atlantic, and 20 from the Irish Sea. Area, 746 sq. m., of which less than a third is under crops. Bogs and hills, with many small lakes, are found in the north-west, where Cuilcagh attains a maximum altitude of 2188 feet. The chief rivers are the Erne, the Woodford, and the Annalee. Of minerals, Cavan affords coal, iron, lead, and copper, with many mineral springs. The chief towns are Cavan, Cootehill, and Belturbet. Cavan returns two members to parliament. Pop. (1851) 174,064; (1911) 91,173, 81·5 per cent. Catholics.—CAVAN, the county town, stands on a branch of the Annalee, 85 miles NW. of Dublin by rail. Pop. 3000.

Cavité (Ka-vee-tay'), a decayed seaport of Luzon, one of the Philippines, 12 miles SW. of the capital. Pop. 5500.

Cawdor, a Nairnshire village, 5½ miles SW. of Nairn. Cawdor Castle, the seat of the Earl of Cawdor, was founded in 1454, but is one of the three traditional scenes of King Duncan's murder by Macbeth in 1040. See Cosmo Innes's Book of the Thanes of Cawdor (1859).

Cawnpore' (Kanhpur), a city of the United Provinces, India, on the right bank of the Ganges, 42 miles SW. of Lucknow, 266 SE. of Delhi, and 628 NW. of Calcutta. The river here varies according to the season, from 500 yards in width to more than a mile. The principal landing-place is the beautiful Sarsiya ghát. Cawnpore, at least as a place of note, is of recent origin, being indebted for its growth, besides its commercial facilities, partly to military and political considerations. Population, 178,000.

In 1777, being then an appendage of Oudh, it was assigned by the nawab as the station of a subsidiary force; and in 1801 it became, in name as well as in fact, British property. At the outbreak of the mutiny in May 1857, Cawnpore contained 1000 Europeans (560 of them women and children), who, after a three weeks' gallant defence, surrendered to the infamous Nana Sahib, on promise of a safe-conduct to Allahabad, only to be pitilessly massacred. There is a memorial church, a Romanesque red-brick building, whilst the scene of the actual massacre is occupied by the memorial gardens. Over the fatal well a mound has been raised, its summit crowned by an octagonal Gothic enclosure, with Marochetti's white marble angel in the centre. But Sir George Trevelyan's Cawnpore (1865) is the best memorial of the tragedy.

Caxamarca. See CAJAMARCA.

Caxias, (1) a town of Brazil, in the province of Maranhão, on the navigable Itapicuru, 190 miles from its mouth. Pop. 10,000.—(2) An Italian colony in the Brazilian province of Rio Grande do Sul, founded in 1875. Pop. 15,000.

Cayenne, a fortified seaport, capital of French Guiana, on an island at the mouth of a river of the same name. The harbour is the best on the coast, but insecure and shallow. Cayenne, though the entrepôt of all the trade of the colony, was long chiefly known as a great French penal settlement, its climate being extremely unwholesome for Europeans. The French took possession of the island in 1604, and again in 1677. The name of the capital is sometimes used for the whole colony. Pop. 13,600.

Cayes, or AUX CAYES (O Kay'), a seaport of Hayti, on the south-west coast, 95 miles WSW. of Port-au-Prince. Pop. 25,000.

Caymans (Kī-mans'), three fertile coral islands, 165 miles NW. of Jamaica, of which they are a dependency. Columbus discovered them, and called them Tortugas, from the abundance of turtle, still their staple production. Area, 225 sq. m.; pop. 6500.

Cazalla de la Sierra, a Spanish town, 38 miles ENE. of Seville. Pop. 8000.

Cazem'be, a region of northern Rhodesia, between the Moero and Bangweolo lakes, west of 30° E. long. Here Livingstone died in 1873.

Cazorla, a town of Andalusia, Spain, 40 miles ENE. of Jaën. Pop. 10,000.

Ceará (Say-a-râh'), a province of Brazil, on the north coast, with an area of 40,253 sq. m., and 1,200,000 inhabitants. The capital, Ceará, has a harbour, with breakwater, and is the terminus of a railway to Baturité and Ico. Pop. 35,000.

Cebu, or ZEBU, is one of the Philippine Islands (q.v.), the seventh in respect of area.

Cedar-bergen, a range in the west of South Africa, stretches N. and S. on the east side of Olifant River Valley, in Clanwilliam division. Sneeuwkop (6335 feet) is the highest point.

Cedar Creek, a river of Virginia, U.S., giving name to the defeat of the Confederates, 19th October 1864.

Cedar Rapids, a town of Iowa, on the Red Cedar River, 79 miles SW. of Dubuque. It is an important railway centre, and has large flour-mills, carriage and machine works, and breweries. Pop. 33,000.

Cefalù (Chay-fa-loo'), a city of Sicily, on the north coast, 40 miles ESE. of Palermo. It lies beneath a cliff, with a Norman cathedral and Greek ruins. Pop. 15,000.

Ceglie (Chayl'yay), a town in southern Italy, 21 miles NE. of Taranto. Pop. 20,000.

Celano, LAKE OF. See FUCINO, LAKE OF.

Celaya (Se-lâh'ya), a town in the Mexican state of Guanajuato, on the Rio Laja, about 150 miles by rail NW. of the city of Mexico. Pop. 25,600.

Celbridge, a town of Co. Kildare, Ireland, on the Liffey, 12 miles W. of Dublin. Pop. 840.

Celebes (Span. pron. The-lay'bez; Eng. usu. Sel'e-bez), practically a Dutch island, is separated from Borneo by the Strait of Macassar, and 800 miles long by 200 broad. It consists of a central nucleus whence radiate four long mountainous limbs, respectively E., NE., SE., and S., enclosing the three gulfs of Gorontalo, running in nearly 200 miles, Tolo 150 miles, and Boni about 200 miles. The gulfs, as also the north and west coasts, are studded with islands, rocks and shoals, and larger outlying islands. The east end of the north-eastern peninsula is subject to earthquakes, and contains 11 volcanoes, some of them active, such as Mount Sapoetan (5938 feet), and, farther east, Mount Klabat (6559 feet), which has now, however, long been quiescent, besides numerous hot springs and sulphur lakes. The mountains of the south peninsula seldom rise above 2000 feet. In the extreme south, however, are Maros (4225 feet) and Bonthain (9994 feet). Between the hills and coast of the south peninsula are extensive grassy plains, affording pasture for large herds of cattle and horses. Celebes is rich in lakes, among them, Passo, in the central nucleus, 35 by 25 miles, and Tondano, nearly 2000 feet above the sea. Thanks to the elevation of the land and its sea exposure, Celebes, no part of which is more than 50 miles from the sea, enjoys a comparatively cool and healthy climate. The vegetation includes rice, maize, coffee, sugar, tobacco, indigo, areca, betel, pepper, clove and nutmeg growing wild; the tree yielding macassar oil, oak, teak, cedar, ebony, sandalwood, bamboos; also the upas. Many mammals, birds, and insects are wholly peculiar to Celebes. Gold is obtained from surface washings; iron, salt, tin, and copper are likewise worked.

The population is probably about a million. The Bugis and Mangkassars of the south peninsula, tall, shapely, and comparatively fair, are the dominant native race, much disposed to trading and seafaring. The 'Alfuros,' a collective name for the other native tribes, are at a very low grade of culture. Celebes was first visited in 1525 by a Portuguese expedition from the Moluccas. In 1607 the Dutch began to trade with Celebes, and now claim the whole island, which they have divided into the residencies of Macassar and Menado, a third division round the north and west of the Gulf of Tolo being included in the residency of Ternate. The chief town is Macassar (pop. 20,000), with a sea-frontage of nearly 2½ miles. See Lahure, Célèbes (Paris, 1879); Hickson, The Naturalist in North Celebes (1889).

Cellardyke. See ANSTRUTHER.

Celle. See ZELL.

Cenis. See MONT CENIS.

Cento (Chen'to), a town of central Italy, 16 miles N. by W. of Bologna. It is the birthplace of the painter Guercino. Pop. 5000.

Central America, that part of the northern half of the American continent which lies between the isthmuses of Tehuantepec and Panama, sometimes extended so as to embrace Mexico. It includes the republics of Guatemala, Honduras, San Salvador, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica; Belize; and the Mexican state of Chiapa and peninsula of Yucatan. The republic of Panamá (once Colombian) might now be added.

Central Asia. See Asia, p. 55.

Central City, the name of several villages and hamlets in the United States, and of the capital of Gilpin county, Colorado, 40 miles W. of Denver by rail, with quartz-mills and rich gold-mines, and 1800 inhabitants.

Central Falls, a city of Providence county, Rhode Island, 4½ miles N. of Providence, with extensive manufactures. Pop. 20,000.

Central India, the official term for a group of feudatory Indian states which fall into eight agencies and residencies, under the supervision of the governor-general's agent. The region in which these states lie is to the north of the British 'Central Provinces' of India, and touches the United Provinces, Rajputana, and Khandesh in the Bombay Province. The area is 78,800 sq. m.; pop. 9,387,000. The subordinate agencies and residencies comprised in the Central India Agency are the Indore, Bhopawar, Malwa, Bhopal, Bundelkhand, and Baghelkhand agencies, and the residencies of Gwalior and Indore.

Central Provinces and Berar, a province of India, near the centre of the peninsula, embracing 22 British districts and 15 native states. Area (including that transferred in 1905 from Chota Nagpore), 100,300 sq. m. British and 31,200 native; pop. 14,000,000 and 2,000,000 respectively. The surface is irregular, the plains being broken by ridges; in the north extend the Vindhyan and Satpura (2000 feet) tablelands, with the Nerbudda between; south of these stretches the great Nagpur plain, with the Chatisgarh plain to the east, and a wild forest-region beyond, reaching almost to the Godavari. The climate is hot and dry, except during the south-west monsoon (June—September), when 41 of the mean annual 45 inches of rain fall. Wheat, rice, oil-seeds, cotton, and tobacco are raised; the only manufactures of note are weaving and the smelting and working of iron ores. Of the population three-fourths are Hindus, and one-seventh aboriginal or non-Aryan tribes who still adhere to their primitive faiths. Only a small part of the population dwells in towns, of which Nagpur and Jubbulpore have over 100,000 inhabitants. Berar is the subject of a separate article.

Ceos (modern Kea, Italianised as Zea or Tzia), one of the Cyclades, in the Ægean Sea, 14 miles off the Attic coast. It is 13 miles long, 8 broad, and 39 sq. m. in area. The culminating point is Mount Elias, 1863 feet high. The population is 4000, of whom the great majority live in the capital, Zea or Ceos. In ancient times Ceos was noted as the birthplace of the poets Simonides and Bacchylides, and the physician Erasistratus.

Cephalonia (Homeric Samē or Samos), the largest of the seven Ionian Islands (q.v.), lies opposite the entrance of the Gulf of Lepanto or Corinth. It is irregular in shape, with a length of 30 miles, and an area of 302 sq. m. Pop. 70,000. The surface is mountainous, attaining 5310 feet; the soil for the most part thin, and water scarce. The capital is Argostoli (q.v.).

Cephissus, one of the two rivers which water the Athenian plain.

Ceram′ (Serang), the largest of the southern Moluccas (q.v.), lies NE. of Amboyna, to which Dutch residency it belongs, and is divided into Great and Little Ceram by the Isthmus of Taruno. Area, 6605 sq. m.; pop. 105,000. A mountain-chain reaches in Nusa Keli 11,000 feet.

Cerignola (Chereen′yola), a town of Italy, 22 miles SE. of Foggia by rail. The Spanish victory over the French here in 1503 established Spain's supremacy in Naples. Pop. 35,000.

Cerigo (Cher′ee-go), the southernmost of the seven Ionian Islands (q.v.), now officially known again by its old Greek name of Cythera, is separated from the Morea by a narrow strait. Area, 107 sq. m.; pop. 10,000. Capsali is the capital. In ancient times the island was sacred to Venus.

Cerne Abbas, a market-town of Dorset, on the Cerne, 7 miles N. of Dorchester. Pop. 800.

Cerreto (Cher-ray′to), a cathedral city of south Italy, 14 miles NNW. of Benevento. Pop. 5000.

Cerro de Pasco (Serro), the capital of the Peruvian dep. of Junin, stands at an elevation of 14,276 feet, 138 miles NE. of Lima. Near it are rich silver-mines. Pop. 15,000.

Cerro Gordo, a plateau in Mexico, the most easterly on the route from Vera Cruz to the capital. Here, on 18th April 1847, the Americans totally defeated the Mexicans.

Cerro Largo, a dep. in the NE. of Uruguay. Area, 5735 sq. m.; pop. 48,000. Capital, Cerro Largo or Melo; pop. 5000.

Certaldo (Cher-tahl′do), a town of central Italy, 19 miles SW. of Florence (37 by rail). Boccaccio was born and died here. His house still stands much as in his time. Pop. 10,000.

Cervet′ri (from Cœre Vetus), a village 19 miles WNW. of Rome, on the site of the ancient Cœre or Agylla, formerly one of the most important cities of Etruria.

Cervin, Mont. See Matterhorn.

Cesena (Chez-ay′na), a cathedral city of central Italy, 12 miles SE. of Forli by rail. It gave birth to Popes Pius VI. and VII. Pop. 12,000. Here Murat defeated the Austrians, 30th March 1815.

Cetinje, or Cettigné (Set-tin′yeh), capital of Montenegro, lies in a rocky valley 2093 feet above sea-level, and 17 miles E. of Cattaro. Pop. 4500.

Cette (Sett), a seaport in the French dep. of Hérault, on a neck of land between the lagoon of Thau and the Mediterranean, 23 miles SW. of Montpellier. The harbour enclosed by the piers and breakwater can accommodate about 400 vessels, and is defended by forts. A broad deep canal, lined with excellent quays, connects the port with the Canal du Midi and the Rhone, thus giving to Cette an extensive inland traffic; it has likewise an active foreign commerce. Cette has shipbuilding yards, salt-works, glass-works, factories for the manufacture of syrups and grape-sugar, &c. It is a resort for sea-bathing, and has extensive fisheries and wine-trade. Colbert founded it in 1666. Pop. 32,000.

Ce′uta (Span. pron. Thay′oo-ta), a fortified port belonging to Spain, on the coast of Morocco, opposite Gibraltar. It occupies the site of the Roman colony of Ad Septem Fratres, so called from the seven hills, of which the most prominent are Montes Almina and Hacho; on the latter, the ancient Abyla (one of the Pillars of Hercules), is a strong fort, and on the former, among beautiful gardens, lies the New Town. Ceuta has a cathedral, but is chiefly important as a military and convict station. The harbour is small, and exposed to the north. In 1415 Ceuta, with its territory, was captured by the Portuguese; in 1580 it fell to Spain. Pop. 13,000.

Cévennes (anc. Cebenna), the chief mountain-range in the south of France. With its continuations and offsets, it forms the watershed between the Rhone and the Loire and Garonne. The Cevennes extend for over 150 miles, through or into nine deps., the central mass lying in Lozère and Ardèche, where Mont Lozère attains 5584 feet, and Mont Mézenc (the culminating point of the chain) 5754 feet. The average height is from 3000 to 4000 feet. See works by R. L. Stevenson (1879) and E. A. Martel (Paris, 1890).

Ceylon (the Taprobane of the Greeks and Romans, and the Serendib of the Arabian Nights), a British crown colony in the Indian Ocean, is an island to the south-east of India, from which it is separated by the Gulf of Manaar and Palk Strait, 32 to 120 miles broad. Extreme length from north to south, 266 miles; greatest width, 140 miles. Area, 23,330 sq. m., of which about one-sixth is under cultivation. In natural scenery Ceylon can vie with any part of the world; and as its magnificent hills rise from the sapphire ocean, clothed with the rich luxuriance of a tropical vegetation, it seems to the voyager like some enchanted island of Eastern story. Undulating plains cover about four parts of the island, and the fifth is occupied by the mountain-zone of the central south, which has an elevation of from 6000 to 8000 feet above the sea-level. Pedrotallagalla attains the height of 8260 feet; Adam's Peak, 7420 feet; and the tableland of Nuwara-Eliya, 6210 feet. The mountain-system is mainly composed of metamorphic rocks, chiefly gneiss, frequently broken up by intrusive granite. With the exception of some local beds of dolomitic limestone, the gneiss is everywhere the surface rock, and the soil is composed of its disintegrated materials. Iron can be obtained in great quantities, and anthracite and rich veins of plumbago exist on the southern range of hills. Gold has recently been found. The gems of Ceylon have been celebrated from time immemorial, and include sapphires, rubies, the oriental topaz, garnets, amethysts, cinnamon stone, and cat's-eye. The pearl-fisheries of Ceylon, known at a very remote date, form a government monopoly, and are under the inspection of an officer, who reports when a sufficient number of pearl-yielding oysters have reached maturity. The fishings occur at irregular dates. The value of pearls obtained varies from £10,000 in some years to £60,000 in others; there was no fishing from 1892 till 1904.

The most important river in Ceylon is the Mahavila-ganga, which drains more than 4000 sq. m. Galle and Trincomalee are the only great natural harbours; but harbour improvements have concentrated the commerce of the island at Colombo, the capital of the island. At Trincomalee are the naval stores and dockyard. In climate, Ceylon has a great advantage over the mainland of India, and as an island enjoys a more equable temperature. The average for the year in Colombo is 80° in ordinary seasons. The beautiful tableland of Nuwara-Eliya is used as a sanatorium. Here the thermometer in the shade never rises above 70°, while the average is 62°; the nights are cool and refreshing. The general botanical features of Ceylon are in many respects similar to those of Southern India; but about 800 species of plants are peculiar to the island. Of animals the primates are represented by the Loris gracilis and five species of monkeys. Sixteen species of bats exist in Ceylon, including the flying-fox. Of the larger carnivora, the bear and leopard; and of the smaller, the palm-cat and the glossy genette (the civet of Europeans) may be mentioned. The tiger is not met with in Ceylon. Deer, buffaloes, and the humped ox of India are plentiful, and the wild boar occurs. The elephant, which is for the most part tuskless, is emphatically lord of the forests of Ceylon. Whales are captured off the coast. Three hundred and twenty species of birds are found. The crocodile is the largest reptile in the island; tortoises and lizards are also found. There are a few species of venomous snakes.

The Singhalese (Sinhalese, also spelt Cingalese), the most numerous of the natives of Ceylon, are supposed to be the descendants of those colonists from the valley of the Ganges who first settled in the island 543 B.C., and speak an Aryan language closely allied to the Pali or modernised Sanskrit. The Kandyans, or Highlanders, are a more sturdy race. The Malabars, or Tamils, have sprung from those early invaders of Ceylon who from time to time swept across from Southern Hindustan. The Moormen, of Arab descent, are enterprising traders. The 'burghers' of Ceylon are people of Portuguese and Dutch descent, who have become naturalised. There is besides a remarkable tribe of outcasts—the Veddahs—hardly removed from the wild animals of the forest. The Singhalese are devoted to Buddhism, which has, however, been adulterated with Brahmanism. The most celebrated Buddhistic relic in Ceylon is the so-called sacred tooth of Gautama or Buddha, really a piece of discoloured ivory, which is guarded with jealous care at Kandy. Another is the sacred Bo-tree of Anuradhapura. Brahmanism or Hinduism is the faith of the Tamils or Malabars, and the Moormen are Mohammedans. After the expulsion of the Dutch Christians, Protestant missions to the natives of Ceylon were commenced by the Baptists in 1813. The Wesleyan Methodists followed in 1814, the Americans in 1816, the Church of England in 1818. Schools, collegiate institutions, and female seminaries, under the direction of the missionaries, are in successful operation; and there is a government system of education. Amongst the antiquities of Ceylon are dagobas or relic-shrines, cave-temples and other temples, and viharas or monasteries; also the ruined tanks, singular monuments of the former greatness of the Singhalese. Thirty colossal reservoirs, and about 700 smaller tanks, still exist, though for the most part in ruins. The restoration of these magnificent works of irrigation is being carried on by the government.

Coffee was long the chief commercial product of the island; but in 1869 a fungus (Hemileia vastatrix) attacked the leaves of the coffee-trees, and though everything was tried to mitigate or overcome the pest, it steadily increased in virulence, and the coffee-planters were obliged to turn their attention to other products of the soil. Cinchona, cacao, cardamoms, and many other plants were tried with varying success, but it soon became plain that Ceylon was capable of becoming a great tea-producing country, and tea has become the chief factor in restoring the financial equilibrium. Cinnamon and cocoa-nut cultivation are chiefly in the hands of natives; tea, cinchona, cacao, and cardamom cultivation in the hands of Europeans. The export of coffee fell from 995,493 cwt. in 1873 to 10,315 cwt. in 1902. In 1878 3515 lb. of tea were exported; in 1900-4 over 150,000,000 lb. a year. The other exports are cinchona, cocoa, coco-nut oil, cinnamon, cardamoms, plumbago, tobacco, coir, copra, and cordage—mainly to India and Britain. The chief imports from Britain are cotton goods, iron and iron goods, coal, and machinery; but the chief import is rice from India. In the early years of the 20th century the exports to Britain averaged £3,500,000 a year, and the imports from Britain £2,100,000.

Ceylon, the largest of the British crown colonies, is administered by a governor aided by executive and legislative councils (the former consisting of six members, the latter of seventeen, partially elective), and municipal councils. Local boards and village tribunals give a measure of self-government to the people. The population of Ceylon, 2,763,984 at the census of 1881, rose by 1911 to 3,592,397, of whom 2,676,230 are Singhalese, 599,771 Tamil immigrants and settlers, 260,842 Moormen (Mohammedans of Arab descent), 5278 Europeans, 25,173 Eurasian descendants of Portuguese and Dutch, 5342 Veddahs, and 11,870 Malays. The revenue in 1882 was 12,161,570 rupees, and in 1910 was 42,789,435 rupees. The expenditure had risen from 12,494,664 rupees in 1882 to 35,708,280 in 1910. In the latter year the rupee had depreciated to 1s. 4d. Buddhism was introduced into Ceylon in 307 B.C. In 237 B.C. the Malabar mercenaries usurped supreme power, which they retained till 1071 A.D., when for 100 years a native dynasty ruled, the reign of Prakrama (from 1153 A.D. on) being the most glorious in the annals of Ceylon. The Malabars struggled with the native dynasties till 1517, when the Portuguese established themselves in the island, to be expelled by the Dutch in 1658; and it was not till the great French wars at the end of the 18th century that the Dutch ceded all their powers and possessions here to Britain, the island being formally annexed to the British crown in 1815.

Cezimbra, a coast town of Portugal, 18 miles S. of Lisbon. Pop. 10,000.

Chablis (Shab-lee'), a town in the dep. of Yonne, 12 miles E. of Auxerre. It gives name to an esteemed white Burgundy wine. Pop. 2000.

Chaco, EL GRAN. See GRAN CHACO.

Chad, TCHAD, or TSAD, LAKE, a rapidly dwindling lake in the Soudan, with an estimated area of 10,000 sq. m. in the dry season, and four or five times that extent during the rainy months. The western half contains the real lake, in great part choked with vegetation, and much reduced in area by diminishing rainfall; the eastern is generally a complex of low islands, separated by shallow canals, and inhabited by a race of semi-amphibious Negroes. The few streams that reach the lake are all small, except the Shari, which comes from the south-east. Lake Chad, whose waters are still fresh, but increasing in salinity, has no regular outlet. It used to overflow towards a great depressed plain 300 miles to the north-east. In a very wet season it connects, through the Shari, its tributary the Logone, and the Tuburi marshes, with the Benuë, and so with the Niger. The average depth is about 5 feet. The north-western shore belongs to French West Africa, the north-eastern and southern as far as the Shari river, to French Equatorial Africa, so that the former states of Kanem, Wadai, and Bagirmi have fallen to France. West of the Shari the German possession of Cameroon sends an extension to the south end of the lake. Britain holds the south-western shore (Bornu) as part of Nigeria. The first Europeans to see it were Denham, Clapperton, and Oudney; Nachtigal explored it in 1870. See the work on the travels of the unfortunate explorer Crampel by Alis, À la Conquête du Tchad (1892); Dybowski, La Route du Tchad (1893); Boyd Alexander's From Niger to Nile (1907); and Documents Scientifiques de la Mission Tilho (1910 et seq.).

Chadda, another name for the Benuë (q.v.).

Chadderton, a suburb of Oldham (q.v.).

Chæronea, a town in ancient Bœotia, near the river Cephissus, memorable for the disastrous defeat of the Athenians by Philip of Macedon, 338 B.C. Plutarch was a native.

Chagny (Shan-yee'), a town in the French dep. of Saône-et-Loire, 32 miles S. of Dijon. Pop. 4500.

Chagos. See DIEGO GARCIA.

Chagres (Tchâh-gres), a town of the republic of Panamá, on the N. coast of the Isthmus of Panamá, at the mouth of the Chagres River. The river Chagres rises about 10 miles NE. of Panamá, makes an immense bend round to the NE., and enters the Caribbean Sea. The line of the Panamá Canal follows the lower valley of the Chagres, an immense dam converting the river into a large lake, which forms part of the waterway.

Chalce'don, a city of ancient Bithynia, at the entrance of the Euxine, opposite to Byzantium.

Chalcis, the capital of the Greek island of Eubœa, on the Euripus, a strait here only 120 feet wide. It was successively Athenian, Macedonian, Roman, and Venetian, until its conquest by the Turks in 1470. Pop. 10,000.

Chaleurs, BAY OF, an inlet of the Gulf of St Lawrence, between Gaspé, a district of Quebec, and New Brunswick, having a length of 90 miles east and west, and a width of from 12 to 20.

Chalfont St Giles, a village of Buckinghamshire, 16 miles SE. of Aylesbury. Milton's cottage here (1665) was saved from demolition and purchased by the nation in 1887.

Chalgrove, a village 13 miles SE. of Oxford, the scene of a skirmish between Prince Rupert's cavalry and a parliamentary force under Hampden, who here received his death-wound, June 18, 1643.

Châlons-sur-Marne (Shâhlon^{g}-sür-Marn), the capital of the French dep. of Marne, on the right bank of the river Marne, 107 miles E. of Paris by rail. An old place, with timber houses and many spired churches, it has a 13th-century cathedral, a handsome hôtel-de-ville (1772), and a fine public park, though the Germans in 1870 cut down its immemorial elms for fuel. It still does a considerable trade in champagne wine; but its manufacture of the worsted cloth known as 'shalloon' (Chaucer's chalons) is a thing of the past, and the population has dwindled from 60,000 in the 13th century to 22,000 in the 20th. Near Châlons (anc. Catalauni) the Romans and Goths in 451 A.D. defeated Attila and his Huns. In 1856 Napoleon III. formed the celebrated camp of Châlons, 16½ miles NE. of the town.

Chalon-sur-Saône (Shâhlon^{g}-sür-Sone), a town in the French dep. of Saône-et-Loire, 84½ miles by rail N. of Lyons. Lying on the right bank of the Saône, which here is joined by the Canal du Centre, uniting it with the Loire, Chalon has an extensive traffic with central France, as well as with the Mediterranean and Atlantic. The industries are copper and iron founding, machinery and ship-building, and the manufacture of glass, paper, and chemicals. Pop. 25,000.

Chamalari (Tcha-ma-lah'ree), a peak (23,944 feet) of the Himalayas, between Tibet and Bhutan, 140 miles E. of Mount Everest.

Chamba, one of the Punjab Hill States, immediately SE. of Cashmere, with an area of 3200 sq. m. Pop. 136,000, nearly all Hindus. It is shut in by lofty hills, and traversed by two ranges of snowy peaks and glaciers, with fertile valleys to the south and west. The banks of the Ravi and Chenab, two of the five great Punjab rivers, are clothed with mighty forests, leased to the British government.

Chambal, a river rising in the Vindhya Range, 2019 feet above sea-level, and flowing 650 miles north-eastward to the Jumna 40 miles below Etawah.

Chambersburg, capital of Franklin county, Pennsylvania, 52 miles WSW. of Harrisburg by rail. A large part of it was burned by the Confederates in 1864. Pop. 12,000.

Chambéry (Shon^{g}bay-ree'), capital of the old duchy and present French dep. of Savoy, beautifully situated between two ridges of hills, 370 miles SE. of Paris by rail. The town itself is uninteresting; but the scenery around, with the river Laisse flowing through the valley, is exceedingly fine. Chambéry has a small cathedral, a palace of justice, and the old castle of the Dukes of Savoy. It manufactures clocks, silk-gauze, soap, hats, paper, &c. Pop. 17,000.

Chambeze (Cham-bee'zeh), the farthest headstream of the Congo, rises south of Tanganyika, about 9° 40′ S. lat., and 33° 15′ E. long., and flows south-west to Lake Bangweolo (q.v.).

Chambord (Shon^{g}borr'), a celebrated chateau in the French dep. of Loir-et-Cher, 12 miles E. of Blois. Commenced in 1526, it is a huge Renaissance pile, and in 1821 was presented to the Comte de Chambord (1820–83).

Chamouni, or CHAMONIX (Shah-moo-nee'; Lat. Campus munitus, as sheltered by the mountains), a celebrated valley among the French Alps, in the dep. of Upper Savoy, 53 miles ESE. of Geneva, at an elevation of about 3400 feet above sea-level. It is about 13 miles long and 2 broad, and is traversed by the Arve. On the south side lies the giant group of Mont Blanc, from which enormous glaciers glide down, even in summer, almost to the bottom of the valley: one of them, the Glacier des Bois, expands in its upper course into a great mountain-lake of ice, the Mer de Glace. The village of Chamouni, which is the usual starting-point for the ascent of Mont Blanc, owes its origin and its alternative name, Le Prieuré, to the Benedictine convent founded here before 1099. In 1741 Chamouni was visited by two Englishmen, Pococke and Wyndham, but it was only in 1787 that the attention of travellers was effectually called to it by the Genevese naturalist, De Saussure, and others. Since then the number of visitors has increased to over 15,000 tourists, and the railway was opened in 1901. Pop. of village, 1000; of commune, 4000.

Champagne, a district and ancient province (180 by 150 miles) of France, now forming the deps. of Marne, Haute-Marne, Aube, and Ardennes, with parts of Yonne, Aisne, Seine-et-Marne, and Meuse. It is famous for its white and red wines, the former either sparkling or still; the best varieties are produced at Rheims and Epernay. The chief towns were Troyes, Bar-sur-Aube, Leon, and Rheims.

Champaign, a city of Illinois, 128 miles SSW. of Chicago. It has furniture and wagon factories, and an Industrial University (1868). Pop. 12,400.

Champaran, a British Indian district in the NW. corner of Behar, with an area of 3531 sq. m., and a pop. of 1,859,465.

Champlain', a beautiful lake separating the states of New York and Vermont, and penetrating, at its north end, about 6 miles into Canada. Lying 91 feet above sea-level, it is 110 miles long, by from 1 to 15 broad, empties itself into the St Lawrence by the Richelieu River, and has communication by canal with the Hudson. The lake was discovered by Champlain in 1609; and here a British flotilla was defeated by the Americans, 11th September 1814.

Chancellorsville, a post-station of Virginia, near the Rappahannock, 11 miles W. of Fredericksburg. Here, May 2 and 3, 1863, the Confederates defeated the Federals, but suffered a severe loss in Stonewall Jackson, who was accidentally shot by his own men.

Chanda, chief town of a district of India, on the south-west frontier of the Central Provinces, 90 miles S. of Nagpur. Pop. 20,000.

Chandausi, a town of the United Provinces, 27 miles S. of Moradabad. Pop. 25,000.

Chanderi (Tchanday'ree), a town of Central India, 105 miles S. of Gwalior. Now an insignificant place, it once contained 14,000 stone houses.

Chandernagore (properly Chandan-nagar, 'city of sandalwood'), a French city, with a territory of about 3½ sq. m., on the right bank of the Hugli, 22 miles above Calcutta. Established in 1673, it for a while rivalled Calcutta; now, through the gradual silting up of the river, it has little external trade. Pop. 25,200.

Chandor, a town in the province of Bombay, 40 miles NE. of Nasik. Its fort, commanding an important pass between Khandesh and Bombay, crowns a hill 3994 feet high. Pop. 5000.

Chandpur, a town of the United Provinces, 19 miles S. of Bijnaur. Pop. 12,000.

Chang-Chow, two cities of China, (1) a city 28 miles W. by S. of Amoy; pop. 1,000,000.—(2) a city 50 miles E. by S. of Nanking; pop. 360,000.

Chang-Sha, a city of China, capital of the province of Hu-nan, on the Heng-kiang, a tributary of the Yang-tse. Pop. 300,000.

Channel, THE ENGLISH (Fr. La Manche, 'Sleeve;' Roman Mare Britannicum), is the narrow sea between England and France. On the east, it joins the North Sea at the Strait of Dover, 21 miles wide, from which it runs west-south-west for 280 miles, and joins the Atlantic Ocean at the Chops, with a breadth of 100 miles between the Scilly Isles and Ushant Isle. With an average breadth of 70 miles, it is 90 miles wide from Brighton to Havre; 60 miles from Portland Bill to Cape La Hague; 140 miles—its greatest breadth—from Sidmouth to St Malo; and 100 to 110 miles west of the latter line. It occupies 23,900 square geographical miles, and contains the Channel Isles, Ushant Isle, and Isle of Wight. It is shallowest at the Strait of Dover, where a chalk ridge at the depth of twelve to thirty fathoms joins England and France. West of this, the average depth of the central portion is thirty fathoms, with hollows from forty to sixty-two fathoms deep. The English coast-line of the Channel is 390 miles long, and the French coast-line is 570 miles long. The proposed Channel Tunnel, 23 miles long, from Dover to Calais, was discussed first in 1867.

Channel Islands, a group of small islands off the NW. coast of France, which from the 10th century formed part of the old duchy of Normandy, and since the Norman Conquest has remained subject to the British crown. The nearest points are about 12 miles from the French coast. The four principal islands are Jersey, Alderney, Sark, and Guernsey; others being the Caskets (or Casquets), Burhou, Brecqhou, Jethou, Herm, the Minquiers, and the Chausseys. The area is 75 square miles, the population 96,900. The islands are administered according to their own laws and customs, and are not bound by British acts of parliament. Jersey has its own lieutenant-governor, judges, and 'states' partly elective; Guernsey, Alderney, and Sark have a governor in common, but separate administrations. English predominates in the towns; elsewhere the vernacular is a local modification of old Norman-French. The scenery is beautiful, the climate delightful to invalids. Frost and snow are rare. Flowering plants and shrubs are about a fortnight earlier in the spring than in England. The produce of the islands is principally agricultural; but horticulture and floriculture are successfully followed—the latter especially in Guernsey. The system of cultivation is very primitive. The principal manure is seaweed. A great quantity is burned for the manufacture of kelp and iodine. The principal crops are potatoes, hay, wheat, turnips, mangel-wurzel, parsnips, and carrots. The Channel Islands are famous for excellent breeds of horned cattle, usually known as 'Alderneys,' though each island has its own special type. The other main articles of exportation are granite, fruit, and early potatoes. See The Channel Islands, by Wimbush and Carey (1904).

Chanonry. See FORTROSE.

Chantenay, a growing western suburb of Nantes (q.v.).

Chantibun, or CHANTABON, a town of Siam, a considerable port near the mouth of the Chantabun River, in the Gulf of Siam, has valuable ruby-mines, and exports sapphires and white pepper. Pop. 7000.

Chantilly (Shonᵍtee-yee'), a town in the dep. of Oise, 26 m. NNE. of Paris. One of the most beautiful places in the vicinity of the capital, and the headquarters of French horse-racing, it attracts immense numbers of visitors. The magnificent chateau of the great Condé here was pulled down at the Revolution of 1793, but was rebuilt by the Duc d'Aumale, who bought back the estate in 1872, and who in 1886 presented it to the French Institute, with its priceless art collections, its value nearly £2,000,000. The manufacture of silk pillow-lace, or blonde, so famous in the 18th century, is all but extinct. Pop. 4500.

Chapala, an isleted lake of Mexico, on the high plateau of Jalisco, surrounded by steep, bare mountains. It has an area of 1300 sq. m., and is traversed by the Rio Grande de Santiago.

Chapel-en-le-Frith, a Derbyshire market-town, 5 miles N. of Buxton. Pop. of parish, 5000.

Chapelizod, a town on the Liffey, partly included in the city of Dublin.

Chapra, a town in Bihar, on the Gogra, 1 mile above its confluence with the Ganges. Pop. 50,000.

Chapul'tepec, a rock, 150 feet high, 2 miles SW. of the city of Mexico. A castle (1785) crowns it, on the site of Montezuma's palace.

Chard, a municipal borough of Somerset, 15 miles SSE. of Taunton. It has manufactures of lace. Pop. 4600.

Charente (Sharonᵍt), a river, rises in the dep. of Haute-Vienne, and winds 222 miles NW., S., and WNW., mainly through the deps. of Charente and Charente-Inférieure, to the Bay of Biscay, opposite the island of Oléron.

Charente, a French dep. formed chiefly out of the old province of Angoumois. Area, 2285 sq. m. Pop. (1866) 378,218; (1911) 346,424. Generally level, with granite offshoots of the Limousin range in the north, and chalk-hills in the south, it is divided into the five arrondissements of Angoulême, Cognac, Ruffec, Barbezieux, and Confolens. Angoulême is the chief town.

Charente-Inférieure (Sharonᵍt-Anᵍfayree-ehr'), a dep. of France, formed principally from the former provinces of Saintonge, Aunis, and a small portion of Poitou. The Bay of Biscay washes its western boundary. Area, 2625 sq. m. Pop. (1866) 479,529; (1911) 450,871. It is watered on its boundaries by the Sèvre-Niortaise and the Gironde, and in the centre by the navigable Charente. The chief harbours are those of Rochefort and Tonnay-Charente. La Rochelle is the chief town.

Charenton-le-Pont (Sharonᵍtonᵍ'-le-Ponᵍ), a town on the Marne, 4 m. SE. of Paris. Pop. 18,000.

Charjui (Tchar-joo'ee), a Russian town of Central Asia, on the Amu-Daria, where the Transcaspian railway from Merv to Bokhara crosses the river by a great bridge opened in 1888.

Charkov'. See KHARKOV.

Charlbury, an Oxfordshire market-town, 6 miles SE. of Chipping Norton. Pop. 1300.

Charlcote House, Warwickshire, 4½ miles ENE. of Stratford-on-Avon, the seat (1558) of the Lucy family.

Charleroi (Shâhrl-rwah'), a Belgian town on the Sambre, 35 miles S. by E. of Brussels. It has manufactures of hardware, glass, yarn, &c., the huge ironworks of Couillet, and neighbouring collieries, smelting-furnaces, and nail-factories. Six times exchanged between France and Spain, it was assigned to Austria by the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748). Pop. 28,000.

Charleston, a port of entry, capital of a county of its own name, and the largest city of South Carolina, is situated on a tongue of land between the rivers Ashley and Cooper, which unite immediately below the town and form a beautiful and spacious harbour, communicating with the ocean at Sullivan's Island, a popular sea-bathing resort, 7 miles below. It is 118 miles NE. of Savannah, 580 miles SW. of Baltimore, and 540 miles SSW. of Washington. A shifting sandbar extends across the mouth of the harbour, but the new jetties (1878–88) secure a depth of 20 feet of water. The harbour is defended by Castle Pinckney and Fort Sumter, each on an island, the former 2 and the latter 6 miles below the city, and also by Fort Moultrie, on Sullivan's Island. At the entrance of the harbour is a flashing light 125 feet high. Charleston is regularly built, and extends about 3 miles in length and nearly 1½ mile in breadth. It has a copious water-supply from a large artesian well (1970 feet deep). Among the public buildings are the custom-house, city hall, court-house, citadel, academy of music, theatre, orphan asylum, and police barracks. The custom-house is a handsome edifice, built of granite and white marble. At the southern extremity of the city is a small park called the Battery or White Point Garden, with a fine promenade on the sea-wall. The Charleston College (1785; reorganised 1837) has an excellent museum of natural history. Here are also a medical college, the state military academy, &c. Charleston is the seat of an Episcopal and a Roman Catholic bishop. St Michael's Church (Episcopal) is a brick structure, with a steeple 180 feet high, and a chime of bells imported from England in 1764. Charleston is a commercial rather than a manufacturing city, and was formerly the chief cotton port of the United States; but since the civil war it has not developed so rapidly as other ports, and at the close of the 19th century the exports had been declining. They now average from $7,000,000 to about $11,000,000 per annum, the principal items being cotton and phosphates. The other exports are rice, lumber, and naval stores. The imports ($1,500,000 to $2,000,000 yearly) are chiefly salt, iron, ale, brimstone, kainite, and fruits from the West Indies. There is a large wholesale distributing trade in dry-goods, clothing, drugs, &c.; and the city has large machine-shops, cotton-presses, grist-mills, cotton-mills, rice-mills, a bagging-factory, shipyards, a good dry-dock for large ships, and extensive manufactures of phosphate of lime, which abounds in the vicinity. The city was founded in 1680; a few years later a company of French Huguenots settled here. In 1776 Charleston repulsed a British squadron; in 1780 it surrendered to Sir Henry Clinton. On 12th April 1861, the Confederates began the civil war by the bombardment of Fort Sumter, which they took the next day. In 1861 half the city was destroyed by fire, and a considerable part was not rebuilt until after 1865. After a long siege and bombardment, begun in 1863, the place was evacuated by the Confederates, February 17, 1865. On 31st August 1886 a severe earthquake destroyed or seriously injured nearly 7000 buildings. Pop. (1800) 18,711; (1840) 29,261; (1880) 49,984; (1891) 54,955; (1901) 55,807; (1910) 58,833.

Charleston, or KANAWHA, capital of West Virginia, on the Great Kanawha River, at the mouth of the Elk, 369 miles WNW. of Richmond by rail. Large quantities of bituminous coal and salt are procured near by. Charleston was made state-capital in 1885, as it had already been in 1870–75. Pop. 23,000.

Charlestown, a Fife seaport village, on the Firth of Forth, 4 miles SSW. of Dunfermline. Pop., with Limekilns, 1400.

Charlestown, a Mayo village, 10 miles NW. of Ballaghaderreen. Pop. 670.

Charlestown (Massachusetts). See BOSTON and BUNKER HILL.

Charleville, a market-town, 34 miles N. of Cork. Pop. 2000.

Charleville (Shâhrl-veel'), a town in the French dep. of Ardennes, on the Meuse, opposite Mézières. It has manufactures of hardware, leather, and beer. Pop. 20,000.

Charlotte, capital of Mecklenburg county, North Carolina, 265 miles ENE. of Atlanta, has manufactures of carriages, cotton goods, tobacco, &c., and is the seat of a Presbyterian university (1867). Pop. 34,000.

Charlotte Amalie (Amâh'lee-eh), the capital of the West Indian island of St Thomas (q.v.).

Charlottenburg (Sharlot'tenboorg'), a Prussian town on the Spree, 3 miles W. of Berlin, with which it is connected by a road leading through the Thiergarten. It contains a royal palace, founded in 1696 for Sophie Charlotte, the second wife of Frederick I.; in its mausoleum here are the remains of Frederick William III. and the Emperor William I. In the town are a famous technical high-school or university and military school; the manufactures include ironwares, machinery, porcelain, glass, paper, leather, chemicals, and beer. Pop. (1871) 19,518; (1880) 30,483; (1890) 76,859; (1900) 189,290; (1910) 305,978.

Charlottetown, the capital of Prince Edward Island, on the south coast, stands on the Hillsborough estuary, which forms a secure and commodious harbour for the largest vessels. It has two colleges, an iron-foundry, a woollen-factory, and shipbuilding yards. The population is about 11,000.

Charnwood Forest, a bare Leicestershire hill-tract (853 feet), 5 miles SW. of Loughborough.

Charolais (Sharolay'), a district in the French dep. of Saône-et-Loire, noted for its fine cattle.

Charters Towers, a mining township of North-east Queensland, situated on the northern spurs of the Towers Mountain, 820 miles NW. of Brisbane. It dates from the gold discovery here in 1871. It has railway connection with Townsville on the coast. Pop. 17,300.

Chartres (Shâhrtr), capital of the French dep. of Eure-et-Loir, on the double-channelled Eure, 55 miles SW. of Paris. It consists of an upper and lower town, connected by very steep streets; and the highest point is crowned by the glorious cathedral—in Street's opinion, the finest in France. Built chiefly between 1194 and 1260, it has two spires, of which the south-western is 342½ feet high, and the north-western, 371; the latter, built in 1507–14, being, 'on the whole, the most beautiful spire on the Continent.' Other features are the three rose-windows, the splendid portals, and the 13th-century stained glass that fills no fewer than 130 windows. The weekly corn-market is one of the largest in France, and is remarkable as being under a corporation of women. Chartres has manufactures of woollen, hosiery, and leather. Population, about 20,000. The Autricum of the Carnutes (hence the present name), Chartres in 1594 was the scene of the coronation of Henry IV.

Chartreuse, LA GRANDE (Shâhr-trehz'), the original Carthusian monastery, founded by St Bruno in 1084, in the dep. of Isère, 14 miles NNE. of Grenoble, and 4268 feet above sea-level. A huge 17th-century structure, it had become practically a hotel when in 1904 the monks were expelled by the French government.

Châteaubriant (Shâh-tō-bree-on^{g}'), a town in the French dep. of Loire-Inférieure, on the Chère, 40 miles NNE. of Nantes by rail. Pop. 6000.

Châteaudun (Shâh-tō-dun^{g}'), a pretty town in the French dep. of Eure-et-Loir, on the Loir, a tributary of the Loire, 83 miles SW. of Paris. It was almost destroyed by fire in 1723. Dunois is buried in the chapel of the stately castle. Pop. 6000.

Château Gaillard. See ANDELYS.

Château-Gontier (Shâh-tō-Gon^{g}t-yay'), a town in the French dep. of Mayenne, on the Mayenne, 180 miles WSW. of Paris by rail. Pop. 7000.

Château Margaux. See MARGAUX.

Châteauroux (Shâhtōroo'), the capital of the French dep. of Indre, on the left bank of the river Indre, 88 miles S. of Orleans by rail. It has manufactures of woollens, iron, leather, and tobacco. Pop. 21,000.

Château-Thierry (Shâh-tō-Tee-er-ree'), a town in the French dep. of Aisne, 59 miles E. by N. of Paris by rail, with manufactures of mathematical instruments and woollen yarn. Here Napoleon defeated Prussians and Russians in 1814. Pop. 7000.

Chatelineau, a Belgian town in Hainault, on the Sambre, 27 miles E. of Mons, with coal-mines and ironworks. Pop. 13,000.

Châtellerault (Shâh-tel-ro'), a town and river-port in the French dep. of Vienne, on the river Vienne, 40 miles S. of Tours by rail. It is a smoky, dingy place, one of the chief seats of the cutlery manufacture in France, and since 1820 has had a government small-arms factory. The title of Duke of Châtellerault was conferred by Henri II. in 1548 on James Hamilton, Earl of Arran and Regent of Scotland. The population is about 15,000.

Chatham (Chat'tam; Ceteham, 'village of cottages'), a municipal and parl. borough, river-port, and naval arsenal of Kent, on the right bank of the Medway, at the upper part of its estuary, 30 miles ESE. of London. It forms almost one continuous town with Rochester (q.v.) on the west, but itself has few objects of interest. It owes its importance to its naval and military establishments situated at Brompton, a suburb on high ground overlooking the Medway. It is the headquarters of the Royal Marines. The Chatham fortified lines are the frequent scenes of field-operations, sham fights, and reviews. The dockyard, founded by Elizabeth before the threatened invasion of the Spanish Armada, was in 1662 removed to its present site. In 1667 the Dutch, under De Ruyter, sailed up the Medway, and, in spite of the fire from the castle, destroyed much shipping and stores. In a military point of view, the lines of detached forts connected with Chatham constitute a fortification of great strength; and the whole is regarded as a flank defence for London. In or near Chatham are Fort Pitt, a military hospital and strong fort; Melville Hospital, for marines and sailors; barracks for infantry, marines, artillery, and engineers; a park of artillery; &c. Chatham is one of the principal royal shipbuilding establishments in the kingdom. The dockyard is nearly two miles in length; and the whole is traversed in every direction by tramways for locomotives. Three great wet-docks, with a water area of 67 acres, on reclaimed marsh land were completed in 1883 after the labour of 17 years, and at a total cost of about £3,000,000. In the navy estimates provision is made for about 5000 artisans and labourers. There are statues of Lieutenant Waghorn, a native of Chatham, and the pioneer of the 'overland route' to India, and of General Gordon (1890); but Chatham's most cherished memories are of Charles Dickens. Pop. (1851) 28,424; (1871) 45,792; (1911) 92,686; of these 42,250 were in the municipal borough, which was constituted in 1891. The parliamentary borough returns one member.

Chatham, (1) a town of Ontario, on the Thames, 67 miles SW. of London by rail, with mills and foundries, soap and candle works. Pop. 11,000.—(2) A port of entry in the north of New Brunswick, on the Miramichi, 6 miles NE. of Newcastle, with a good harbour, shipyards, foundries, a Catholic cathedral, and a college. Pop. 5000.

Chatham Islands, a small group in the Pacific, lying 360 miles E. of New Zealand, to which they politically belong. There are three islands—of which the largest, Chatham Island, is 38 miles long—and some rocky islets. Total area, 375 sq. m.; pop. 260, of whom about half are Maoris, with a few Morioris or aborigines. The Chatham Islands were discovered in 1791 by Lieutenant Broughton, of the brig Chatham. A large brackish lake occupies the interior of Chatham Island, which is of volcanic origin and hilly. Stock-rearing and seal-fishing are the chief industries, the islanders having over 60,000 sheep and 400 to 700 cattle, with which they supply passing vessels. The Morioris numbered 1200 in 1831, when 800 Maoris were landed from New Zealand, by whom the former were reduced to 90 in nine years' time.

Châtillon (Shâh-tee-yon^g'), a town in the French dep. of Côte d'Or, on the Seine, 49 miles NNW. of Dijon. A congress of allied sovereigns was held here in 1814. Pop. 4000.

Chat Moss, a bog in Lancashire, the largest in England, 7 miles W. of Manchester, and 10 sq. m. in extent. In 1793–1800 it was the scene of the first great and successful efforts for the reclaiming of bogs, and in 1829 George Stephenson here achieved a great engineering triumph in the construction of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway, constructing the portion of the line through Chat Moss at a smaller expense than any other part of the railway.

Chatsworth, Derbyshire, 25 miles N. by W. of Derby, is the magnificent seat of the Duke of Devonshire, a Palladian pile (1687–1820), with splendid art-collections and grounds.

Chattahoo'chee, a headstream of the Appalachicola (q.v.).

Chattanooga, capital of Hamilton county, Tennessee, a shipping centre on the Tennessee River, 151 miles SE. of Nashville, with good railway connections. It has cotton and other factories, ironworks, tanneries, and sawmills. Pop. 44,600.

Chatteris, a Cambridgeshire market-town, 8 miles S. of March. Pop. 5300.

Chaudes-Aigues (Shoad-zayg'), a town in the dep. of Cantal, 90 miles S. of Clermont, with four mineral springs (135° to 177° F.). They are good for various diseases, rapidly discharge the grease from sheep's wool, and in winter are impounded for heating the houses of the town. Pop. 1000.

Chaudfontaine (Shoad-fon^g-tayn'), a Belgian village in the valley of the Vesdre, 5 m. SSE. of Liège by rail, with mineral springs (92° F.). Pop. 2000.

Chaudière (Sho-dee-ehr'), a river and lake of Canada. The river joins the St Lawrence from the south 7 miles above Quebec, and 2½ miles from its mouth, forms the celebrated falls of Chaudière. The lake—merely one of the many expansions of the Ottawa—has on its right the city of that name, the capital of the Dominion.

Chaumont (Sho-mon^g), a town in the French dep. of Haute-Marne, 1023 feet above sea-level between the rivers Marne and Suize, 140 miles SE. of Paris. There are manufactures of gloves, cutlery, &c. Pop. 12,000.

Chauny (Sho-nee'), a town in the French dep. of Aisne, 77 miles NNE. of Paris. Pop. 10,000.

Chautauqua (ch as sh), a celebrated summer-resort on Chautauqua Lake, in a county of the same name near the south-west extremity of the state of New York, is famous as the seat of the 'Chautauqua Assembly,' founded in 1874 by John H. Vincent, D.D., and Lewis Miller, to provide systematic instruction for Sunday-school teachers, together with popular lecture courses in literature, science, and art. Lake Chautauqua is a beautiful sheet of water 20 miles long, with an average breadth of 2 miles, lying 700 feet above Lake Erie, from which it is distant 10 miles. The Assembly Grounds, on the northern shore of the lake, comprise about 165 acres, containing over 500 attractive summer cottages, a museum of archæology, an amphitheatre seating over 5000, &c. Large numbers of students and visitors congregate here in the summer season.

Chaux de Fonds (Sho-d'Fon^{g}d'), a Swiss town, 18 miles by rail NW. of Neuchâtel, in a bleak valley 3254 feet above the sea. It has for two centuries been a chief seat of the watch manufacture. Pop. 38,000.

Cheadle, (1) a market-town in the moorland district of Staffordshire, 14 miles NNE. of Stafford. Lying in a pleasant vale, engirt by wooded hills, it has a Roman Catholic Church, erected in 1846 from designs by Pugin, at a cost of £60,000. Pop. of parish, 5800.—(2) Cheadle and Gatley, a Cheshire urban district, near the Mersey, 2¼ miles WSW. of Stockport, and included partly in that county borough. Pop. 10,000.

Chedabucto Bay, an indentation into Nova Scotia, at the entrance of the Gut of Canso, which separates Cape Breton from Nova Scotia.

Cheddar, a Somerset village, on the south side of the Mendip Hills, 21½ miles SSW. of Bristol by rail. It lies at the entrance of a deep rocky gorge, nearly 1 mile long, whose stupendous limestone cliffs contain caverns—one 300 feet long—filled with fantastic stalactites and stalagmites. The famous Cheddar cheese originated here. Pop. of parish, 2000.

Chedu'ba (or Man-aung), a wooded island of Arakan, in the Bay of Bengal. Area, 240 sq. m.; pop. 30,000.

Cheesewring, a curious natural pillar, 32 feet high, in Cornwall, 5 miles N. of Liskeard.

Che-foo, a treaty port on the north side of the peninsula of Shan-tung, at the entrance to the Gulf of Pechili, in which it is the only port that remains open throughout the winter. The foreign quarter, with about 420 Europeans and Americans, is in some sense a colony of Shanghai; the Chinese town (spelt also Cheefoo, Chi-fu, and Tschifu) has about 33,000 inhabitants. There is a large import and export trade.

Che-keang, an eastern and maritime province of China. Capital, Hang-chow.

Cheliabinsk (Tchel-ya-binsk'), a town in the Russian government of Orenburg, 365 miles NE. of Orenburg, which has rapidly grown in importance as the meeting-point of several great railways—one of them the Trans-Siberian railway. Pop. 26,000.

Chelmer, an Essex tributary of the Blackwater at Maldon, 29 miles long.

Chelmsford, the county town of Essex, at the confluence of the Chelmer and the Cann, 29 miles NE. of London. It has a corn exchange (1857), a shire hall (1792), a grammar-school (1551), and a parish church, which, all but the tower and spire, was rebuilt between 1803 and 1878. There is a considerable trade in agricultural produce. Chelmsford was incorporated in 1888. The bishopric was erected in 1913. Pop. 18,000.

Chelsea, a suburb of London, on the north bank of the Thames, here crossed by bridges to Battersea (q.v.). In the sixteenth century the village of Chelsea was the residence of Sir Thomas More, Queen Catharine Parr, the Princess Elizabeth, and Anne of Cleves. Afterwards Walpole, Swift, Steele, and Sir Hans Sloane, and, in later years, Leigh Hunt, Carlyle, Rossetti, and George Eliot lived here. Ranelagh (1742–1803) here was much resorted to, and afterwards Cremorne (closed 1877). Besides Chelsea Hospital (1692) for old and disabled soldiers, there are a Royal Military Asylum for soldiers' children, large barracks for the Foot Guards, a botanic garden, water-works (1722) to supply London, a river-pier, and an embankment (1873) extending to Battersea Bridge on the west. The famous porcelain works were established about 1745. The borough has returned a member to parliament since 1885, and (since 1899) is one of the London metropolitan boroughs. Pop. 66,400. See the official History of Chelsea Hospital (1872), works by Martin (1888), Beaver (1893), and Godfrey (1913).

Chelsea, Massachusetts, a north-east suburb of Boston, separated therefrom by the Mystic River estuary. Pop. 32,000.

Cheltenham, a fashionable watering-place of Gloucestershire, on the Chelt, a little affluent of the Severn, 44 miles NNE. of Bristol, 47 SSW. of Birmingham, and 121 WNW. of London (by road only 95). It lies in a picturesque and fertile valley, on the east and south-east half encircled by the Coteswolds. A saline spring was discovered here in 1716, and from a mere village the place gradually increased till 1788, when the benefit derived by George III. from its waters suddenly made it a resort of fashion. The four spas—Royal Old Well, Montpellier, Pittville, and Cambray—are all saline but the last, which is chalybeate; they are deemed efficacious for liver complaints and dyspepsia. With its squares, crescents, and terraces, its gardens and promenades, its clubs and pump-rooms, its August 'cricket week,' its healthy climate, the cheapness of living, and the happy absence of manufactures, the town offers many attractions both to visitors and residents, the former largely fox-hunters in winter, the latter retired Anglo-Indians. It is, besides, a great educational centre, the seat of the Proprietary College, for 700 boys, founded in 1840, and occupying a splendid Tudor pile of 1843; a grammar-school (1586; reconstituted 1883); a large ladies' college (1854); a Church of England training college for schoolmasters (1847); and private schools beyond number. Noticeable buildings are the 14th-century parish church; the Roman Catholic Church (1857), with a spire 205 feet high; the Corn Exchange (1863); and the handsome Free Library. Cheltenham has memories of Handel, Lord Tennyson, Frederick Robertson, Sydney Dobell, and Dean Close, under whom (1824–56) it became a stronghold of Evangelicalism. It was incorporated as a municipal borough in 1876, and has returned one member to parliament since 1832, the parliamentary boundary having been extended in 1885. Pop. (1804) 3076; (1841) 31,411; (1911) 53,066, of whom 48,944 were within the municipal boundary.

Chelyuskin, Cape (Tchel-yoos'kin; also called North-east Cape, and Cape Severo), the most northerly point of Asia, on a peninsula of the same name, which forms the western arm of the eastern half of the Taimyr peninsula. It is named after a Russian officer who here succumbed to the fatigues of the journey (1742); it was first revisited by Nordenskjöld in 1878. He found it a low promontory, divided into two parts by a small bay; the lat. of the western is 77° 36′ 37″ N.

Chemnitz (Kem'neetz), a Saxon town at the base of the Erzgebirge and the confluence of the Chemnitz with three other streams, 51 miles SSE. of Leipzig by rail, and 43 WSW. of Dresden. It is the 'Saxon Manchester,' its industry consisting in the manufacture of cottons, woollens, silks, calico, cheap hosiery, machinery, and mixed fabrics of wool, cotton, and jute. Pop. (1801) 10,835; (1861) 45,532; (1910) 287,807.

Chemulpo, a town on the west coast of Corea, 25 miles by road WSW. of the capital, Seoul. It is one of the three treaty ports opened in 1883 to foreign commerce, the volume of which has since steadily advanced. Pop. 20,000, of whom 11,000 are Japanese.

Chenab', one of the five rivers of the Punjab, rises in the Kashmir range of the Himalayas and enters British territory in Sialkot district. It unites with the Jhelum at Timmu, afterwards receives the Ravi, and, as the Trimab, joins the Sutlej, 50 miles above Mithankot. Its length is 755 miles.

Cheneys, the former seat of the Russells, in Bucks, 4 miles E. by N. of Amersham. The church is their burial-place.

Chengalpat. See CHINGALPAT.

Chepping Wycombe. See WYCOMBE.

Chepstow, a river-port of Monmouthshire, on the right bank of the Wye, 2½ miles from its influx to the Severn estuary, and 17 ENE. of Newport. It lies between bold cliffs, on a slope rising from the river, in the midst of exquisite scenery. Its noble ruined castle stood two sieges during the Great Rebellion, and has been held successively by Fitz-Osbornes, Clares, Bigods, Herberts, and Somersets. The railway crosses the Wye by Brunel's tubular suspension bridge (1852), 600 feet long, and 50 above high-water. Here occurs the highest tide in the British Islands—the greatest recorded difference between low and high water being 53 feet. Pop. 3000. See Marsh's Annals of Chepstow Castle (1883).

Cher (Sher), a river flowing 200 miles northward and north-westward to the Loire below Tours. It is navigable from Vierzon.—CHER, to which the river gives its name, is the central dep. of France. The surface consists of plain and well-wooded hills (1600 feet). Area, 2770 sq. m.; pop. (1872) 335,392; (1911) 337,810. Bourges is the chief town.

Cherasco (Kayras'ko), a town of north Italy, 37 miles SSE. of Turin by rail. Pop. 5000.

Cherbourg (Sher-boorg'), a French port and arsenal in the dep. of Manche, at the head of a deep bay on the N. extremity of the peninsula of Cotentin, 70 miles S. of the Isle of Wight, and 230 WNW. of Paris. Begun by Vauban in 1687, the harbour-works and fortifications were pushed on by the great Napoleon, and were supposed to have been completed in 1858 by Napoleon III. at a total outlay of 200 million francs; but less than thirty years after, the French government resolved to spend 49 millions more on the construction of fresh works between 1883 and 1894. The stupendous digue or breakwater (1853) is almost 2½ miles long, encloses a space of nearly 2000 acres, and is connected with the strongest fortifications. The commercial harbour of Cherbourg consists of an outer harbour, 786 feet in length by 654 feet wide, and of an inner basin, 1338 feet long by 416 feet wide. The great inner naval floating-harbour was inaugurated by the Emperor Napoleon in 1858, in presence of Queen Victoria. Entirely cut out of the solid rock, it is 20 acres in area, and is surrounded by building-slips and capacious graving docks. The town itself is insignificant, the streets being narrow and dirty. There are some manufactures of hosiery, chemicals, lace, and leather, sugar and salt refineries, sawing and flour mills; but the industrial energies of the great bulk of the population are absorbed in the arsenal and dockyards. Cherbourg is a very ancient place; originally Cæsaris Burgum, in the 11th century it was known under the name of Carusbur. In 1758 it was taken by the English, who destroyed the naval and military works, and levied a contribution on the town. Pop. (1872) 34,785; (1911) 43,731, not including the suburbs of Tourlaville, Octeville, and Equeurdreville.

Cherhill, Wiltshire, 3 miles E. of Calne, with a 'white horse' (1780) in the turf, 129 feet long.

Cheribon, a seaport of Java, on the north coast, 125 miles ESE. of Batavia. Pop. 26,000.

Cherkask. See TCHERKASK.

Chernigov. See TCHERNIGOFF.

Cherso, an Austrian island of Illyria, in the Gulf of Quarnero, 13 miles SSW. of Fiume. Area, 127 sq. m.; pop. 10,000. Cherso (pop. 5000), on the west side, has a spacious harbour.

Cherson. See KHERSON.

Chertsey, a town in Surrey, near the right bank of the Thames, here crossed by a seven-arch bridge (1785), 21 miles WSW. of London. It arose in a monastery founded in 666, and re-founded in 964 by Edgar for Benedictine monks. Charles James Fox lived on St Anne's Hill, an abrupt elevation a mile distant; and the poet Cowley spent his last two years in a house that is marked with an inscription. The population is about 14,000.

Cherwell, a stream, 30 miles long, rising in Northamptonshire, and falling into the Isis or Thames near Oxford (q.v.).

Chesapeake Bay, in Maryland and Virginia, and dividing the former state into two parts, is the largest inlet on the Atlantic coast of the United States, being 200 miles long, and from 4 to 40 broad. Its entrance, 12 miles wide, has on the north Cape Charles, and on the south Cape Henry, both promontories being in Virginia. The bay receives the Susquehanna, Potomac, Rappahannock, York, and James rivers.

Chesham, an urban district of Buckinghamshire, 28 miles NW. of London. It manufactures cricket bats, racquets, wooden spades, hoops, &c. Pop. 8000.

Cheshire, a maritime county in the west of England, on the Welsh border, bounded N. by the river Mersey, separating it from Lancashire, and partly also by the Irish Sea. Its greatest length from north to south is 48 miles; greatest breadth, 32; and area, 1102 sq. m., of which 76 per cent. is under cultivation. The coast-line is confined to the hammer-headed peninsula called Wirral, about 8 miles broad, between the estuaries of the Mersey and Dee. The surface forms an extensive nearly level plain between the Derbyshire and Welsh mountains, well wooded, and studded with small lakes or meres. This plain, comprising four-fifths of the surface, is crossed, near the middle, by a tract of high ground running south-west from a promontory overlooking the Mersey, near the mouth of the Weaver, to Beeston Castle rock, 366 feet high. In the east are large tracts of peat, and much of the county is wet and rushy. Coal-measures appear on the Flintshire border, and also on the borders of Staffordshire and Derbyshire. The Dee skirts the county on the west for 55 miles, the Mersey on the north for 40, and the Weaver, rising in the east part, runs 40 miles west-north-west to the Mersey. In addition to its river navigation, the county has an almost unrivalled system of canals, and contains the greater part of the Manchester Ship Canal. The chief mineral products are rock-salt and coal. The rock-salt, discovered in 1670, and mined by gunpowder, is found near the Weaver and its branches, especially near Northwich (q.v.), and at Middlewich, Winsford, and Sandbach. Much salt is also made from brine-springs 20 to 40 yards deep. About 90,000 cows are kept, capable of producing 15,000 tons of cheese. In the cattle-plague of 1865–66 upwards of 70,000 cattle perished, 36,000 of these being slaughtered as a preventive measure. Pop. (1801) 194,305; (1841) 395,660; (1911) 954,919. There are extensive manufactures in the principal towns, especially Birkenhead, Congleton, Chester (the county town), Crewe, Hyde, Macclesfield, Stalybridge, and Stockport. The county is formed into eight parliamentary divisions, each returning one member, and includes the parliamentary boroughs of Birkenhead and Chester, with portions of the boroughs of Ashton-under-Lyne, Stalybridge, Stockport, and Warrington. It contains 503 civil parishes, and is mostly in the diocese of Chester. Cheshire has some Roman roads, tumuli, barrows, remains of religious houses, and many old castles and halls. William the Conqueror erected Cheshire into a county palatine, with an independent council and eight barons. Henry VIII. subordinated it to the English crown; but Cheshire did not send representatives to the English parliament till 1549. See Ormerod's History of Cheshire (3 vols. 1819; new ed. 1875), and Earwaker's East Cheshire (1877).

Ches'hunt, an urban district of Hertfordshire, 14 miles N. of London. It is famous for its rose-gardens, and its college, founded in 1768 for 'the Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion' at Trevecca, Wales, removed hither in 1792, and in 1905 transferred to Cambridge. Pop. 13,000.

Chesil Bank or Beach, a bank of gravel and shingle extending 16 miles from Bridport to Portland. It varies in height from 20 to 43 feet, and in width from 170 to 200 yards. For some part of its course it hugs the shore, but the Fleet comes between it and the land for nearly 10 miles from Abbotsbury (q.v.). Towards its west end the bank is composed of sand, grit, and fine gravel, but the materials get gradually larger and larger as it is followed eastward.

Chester, an ancient episcopal city, municipal, parliamentary, and county borough, and river-port, the capital of Cheshire, on the right bank of the Dee, 22 miles from the mouth of its estuary, 16 miles SE. of Liverpool, and 179 miles NNW. of London. One of the most picturesque towns in England, it stands on a rocky sandstone height, and is still surrounded by the entire circuit of its ancient walls, nearly 2 miles round, 7 or 8 feet thick, and forming a promenade with parapets. The castle, with the exception of 'Cæsar's Tower,' has been removed, its site being occupied by barracks and county buildings. The Dee is crossed by two bridges, the old picturesque bridge of seven arches, and the new or Grosvenor Bridge (1832), with a noble single arch of stone 200 feet in length. The two main streets cross each other at right angles, and were cut out of the rock by the Romans 4 to 10 feet below the level of the houses. These streets exhibit the curious arrangement called the 'rows:' the front parts of their second stories, as far back as 16 feet, form a continuous paved promenade or covered gallery, open in front, where there are pillars and steps up from the street below, with private houses above, inferior shops and warehouses below, and the chief shops of the town within. There are a considerable number of the picturesque old timber houses of the 16th century, and many of the more modern buildings are in the same style. The Cathedral is an irregular massive structure of crumbling sandstone, 375 by 200 feet, with a massive tower of 127 feet. Formerly the church of the rich abbey of St Werburgh, it became in 1541 a cathedral church. It is of various dates from Norman to Late Perpendicular, its most striking feature being the fine Perpendicular window of the west front. Chester has manufactures of lead, oil, and chemicals, iron-foundries, and an iron-shipbuilding yard. The making of boots and shoes is an important industry. Since 1885 Chester returns only one member. Pop. (1851) 27,756; (1911) 39,028.

Chester was the Deva or Devana Castra of the Romans, and the British Caerleon: Chester representing the Anglo-Saxon Ceaster, from the Roman Castra. In 605 it was laid utterly waste by Ethelfrith of Northumbria; and rebuilt in 908, it was the last place in England that held out against William the Conqueror. Llewelyn ravaged it in 1255; and after a long and memorable siege (1643–46), the royalist inhabitants were starved into surrender. A projected Fenian attack on the castle in 1867 proved abortive.

Chester, a city of Pennsylvania, on the Delaware, 15 miles SW. of Philadelphia, with a military academy, large shipbuilding yards, and manufactures of cotton and woollen goods, engines, &c. Swedes founded it as Upland in 1643—the oldest town in the state. Pop. (1860) 4631; (1910) 38,500. There is a Historical Sketch of the city by Ashmead (1883).

Chesterfield, a municipal borough in Derbyshire, on the Rother rivulet, 12¼ miles SSE. of Sheffield by rail. All-Saints' Church (c. 1350) has a curious crooked spire, 228 feet high, and 6 feet off the perpendicular; in Trinity Church (1838) is buried George Stephenson. Other buildings are the townhall (1857), the Stephenson memorial hall, and the grammar-school (1574; rebuilt 1846). There are manufactures of silk, lace, earthenware, and machinery; and the neighbourhood is rich in coal, iron, and other minerals. Brindley's Chesterfield Canal (1776) extends 46 miles to the Trent. Pop. (1851) 7101; (1911) 37,429, within the borough as extended in 1892. See Yeatman's Records of Chesterfield (1885).

Chesterfield Inlet, a narrow gulf penetrating 250 miles west from the NW. of Hudson Bay.

Chester-le-Street, a Durham market-town near the left bank of the Wear, 6 miles N. of Durham city. The seat of the Bishop of Bernicia from 883 to 995, it has an old collegiate church; whilst in the neighbourhood are Lambton, Lumley, and Ravensworth Castles, the seats of the Earls of Durham, Scarborough, and Ravensworth. Coal-mines and ironworks are numerous. Pop. of urban district, 14,700.

Chesterton, a NE. suburb of Cambridge.

Cheviot Hills, a mountain-range of Northumberland and Roxburghshire, on the English and Scotch border, running 35 miles south-westward, from near the junction of the Till and Tweed, to the sources of the Liddel. The principal points are Cheviot Hill (2676 feet) and Peel Fell (1964).

Cheyenne, the capital of Wyoming state, U.S., situated on the eastern slope of the Laramie Mountains, 6000 feet above sea-level, and 106 miles by rail N. of Denver. Coal and iron are found in its neighbourhood. Pop. (1870) 1450; (1880) 3456; (1900) 14,087; (1910) 11,320.

Chhatisgarh is the south-east division of the Central Provinces of India; area, 20,000 sq. m.; pop. 3,000,000.

Chiana (Kee-âh'na; anc. Clanis), a river of Italy, originally a tributary of the Tiber, watering the perfectly level Val di Chiana, which its overflow rendered once the most pestilential district of Italy. The bed was deepened in 1789–1816, and in 1823 a northern branch was led through canals to the Arno, a few miles below Arezzo.

Chianti (Kee-âhn'tee), an Italian mountain-range, in the province of Siena; it gives name to an excellent red wine.

Chiapas, Las (Tchee-âh'pas), a Pacific state of Mexico, adjoining Guatemala. Area, 27,222 sq. m.; pop. 440,000. Capital, Tuxtla-Gutiérrez.

Chiaramonte (Kee-âh-ra-mon'teh), a town of Sicily, 30 miles W. of Syracuse; pop. 10,000.

Chia'ri (Kee-âh'ree), a town of Lombardy, 13 miles W. of Brescia by rail. Here the Austrians, under Prince Eugene, defeated the French and Spaniards, under Villeroi, 2d September 1701. Pop. 4000.

Chiavari (Kee-ah'va-ree), a port of Italy, 24 miles ESE. of Genoa by rail; pop. 13,000.

Chiavenna (Kee-a-ven'na), a town of Lombardy, to the north of Lake Como; pop. 4500.

Chicacole, a town on the Languliya River, 567 miles NE. of Madras; pop. 20,000.

Chicago (pron. Shekahgo) is situated in the north-east corner of the state of Illinois, about the fork and mouth of the Chicago River, on the west shore and near the head of Lake Michigan. It is 850 miles from Baltimore, and 2415 from San Francisco. The city is divided by the river and its branches into north, south, and west 'sides,' which are connected with each other by upwards of thirty bridges and two tunnels. The river frontage, counting both sides, extends 41 miles. From a small trading village Chicago has expanded into a great metropolis, ranking, in the United States, second only to New York. The area, in 1887 only 36·7 sq. m., had in 1904 increased to 190; while the city extended lengthwise for 21½ miles, and from east to west 10½ miles. It is the largest grain market in the world; and more hogs are killed, and more pork, bacon, and lard shipped, than in and from any other two cities on the continent. The site was at first barely on a level with the lake; but thoroughfares were gradually raised from 8 to 12 feet, and the surrounding lots progressively filled in. Now Chicago has some of the finest streets (laid out with mathematical regularity) in all America, notably Michigan Avenue and Drexel Boulevard. Among the public buildings of Chicago are the Board of Trade building, of granite; the county court-house and city-hall, erected at a cost of nearly $6,000,000; the criminal court and county jail; the United States custom-house and post-office; the Art Institute building; the Dearborn Observatory; the Auditorium, with a seating capacity of 7500; besides some 300 churches, public schools, numerous hospitals, theatres, music-halls, and many palatial hotels. The Chicago University, opened in 1892, has 6000 students, and assets valued at $25,500,000, of which $9,000,000 were given by Mr Rockefeller. There are also medical and commercial colleges, a university at Evanston, 12 miles to the north, and several theological seminaries in the city and its suburbs. The public library, with 400,000 volumes, is one of the largest in the United States; and the Newberry Library, founded in 1888 as a reference library by a legacy of $3,000,000, has over 250,000 volumes. Many of the office buildings are enormously tall, accessible in the upper stories by rapid elevators; these 'sky-scrapers' are built on the steel-frame system, the brick walls not actually serving as a support.

The park system is without a parallel in America; it embraces Lincoln Park, on the lake shore to the north, and five others, all connected or nearly so by magnificent boulevards, the system measuring some 35 miles. Among other open spaces are 20 large cemeteries, besides numerous smaller parks and squares, and several driving parks. The water-supply system has 640 miles of pipe; water is pumped through tunnels, capable of furnishing over 1,000,000,000 gallons a day, and running out into Lake Michigan. The sewerage of the city is emptied, by a canal connecting the Chicago and Illinois rivers, into the Mississippi, and thence to the Gulf of Mexico; this scheme, adopted in 1892 (opened in 1900), included an open canal combining a sewage system with a system of navigation between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi, practically between the North Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico. The city garbage is disposed of by fire in destructors. The great secret of Chicago's phenomenal growth is its transportation facilities by rail and water. Fully one-third of the railroad system of the United States centres there. But the great waterway by Lake Michigan and its connections is unquestionably of most importance for the prosperity of the city. In 1888 for the first time a steamer from London direct landed her cargo at this city. The manufactures of the city include nearly every variety of production, from a child's toy to the largest steam-engine.

Joliet and Marquette visited the place in 1673, and ere long the French built a fort here. 'Fort Dearborn' was built in 1804. The history of Chicago as a city dates from 1837, when its population was 4170; in 1845 it was 12,088. Since that time the city has made prodigious strides in extent and in the acquisition of wealth. Pop. (1860) 109,206; (1880) 503,185; (1910) 2,185,283. In 1900 the number of native-born was 1,111,460 (59 per cent. of foreign parentage), and 587,115 were foreign-born, largely Germans, next Irish, Bohemians, Poles, Swedes, Norwegians, English and Scotch, French, Canadians—besides 30,150 negroes. The manufactures of the city are very various. Over 500,000,000 bushels of grain are dealt with annually in the Chicago elevators. Over 7,000,000 hogs, 2,000,000 cattle and as many sheep are slaughtered annually. The city income is about $35,000,000 yearly.

The great fire, which broke out on Sunday, October 7, 1871, devastated a total area of nearly 3¼ sq. m.; about 17,450 buildings were burned, 98,500 persons rendered homeless, and some 200 lives sacrificed, the total money loss being estimated at $190,000,000. As a result of this disaster, when this central portion was rebuilt, brick, iron, and stone structures were erected, and stone pavements also were substituted for wood. Another conflagration, on July 14, 1874, destroyed about $4,000,000 worth of property. In 1886 occurred the 'Haymarket Massacre,' in which eight policemen were killed and sixty maimed by a dynamite bomb thrown by an anarchist from among a crowd of labour agitators. Another anarchist plot was detected in July 1888. In Jackson Park, to the south-east of the city, was the site chosen for the great World's Columbian Exposition or World's Fair, held 1st May to 30th October 1893, in celebration of the fourth centenary of the discovery of America by Columbus. The buildings were dedicated with elaborate ceremonies on 21st October 1892. The area occupied for the purpose, 633 acres, had a frontage of a mile and a half on Lake Michigan; the enormous building for manufactures itself covering 30½ acres of ground, and having 13½ acres of gallery space. The number of visitors was, from first to last, 23,529,400. See histories by Andreas (1884) and Moses and Kirkland (1895).

Chichen', one of over fifty ruined Indian towns in the Mexican province of Yucatan, a few miles WSW. of Valladolid.

Chichester, a municipal borough and episcopal city in Sussex, 17 miles ENE. of Portsmouth, and 28 W. of Brighton. It stands on a plain between an arm of the sea and the South Downs, which rise gently on the north. The two main streets cross at right angles, and meet in an elaborate eight-sided market-cross (c. 1500). Within the suburbs the city is surrounded by an ancient wall, 1½ mile in circuit, now a promenade under the shade of elms. The cathedral, erected in the 12th and 13th centuries, on the site of a wooden one founded 1108, and burned 1114, measures 410 by 131 feet, with a spire 277 feet high (rebuilt 1865–66, after its fall in 1861), and a detached bell-tower or campanile, 120 feet, the only structure of the kind retained by an English cathedral. The bishop's palace is supposed to have been erected on the site of a Roman villa. Chichester has a market-house, guildhall (formed out of the chapel of the Franciscan monastery), a theological college (1872), &c. The chief trade is in agricultural produce and live-stock. Wool-stapling, malting, brewing, and tanning are also carried on. From the time of Edward I. till 1867 Chichester returned two members, and till 1885 one. The port of Chichester, 2 miles to the south-west of the city, is situated on a deep inlet of the English Channel, of about 8 sq. m., and is connected with Chichester by a canal. Probably the Roman Regnum, Chichester was partly destroyed c. 491 by the South Saxons, but soon rebuilt by Cissa, their king, and called Cissanceaster, or Cissa's Camp. It suffered much during the Great Rebellion, when among royalist prisoners of war was the famous Chillingworth, who died here, and lies buried in the cathedral. Pop. 12,600. See works by Willis (1861), Stephens (1876), Swainson (1880), and Corlette (1902).

Chickahom'iny, a river of Virginia, flowing 90 miles south-eastward, within 5 miles of Richmond, to the James. Four battles were fought near it in June 1862.

Chickamauga, a tributary of the Tennessee River, rising in Georgia, and flowing NW. into Tennessee, where, on its banks, the Confederates won a victory, September 19–20, 1863.

Chicken Rock, 2 miles S. of the Calf of Man, with a lighthouse.

Chiclana (Chee-klah'na), a town of Spain, 12 m. SE. of Cadiz, with mineral baths. Pop. 11,000.

Chiclayo (Chee-klī'o), a town of Peru, 12 miles SE. of Lambayeque. Pop. 13,000.

Chic'opee, a town of Hampden county, Massachusetts, on the east bank of the Connecticut River, 4 miles N. of Springfield, with manufactures of cottons, firearms, swords, tools, bicycles, and bronzes. Pop. 25,400.

Chiem-See (Keem-Zay), a lake of Upper Bavaria, 40 miles SE. of Munich, and 1650 feet above sea-level, is 12 miles long, 7 broad, and 512 feet deep. It has three islands; its surplus water is discharged by the Alz into the Inn.

Chiëri (Ke-eh'ree), a town of Italy, 12 miles SE. of Turin by rail. Pop. 15,000.

Chiëti (Ke-ay'tee; anc. Teate), an archiepiscopal city of Italy, on a hill near the Pescara, 69 miles E. of Aquila by rail, and only 8 from the Adriatic. It has a fine Gothic cathedral. Pop. 25,600.

Chignecto Bay, an inlet at the head of the Bay of Fundy, in British North America. It separates Nova Scotia from New Brunswick, is 30 miles long and 8 broad, and has an isthmus of only 14 miles wide, with an unfinished and abandoned ship-railway (undertaken in 1889) between it and the Gulf of St Lawrence.

Chigwell, an Essex village on the border of Hainault Forest, 13 miles NE. of London. Its 'Maypole Inn' figures in Barnaby Rudge; and its grammar-school, founded by Archbishop Harsnet of York in 1629, has been enlarged since 1871 at a cost of £10,000. Penn was a pupil. Pop. of parish, 2800.

Chihuáhua, the largest state of Mexico, bounded N. and NE. by New Mexico and Texas, has an area of 87,802 sq. m., and a pop. of 405,000.—Chihuáhua, the decayed capital, is 225 miles S. of El Paso by rail. It has an imposing cathedral (1717–89). Pop. 39,000.

Chikislar, a small port in Russian Turkestan, on the east shore of the Caspian, north of the Atrek's mouth.

Chili (Tchee'lee; Span. Chile, pron. Tchee'lay), one of the republics of South America, on the west coast and bordering on Peru, Bolivia, and Argentina. It may be described as a long strip of territory lying between the summit of the Andes and the Pacific Ocean, extending from about the 18th parallel of south latitude to the southern extremity of Tierra del Fuego. After the war with Bolivia and Peru (1879–81), Chili acquired the coast between 23° and 25° S. claimed by Bolivia, and annexed the Peruvian province of Tarapacá. Chili occupies the Peruvian province of Tacna (with Arica), subject to the payment of a war indemnity by Peru. In the south the disputed claims of Chili and Argentina to Patagonia have been settled by Chili taking all territory and islands south of the 52d parallel and west of 68° 30′ W. This includes the larger portion of Tierra del Fuego. The Strait of Magellan is by treaty considered neutral. The length of Chili is about 2500 English miles. Its breadth varies from 40 to 200 miles. The Andes extend in two parallel lines throughout nearly the entire length of the country; between these two ranges of the 'Cordilleras' there is a central valley or tableland. The streams in the north are mostly shallow brooks; in the south they are larger and more numerous, although most are navigable for only a few miles. The Biobio (q.v.) is the largest; the Callecalle, or Rio de Valdivia (100 miles), is the most important, because of the sheltered harbour at its mouth. In the south are also many deep lakes. Mineral waters, chiefly saline and sulphureous, are abundant. The most important islands are those constituting the southern province of Chiloé; Juan Fernandez also belongs to Chili. Owing to its great extension from north to south, Chili comprises regions of very different nature and climate. The north provinces, Tarapacá, Atacama, and part of Coquimbo, are arid, rainless districts, where the principal industry is mining and extraction of saltpetre. The middle and southern provinces — Aconcagua, Valparaiso, Santiago, O'Higgins, Colchagua, Curicó, Talca, Linares, Máule, Nuble, Concepcion, Arauco, Biobio, Malleco, Cautin, Valdivia—are agricultural, with coalfields. The Patagonian provinces—Llanhique, Chiloé, and Magellanes territory—are densely wooded. The climate of Chili is, on the whole, temperate. In the north it is rather hot and rainless; in the south it is dry for about eight months of the year, and rainy the other four. In Southern Chili generally the land is poor and of hardly any value for agriculture, which, indeed, is carried on in a very primitive fashion; but the soil of the valleys, where large herds of cattle graze, is very fertile. The Andes are almost everywhere visible, covered with perpetual snow. The highest peak is Aconcagua, 22,867 feet; the average height of the great range is 8000 feet. There are many volcanic peaks, mostly extinct. Chili is subject to frequent shocks of earthquake, and occasionally to destructive terremotos; the most notable of these recorded was in 1832, when the coast near Valparaiso was thrown up permanently between 3 and 4 feet. In 1835 Concepcion and Talcahuano were destroyed; in 1868 and in 1875 Iquique and the northern districts suffered, and in 1906 Valparaiso.

The population of Chili at the census of 1885 was 2,524,476; in 1910, 3,415,000. Santiago, the capital, has 350,000 inhabitants; Valparaiso, 180,000; Concepcion, Iquique, Talca, Chillan, Antofagasta, over 30,000. The natives of Chili are a mixture of Spanish with the Araucanian Indians. In the upper classes the race has been kept more purely Spanish than in any other South American country. The working-classes are laborious and docile, but it cannot be said that there is as yet any effectual protection for property. The manufactures are confined to copper-smelting, sugar-refining, tanning, brewing, manufactures of soap and candles, biscuits, boots and shoes, woollens, flax, and nitrates.

Chili is a Roman Catholic country, but other religions are tolerated. Education receives much attention. There is a first-class university at Santiago, and a lyceum in every provincial capital. The language spoken in Chili is Spanish, but with many local words of Indian origin.

The value of imports in 1890–1912 varied from $63,000,000 to $350,000,000; the exports varied from $69,000,000 to $380,000,000. About a fourth of the imports and half of the exports are from and to Britain, the German and United States trade being next in importance. Mineral products represent three-fourths of the total exports. The chief articles of export are nitrate and iodine, copper, silver, gold, manganese, hides, wool, wheat, and barley. The principal imports are cotton, woollen, and jute goods, iron, hardware, coal, machinery, timber, rice, sugar, earthenware, cement, paper, beer, glassware, kerosene, tallow, matches, tea and coffee.

A government broad-gauge railway line runs from Valparaiso to Santiago, crossing the coast-range of the Andes, and thence southwards through the central valley to Concepcion, and through Araucania to Valdivia, forming part of the longitudinal railway. A branch also runs to Santa Rosa at the foot of the Andes, from which a line was constructed, under difficulties, between 1890 and 1909, to unite with the Argentine railway system, viâ the Uspallata Pass, which it crosses at the elevation of 9843 feet above sea-level by means of a tunnel 6¼ miles in length. Other railways include lines from Arica and from Antofagasta into Bolivia.

The credit of Chili stands higher than that of any other South American state. In 1913 the foreign debt amounted to about $460,000,000, and the internal debt to $6,000,000 in gold and $181,000,000 in paper. The revenue for 1912 was estimated at $69,500,000, and the expenditure $77,000,000. The gold standard was adopted in 1895, and a loan of $20,000,000 authorised for the conversion of the paper currency. Conversion was postponed, however, to 1915. The peso (represented by $) of gold is worth 1s. 6d., of paper about 1s.

The constitution of Chili is republican, and based upon that of the United States. The cabinet consists of six ministers. The Council of State consists of five members nominated by the president, and six appointed by congress. The legislature is composed of two chambers—the Deputies, about 100 in number; and the Senate, numbering one to every three deputies. From the war of 1879–81 with Peru, Chili enjoyed peace and prosperity till 1891, when, owing to President Balmaceda's aiming at dictatorial powers, a rebellion broke out which ended in Balmaceda's defeat. Boundary disputes with Argentina were referred to British arbitration and arranged in 1898.

Chilkoot, a pass from Dyea, on the inlet from the Pacific, over the mountains to the head-waters of the Yukon; on the main route to Klondike till the railway by the White Horse Pass.

Chillan, capital of the Chilian province of Nuble, with bathing establishments on the extinct volcano of Chillan (9445 feet). Pop. 35,000.

Chillianwalla, a Punjab village, 5 miles from the Jhelum's east bank, and 85 NW. of Lahore. Here an indecisive but sanguinary battle was fought in the second Sikh war, 13th January 1849.

Chillico'thé, capital of Ross county, Ohio, on the Scioto River and the Ohio Canal, 50 miles S. of Columbus. It has manufactures of paper, leather, &c., and was from 1800 to 1810 the capital of the state. Pop. 14,500.

Chillingham, a village in the north of Northumberland, on the river Till, 8 miles SW. of Belford. To the south is Chillingham Castle, seat of the Earl of Tankerville, built in the reign of Edward III. In the park, as at Cadzow, are preserved a herd of wild white cattle.

Chillon (Fr. pron. Shee-yon^{g}'), a castle 1½ mile SSE. of Montreux, at the east end of the Lake of Geneva. It was long a state-prison, and in it languished Byron's 'Prisoner of Chillon,' Bonivard.

Chiloé, a province of Chili (q.v.); area 9000 sq. m.; pop. 100,000.

Chiltern Hills, the southern part of the low chalk range which runs about 70 miles north-east from the north bend of the Thames. In Oxford, Herts, and Beds they are 15 to 20 miles broad. The highest point is near Wendover (950 feet).—The hundreds of Bodenham, Desborough, and Stoke, in Buckinghamshire, are called the Chiltern Hundreds. The Stewardship of them (the salary being as fictitious as the duties) is still held to be an office of profit under the crown, and its acceptance by a member of the House of Commons entails the vacation of his seat (simple resignation without some disqualification not being provided for in parliamentary usage).

Chimbora'zo, a conical peak of the Andes, in Ecuador, 20,498 feet above the sea, but only about 11,000 above the level of the valley of Quito, to the north. From 1745, when La Condamine ascended as high as 16,730 feet, numerous attempts had been made to scale it before Whymper in 1880 twice reached its summit.—The province of Chimborazo, to the south, has an area of 5523 sq. m., and a pop. of 120,300.

Chimbote (Tchim-bo'tay), a seaport of Peru, 250 miles NW. of Lima; pop. 2000.

China, in its widest sense, is a vast territory in eastern Asia only inferior in extent to the total dominions of Great Britain and Russia, including, besides China Proper, Manchuria, Mongolia, Tibet, and Eastern Turkestan, some of which dependencies took advantage of the events of 1911-13 to assert their independence. China Proper is alone dealt with here. By its natives it is never so called, but usually by the Chinese words for 'The Middle State,' or 'The Republic of the Middle Flower.' The name China (Chi-na, land of Chin) comes to us from India through Buddhism. Various old names are Serica and Cathay, and in the Bible 'Land of Sinim' (Isa. xlix. 12).

China Proper, washed on the east by the Pacific, consists of eighteen provinces—the three provinces of Manchuria not being reckoned. On the north are Chih-lî, Shan-hsî (Shansi), Shen-hsî (Shensi), and Kan-sû; on the west Sze-chwan (Szechuen) and Yun-nan; on the south Kwang-hsî (Kwangsi) and Kwang-tung; on the east Fû-chien (Fukien), Cheh-chiang (Chehkiang), Cheang-sû (Kiangsu), and Shan-tung; and in the centre are Ho-nan, An-hui (Nganhwei), Hû-pei, Hû-nan, Chiang-hsî (Kiangsi), and Kwei-châu (Kweichow). Hainan is the only important island. The total area, often stated at 1,300,000 sq. m., is probably not much short of 2,000,000. China and its dependent territories have an area of 4,300,000 sq. m. The population of the whole is variously estimated at from 300 to 440 millions. The great bulk of this falls to the provinces of China Proper; the population of all the dependencies (Manchuria, Tibet, Mongolia, East Turkestan) making but some 16,000,000 or 25,000,000 of the total. The population of Peking, the capital, is probably about a million. Of over forty ports open to foreign commerce, about half are supposed to have a population under 50,000. That of Canton is estimated at 2,600,000; of Tien-tsin at 950,000; of Shang-hâi at 800,000 (with outlying villages 1,000,000); of Han-kau at 750,000; of Fû-châu at 650,000; of Ning-po at 250,000.

China Proper may be described as sloping from the mountainous regions of Tibet towards the shores of the Pacific on the east and south. The most extensive mountain-range is the Nan Ling or Southern Range, a far-extending spur of the Himalayas. Commencing in Yunnan, it bounds with a continuous barrier (penetrated by only a few difficult passes) Kwang-hsî, Kwang-tung, and Fû-chien on the north, and, passing through Cheh-chiang, reaches the sea at Ning-po. North of this long range, and west of the 113th meridian, on to the borders of Tibet, the country is mountainous, while to the east and from the great wall on the north, to the Po-yang lake in the south, there is the Great Plain, comprising the greater part of the provinces of Chih-lî and Shan-tung, Ho-nan, An-hui, and Chiang-sû.

In the provinces west from Chih-lî—Shan-hsî, Shen-hsî, and Kan-sû—the soil is formed of what are called the loess beds, which are extremely fertile, the fields composed of it hardly requiring any other manure than a sprinkling of its own fresh loam. The husbandman in this way obtains an assured harvest two and even three times a year. This fertility, provided there be a sufficient rainfall, seems inexhaustible. The rivers of China—called for the most part ho in the north, and chiang (kiang) in the south, are one of its most distinguishing features. Two of them stand out conspicuous among the great rivers of the world; the Ho, Hoang-ho, or Yellow River, and the Chiang, or Yang-tsze-kiang. They rise not far from each other among the mountains of Tibet. The Ho pursues a tortuous course seaward through North China; the Chiang or Yang-tsze through Central China. The terrible calamities caused by the inundations of the Hoang-ho have procured for it the name of 'China's Sorrow.' So recently as 1887 it burst its southern bank near Chăng Châu, and poured its mighty flood, with hideous devastation and the destruction of millions of lives, into the populous province of Ho-nan. The Ho is not much under the Chiang in length—somewhat over 3000 miles. The Grand Canal, when in good order, afforded water communication from Peking to Hang-châu in Cheh-chiang, a distance of more than 600 miles. Steam communication all along the eastern seaboard from Canton to Tien-tsin has very much superseded its use. The lakes are very many, but not on so great a scale as the rivers.

It was in 214 B.C. that the emperor Shih Hwang Tî determined to erect a grand barrier all along the north of his vast empire. The Great Wall is one of the wonders of China, and extends from the Shan-hâi Pass east of Peking westward to the Chia-yü barrier gate, the road through which leads to the 'Western Regions.' Its length in a straight line would be 1255 miles, but, if measured along its sinuosities, this distance must be increased to 1500. It is formed by two strong retaining walls of brick, rising from granite foundations, the space between being filled up with stones and earth. The breadth of it at the base is about 25 feet, at the top 15, and the height varies from 15 to 30 feet.

The country is rich in the products necessary for the support and comfort of the people. There is in it every variety of climate; but the average temperature is lower than in any other country in the same latitude. Wheat, barley, maize, millet, and other cereals are chiefly cultivated in the northern regions, and rice in the southern. Culinary or kitchen herbs, mushrooms, and aquatic vegetables, with ginger and a variety of other condiments, are everywhere produced and largely used. Sugar, indigo, and cotton are the principal crops cultivated in the southern provinces. Oranges, pummeloes, lichis, pomegranates, peaches, plantains, pine-apples, mangoes, grapes, and many other fruits and nuts, are supplied in most markets. Tea is noted below. Opium has been forbidden. The Chinese are emphatically an agricultural people; irrigation is assiduously and skilfully employed, and no people are so careful to waste nothing that can be used as manure. Pork is the commonest flesh meat, and the number of pigs is enormous. The seaboard, rivers, lakes, and ponds supply an immense quantity of excellent fish taken by the net. Fowls and ducks are largely produced.

Tea does not grow in the north, but is cultivated extensively in the western provinces and in those south of the Great Chiang. The infusion of the leaves was little, if at all, drunk in ancient times, but now its use is universal. Fû-chien, Hû-pei, and Hû-nan produce most largely the black teas; the green comes chiefly from Cheh-chiang and An-hui; both kinds come from Kwan-tung and Sze-chwan. Next to silk, tea is China's most valuable export. As compared with the populations of western nations, the Chinese are sparing in the use of strong drink; the use of opium is being stamped out. From the 23d century B.C. and earlier, the care of the silkworm, and the spinning and weaving of its produce, have been the special work of woman. The mulberry-tree grows everywhere, and in all the provinces some silk is produced; but Kwan-tung, Sze-chwan, and Cheh-chiang furnish the best and the most. Indigenous to the country also are hemp and other fibrous plants, such as the Bœhmeria nivea. Cotton is cultivated most extensively in the great basin of the Chiang. China has many animals related to North American forms. The rhinoceros, elephant, and tapir are said still to exist in the forests and swamps of Yun-nan, and tigers occur in some districts. Both the brown and black bear are met with, and several varieties of deer, including the musk-deer. The breed of horses and cattle is dwarfish; asses and mules are better of their sort. The camel is seen in the north and west.

The coalfields of China are enormous—more than twenty times the extent of those of Great Britain; but up to this time the majority of them can hardly be said to have been more than scratched. Immense quantities of iron ore, moreover, must have been extracted from the earth during the millenniums of its history, but a much greater amount is still untouched. Copper, lead, silver, and gold are known to exist in many places. Tin is an important export. Petroleum is exploited. The monetary currency is mainly the copper cash, cumbrous and often debased. Even foreign silver coins are treated as bullion, and taken by weight; but silver dollars are coined at Tien-tsin and elsewhere. Good roads are few. Where communication by water is abundant the want of roads is not so much felt. It is owing doubtless to the want of roads that the wheelbarrow is so much used from the Chiang northwards. A smattering of education is widely diffused; but apart from the official classes, who obtain promotion by competitive examinations, those who can read freely or write readily are few. The three religions of China are Confucianism, Tâoism, and Buddhism. It is difficult to estimate the comparative number of their adherents. To claim a majority for those of any one of them is very absurd. As a matter of fact, Confucianism represents the intelligence and morality of China; Tâoism its superstitions; and Buddhism its ritualism and idolatry, while yet it acknowledges no God. Of the disappearing peculiarities of the Chinese may be reckoned the pigtail of the men and the pinched feet of the women. Infanticide is not so common as is often said.

The government of the empire was conducted from the capital, the central authorities directing and controlling the different provincial administrations. There was a Grand Cabinet, the privy-council of the emperor, whose members were few, and held other substantive offices. There was also the Grand Secretariat, formerly the supreme council. The business on which the cabinet deliberated came before it from the Seven Boards—of Civil Office, of Revenue, of Ceremonies (including religion), of War, of Punishment, of Works, and, from 1885, of Admiralty affairs. Each Board had two presidents and four vice-presidents, three of them Manchûs and three Chinese. The Tsungli Yamăn, or foreign office, established in 1861, was in 1902 superseded by a new one called Wai-wu-pu; and the Censorate exercised a supervision over the Boards. In 1906 the imperial government began to build up a constitution, to be completed in 1917. The Senate, set up in 1910, pressed for acceleration, and aided by a rebellion against Manchû domination, succeeded in obtaining all its demands, and eventually the abdication of the emperor. In February 1912 a republic was established, and Yuan Shih-K'ai elected president. The constitution included a senate and a chamber of deputies, both elected, and representing the dependencies as well as China Proper. Then followed a struggle for power between president and parliament, civil war (1913) in which the parliamentary South was defeated, the purging of parliament of its majority by Yuan, and a return to autocratic government. In the provinces a governor-general and governor are usually associated; below these two functionaries there are the lieutenant-governor (commonly called the treasurer), a commissioner for foreign affairs (1910), &c. Provincial assemblies were established in 1908. The revenue is estimated at about £30,000,000, derived mainly from land-tax, customs, likin or transit duties, salt-tax, and licenses. China had no foreign debt till 1874.

The imports of China from abroad amounted in 1887 to 102,263,000 taels, in 1912 to 486,000,000; the exports in 1887 to 85,860,000, and in 1912 to 370,000,000. The chief imports are cotton goods, rice, sugar, metals, oil and kerosene, woollens, fishery products and 'seaweed,' coal, and raw cotton; the exports, silk, tea, beans, cotton, sugar, straw-braid, paper, clothing, hides, and china-ware. These figures do not include the very extensive coasting trade, but only goods passed through the various treaty ports open to foreign commerce (of which Shang-hâi is by far the most important, Canton being the second), and the Russian overland trade. English imports from China, according to English official figures, have during the 20th century varied between £2,000,000 and £4,000,000. English exports to China, between £6,800,000 and £13,300,000. Of the total shipping entered and cleared in 1911 at Chinese ports, 170,000 vessels of 86,000,000 tons (many steamers), 30,000 of 40,000,000 were British.

The imperial army proper consisted of Manchûs, Mongols, and the descendants of Chinese who revolted from the Ming dynasty and joined the Manchûs on their invasion of the empire, the first defection taking place in 1621. These were divided each into eight corps with different-coloured banners, and as a whole were styled 'The Eight Banners.' In addition to this there was the national army, distributed in more than one thousand camps throughout the provinces, nearly twice as numerous as the imperial, and called 'The Army of the Green Standard,' being in fact little more than a vast militia or gendarmerie. Both are being superseded by the New Army and a police force. The total force on a peace footing is about 300,000, and on a war footing about 1,000,000, but with little cohesion or discipline. The navy possessed by China was all but annihilated in the war with Japan. Since then some swift vessels have been acquired. A scheme for reorganisation is on foot.

Chinese historical documents begin with the reigns of Yâo and Shun (2356–2206 B.C.). In 403 B.C. we find only seven great states, all sooner or later claiming to be 'the kingdom,' and contending for the supremacy, till Ts'in (Ch'in) put down all the others, and in 221 B.C. its king assumed the title of Hwang Tî, or Emperor. From that year dates the imperial form of the Chinese government, which thus existed for more than 2100 years. The changes of dynasty were many, two or more sometimes ruling together, each having but a nominal supremacy over the whole nation. The greater dynasties have been those of Han (206 B.C.–220 A.D.), T'ang (618–906), Sung (960–1279), Yüan (the Mongol, 1280–1367), the Ming (1368–1643), and the Ch'ing (Manchû-Tatar, from the Manchû conquest of China in 1643 to the 1912 revolution). It was not till after the Cape of Good Hope had been doubled, and the passage to India discovered by Vasco da Gama in 1497, that intercourse between any of the European nations and China was possible by sea. It was in 1516 that the Portuguese first made their appearance at Canton; and they were followed at intervals of time by the Spaniards, the Dutch, and the English in 1635. The Chinese received none of them cordially; and Chinese dislike of them was increased by their mutual jealousies and collisions with one another. In the meantime trade gradually increased, and there grew up the importation of opium from India. Before 1767 the import rarely exceeded 200 chests, but in that year it amounted to 1000. In 1792 the British government wisely sent an embassy under Lord Macartney to Peking. A second embassy from Great Britain in 1816 was dismissed from Peking suddenly and contumeliously because the ambassador would not perform the prostrations required. From the measures of the Chinese to prevent the import of opium came the first war with China in 1840; the result of which was the opening of Canton, Amoy, Fû-châu, Ning-po, and Shang-hâi to commerce, and the cession of Hong-kong to Britain. A second war in 1857, France being allied with Britain, ended in the opening of five more treaty ports. A third war (1860) and the march on Peking did even more to open China to the world. After a war in 1884–85 France secured permanent control of Tongking and Annam. In 1894 Japan, reviving old claims on Corea, drove the Chinese out of Corea, and after victories on land and at sea, captured Port Arthur and Wei-hai-wei. By the treaty of 1894 Japan secured as indemnity Formosa and the Liao-tung peninsula; but the protests of Russia, Germany, and France made Japan resign Liao-tung. Russia obtained a lease of Port Arthur and Talienwan, with railway and other privileges in Manchuria; Germany obtained Kiao-chau and concessions in Shan-tung; and Britain, as an offset, obtained a lease of Wei-hai-wei and sought to secure trading freedom in the Yang-tsze-kiang valley. Russia's refusal to evacuate Manchuria and her movements in Corea led to war with Japan in 1903, the defeat of the Russian armies in Manchuria, the destruction of the Russian fleet, and the fall of Port Arthur (1905), China being nominally neutral. By the peace (1905) Japan secured dominance in Corea, the Russian leases in Liao-tung, and great influence in southern Manchuria and on China generally.

A series of far-reaching reforms, promoted by a nationalist reform party in 1898, were summarily cancelled by the dowager empress, who assumed supreme authority; and the reactionary and anti-foreign 'Boxer' association ('The Fist of Righteous Harmony'), encouraged by the court, made extermination of foreigners its war-cry and besieged the legations in Peking, relieved after a two months' siege by an army of Japanese, Russians, British, Americans, French, and Germans. The constitutional movement and the revolutions of 1911–13 are dealt with above.

It is estimated that some 9,000,000 Chinese live abroad, especially in California, British Columbia, the Straits Settlements and Eastern Archipelago, Siam, and Australia. More than half the population of Singapore is Chinese. From 1855 onwards the immigration of Chinese into the United States increased, in 1882 it was checked, and in 1888 practically prohibited. Australia and Canada also restrict Chinese immigration. The admission of Chinese coolies to work in South African mines was, spite of keen opposition, sanctioned under special arrangements, and they were employed from 1904 to 1910.

The Chinese people are the result of a fusion of various invading Mongolian tribes, from B.C. 3000 to 700 A.D., with the aborigines of various stocks; the Manchû dynasty ruled till 1912. Three types may still be recognised in China—a northern Manchû-Corean, a central and nearly pure Chinese, and a southern with Malayan and other admixtures. The Chinese language is monosyllabic, the words being indeclinable and wholly uninflected. It is written by means of some 73,000 characters, each of which is the symbol of an idea. The spoken language differs greatly in different parts of the country, though the written language is everywhere the same.

Chinampo, or CHINNAMPHO, an open port on the N. coast of Corea, 105 miles NW. of Seoul; pop. 17,000.

Chinandega (Tcheenanday'ga), a Nicaraguan town, 30 miles NW. of Leon; pop. 13,000.

China Sea, the portion of the Pacific Ocean to the east of China and Siam.

Chincha Islands, three bare, rocky islets of Peru, 6¼ miles in area and 200 feet high, which in 1841–74 yielded millions of tons of guano.

Chinchilla (Tchin-cheel'ya), a town of Spain, 12 miles SE. of Albacete by rail; pop. 7000.

Chinchon', a town of Spain, 25 miles SE. of Madrid; pop. 5000.

Chindwa'ra, a town in the Central Provinces, 70 miles N. by W. of Nagpur; pop. 10,000.

Chindwin, a tributary of the Irawadi (q.v.).

Chingalpat (Chengalpat), a town of India, 36 miles SW. of Madras by rail; pop. 10,000.

Chingford, an Essex urban district, 9½ miles NE. of London, in Epping Forest, with a golf-course and a notable reservoir; pop. 8000.

Ching-tu, or CHENTU, capital of Sze-chwan, in a fertile plain and rich mining country. It has a great arsenal and a population of a million.

Chin-Kiang, a Chinese port on the Yang-tsze-kiang, 40 miles ENE. of Nanking, opened to foreign trade in 1861. Pop. 235,000.

Chinon (Shee-non^{g}'), an antique town in the dep. of Indre-et-Loire, on the Vienne, 31 miles SW. of Tours by rail. On a lofty rock are the ruins of its vast old castle, the death-place of Henry II.; and the place where, in 1429, Joan of Arc revealed her mission to the Dauphin. A farmhouse across the Vienne is pointed out as Rabelais' birthplace. Pop. 4000.

Chin′sura, a town on the right bank of the Húglí, originally Dutch, but ceded to the British in 1825, and now included in Húglí (q.v.).

Chioggia, or CHIOZZA (Kee-od′ja, Kee-ot′za), a seaport and cathedral city of Italy, 15 miles SSW. of Venice, on an island at the southern end of the Venetian Lagoon, connected with the mainland by a stone bridge of 43 arches. Pop., inclusive of Sottomarina, 30,000.

Chios (Keeos; now Chio, Italianised Scio), one of the most beautiful and fertile islands in the Ægean Sea, long held by Turkey, 7 miles off the coast of Asia Minor, at the entrance to the Gulf of Smyrna. It is 30 miles long from north to south, by 8 to 15 miles broad, with an area of 320 sq. m., and a pop. of 70,000, almost all Greeks. The larger northern part is more mountainous than the southern. The climate is delightful and salubrious. Earthquakes are, however, not rare, and one in 1881 caused the death of 3558 persons, and the destruction of property to the value of three to four millions sterling. The products are wine and figs, both noted in classical days, with mastic, silk, lemons, oranges, olives, antimony, and goats' skins. The capital, Chios, about the middle of the east coast, contains about 16,000 inhabitants. On the west coast is a rich monastery, Nea-Moni, founded in the 11th century. Chios, which is one of the seven birthplaces of Homer, was taken by the Genoese (1346), the Turks (1566), and the Greeks (1912–13). A number of the Chiotes having in 1821 joined the revolted Samians, a Turkish fleet and army in 1822 inflicted dreadful vengeance; 25,000 Chiotes fell by the sword, 47,000 were sold into slavery, and only some 5000 escaped. A second rising in 1827 was likewise unsuccessful.

Chippenham, a municipal borough in Wiltshire, on the Avon, here crossed by a bridge of twenty-two arches, 13 miles NE. of Bath. An ancient place, it was captured by the Danes from Alfred the Great in 878, and now consists chiefly of a long well-built street. It has a trade in cheese and other agricultural produce, but its cloth manufactures have declined. It lost its last parliamentary member in 1885. Population, 5300.

Chippewa Falls, capital of Chippewa county, Wisconsin, on the Chippewa River, 114 miles by rail E. of St Paul, with saw and flour mills and a large lumber-trade. Pop. 9200.

Chipping Campden. See CAMPDEN.

Chipping Norton (meaning 'northern market-town'), a mun. borough in the N. of Oxfordshire, 85 miles NW. of London by rail, with woollen, tweed, and glove manufactures; pop. 4000.

Chipping Ongar. See ONGAR.

Chipping Sodbury ('southern market-borough'), a Gloucestershire market-town, near the Frome, 10½ miles NE. of Bristol. Pop. of parish, 1000.

Chipping Wycombe. See WYCOMBE.

Chiquimu′la, a town (pop. 4000) in the east of Guatemala, which gives name to the ISTHMUS OF CHIQUIMULA, with a breadth from the Gulf of Honduras to the Pacific of 150 miles.

Chiquinquirá, a town in Colombia, near the Suarez, 30 miles W. of Tunja, since Indian times a place of pilgrimage. Pop. 18,000.

Chiriquí (Tchee-re-kee′), a division of Panamá, adjoining Costa Rica, notable for its antiquities and its volcanic eruption in 1912; area, 6500 sq. m.; pop. 43,000. See MacCurdy, Study of Chiriquian Antiquities (1911).

Chirk, a Denbighshire market-town, on the Ellesmere Canal, 9¼ miles S. by W. of Wrexham; pop. of parish, 2600.

Chislehurst, a Kent urban district, 11 miles SE. of London. Sir Nicholas Bacon was a native. Camden Park estate (now built over) was the residence of Camden the antiquary. Napoleon III. died at Camden Place in 1873. There are an Orphanage and a Governesses' Institution here. Pop. 9000.

Chiswick, an urban district of Middlesex, on the north bank of the Thames, 7½ miles W. by S. of St Paul's. Here are some charming old riverside houses (one of them William Morris's home); here too are extensive market-gardens to supply London. In the churchyard are Hogarth's grave and Foscolo's cenotaph; and at Chiswick House, when guests of the Dukes of Devonshire, died Fox and Canning. The population is over 38,000.

Chita, or TCHITA, capital of Transbaikalia, on the Chita River and the great Siberian railway, 545 miles E. of Irkutsk; pop. 60,000.

Chitaldrúg, a town of Mysore, India, 126 miles NW. of Bangalore; pop. 5000.

Chitrál, a small state of the NW. Frontier Province, in the upper basin of the Kunar, or Kashkar, a tributary of the Kabul River, and on the borders of Kafiristan.

Chittagong, or ISLAMABAD, a port of Bengal, 220 miles E. of Calcutta, on the eastern side of the Bay of Bengal, and on the Karnaphuli River, about 12 miles from its mouth. Formerly an important centre of trade under the Portuguese, with one of the best ports in India, it has recently regained much of the commerce it lost with the rise of Calcutta. In 1905–12 it was a sub-capital of Eastern Bengal and Assam. Pop. 25,000.

Chittor′ ('little town'), a town of India, on the Poini, 100 miles W. of Madras; pop. 10,000.

Chiusa (Kee-oo′za), the name of several Italian towns, the largest being CHIUSA SCLAFANI, in Sicily, 31 miles SSW. of Palermo; pop. 6500.

Chiusi (Kee-oo′zee), a town 102 miles NNW. of Rome by rail, on an olive-clad eminence in the Val di Chiana, not far from the small Lago di Chiusi. The Clusium of the Etruscans, it has yielded many antiquities. Pop. 6000.

Chivasso (Kee-vas′so), a town of Italy, on the Po, 18 miles NE. of Turin by rail; pop. 4000.

Chivilcoy, in the Argentine province of Buenos Ayres, is 110 miles W. of the capital. Pop. 15,000.

Chobe, a tributary of the Zambesi.

Chobham, a Surrey parish, 4 miles NW. of Woking. A camp was formed here in 1853.

Cholet (Sho-lay′), in the French dep. of Maine-et-Loire, on the Maine, has manufactures of linens and woollens. Pop. 16,000.

Cholu′la, a decayed town of the Mexican state of Puebla, stands nearly 7000 feet above sea-level, on the tableland of Anahuac, 55 miles ESE. of the city of Mexico. The pop. has dwindled from 100,000 in Cortes' day to only 7000. The most remarkable memorial of aboriginal times is the huge Teocalli pyramid of earth, clay, brick, and stone, dedicated to the god Quetzalcoatl.

Chon, a loch, 1¾ mile long and 3 furlongs wide, 7 miles WNW. of Aberfoyle.

Chonos Archipelago, a group of bare, thinly peopled islands off the west coast of Patagonia, 44°-46° S. lat., belonging to Chili.

Chorley, a busy town in North Lancashire, 9 miles S. by E. of Preston by rail. It has manufactures of cotton-yarn, jaconets, muslins, fancy goods, calicoes, ginghams, and railway wagons, with neighbouring bleach-fields, print-works, coal-mines, and stone quarries. It became a municipal borough in 1881. Pop. 30,300.

Chosön. See Corea.

Chota Nagpore (Chutiá Nágpur), a south-west portion of the province of Bihar and Orissa, embracing five British districts and two tributary states; area of the British districts, 27,000 sq. m.; pop. 5,000,000. Some states formerly included were transferred in 1905 to the Central Provinces and to the Orissa Tributary States.

Christchurch, a parliamentary and municipal borough of Hampshire, at the head of the estuary formed by the Avon and Stour, 24 miles SW. of Southampton by road, but 33½ by rail. The noble church of an Augustinian priory (1150) is 303 feet long by 101 across the transept, and includes every style from Norman to Perpendicular. Special features of interest are the splendid Early English porch, a monument to Shelley, a beautiful rood-screen, and the chapel built by Henry VIII.'s victim, Margaret, Countess of Salisbury. Little remains of a Norman castle. Christchurch possesses one notable specialty, the making of watch and clock fusee-chains. The harbour has high-water twice every tide. The parliamentary borough, 22,350 acres in area, comprises the favourite watering-place Bournemouth, and returns one member; but of the population of 90,000 only 5000 are within the municipal borough of Christchurch, which was incorporated in 1886.

Christchurch, capital of the provincial district of Canterbury, New Zealand, on the river Avon, about 8 miles from Port Lyttelton by rail. It has tramways, government offices, a museum (with many specimens of the Moa), a cathedral (1881; a reproduction of that of Caen in France), and a hospital. The water-supply is derived from artesian wells. Two parks and the Government Domain afford ample pleasure-grounds. Boot manufacturing is one of the chief industries. An earthquake in 1888 damaged the cathedral and other buildings. Pop. 53,000, but with suburbs, 80,000.

Christiania, the modern capital and chief commercial town of Norway (the ancient capital is Trondhjem, 'home of the throne,' where the kings are still crowned), 59° 56′ N. lat., 10° 50′ E. long., is built on the northern end of the Christiania Fiord. Pop. (1801) 8931; (1891) 151,239; (1910) 241,834. Christiania is named after Christian IV., who commenced building it in 1624 after the destruction of the ancient city of Oslo by fire. It is the seat of the national parliament, of the High Court of Judicature, and of the National University, with over 1500 students. Connected with this are the students' garden, a library of 450,000 volumes, a botanical garden, zoological and other museums, laboratories, and observatory. The Meteorological Institute was established in 1866. There are two national and historical palaces here, one in the city quite near the university, and one, Oscarshall, beautifully situated two miles from the city on an eminence overlooking the fiord. There is a national picture-gallery, and a very interesting museum of northern antiquities. The Dom or Cathedral and Trinity Church are the principal ecclesiastical buildings. The old fortress Akershus Faestning still remains, and is used as a promenade, but has little military value. Among other public buildings are the Houses of Parliament, two theatres, the Freemasons' Hall, &c. The staple industry of Christiania is its shipping trade; its chief export is timber. A considerable industry is the brewing of Christiania öl, a sort of lager beer, with resinous flavour, largely consumed throughout Norway, and exported. The minor manufactures are cotton, canvas, engine-works, nail-works, paper-mills, and cariole-making. The harbour is closed by ice for three or four months most winters.

Christiansand, a city of Norway, near its southernmost extremity, on a sandy plain at the mouth of the Otteraa. A garrisoned town, built by Christian IV. in 1641, it has several dockyards, and a good harbour much used for refuge. At the mouth of the harbour is the beautiful island of Odderö, laid out with public gardens and promenades. Christiansand has a considerable trade in timber, pitch, stockfish (salted cod), fish-oil for curriers, salmon, mackerel, lobsters, and white ptarmigans, the last two chiefly for the London market. Shipbuilding is a considerable industry. Christiansand, which suffered much by fire in July 1892, has a cathedral. Pop. 15,300.

Christiansfeld, a settlement (1772) of Moravian Brethren in Northern Sleswick.

Christianstad, a Swedish town, on the Helge, 14 miles from the Baltic, and 351 SSW. of Stockholm by rail. It possesses an arsenal, a magnificent church, and a senate-house. Pop. 12,000.

Christianstadt, the chief town of the Danish West Indian island of Santa Cruz, on the north shore. Pop. 5500.

Christiansund (63° 10′ N. lat., 7° 50′ E. long.), sometimes confounded with Christiansand though 350 miles farther north, is a picturesque Norwegian coast-town, built on three wooded islands. It has a considerable trade with Spain and Italy in salt-fish, and is a calling-place for passenger steamers. Pop. 13,200.

Christmas Island, in the Pacific, is in 1° 57′ N. lat., and 157° 27′ W. long., with some guano deposits, and is a British possession.—Another, annexed to Britain (Straits Settlements) in 1888-1889, lies about 250 miles SW. of Java. Six miles long by four broad, it consists of rich phosphate deposits and coral on a volcanic substratum, part of it covered with luxuriant vegetation.—There is a third Christmas Island in the Bras d'Or, Cape Breton.

Chrudim, a town of Bohemia, 74 miles ESE. of Prague by rail. It manufactures sugar, beer, alcohol, and artificial manure. Pop. 15,000.

Chubut, or Chupat, an Argentine territory in Patagonia, so named from a river whose mouth is 600 miles S. of the river Plate; population, 30,000. It contains a Welsh colony, whose first settlers arrived in 1865. The principal town, Trerawson, or Rawsonville, about 5 miles from the sea, is named after Dr Rawson, an Argentine statesman.

Chudleigh, a Devon market-town, on the Teign, 10 miles SSW. of Exeter. Pop. of parish, 2000.

Chudleigh, Cape, on the north coast of Labrador, at the entrance of Hudson Strait.

Cincinnati (Sin-sin-nah′tee), the second city of Ohio, on the north bank of the river Ohio, 270 miles SE. of Chicago by rail, opposite the cities of Covington and Newport in Kentucky. Steam-ferries and six lofty bridges connect the city with the Kentucky shore; the suspension bridge by Roebling is 2250 feet long, and cost $1,800,000. Cincinnati occupies an exceedingly broken and irregular site, the more densely built parts being enclosed between the river and steep hills. The lower business streets are liable to be flooded at times. The river front is upwards of 14 miles in length. A second terrace is 50 or 60 feet higher, and a district between the hills and the Miami Canal, known as 'over the Rhine,' is appropriated to the large German colony. The suburbs are built on a succession of irregular hills, by whose steepness they are broken into a series of some five and twenty villages, interspersed with parks (including Eden Park, of 216 acres). Among the public buildings are the post-office; the Chamber of Commerce; a large art museum; an art school, and a college of music (1878); a large music-hall, with a noted grand organ; a commodious city building; and a court-house. There are more than 250 churches, including a Roman Catholic cathedral; besides many handsome theatres, hotels, and public halls, hospitals and asylums, and schools of every grade, including medical, law, and divinity seminaries—the Presbyterian Lane Theological Seminary is famous. To the Cincinnati University, the Cincinnati Observatory and Astronomical School are attached; there are large libraries, a zoological garden, the Cuvier Club and the Historical and Philosophical Society. The city is a centre of musical and art culture, and its decorative pottery and wood-carving have a national reputation. It has a large river and canal traffic, and many railways converge here. Amongst the factories are clothes-factories, foundries, machine shops, coach-works, works for the manufacture of furniture, tobacco, shoes, leather, &c. There is some boat-building and printing; and the slaughter-houses, stock-yards, and grain-elevators are very extensive. Cincinnati was settled by white men in 1780, and was named in honour of the military Society of the Cincinnati. It was incorporated as a city in 1819, and early attained the name of 'the queen city of the west;' as also that of 'Porkopolis,' from its great trade in pork. Great riots occurred in 1884, and were with difficulty suppressed by the military. Pop. (1850) 115,436; (1880) 255,139; (1890) 296,908; (1910) 363,591, about a third being of German origin.

Cinque Ports. The five great ports on the coast of Kent and Sussex lying opposite to France—Sandwich, Dover, Hythe, Romney, and Hastings—were, subsequently to the battle of Hastings, constituted by the Conqueror a jurisdiction entirely separate from the counties of Kent and Sussex, and erected into a sort of county palatine, under a warden, the seat of whose administration was Dover Castle (now Walmer Castle). Privileges similar to theirs were afterwards extended to Winchelsea and Rye; and all the seven municipal towns except Winchelsea had subordinate ports and towns attached to them, which were called limbs or members. See books by Montagu Burrows (1888) and Hueffer (1900).

Cintra, a town of Portugal, 17 miles WNW. of Lisbon; pop. 6000. The convention of Cintra (1808), between Britain and France, provided for the evacuation of Portugal by the French.

Circars, The Northern (Sarkár, 'a government'), the historical name for an Indian territory lying along the coast of the Bay of Bengal, from 18 to 100 miles wide, with an area of 17,000 miles. It nearly corresponds with the present Madras districts of Ganjam, Vizagapatam, Godavari, Kistna, and parts of Nellore and Karnúl.

Circassia, a territory on both sides of the western Caucasus. See Caucasus.

Cirencester, a town of Gloucestershire, amid the Coteswold Hills, on the Churn, a headstream of the Thames, and on the Thames and Severn Canal, 14 miles SSE. of Cheltenham, and 18 NW. of Swindon. It has a very fine Perpendicular church (restored 1867), a public hall (1863), some remains of an abbey (1117), and, 1 mile distant, an agricultural college (1846) of Bristol University. Near this is the handsome seat of Earl Bathurst. There is a considerable trade in wool and agricultural produce, and the town is a hunting centre. Till 1867 it returned two members; till 1885 one. The population is over 7600. Cirencester (pron. Cisseter) was the Roman Corinium, and was stormed by Rupert in 1642 and 1643. The chronicler Richard of Cirencester was a native.

Cis-Sutlej States, a term including the British districts of Umballa (Ambala), Ludhiana, Firozpur, Hissar, and the native states of Patiala, Jind, and Nabha.

Citeaux (See-tō'; anc. Cistercium), the mother abbey of the great Cistercian monastic order (founded here in 1098), stands 12 miles S. of Dijon, in the French dep. of Côte d'Or. The abbey buildings, nearly destroyed in 1798, have been converted into an industrial and agricultural reformatory for juvenile offenders.

Clackmannan, the county town of Clackmannanshire, on the Devon, 2 miles E. by S. of Alloa. An eminence is crowned by the ruined tower of the Bruces. Pop. 1400.

Clackmannanshire, the smallest county of Scotland, lies between the counties of Perth, Kinross, Fife, and Stirling, and slopes from the green Ochil Hills to the Forth; area, 55 sq. m.; pop. (1871) 23,747; (1911) 31,121. Clackmannan is the county town, but Alloa and Alva are more important places. Clackmannanshire, with Kinross-shire, returns one member to parliament. See a book by Beveridge (1888).

Clacton, an Essex watering-place, 15 miles SE. of Colchester; pop. 10,000.

Clairac, a town in the French dep. of Lot-et-Garonne, on the Lot, 18 miles NW. of Agen; pop. 1500.

Clairvaux (Clair-vō'), a village of France, 10 miles SE. of Bar-sur-Aube. Its once famous Cistercian abbey, founded in 1115 by St Bernard, was suppressed at the Revolution, and the extensive buildings are now used as a prison.

Clanwilliam, a division of the Cape Province, South Africa, N. of Capetown, embracing the rich valley of Olifant River West. Chief village, Clanwilliam, on Jan Dissels River.

Clap'ham, a south-western suburb of London, lying a mile S. of the Thames, and forms one of the London parliamentary boroughs, returning one member, but for municipal purposes it is divided between the metropolitan boroughs of Battersea and Wandsworth. Clapham Common is still an open common of 200 acres.—The 'Clapham Sect' was a name given by Sydney Smith to the Evangelical party, as represented especially by Venn, Romaine, Zachary Macaulay, and Wilberforce.

Clapton, a north-east district of London.

Clara, a market-town of King's county, 65 miles W. of Dublin. Pop. 1000.

Clare, a maritime county in the province of Munster, Ireland, lying between Galway Bay and the Shannon. It has a length of 67 miles, a greatest breadth of 43, and an area of 1294 sq. m. In the east the hills reach a height of 1758 feet. The sea-line is high and rocky, in parts precipitous, and occasionally from 400 to 680 feet high, with many isles and fantastic detached rocks. The chief rivers are the Shannon and the Fergus. The county has about 100 small lakes. The south-west third of the county forms part of the Munster coalfield. There are lead-mines, slate and marble quarries, and many chalybeate springs. The chief towns are Ennis (the county town), Kilrush, Kilkee, Ennistimon, and Killaloe. Pop. (1841) 286,394; (1911) 104,232, nearly all Catholics. The county returns two members. There are many cromlechs, raths, remains of abbeys, and old castles, and several round towers, one at Kilrush being 120 feet high. Till Elizabeth's time the county was called Thomond; its present name comes from an English adventurer, Thomas de Clare, who received from Henry III. a part of all the land he might conquer from the Irish.

Clare, (1) one of the most interesting of the smaller towns of Suffolk, 19 miles SSW. of Bury. It has a fine old castle, and gives an earl's title to the British sovereign. Pop. of parish, 1600. —(2) A village of County Clare, on the Fergus, 23 miles NW. of Limerick; pop. 500.—(3) Or CLAREMORRIS, a town of County Mayo, 14 miles SE. of Castlebar; pop. 1000.

Clermont (mediæval Clair-mong'; Clarus Mons, or Clarimontium), the name of several towns in France. (1) In the dep. of Oise, 41 miles N. of Paris by rail. Pop. 4000.—(2) CLERMONT-FERRAND (Roman Augustonemetum), the capital of the dep. of Puy-de-Dôme, between the rivers Bedat and Allier, 135 miles S. of Paris by rail. Among its buildings are the old Gothic cathedral, built of dark lava from a neighbouring range of extinct volcanoes; the fine church of Notre Dame, where Pope Urban II. preached the first Crusade; the handsome Palais des Facultés; and the government buildings, formerly a convent (1250). The chief manufactures are candied fruits, wax matches, chemicals, linen, rope, lace, and machines. There are several mineral springs. The bishopric of Clermont was founded in 253; and seven ecclesiastical councils were held here during the middle ages. A statue has been erected to Pascal, who, as well as Gregory of Tours, was a native of Clermont. Pop. (1872) 32,963; (1911) 65,386.—(3) CLERMONT L'HÉRAULT, 33 miles W. of Montpellier by rail; pop. 4800.

Clevedon, a pleasant Somersetshire watering-place, on the Bristol Channel, 12 miles by road but 16 by rail WSW. of Bristol. The historian Hallam, and Arthur, his son, lie in the old parish church; Coleridge lived a while here at Myrtle Cottage (1795); and Clevedon Court, a mediæval mansion of singular beauty, though much damaged by fire in 1882, is the 'Castlewood' of Thackeray's Esmond. The population is about 6000.

Cleveland, a wild mountainous district, with some picturesque fertile valleys, forming the east part of the North Riding of Yorkshire between Whitby and the Tees. In the south the hills rise 1300 to 1850 feet. An extraordinary change has been wrought in the aspect of the country by a discovery of ironstone in the Cleveland hills; since 1851, lonely hamlets have become populous towns. See works by J. C. Atkinson (1891) and J. Leyland (1892).

Cleveland, the largest city of Ohio, is on the south shore of Lake Erie, 350 miles by rail E. of Chicago. The city is built mainly upon a plain from 60 to 150 feet above the lake, and is divided into the east and west sides by the tortuous valley of the Cuyahoga River, which is crossed by two high-level bridges—one mainly of stone (1878), and one of iron (1888, 3931 feet long). There are other bridges at the lower level in the valley. The 'flats' along the river are occupied by vast lumber-yards, factories, mills, coal-yards, ore docks, ship-yards, &c. The river is the harbour, and an outer harbour is protected by an immense United States breakwater. The business centre of Cleveland extends east from the lower part of the river-valley for three-fourths of a mile along Superior Street. Cleveland has a fine city hall and court-house, post-office, and other public buildings. From the Public Square, which is adorned with monuments, fountains, and the fine old 'Stone' (first Presbyterian) Church, Euclid Avenue, according to Bayard Taylor the most beautiful street in the world, runs eastward beyond Wade Park, a beautiful tract of about 65 acres. Farther east is Lake View Cemetery, with the monument of President Garfield, 125 feet high. A great wealth of gardens and shade-trees is noticeable throughout the 'Forest City,' except in the poorest quarters; few houses are built in blocks, and tenements are virtually unknown. The water is supplied from Lake Erie. Cleveland has a large music-hall, several theatres, over 250 churches, the Western Reserve University, and colleges, medical schools, hospitals, asylums, and two large libraries; numerous periodicals, daily, tri-weekly, weekly, and monthly, are published in the city. Cleveland's rapid growth is due mainly to the fact that nowhere else can the rich iron ores of Lake Superior, the coal of Northern Ohio, and the limestone of the Lake Erie islands, be brought together so cheaply; its position at the north terminus of the Ohio Canal being very advantageous, and seven railways terminate here. The chief industries of the city are the various manufactures of iron, including steel rails, forgings, wire, bridges, steel and iron ships, engines, boilers, nails, screws, sewing-machines, agricultural implements and machinery of all kinds, the refining of petroleum, wood-work, and other manufactures of endless variety. Cleveland is the greatest iron ore receiving point in America, one of the largest lumber markets in the country, and the mercantile centre of an extensive and productive region. The site was laid out by General Moses Cleveland in 1796; in 1836 it was incorporated. Pop. (1850) 17,034; (1880) 160,146; (1890) 261,353; (1910) 560,663.

Cleves (Ger. Kleve, Dutch Kleef), a town of Rhenish Prussia, 2½ miles from the Rhine, and 48 NW. of Düsseldorf. The fine old castle, the Schwanenburg, partly built on a commanding rock, is the reputed scene of the legend of the Knight of the Swan, made familiar by Wagner's opera of Lohengrin. Anne of Cleves, fourth wife of Henry VIII., was born here. Cleves has manufactures of cotton and leather goods, tobacco, &c. Pop. 20,000.

Clew Bay, an inlet of the Atlantic, on the west coast of County Mayo, about 15 miles long by 9 broad. At the entrance is Clare Island (3949 acres; pop. 360), which, as well as Inishgort (27 acres), has a lighthouse.

Clewer, a Berkshire parish, on the Thames, partly within the borough of Windsor. Here is a well-known Anglican sisterhood.

Clichy (Clee-shee'), a town on the Seine, to the north-west of Paris, of which it forms a suburb. It has numerous manufactories, especially of chemicals and catgut, and is much affected by washerwomen. Pop. 47,000.

Cliefden. See CLIVEDEN.

Clifden, a Connemara seaport, 50 miles NW. of Galway; pop. 800.

Clifford Castle, a ruin on the Wye, Herefordshire, 2 miles NNE. of Hay, the traditional birthplace of Fair Rosamond.

Clifton. See BRISTOL.

Clifton, now NIAGARA FALLS, a city of Ontario, on the Niagara River, 2 miles below the Falls. Here is a noble railway suspension bridge, 800 feet long and 240 above the water. Pop. 10,000.

Clifton Moor, Westmorland, 3 miles SSE. of Penrith, the scene of a Jacobite skirmish (1745).

Clinton, (1) capital of Clinton county, Iowa, on the Mississippi, here crossed by an iron railroad bridge, 4000 feet long, 60 miles SSE. of Dubuque by rail. It has numerous mills, foundries, and factories, and a trade in lumber and grain. Pop. (1870) 6129; (1910) 25,577.—(2) A town of Massachusetts, on the Nashua River, 45 miles W. of Boston by rail. It has large manufactures of ginghams and plaids, carpets, combs, and machinery. Pop. 30,000.—(3) A post-village of New York, 9 miles WSW. of Utica, is the seat of Hamilton College (1812), a Presbyterian foundation; pop. 1200.

Clippens, a Renfrewshire village, 1 mile NNE. of Johnstone.

Clipstone, in Sherwood Forest, Notts, 5 miles NE. of Mansfield, the seat of an ancient royal palace.

Clitheroe, a municipal borough in Lancashire, on the Ribble, 35 miles N. of Manchester. It lies on a low eminence, at the base of Pendle Hill (1831 feet). Clitheroe has cotton and paper mills, and extensive lime-quarries are wrought in the neighbourhood. Its 12th-century castle was dismantled by the parliamentarians in 1649. The free grammar-school dates from 1554. Stonyhurst College (q.v.) lies 4 miles SW. A borough since about 1280, Clitheroe till 1832 returned two members to parliament, then till 1885 one. Pop. (1851) 7300; now 12,500. See Whitaker's History of Whalley and Clitheroe (1801; 4th ed. 1876).

Cliveden, a seat with noble woods in Bucks, on the Thames, 3¼ miles NNE. of Maidenhead. Originally built by Charles II.'s Duke of Buckingham, but burned in 1795 and 1849, it was sold in 1893 by the Duke of Westminster to the American millionaire, W. W. Astor.

Cloch Point, on the Clyde, opposite Dunoon, with a lighthouse.

Cloghan (Clo'an), a village of King's county, 5 miles NE. of Banagher.

Clogher (Clo'er), (1) a decayed episcopal city and quondam parliamentary borough of Tyrone, on the Blackwater, 15 miles SSE. of Omagh. The Protestant see is now united to Armagh. The cathedral and episcopal palace are handsome edifices. Pop. 200.—(2) A fishing-village of County Louth, 7 miles NE. of Drogheda; pop. 600.

Clonakilty, a seaport of County Cork, at the head of Clonakilty Bay, 33 miles SW. of Cork; pop. 3000.

Clones, a town of County Monaghan, 94 miles NW. of Dublin by rail; pop. 2400.

Clonfert, an ancient episcopal city of Ireland, is in the extreme east of County Galway. The bishopric was founded in the 6th century, and ceased to be a separate Anglican one in 1602, being ultimately incorporated with Killaloe; but it is still the see of a Roman Catholic bishop.

Clonmacnoise, a holy place of Ireland, on the Shannon, 10 miles by river S. of Athlone. An abbey was founded here by St Kieran in 548; and the spot is still marked by the ruins of the 'seven churches' (including the 'cathedral,' the ruins of which belong to the church rebuilt in 14th century), two round towers, and a great Celtic cross. This 'Iona of Ireland' was the burial-place of many princes.

Clonmel', a municipal borough in Tipperary and Waterford counties, on the Suir, 135 miles SW. of Dublin by rail. In 1650 Cromwell besieged it, and demolished the castle. It gave birth to Sterne and Lady Blessington, and was the scene of Smith O'Brien's attempted rising in 1848. Till 1885 it returned one member. Here Bianconi first established his jaunting-cars; and Clonmel is still a tourist centre. Pop. 10,000.

Clontarf', where in 1014 Brian Boru defeated the Danes, was long famous as a watering-place, and in 1900 was incorporated with Dublin city.

Cloughjordan, a village of Tipperary, 87 miles SW. of Dublin. Pop. 400.

Clovelly, a coast-village of North Devon, 11 miles WSW. of Bideford. From its rude little pier it climbs 400 feet upwards in a steep narrow combe. Pop. of parish, 600.

Clovenfords, a famous vinery on the Tweed, 3¼ miles W. of Galashiels.

Cloyne, an ancient episcopal town of County Cork, 15 miles ESE. of Cork. The cathedral was founded in the 6th century by St Colman; opposite is a finely preserved round tower over 90 feet high. The see, held once by Bishop Berkeley, is united to that of Cork; but there is also a Catholic diocese. Pop. 750.

Clugny (Clün-yee'), or CLUNI, a town in the dep. of Saône-et-Loire, on the Grosne, 15 m. NW. of Mâcon by rail. Pop. 4000. Its famous Benedictine abbey (910–1790) attained a degree of splendour and influence unrivalled by any similar institution of the middle ages. The grand basilica or abbey church, commenced by St Hugh, the eighth abbot, in 1089, and dedicated by Pope Innocent II. in 1131, was, until the construction of St Peter's at Rome, the largest church in Christendom. Of this magnificent and imposing pile one tower and part of the transept alone remain; the site of the nave is traversed by a road. See two works by Sir G. F. Duckett (1886–88), with others in French by Pignot, Lorain, Penjon, Cuchérat, and Champly.

Clumber Park, a seat of the Duke of Newcastle, in Notts, 3 miles SE. of Worksop.

Clun, a Shropshire market-town, 6½ miles N. by E. of Knighton. Pop. of parish, 1900.

Clunes, a gold-mining township of Victoria, 97 miles NW. of Melbourne by rail.

Clunie, a Perthshire parish, 5½ miles W. by S. of Blairgowrie, with an isleted loch, and a castle associated with the 'Admirable' Crichton.

Clusium. See Chiusi.

Clwyd (Kloo'id), a river of north Wales, rises on Craig Bronbanog, in Denbighshire, and runs 30 miles to the Irish Sea, below Ruthin flowing through the fertile Vale of Clwyd, 24 miles long, and 2 to 7 wide.

Clyde (Welsh Clwyd, 'strong'), a world-famous river and firth of south-west Scotland. The river rises as Daer Water at an altitude of 1600 feet, and runs 106 miles northward and north-westward, round Tinto Hill (2335 feet), and past Lanark, Bothwell, Glasgow, and Renfrew, till at Dumbarton it merges in the firth. Its drainage area is 1481 sq. m., of which 111 belong to the South, North, and Rotten Calders, 127 to the Kelvin, 200 to the Black and White Carts, and 305 to the Leven and Loch Lomond. Tributaries higher up are Powtrail Water, Little Clydes Burn, Douglas Water, Medwyn Water, Mouse Water with its deep gorge through the Cartland Crags, and, near Hamilton, the Avon. In the four miles of its course near Lanark the river descends from 560 to 200 feet, and forms the four celebrated Falls of Clyde—Bonnington, Corra, Dundaff, and Stonebyres Linns, of which the finest, Corra, makes a triple leap of 84 feet. Above the falls the Clyde is a beautiful pure trout-stream, traversing pastoral uplands; below, it flows through a rich fertile valley, here broadening out into plain, there pent between bold wooded banks. But its waters become more and more sluggish, begrimed, and polluted, the nearer they get to Glasgow. Since 1765 much has been done towards rectifying and deepening the channel from Glasgow to Dumbarton, no less than 90,000,000 cubic yards of materials having been lifted by steam-dredgers during 1844–1913. The result has been that whereas 'a hundred years ago there was a depth at low-water of 15 inches,' now they have at Glasgow from 18 to 23 feet at low-water, and 28 to 33 at high-water; and that whereas even lighters could once 'not pass to and from Glasgow except it be in the time of flood or high-water at spring-tides,' now the Clyde from Glasgow downwards is navigable by the largest steamers afloat. In 1812 Henry Bell launched on the Clyde the first boat in Europe successfully propelled by steam; and since then the river's shipping and shipbuilding (the latter dating from about 1718) have both grown enormously.—The Firth, which some make begin at Glasgow (the highest point of the tide), and some not until Gourock, extends 12 miles westward and 52 southward, and broadens from 1 mile at Dumbarton to 1¾ at Dunoon, and 37 at Ailsa Craig. It sends off the Gareloch, Loch Long, Holy Loch, and the Kyles of Bute; contains the islands of Bute, Arran, and the two Cumbraes; is bordered along its ancient sea-margin with an almost continuous fringe of seaports and watering-places (Greenock, Rothesay, Ayr, &c.); and, like the last 14 miles of the river, is one of the world's chief commercial water-ways. See works by Deas (1881–87), Millar (1888), and Pollock (new ed. 1893).

Clydebank, a town of Dumbartonshire, on the right bank of the Clyde, 5½ miles NW. of Glasgow. It has great shipbuilding and sewing-machine works and docks. Pop. 37,500.

Clydesdale. See Clyde and Lanarkshire.

Clynder, a Dumbartonshire watering-place on the Gareloch.

Cnossus, Gnossos, or Knossos, anciently the chief town of Crete, said to have been built by Minos, where since 1900 very important excavations of the great palace have been made by Sir A. J. Evans and others. It stood N. of the centre, 3 miles from the sea.

Coahuila (Ko-a-wee'la), a state of Mexico, next to Texas; area, 64,000 sq. m.; pop. 368,000.

Coalbrookdale, in Shropshire, extends 8 miles along the Severn, rich in iron and lime.

Coalisland, a village of Tyrone, 5 miles NE. of Dungannon; pop. 900.

Coalville, an urban district of Leicestershire, 16 miles NW. of Leicester by rail; population, 18,600.

Coänza, Kwanza, or Quanza, a river of West Africa, rising in the east of the Portuguese territory, and after a generally NW. course, entering the Atlantic 30 miles S. of St Paul de Loando. It is navigable for light vessels as far as the Cambambe cataracts, over 120 miles.

Coast Range, a range of mountains nearly parallel to the Pacific Coast in California (q.v.).

Coatbridge, a thriving manufacturing town of Lanarkshire, since 1885 a municipal burgh, 9 miles E. of Glasgow by rail, and 32 W. by S. of Edinburgh. The centre of a great mineral district, it is surrounded by numerous blast-furnaces, and produces malleable iron, boilers, tubes, tin-plate, firebricks and tiles, and railway waggons. Coatbridge has grown very rapidly in size and prosperity—a growth largely due to the development of ironworks. Pop. 43,300.

Coats Land. See Antarctica.

Coatzacoalcos, a river of Mexico. At its mouth is Puerto Méjico (Coatzacoalcos), a seaport, the N. terminus of the Tehuantepec railway.

Cobalt, a mining-town of eastern Ontario, near Lake Temiskaming, 330 miles N. of Toronto by rail, is the centre of a very rich silver district, with nickel, cobalt, and some gold; pop. 6000.

Cobán (Ko-bâhn'), capital of the dep. of Vera Paz, in Guatemala, 85 miles N. of the town of Guatemala; pop. 31,000.

Cobham, (1) a village of Kent, 4 miles SSE. of Gravesend.—(2) A Surrey village, on the Mole, 6½ miles W. of Epsom; pop. of parish, 4000.

Cobija (Ko-bee'ha), a seaport of the Chilian province of Antofagasta, on a shallow, open bay.

Coblenz, or Koblenz (Kō-blentz), capital of Rhenish Prussia, 56 m. SSE. of Cologne by rail, at the junction of the Rhine and Moselle. It is very strongly fortified with a wall and a series of detached forts, including the almost impregnable castle of Ehrenbreitstein (q.v.), on the opposite side of the Rhine. Among the principal buildings are the church of St Castor (836), the oldest in the Rhine district; the Kaufhaus (1479); the Protestant Florins Kirche (12th century); the church of Our Lady (1250–1431); and the old Jesuit College, now a gymnasium. The extensive palace was built in 1778–86 by the last Elector of Trèves, and restored in 1845. The favourable position of Coblenz secures it an active commerce in wine, corn, mineral waters, &c. It manufactures Moselle wine, pianos, paper and cardboard goods, machinery, barges, cigars, japanned goods, and furniture. Pop. (1875) 29,290; (1910) 56,478. Coblenz (Fr. Coblence) was known to the Romans as Confluentes. From 1018 till 1796 it belonged to Trèves. In 1798 it was made the capital of the new French dep. Rhine and Moselle, and by the treaty of 1815 was given to Prussia.

Cobourg, a port of entry of Ontario, on Lake Ontario, 69 miles NE. of Toronto. It contains several woollen-mills, foundries, and breweries. Pop. 5000.

Coburg (Ko'boorg), capital of the duchy of Coburg, in the united duchy of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, is picturesquely situated on the left bank of the Itz, 81 m. SSE. of Eisenach by rail. The ducal palace (1549) is one of the principal buildings, others being the government buildings, the arsenal, containing a public library, the town-house, and the palace of the Duke of Edinburgh. The old castle of Coburg, mentioned in 1057, beside which Coburg originally grew up, is situated on an eminence 530 feet above the town. It afforded Luther a shelter during the Diet of Augsburg in 1530, and in 1632 successfully resisted a siege by Wallenstein. In 1782 it was converted into a prison, but in 1838 it was thoroughly restored. Luther's apartments are preserved as he used them. Coburg has manufactures of machinery, colours, woollens, cotton, marquetry, baskets, porcelain, furniture, and carriages, and exports beer. Pop. 24,000. Prince Albert, to whom a statue was erected in the market-place of Coburg by Queen Victoria in 1865, was born at Rosenau, a ducal seat 4 miles to the north.

Coburg Peninsula, the most northerly part of Australia to the west of the Gulf of Carpentaria, running out north-westward towards Melville Island.

Cocanada (Cocanah'da), a seaport and headquarters of Godavari district 315 miles N. of Madras; pop. 50,000.

Cochabamba, a central dep. of Bolivia, with offshoots of the Eastern Cordilleras, and extensive plateaus; area, 23,300 sq. m.; pop. 380,000. The capital, Cochabamba (8396 feet above the sea), on a tributary of the Guapay, was founded in 1565, as Ciudad de Oropesa; pop. 25,000.

Cochin, a native state of India, politically connected with Madras, between the British district of Malabar and the state of Travancore, with the Arabian Sea on the SW. Area, 1362 sq. m.; pop. 919,000. Cochin formed a treaty with the East India Company in 1798.

Cochin, once the capital of the above principality, but now a seaport of Malabar district, in the Madras presidency. In spite of a bar, it is next to Bombay on this coast for shipbuilding and maritime commerce. Here the Portuguese erected their first fort in India in 1503. They were supplanted by the Dutch in 1663; and in 1796 Cochin was captured by the British. Pop. 20,000. Half a mile south is a town of the same name, in the native state (pop. 20,000).

Cochin-China, a name for Annam (q.v.), is used specially for French Cochin-China, a part of French Indo-Chine, occupying the south extremity of the Indo-China peninsula, and bounded N. by Cambodia and Annam; area, 23,000 sq. m.; population, 3,000,000, chiefly Annamites, but comprising also Cambodians, Chinese, &c. Through nearly its whole extent Cochin-China is low and almost flat, but to the north and east rises into hills. It is watered in the west by two branches of the Mekong, the Han-giang and the Tien-giang. In the east the Dong-nai River flows from north-east to south-west, receiving the Saïgon River from the north-west. These and other rivers are all connected with one another by the innumerable arroyos and canals which intersect Cochin-China in all directions. The temperature rises in the dry season (October to April) to 95° F. by day and 62° by night, and in the wet season varies between 68° and 86°. The soil, mostly alluvial, is exceedingly fertile, producing the best rice in the world. Sugar-cane, tobacco, cotton, arachis, mulberry, indigo, maize, tea, betel, hemp, coffee, pepper, cardamoms, beans, sweet potatoes, coconuts, areca-nuts, and bananas are raised. Saïgon, the capital, is capital also of French Indo-China. Cape St Jacques is joined by telegraph to Singapore, Tonkin, and Hong-kong.

Cockburnspath, a Berwickshire village, 7 miles SE. of Dunbar.

Cockenzie, a Haddingtonshire fishing-village, 1 mile NE. of Prestonpans. Pop. 2400.

Cockermouth, a town of Cumberland, on the Derwent, 25 miles SW. of Carlisle, and 12 NW. of Keswick. A ruined castle crowns a bold height on the left bank of the Cocker, near its influx to the Derwent. It became Mary Stuart's prison in 1568, and in 1648 was dismantled by the parliamentarians. Wordsworth was born here in an old-fashioned house still standing. Till 1867 Cockermouth returned two members to parliament; till 1885 one. Pop. 5200.

Cockpen', a Midlothian parish, 7½ miles SE. of Edinburgh.

Cockthorpe, a Norfolk parish, 5 miles NE. of Walsingham. Sir Cloudesley Shovel was a native.

Cocos. See Keeling Islands.

Cod. See Cape Cod.

Codogno, a town of Northern Italy, 17 miles SE. of Lodi by rail. Pop. 10,000.

Cœle-Syria (See-leh; 'Hollow Syria'), now called El-Bukâ'a, 'the deep plain,' a valley of Syria, extending between the ranges of the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. It is 1706 feet above the sea, and is watered by the Orontes (now El-Asi). Above the valley stand the ruins of Baalbek.

Coggeshall, a town of Essex, on the Blackwater, 44 miles NE. of London. It has a school, founded by Sir Robert Hitcham (1636), remains of a Cistercian abbey (1142), a good Decorated church, and some manufactures of silk, velvet, and lace. It is supposed to have been the Roman Canonium. John Owen was minister here. Pop. 3000. See Beaumont's History of Coggeshall (1890).

Cognac (Kon-yak'), a town in the French dep. of Charente, on an old castle-crowned hill over the Charente, 42 miles SE. of Rochefort by rail. The cultivation of the vine and distillation of brandy, hence called Cognac, form the chief industry of the district. Francis I. was born here. Pop. 18,000.

Cohoes, a manufacturing city of Albany county, New York, on the Hudson, at the mouth of the Mohawk, 3 miles above Troy, and on the Erie Canal. It has cotton-mills, knitting-mills, and manufactures of axes, gas-piping, machines, &c. Pop. 25,000.

Coilsfield, or MONTGOMERIE, an Ayrshire estate near Tarbolton, with memories of Burns and Highland Mary.

Coimbatore (Co-im'ba-tore), a town of Madras Presidency, on the Noyil, 304 miles SW. of Madras by rail, and 1437 feet above the sea. Population, 55,000.

Coimbra (Co-im'bra), capital of the Portuguese province of Beira, on a hill above the Mondego, 135 m. NNE. of Lisbon by rail. It was the capital of Portugal for about two centuries and a half from its erection into a kingdom in 1139, and many of the early kings are buried in and around the old town. It has two cathedrals, and a university, the only one in Portugal, with over 1300 students. It was originally established at Lisbon in 1288, but was permanently transferred here in 1537. Pop. 21,000.

Coína, a town of Spain, 20 miles WSW. of Malaga; pop. 15,000.

Coire. See CHUR.

Cojutepeque (Ko-hoo-te-pay'kay), a town of San Salvador, Central America, 15 miles E. of the capital. Pop. 10,000.

Colberg, or KOLBERG, a seaport and watering-place of Prussia, in Pomerania, on the Persante, near its mouth in the Baltic, 170 miles NNE. of Berlin by rail. It manufactures woollens, agricultural machines, and spirits. Pop. 25,000.

Colchester, an ancient municipal and parliamentary borough in the NE. of Essex, on the right bank of the Colne, 51 miles NE. of London, and 12 miles from the sea. It is built on the ridge and sides of a promontory, with a port on the river at a suburb called the Hythe, which has a quay for vessels of 150 tons. It is a town of special historical and antiquarian interest. Before the Roman conquest of the island it was the British 'Royal Town' of Cunobelin (the Cymbeline of Shakespeare); and here the Emperor Claudius founded a colonia—the first Roman town in Britain. There are still many remains of that town. The walls are the most perfect Roman walls in England. Immense quantities of pavements, coins, pottery, and other remains of domestic use and personal adornment have been found here. The tower of Holy Trinity Church has all the characteristics of Saxon architecture. The castle, homing a very interesting museum, is the largest Norman keep in England. In the Norman west front of St Botolph's Priory the Roman bricks are a striking feature; and all the old churches have an intermixture of Roman brick in their walls. The Protestant refugees from the Low Countries at the end of the 16th century introduced the baize and serge trade, which became an important manufacture, and spread into the neighbouring towns and villages. Colchester was one of the eight 'Dutch Congregations' incorporated by royal license. The wars with Spain in the reign of Queen Anne closed the markets for these goods, and the trade died out. A chief historical event was the siege and capture of the town by the parliamentarians (1648). Colchester now is a large military depot; and the fishery of the Colne and its creeks has for centuries been famous for the quality of its oysters. Colchester returns one member. Pop. 43,500. See the Rev. E. Cutts's Colchester ('Historic Towns' series, 1888).

Coldingham, a Berwickshire village, 46 miles ESE. of Edinburgh, with remains of an Augustinian priory (1098); pop. 500.

Coldstream, a Berwickshire town, 15 miles SW. of Berwick by rail, on the Tweed, with a fine bridge by Smeaton (1766); pop. 1400.

Coleford, in Gloucestershire, 4 miles ESE. of Monmouth; pop. 2600.—Also a town of Somerset, 6 miles NW. of Frome; pop. 1500.

Colenso, a small town of Natal, on the Tugela, 15 miles S. of Ladysmith, where on 15th Dec. 1899 Buller was defeated by the Boers.

Coleorton, Leicestershire, 3 miles E. by N. of Ashby-de-la-Zouch, the seat of Sir George Beaumont, connoisseur and art-patron. See Knight's Memorials of Coleorton (2 vols. 1887).

Coleraine, a river-port in County Londonderry, on the Bann, 4 miles from its mouth, 33 by rail NE. of Londonderry. It has manufactures of fine linens, pork-curing, distilling, and important river fisheries. Until 1885 Coleraine returned a member to parliament. Population, 7800.

Coleroon, the largest and most northerly branch from the Kaveri, flows 94 miles to the Bay of Bengal.

Colesberg, a town of the Cape Province, 142 miles by rail SW. of Bloemfontein. It was the scene of active operations during the war, 1899–1902. Pop. about 2700.

Coleshill, a Warwickshire market-town, 10 miles ENE. of Birmingham; pop. of parish, 3000.

Colima (Ko-lee'ma), a Pacific Mexican state, with an area of 2300 sq. m., and a population of 78,000. The capital is Colima, 1450 feet above the sea, and 40 miles ENE. of the port of Manzanillo; pop. 25,000. Beyond the state frontier, about 35 miles NE. of the capital, rises the volcano of Colima (12,750 feet), which burst out in June 1869.

Colinsburgh, a Fife village, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile N. by W. of Kilconquhar station. It was founded about 1718 by Colin, Earl of Balcarres. Pop. 320.

Colinton, a Midlothian village, on the Water of Leith, 4 miles SW. of Edinburgh; pop. 1200.

Coll, one of the Argyllshire Hebrides, 16 miles W. of Tobermory in Mull. It is 13 miles long, 1 to $3\frac{1}{2}$ broad, 326 feet high, and 30 sq. m. in area. Pop. 400.

Col'lé, a cathedral city of Italy, on the Elsa, 24 miles SSW. of Florence; pop. 2000.

Collingwood, a town of Ontario, on the south shore of Georgian Bay. It has factories, ship-yards, and grain-elevators, and a considerable trade in lumber and grain. Pop. 7000.—Another Collingwood is a suburb of Melbourne (q.v.).

Collumpton. See CULLOMPTON.

Colmar, the capital of the German district of Upper Alsace, on a plain near the Vosges, 42 miles SSW. of Strasburg. It is one of the chief seats of the cotton industry in Alsace, other manufactures being paper, leather, ribbons, and hosiery. Colmar is an old place, having been raised to the rank of a free imperial city in 1226. Fortified in 1552, its fortifications were razed in 1673 by Louis XIV. Pleasant boulevards now occupy their place. Colmar was formally ceded to France in 1697, but was recovered by Germany in 1871. Pop. 44,000.

Colne, a town of East Lancashire, on a high ridge near the source of the Calder, a western branch of the Ribble, 26 miles N. of Manchester. It manufactures cotton calicoes and mousselines-de-laine. Pop. 26,000.

Colney Hatch, a village of Middlesex, 6½ miles N. of London, with a great lunatic asylum, opened in 1851.

Cologne (Ger. Köln, Cöln), a city and port on the left bank of the Rhine, 362 miles by rail WSW. of Berlin, 175 SE. of Rotterdam, 149 E. of Brussels, and 302 NE. of Paris. Formerly an independent city of the German empire, it is now the most important town of Rhenish Prussia; a fortress of the first rank, forming a semicircle along the Rhine, and connected with the town of Deutz on the opposite bank by a bridge of boats, and an iron bridge, 1362 feet long, for railway and carriage traffic. Pop. (1871) 129,233; (1910) 516,527. The old streets are mostly narrow and crooked; but the area freed by the removal of the ancient fortifications was purchased in 1882 by the corporation for about £600,000; its most prominent feature is the handsome 'Ringstrasse' or boulevard, nowhere less than 60 feet wide, which encircles the entire old town. The new fortifications include a number of detached forts, planted round Cologne and Deutz, within a radius of about 4 miles from the cathedral. The church of St Maria im Capitol was consecrated in 1049; in St Ursula are preserved the bones of the 11,000 virgins. The cathedral is one of the noblest specimens of Gothic architecture in Europe. Traditionally founded by Archbishop Hildebold, during Charlemagne's reign in 814, and gifted by Frederic Barbarossa in 1162 with the bones of the three Magi, it was rebuilt after burning in 1248. The choir was consecrated in 1322; and the work was carried on till 1509, when it was suspended; but the work of renovation began in 1823, and in 1842 the foundation-stone of the new part was laid. The naves, aisles, and transepts were opened in 1848; the magnificent south portal was completed in 1859; in 1860 the iron central flèche was added; and the western spires, the crown of the edifice, were finished in 1880. The church measures 440 feet in length, and 240 in breadth; the spires rise 515 feet. The great bell, the 'Kaiserglocke' (1887), made of French cannon, weighs over 26 tons. Among secular buildings are the 14th-century town-house; the noble Gothic Gürzenich (1441–52), a banqueting-hall, now containing the exchange; the modern law-courts; and the Wallraf-Richartz Museum, with a good collection of paintings. The situation of Cologne is extremely favourable for commerce; and the manufactures include the making of eau-de-Cologne, beet-sugar, tobacco, glue, carpets, soap, leather, furniture, pianos, chemicals, and spirits of wine. The city was founded by the Ubii, about 37 B.C., and was at first called Ubiorum oppidum; but a colony being planted here in 50 A.D. by Agrippina, the wife of the Emperor Claudius, it received the name of Colonia Agrippina. It entered the league of the Hanse towns in 1201, and contended with Lübeck for the first rank. Cologne was at a very early period the seat of a bishopric, elevated at the end of the 8th century into an archbishopric, whose holders took their place amongst the princes and electors of the empire. The archbishopric was secularised in 1801, when the city also lost its independence, and the Congress of Vienna assigned the whole territories to Prussia.

Colombia, a republic occupying the north-west corner of the South American continent, and till 1903, when Panamá (q.v.) became independent, including also the Isthmus of Panamá. Its area is estimated at about 500,000 sq. miles (nearly as large as Great Britain, France, and Spain together). The population amounts to about 4,000,000, including some 200,000 uncivilised Indians in the remote forests. The situation of Colombia, washed by two oceans, with a coast-line of nearly 3000 miles, and many good harbours, is very favourable to commerce. The surface of the country is extremely varied, with lofty mountains in the west, and vast plains in the east scarcely above the level of the sea. For the mountain system, which spreads out in three great ranges, like the rays of a fan, see ANDES. From the Central Cordillera descend the two principal rivers of Colombia, the Magdalena and its tributary the Cauca, which flow north into the Caribbean Sea, besides several affluents of the Amazon in the east, and the Patía, which forces its way to the Pacific through a gorge between cliffs 10,000 to 12,000 feet high. The Eastern Cordillera, by far the largest chain, consists of a series of extensive tablelands, cool and healthy, and is the most thickly populated portion of the republic; on one of its plateaus, at an elevation of 8694 feet, stands the capital, Bogotá (q.v.). Eastward from this Cordillera stretch vast llaños or plains, through which flow many tributaries of the Orinoco. Other rivers are the San Juan (navigable 150 miles), on the Pacific coast, and the Atrato and Zulia flowing north. In the course of one day's journey, the traveller may experience in this country all the climates of the world; perpetual snows cover the summits of the Cordilleras, while the valleys are smothered in the rich vegetation of the tropics. The climate of Panamá is notoriously unwholesome, and in some parts of Bolívar and Magdalena marsh fevers abound. The hot region, extending to an elevation of about 3200 feet, produces in abundance rice, cacao, sugar-cane, bananas, yams, tobacco, indigo, cotton, caoutchouc, vegetable ivory, medicinal plants, resins, and dyewoods. In the temperate zone, from 3200 to 8500 feet above the sea, the coffee plant, the fig, and the cinchona-tree flourish. The wax-palm extends beyond this region, and is found at a height of nearly 11,000 feet, and large crops of potatoes, grain, and leguminous plants are raised in the cold region; but from 10,000 feet rises the bleak páramo, with its scanty vegetation, ending in lichens at the snow-line. The fauna of Colombia is very varied, including the condor, capybara, tapir, armadillo, sloth, seventeen kinds of monkeys, jaguar, puma, ocelot, margay, and bear. The boa and numerous other snakes are common, alligators swarm in the rivers. Enormous herds of cattle are found throughout the temperate zone. In minerals the country is exceedingly rich, although the mines have been little wrought, owing to the lack of roads. Yet from the dep. of Antioquia alone over £400,000 worth of gold is annually exported. The former dep. of Tolima is rich in silver. Iron, copper, lead, platinum, coal, sulphur, zinc, antimony, arsenic, cinnabar, rock-salt, crystal, granite, marble, lime, gypsum, jet, amethysts, rubies, emeralds, porphyry, and jasper are also found.

The only industries common to all the deps. of Colombia are agriculture and the rearing of cattle. Coarse cloths, soap, and candles are manufactured; and the so-called Panamá straw-hats are exported. The transit trade across the Isthmus of Panamá (q.v.), which was formerly very important, was lost to the republic in 1903, when Panamá became a separate state. The foreign trade proper is mainly with Great Britain and the United States. The imports are mostly food-stuffs, textiles, machinery, and ironwares; the exports, coffee, gold, silver, and other ores, caoutchouc, ivory-nuts, divi-divi pods (for tanning), tobacco, cacao, cotton, cinchona, cattle, balsams, timber and dyewoods, hides and wool. At the beginning of the 20th century the annual value of exports was $20,000,000, and of imports $19,000,000. Of the export trade 27 per cent. goes to the United States, and 25 per cent. to Britain. The revenue for the usual biennial periods averages about $29,000,000, and the expenditure about $40,000,000, showing a serious deficit. The internal debt amounts to about $11,350,000. The foreign debt, mostly to Britain, was cut down in 1897, by arrangement, to $13,122,000, but even so the interest fell steadily into arrears. There are 600 miles of railway in Colombia, and over 10,000 miles of telegraph.

The population is mainly descended from the numerous Indian tribes, partly Hispanicised in language and habits. The chief aborigines of the country, the Chibchas or Muyscas, inhabiting the plateau of Bogotá, were a comparatively civilised race at the discovery of the New World. Part of the viceroyalty of New Granada, Colombia won its independence from Spain in 1810–1819, under Bolívar. The republic originally included Venezuela and Ecuador. The pure whites form about a fifth of the population, the Indian half-breeds more than half; mulattoes and zambos, resulting respectively from the union of negroes with whites and Indians, exceed a sixth. Slavery was finally abolished in 1852, and in 1870 a system of compulsory education was adopted. The state church is Roman Catholic, but toleration guaranteed. See a book by P. J. Eder (1913).

Colombo (Kalan-totta, 'the Kalany ferry'), the capital of Ceylon, is situated on the western side of the island. Since the construction of the great breakwater begun in 1875, the harbour has been greatly improved, especially by works in 1894–1906; trade has of late years vastly increased, Colombo having superseded Galle. It is the seat of an Anglican bishop, and is an important missionary centre. Colpetty, a beautiful suburb, shaded by groves of the cocoa-nut palm, is a favourite retreat. Lord Napier of Magdala was born here. The Portuguese, who fortified the place in 1517, altered its older name Kalambu, in honour of Columbus. The Dutch succeeded to the Portuguese, and to the Dutch the British in 1796. Pop. (1871) 100,238; (1911) 185,704.

Colon′. See ASPINWALL.

Colonia, a dep. of Uruguay, on the Plata, below the Uruguay River. Area, 2200 sq. m.; population, 70,000. The capital, Colonia del Sacramento, on the Plata, 100 miles above Monte Video, has a good harbour, a dock for vessels of 1000 tons, and 1500 inhabitants.

Colonna, CAPE (anc. Sunium Promontorium), a Greek headland, the southmost point of Attica, crowned by a temple of Minerva, thirteen of whose white marble columns (whence the modern name) are still standing.

Colonsay and Oronsay, two of the Argyllshire Hebrides, 16 miles NNW. of Port Askaig in Islay, separated from each other by a sound, 100 yards wide, and dry at low-water. Colonsay, which rises to a height of 493 feet, is 16 sq. m. in area; Oronsay, only 3. On the latter are a sculptured cross and a 14th-century Austin priory; whilst in the former are standing-stones, a bone cave, Colonsay House (1772), and an obelisk to the lawyer, Duncan M'Neill, Lord Colonsay (1794–1874). Population, 270, of whom nearly all are in Colonsay.

Colorado (Co-lo-rah′do; Span. 'reddish'), a remarkable river of North America, formed in 39° 17′ N. lat., 109° 50′ W. long., by the union of the Grand and Green rivers, rising, one in Colorado state, the other in Wyoming. Below the junction, the main affluent in Utah is the San Juan, and in Arizona the Colorado Chiquito or Flax River, the Bill Williams, and the Rio Gila, all from the left. The only important affluent the Colorado receives from the right is the Rio Virgen. From the junction of the Grand and Green, the general course of the stream is to the south-west, through the southern part of Utah and the north-west of Arizona; and it afterwards separates Arizona from Nevada and California. The lower part of its course is in Mexican territory, where it flows into the north extremity of the Gulf of California. The most striking features of the Colorado basin are its dryness, and the deeply channelled surface of the greater part of the country. Almost every stream and watercourse, and most of all the Colorado itself, has cut its way through stratum after stratum of rock, until now it flows, in a great part of its course, at the bottom of a deep trench or cañon. For nearly 400 miles below the mouth of the Colorado Chiquito, the main stream thus makes its way through a great plateau, forming what is called the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, one of the most remarkable ravines in the world. The cañon-walls throughout the upper part of the great cañon are from 4000 to 7000 feet in height, and are often nearly perpendicular. This over-drained river basin has an area of 240,000 sq. m. The whole course of the river below the junction is about 900 miles; to its remotest sources it is 2000 miles. Navigation, though much impeded by rocks and sand-bars, is possible for light-draught steamers for over 600 miles. See Powell's Canyons of the Colorado (1893), Dutton's book on the geology, and Dellenbaugh's Romance of the Colorado (1903).

COLORADO RIVER OF TEXAS rises by many head-streams in north-west Texas, winds 900 miles south-eastward, and discharges its waters by two main outlets into Matagorda Bay. It is little used for navigation. Its valley is fairly fertile and supplied with timber.

Colorado, a state of the American Union, in 37°–41° N. lat., and 102°–109° W. long., traversed from north to south by ranges of the Rocky Mountains. It takes its name from the river Colorado, to the basin of which all the western slope of the state belongs, as the eastern does to the Mississippi valley; while part of the south is drained by the Rio Grande and its head-streams. The area is 103,645 sq. m., or rather more than half that of France, Colorado being seventh of the states in size. The high plains and over-drained mesas to the west are not clearly marked off from the mountain-region; and much of the western slope is actually mountainous. The eastern slope, which embraces about two-fifths of the whole state, is, apart from the foot-hills skirting the flank of the mountain-region, an open and comparatively treeless plain, with a surface singularly monotonous, and for the most part devoted to the pasturage of cattle and sheep. This level region averages 5000 feet in altitude, and its lowest point is 3000 feet above sea-level. The mountain region contains more than a hundred peaks exceeding 13,000 feet, the loftiest being Blanca Peak (14,464 feet). Six passes cross mountain-ranges at points over 12,000 feet high; the Argentine Pass is 13,000 feet in altitude. Railways are led across many of these passes. A marked feature of the mountain-region is presented in the parks, or rich mountain-valleys, often very spacious, and generally bearing evidence of being the dried basins of lakes. The central mountain-region, with its parks, cañons, and hot springs, and its rich mineral deposits, has attracted most attention; the western part of the state is far less accessible and less developed. The rainfall is small; but a good many important streams take their rise in the state, including several tributaries of the Colorado; the Arkansas and South-Platte, flowing to the Mississippi; and the Rio Grande. Extensive and important irrigation-works are fed by some of these streams. From the dryness of the air, Colorado has a great reputation as a health-resort. The medicinal and thermal springs are numerous. A disease called 'mountain fever' is endemic in some places. Agriculture is remunerative in all sections where irrigation can be effected. Insect-plagues, including the Colorado potato-beetle, have proved very destructive; the Rocky-mountain locust has of late been comparatively harmless.

The discovery of gold (1858) in the neighbourhood of Pike's Peak led to the first important settlements in this region. Since 1873 the silver production has far exceeded that of gold, and the state took rank as the first in out-turn of silver, second or third in its gold, and first or second in the production of the precious metals in general. The depreciation of silver and the currency legislation of 1893 led to the closing of some of the silver-mines, and on the other hand a development of gold-mining took place, so that from 1897 Colorado was the chief gold-producing state of the Union, and from 1900 onwards produced annually twice as much as California. In the working of the silver ores much lead is obtained. There are great beds of coal. Iron and Bessemer steel rails are among the manufactures; copper, cement, fireclay, and manganese are wrought; and there are thirty petroleum wells near Florence. Not quite one-half of this region was acquired by the United States from France in 1804; the remainder was ceded by Mexico in 1848. The southern part has a small Spanish-speaking population, partially of Indian descent. Colorado was organised as a territory in 1861, and was admitted as a state in 1876. The principal towns are Denver, the capital (106,713), and Pueblo (24,558). Pop. of Colorado (1860) 34,277; (1870) 39,864; (1880) 194,327; (1885) 243,910; (1890) 412,198; (1900) 539,700; (1910) 799,024.

Colorado Springs, a popular summer-resort of Colorado, situated on the Fontaine qui Bouille Creek, 75 miles S. of Denver by rail; population, 29,000.

Columbia, the name of nearly thirty places in the United States, of which the most important are: (1) The capital of South Carolina, at the head of navigation on the Congaree River, 130 miles NNW. of Charleston by rail. It has a fine granite state-house ($3,000,000), a Presbyterian theological seminary, and the university of South Carolina (1806). Pop. (1880) 10,036; (1910) 26,319. —(2) A borough of Pennsylvania, on the Susquehanna, 80 miles W. of Philadelphia, with iron-furnaces and rolling-mills, and manufactures of machinery, flour, &c. Pop. 12,000.—(3) The capital of Maury county, Tennessee, on the Duck River, 45 miles SSW. of Nashville by rail, with manufactures of ploughs, furniture, and flour. Pop. 6000.—(4) The capital of Boone county, Missouri, 24 miles E. of Boonville, with manufactures of flour, tobacco, and woollens, and with the state university (1840). Pop. 10,000.

Columbia, or OREGON, after the Yukon the largest river on the west side of America, rises in British Columbia, on the west slope of the Rocky Mountains, near Mounts Brown and Hooker, in about 50° N. lat., has a very irregular course, generally south-west, through Washington, forms the northern boundary of Oregon for about 350 miles, and enters the Pacific by an estuary 35 miles long and from 3 to 7 wide. Its estimated length is 1400 miles; its chief affluents Clarke's Fork and the Snake River (with very remarkable cañons). Difficulties of navigation offered by a surf-beaten bar, and by falls and rapids, were grappled with in 1913, and the deepening of the river, already much used by steamships for 500 miles, undertaken. The extraordinarily abundant salmon-fisheries of the Columbia have been largely developed; and there are many canneries, mostly near the mouth of the river.

Columbia, BRITISH, is a province of the Dominion of Canada, bounded on the N. by Yukon and the North-west Territories (beyond the 60th parallel of latitude); on the S. by the United States; on the W. by the Pacific Ocean and part of Alaska; and on the E. by the province of Alberta. Its area is 355,855 sq. m., including Vancouver Island (14,000 sq. m.) and Queen Charlotte Islands (5100 sq. m.), 200 miles NW. of Vancouver Island. British Columbia was practically under the control of the Hudson Bay Company until 1858, when, owing to the discovery of gold, it was made a crown colony. Vancouver Island was united with it in 1866, and the province joined the Canadian Confederation in 1871. The scenery is rugged and picturesque. Between the western slopes of the Rocky Mountains (highest peaks, Mount Brown, 16,000 feet, and Mount Hooker, 15,700 feet) and the sea the area is largely occupied by spurs and outlying groups of that chain. Near the coast these form the Cascade Range. Of the rivers the most important is the Fraser, 800 miles long, and 600 yards wide at its principal outlet in the Gulf of Georgia. Of the Columbia only the upper portion is within the province. Many varieties of climate are found. That of Vancouver Island and the coast of the mainland is very similar to that of the south of England. The interior is divided as to climate into three zones—the south, the middle, and the north. In 1881 the population was 49,459, and in 1901, 190,000, including about 25,000 Indians and 10,000 Chinese, and in 1911 392,480. Towns on Vancouver Island are Victoria, the capital (pop. 32,000), and Nanaimo; on the mainland there are New Westminster, formerly the capital; Vancouver (100,000), terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and Prince Rupert, terminus of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The province has a lieutenant-governor, appointed and paid by the Dominion, and a Legislative Assembly, elected by the inhabitants.

The province is not likely to become an agricultural country, but there is a considerable area of land available for arable and pastoral farming both on Vancouver Island and on the mainland in the river-valleys. The rich valley of the lower Fraser, or New Westminster district, is the largest compact agricultural area on the mainland. Of the total area (say 250,000,000 acres) only about 900,000 acres are as yet occupied. The fruit-growing industry is still in its infancy. The principal industries of the province are connected with the mines, the fisheries, and the forests. The minerals form one of its chief resources. Gold, coal, silver, iron, copper, galena, mercury, platinum, antimony, bismuth, molybdenum, plumbago, mica, and other minerals have been discovered in different parts, copper being very widely distributed. The quartz-mines have been little drawn on; most of the metal secured has come from the alluvial deposits. Coal and lignite exist in many parts of the mainland. At Nanaimo, on Vancouver Island, there is a large coalfield, and an extensive export, largely to the United States. Excepting the salmon-fishery, the rich fisheries have not yet been developed. The fur-sealing industry in the Pacific is also valuable. But little timber has yet been cut, notwithstanding the immense forests of magnificent trees that abound. Until the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1885, British Columbia was isolated from the rest of the Dominion. A second transcontinental railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific, crosses the north of the province to Prince Rupert. British Columbia occupies a favourable position in regard to the markets of the west of South America and Australasia. Lines of steamers connect Vancouver with Hong-kong and Australian ports. The telegraph cable to Australia was completed in 1902. The Alaska boundary dispute was settled in 1903. See works by Pemberton, Rattray, Macdonald, Macfie, Leonard (1860–70), H. H. Bancroft (1887), Lees and Clutterbuck (1888), Begg (1896), and Baillie-Grohman (1900).

Columbus, the capital of the state of Ohio, on the Scioto River, 116 miles NE. of Cincinnati and 138 SSW. of Cleveland. In a central square of 10 acres stands the state capitol, a fine structure 304 feet by 184. Other edifices are the city-hall, with a public library; a court-house; U.S. government and Board of Trade buildings; a large state penitentiary; a hospital for the insane; and institutions for the blind, the deaf and dumb, &c. Here also are the Ohio State University and the Capital University (Lutheran). The town suffered severely from floods in 1913. Railways radiate in all directions, which, added to the natural advantage of proximity to the great coal and iron fields of the state, tend to a rapid development of the manufacturing industries. Columbus was founded in 1812. Pop. (1870) 31,274; (1880) 51,647; (1890) 88,150 ; (1910) 181,548.

Columbus is also the name of some twenty other places in the United States, the most important being: (1) Capital of Muscogee county, Georgia, on the Chattahoochee River, 100 miles SSW. of Atlanta. It has a large trade in cotton, and extensive manufactures of cotton, woollen, and iron goods. Pop. without suburbs, 20,000.—(2) Capital of Bartholomew county, Indiana, 41 miles S. by E. of Indianapolis; pop. 9000.—(3) Capital of Lowndes county, Mississippi, on the Tombigbee River, 150 miles NE. of Jackson; pop. 9000.—(4) Capital of Colorado county, Texas, on the Colorado River, 95 miles SSE. of Austin by rail.

Colwyn Bay, a beautiful watering-place of Denbighshire, 6 miles W. of Abergele; pop. of urban district, 12,600.

Colyton, a Devon market-town, on the Coly (a feeder of the Axe), 4½ miles SW. of Axminster; pop. of parish, 2000.

Comacchio (Co-mak′ki-o), a walled cathedral city of Italy, 30 miles ESE. of Ferrara, on an island in a shallow lagoon; pop. 10,000.

Comaya′gua, a city of Honduras, Central America, on the Rio Humuya, 190 miles E. of Guatemala. Founded in 1540, it has a handsome cathedral. Pop. 10,000.

Combaconum (Kumbhakonam), one of the oldest and most sacred cities of southern India, in the centre of the richest part of the Kaveri delta, 193 miles SW. of Madras by rail, with Hindu temples, a government college, &c. Population, above 60,000.

Combe-Florey, a Somerset parish, 5 miles NE. of Wiveliscombe. Sydney Smith was rector.

Combemartin, a Devon coast-village, 4 miles E. of Ilfracombe; pop. of parish, 1700.

Comber, a market-town of Devon, on the river Comber, 8 miles SE. of Belfast; pop. 2600.

Comines (Comeen′), a town on the borders of Belgium and France, 15 miles SW. of Courtrai by rail, divided by the Lys into two parts, of which that on the left (pop. 7000) belongs to Belgium; the other, on the right (pop. 6000), to France.

Comiso, a town of Sicily, 37 miles WSW. of Syracuse; pop. 20,000.

Commentrey, a town in the French dep. of Allier, 211 miles S. of Paris by rail, with collieries and ironworks; pop. 7000.

Commondyke, an Ayrshire collier-village, 3 miles NNE. of Cumnock.

Como, a walled city of Lombardy, Northern Italy, at the south-west extremity of the Lake of Como, 30 miles N. of Milan by rail. It lies in a valley, surrounded by hills, clad with luxuriant gardens, olive plantations, and orange groves, with here and there an old ruin cropping out. Among the principal buildings of Como are the cathedral (1396–1732), and the marble 13th-century town-hall. The chief articles of manufacture are silk, satin, gloves, and soap. Pop. 44,000. Como, the ancient Comum, was the birthplace of Cæcilius Statius, the two Plinys, several popes, and the physicist Volta.

The Lake of Como (Ital. Lago di Como, or Il Lario, anc. Larius Lacus), a lake of Northern Italy, lying at the foot of the Bernine Alps, and formed by an expansion of the Adda, which enters it at its north, and issues at its south-eastern extremity. Its total length is 30 miles; but midway the promontory of Bellaggio divides it into two branches, the shorter of which is called the Lago di Lecco. The greatest breadth is 2½ miles. It is 663 feet above sea-level, has a mean depth of 870, and a maximum of 1352 feet. The beauty of the surrounding scenery and the salubrity of the climate have made the Lake of Como the most resorted to in Italy, its shores being everywhere studded with noble villas. See Lund, Como and the Italian Lakes (1887).

Comorin′, Cape (Kumári), the most southerly extremity of the peninsula of India, in 8° 4′ 20″ N., and 77° 35′ 35″ E.

Co′moro Isles, a group belonging since 1886 to France, in the Mozambique Channel, since 1908 part of the colony of Madagascar; area, 761 sq. m.; pop. 90,000. Of volcanic origin, and mountainous, attaining 8400 feet, they are four in number—Great Comoro or Angaziya, Anjouan or Johanna, Mohilla, and Mayotta; the last has been French since 1841. In all, the blood of the natives is partly Arab, partly Malagasy.

Compiègne (Com-pee-eñ'), a town in the French dep. of Oise, on the river Oise, a little below its junction with the Aisne, 52 miles NNE. of Paris by rail. It has three interesting churches, a Gothic hôtel-de-ville with a fine belfry, and a palace, rebuilt by Louis XV., and splendidly fitted up by Napoleon. The beautiful Forest of Compiègne, 30,000 acres in area, was a favourite hunting-ground of the kings of France. The manufactures include canvas, cordage, and sugar. Population, about 14,000. It was at the siege of Compiègne, in 1430, that the Maid of Orleans was captured; and here, in 1810, Napoleon first met Maria Louisa of Austria.

Compostella. See SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELLA.

Compstone, the ruined castle (traditionally) of the poet, Alexander Montgomerie, on Tarf Water, 2¼ miles N. by W. of Kirkcudbright.

Compton Castle, Devon, 4 miles W. of Torquay, a fine old fortified house.

Comrie, a pleasant, sheltered village of Perthshire, on the Earn, 7 miles W. of Crieff by rail (1893), often disturbed by earthquakes, notably in 1839 and 1876. Pop. 1000.

Comstock. See VIRGINIA CITY.

Cona, an Argyllshire stream, flowing 9½ miles eastward to Loch Linnhe. See also GLENCOE.

Conacry, or KONAKRY, a town on the small Tombo island (9° 50′ N. lat.), capital of French Guinea, an important seaport and terminus of a railway to the Niger; pop. 25,000.

Concarneau (Con^{g}câhr-no'), a fishing-village of Brittany, on the east coast of Finistère, 15 miles by rail SE. of Quimper; pop. 8000.

Concepcion, (1) a province of Chili, stretching from the Andes to the coast north of Arauco; area, 3535 sq. m.; population, 230,000.—CONCEPCION, the capital, near the mouth of the Biobio, is a regular and handsome town, with a fine cathedral. Its port, Talcahuano, on Concepcion Bay, is the safest and best harbour in all Chili. Pop. 60,000.—(2) CONCEPCION DEL URUGUAY, the former capital of the Argentine province of Entre Rios, on the Uruguay, 180 miles SE. of Paraná by the Entre Rios Railway; pop. 10,000.—(3) CONCEPCION, a town of Paraguay, on the Paraguay River, 260 miles above Asuncion; pop. 4000; or 15,000 with the surrounding districts.—(4) The name of several places in Bolivia, the largest CONCEPCION DE APOLOBAMBA, capital of Caupolican, in the province of Beni, formerly a Franciscan mission.—(5) CONCEPCION, a town of Mexico, 50 miles W. of Chihuahua, in the upper Yaqui valley.—(6) CONCEPCION DE LA VEGA, a town of San Domingo, 5 miles SE. of Santiago; pop. 9000.

Concord, (1) a town of Massachusetts, 23 miles by rail NW. of Boston. As early as 1767 the people of Concord opposed the British government, and in the revolutionary skirmish here on the 19th April 1775, 'the embattled farmers stood and fired the shot heard round the world.' The place was the home of Emerson, Hawthorne, and Thoreau, and the Alcotts. In the Old Manse Emerson was born, and in it Hawthorne wrote his 'Mosses from an Old Manse.' Pop. 6400. See Bartlett's Concord (1880).—(2) Capital of New Hampshire, U.S., on the Merrimac River, 73 miles NNW. of Boston by rail. It has a fine granite state-house, celebrated quarries of white granite, and, with abundant water-power, manufactures of cotton, woollens, leather, &c. Population, 25,000.

Concordia, a river-port of the Argentine state of Entre Rios, on the Uruguay, 302 miles N. of Buenos Aires by river; pop. 14,000.

Condamine, a headstream of the Darling (q.v.).

Condé-sur-l'Escaut (Con^{g}day-sür-l'Esco'), a fortified town in the French dep. of Nord, at the confluence of the Haine and Scheldt, 7 miles NNE. of Valenciennes by rail; pop. 5000.

Condé-sur-Noireau (Con^{g}day-sür-Nwahro'), a French town in the dep. of Calvados, 23 miles SSW. of Caen; pop. 5000.

Condom (Con^{g}don^{g}'), a town in the dep. of Gers, on a height above the confluence of the Baise and the Gèle, 20 miles SW. of Agen by rail; pop. 6000.

Conegliano (Con-el-yâh'no), a picturesque town of Italy, 31 miles NE. of Venice by rail; pop. 6000.

Coney Island, barely separated from the south-west angle of Long Island, at the entrance to New York harbour, is a narrow strip of sand, 5 miles long, by ½ mile broad, with a fine beach. It is a crowded place of summer resort, with huge bathing pavilions, a tubular iron pier (1000 feet), a look-out tower (300 feet), and the Brooklyn seaside home for poor invalid children.

Congleton, a market-town and ancient municipal borough in the east of Cheshire, picturesquely situated in a deep valley on the banks of the Dane, an affluent of the Weaver, 26 miles S. of Manchester. It has a handsome town-hall (1866), a market-house (1882), manufactures of silk, and neighbouring coal-mines. Population, 11,000.

Congo, the great equatorial river of Central Africa, in respect of its basin the second largest river of the world, has its reservoir in Lake Bangweolo, of which the Chambezi is the largest feeder, and into which also flow numerous streams from the Lokinga Mountains on the south. From Bangweolo the great river issues under the name of the Luapula; and flowing in a northerly direction, it expands into Lake Moero, on leaving which it is called, as far as Nyangwe, the Lualaba. From Nyangwe to Stanley Falls, Stanley christened it the Livingstone; and from Stanley Falls to the mouth it is known by the name of the Congo.

Its length has been calculated variously at a little under and a little over 3000 miles; it drains an area of more than 1,300,000 sq. m.; and it discharges a body of water into the ocean second only to the Amazon. Such is the power and force of this mighty stream that no delta exists at its mouth. Vessels take in fresh water at its entrance into the sea. The two largest tributaries of the Congo are the Kassai from the south, explored (1885) by Wissmann; and the Mobangi, from the north, explored (1884–85) by Grenfell, and afterwards by Vangele. Other tributaries are the Kwa or Kwango, the Juapa and Bosira, the Ikelemba, the Lulongo, and the Lumami rivers on the south or left bank; and the Aruwimi, the Mbura, the Loika, the Ngala, the Lokinga Nkundji, &c., on the north or right bank. As regards commerce and navigation, the Congo may be divided into three parts—Lower, Middle, and Upper. The lower region extends from Banana at the mouth to the foot of the first rapids, 110 miles, navigable by ocean steamers drawing 18 feet. The middle or cataract region extends from Vivi to Stanley Pool, 235 miles, navigable for 70 miles by small steamers or iron whaleboats; and a railway, surveyed in 1888, from Vivi to Leopoldville (250 miles), was soon thereafter begun, keeping mostly at a distance of about 30 miles south of the river. The mortality of the workers employed in the construction of the railway was very high, and labourers had to be imported from Dahomey and the Gold Coast regions. Chinese coolies were also employed. The first 25 miles were open for traffic in 1893, and the railway from Matadi to Leopoldville was completed by 1898. The upper region of the river from Stanley Pool to Stanley Falls, 1068 miles, is navigable for steamers with a draught of four feet, besides over 3000 miles of navigable tributaries.

The river, whose mouth was discovered in 1482 by Diogo Cam, was known to the Portuguese as the Zaire, a corruption of the native words Nzari, Nyali, or Niadi, meaning 'river;' while the country about it and south of it was known as Congo. The centre of Portuguese missions was San Salvador. In 1818 Captain Tuckey was sent by the British government, and explored 118 miles of the river. In 1867–71 Livingstone discovered the Luapula and Lualaba, which he supposed to be the head-waters of the Nile; but which in 1876–77 Stanley proved, by following it down, to be really the Congo.

Congo, Belgian, formerly called the Congo Free State, developed out of the Association Internationale formed by Leopold II., king of the Belgians. It was recognised as a state by the European Powers in conference at Berlin in 1885. At first under the sovereignty of Leopold as an individual, it was by him made over, with all his sovereign rights, to Belgium in 1890; and Belgium, after hesitation, annexed it in 1908. The colony comprises a small strip of territory north of the Congo River, from its mouth to Manyanga, thence it is bounded N. by the Congo River (with French Congo to the northwards) to the Mobangi, thence to the NE. watershed of the Congo basin, eastwards to Lake Albert, and southwards to near Lake Bangweolo, westwards to the Kassai River sources, and thence by a zigzag to the Kwango, and then to the Congo at Nokki (the south bank of the river from that point being Portuguese). The colony borders accordingly on French Equatorial Africa, Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, the Uganda Protectorate, German East Africa, Northern Rhodesia, and Portuguese West Africa. The west shore of Lake Tanganyika belongs to Belgian Congo.

The Congo Free State was governed by an administrative bureau at Brussels, consisting of three secretariats—Control, Finance, and Foreign Affairs, under the direct supervision of the king of the Belgians. On annexation it was placed under a Colonial Council, appointed by the king, the Senate, and the House of Representatives of Belgium, and presided over by the Colonial Minister, appointed by the king. The Governor-general has his headquarters at Boma, 60 miles from the sea, on the right bank of the river. The state, formerly allowing free imports, was allowed in 1890 to impose duties. The annual revenue is about 40,000,000 francs. There is railway communication between Katanga and South Africa, and other lines are destined to connect with Egypt and the west coast. The inhabitants of the Congo basin belong to what has been termed the Bantu race. They are a happy, inoffensive people, not so dark as the Fan or Ethiopian. Split up into numberless tribal communities, they can offer but slight resistance to the advance of civilisation; and as they are born traders, they take very readily to commerce. The dialects throughout the country are very numerous, but many of them would appear to have a common origin. Pop. from fifteen to thirty millions. The climate is purely tropical, the average temperature ranging between 78° and 82°. Malarial fevers, especially on the coast, are not infrequent. The interior is healthier than the coast. The principal products are ivory, palm-oil, palm-kernels, india-rubber, various gums, ground-nuts, camwood, beeswax, orchilla, &c. Wild coffee, tobacco, and hill rice are cultivated on the upper river; also various kinds of maize and sorghum. The Katanga region is rich in copper, gold, and other metals. The annual value of the special exports (principally rubber, copal, ivory, copper, gold, palm oil and kernels, and cocoa) is about 57,000,000 francs (general exports, 76,500,000 francs), and of the general imports 35,000,000 francs. Before annexation the administration was charged with allowing systematic cruelty in enforcing labour and extorting produce and taxes. A programme of gradual reform was adopted in 1910.

See works on the Congo State and River by Stanley (1885), Bentley, Ward, and Johnston (1895), and, impeaching the administration for cruelty, Fox Bourne (1903), Burrows (1903), and Grenfell (1908); French books by Alexis, Coquilhat, Dupont, Jeannent, Wauters, Allart, and Bourguignon (1898); the German work by Pechuel-Loesche; Silva White's Development of Africa (1890), Scott Keltie's Partition of Africa (1895), and Sir H. Johnston's Colonization of Africa (1899). For French Congo, see Gabun.

Coni (Ko'nee), or Cuneo, capital of an Italian province, 48 miles SW. of Turin by rail. It has a fine cathedral. Pop. 27,500.

Conisborough Castle, a Norman-Saxon round tower in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 5 miles WSW. of Doncaster. It is Athelstan's stronghold in Ivanhoe.

Conishead Priory, Lancashire, 2 miles SSE. of Ulverstone, a hydropathic on the site of a 12th-century monastery.

Coniston Lake, in the English Lake District, lies in North Lancashire, at the east foot of the Coniston Fells, 9 miles W. of Bowness on Windermere. It is 5 miles long, ½ mile broad, 147 feet above the sea, and 260 feet deep. On the east shore stand Ruskin's home, Brantwood, and Tent House, once Tennyson's residence. The Old Man of Coniston, to the NW., is 2633 feet high.

Conjeveram (Kánchivaram), the Benares of southern India, 45 miles SW. of Madras by rail, with three large Hindu temples, seven old tanks, and an annual fair. It was long a Buddhist centre. The United Free Church of Scotland has a mission here. Pop. 48,000.

Conn, Lough, a picturesque Irish lake of County Mayo, together with Lough Cullin (from which it is separated by a narrow neck of land), 13 miles long, and 1 to 3 broad.

Connah's Quay, a seaport on the Dee estuary, 4 miles SE. of Flint.

Connaught, the most westerly and the smallest of the four provinces of Ireland. It contains the counties of Galway, Leitrim, Mayo, Roscommon, and Sligo. Greatest length from north to south, 105 miles; greatest breadth, not including Achil Island, 92 miles. Area, 6863 sq. m.; pop. (1841) 1,420,705; (1911) 610,984. The west coast has many fine bays and harbours, and the surface, especially in the western half, is mountainous and rugged, forming grand and picturesque scenery. The people are almost purely Celtic.

Connecticut (kon-net'-e-cut), one of the six New England states of the American Union, is bounded by Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Long Island Sound, and the state of New York. The smallest in area of all the states except Rhode Island and Delaware, with a surface of 4990 sq. m. (two-thirds that of Wales), it is one of the most densely peopled states of the Union. The surface is rocky and uneven, and the low Green and Taconic Mountains of the Appalachian system occupy part of the west. Much of the soil is not easily cultivated, and rather unfertile; but part of the valley of the Connecticut River is very productive, and grows tobacco. The Connecticut River, rising in New Hampshire, and forming the boundary with Vermont, flows south through Massachusetts and Connecticut to Long Island Sound, after a course of 450 miles, navigable for small vessels to Hartford. In the east of the state is the Thames, and in the west the Housatonic. The chief value of the very numerous streams is as a source of water-power for manufactories. The brown hematites of the northwest yield excellent iron; there are quarries of sandstone, granites, trap, limestone, and gneissoid building-stones, as well as of serpentine and verde-antique; and lead, copper, and cobalt have been mined. Mineral-waters occur. The climate is very changeable, and is rather severe in winter, but generally healthful. Some good harbours favour the coastwise trade, but the whale and seal fisheries have declined. Oyster-fishing and other fisheries are engaged in. The state stands in the first rank as respects the amount and aggregate value of manufactured goods; clocks, hardware, india-rubber goods, firearms, silks and other textiles, small-wares in great variety, and subscription books are produced on a large scale. In very few parts of the world has more been done for popular education than in this state. Yale University at New Haven comprises collegiate and post-graduate courses, besides medical, theological, scientific, law, and art schools. Trinity College is at Hartford, and the Wesleyan University at Middletown, and there are several divinity schools. Among cities and towns are Hartford, the capital (pop. 100,000), New Haven (136,600), Bridgeport, Waterbury, Meriden, New Britain, Norwalk, Danbury, Norwich, Stamford, and New London.

The old stock of inhabitants were of English Puritan origin, but of later years there has been a large immigration of Irish, German, English, and others. The originally Puritan colony of Connecticut may be said to date from the secession in 1634 of the more democratic element from Massachusetts. Its constitution of 1639 was 'the first written democratic constitution on record.' The royal charter of 1662, essentially a confirmation of the older one, was superseded by the present state constitution only in 1818. Prominent events in Connecticut history have been the bloody war with the Pequot Indians, 1637; the governorship of Sir Edmund Andros, during a part of which (1687–88) the colonial charter was in abeyance; and the abolition of slavery in 1818. Pop. 1,114,756.

Connel Ferry, Argyllshire, at the mouth of Loch Etive, 6 miles NE. of Oban, has a great railway bridge.

Connemara (Con-ne-mah'ra), a wild district forming the westernmost division of Galway.

Connor, an Antrim village, 5 miles S. of Ballymena. Here Edward Bruce defeated the English (1315). There is a diocese of Connor.

Consett, a Durham town, on the Derwent, 8½ miles N. of Wolsingham, with ironworks and coal-pits. Pop. 11,000.

Constance, or KOSTNITZ, a city of Baden, once a free imperial city, is situated on both sides of the Rhine, at its exit from Lake Constance, 91 miles E. of Basel by rail. One of the most ancient towns of Germany, Constance owed its prosperity to its linen industry, already famous in the 12th century. Its manufactures also include cotton, jute, and waterproof fabrics, canvas, carpets, chemicals, bell-founding, &c. It has a cathedral (dating partly from the 11th century), an old Dominican convent (now an hotel), and the present market-hall, in which three places the sessions of the great Church Council of Constance (1414–18) were held. Pop. 27,600.

LAKE OF CONSTANCE (German Bodensee or Bodmansee; Roman Lacus Brigantinus) lies between Switzerland and Germany, on the north side of the Swiss Alps, and forms a meeting-point of the five territories—Baden, Würtemberg, Bavaria, Vorarlberg (Austria), and Switzerland. Lying 1306 feet above the sea, and traversed by the Rhine from east to west, it has a length of 46 miles, an extreme breadth of 10 miles, an area of 204 sq. m., and a depth of 490 feet (maximum 827). Towns on its shores are Constance, Bregenz, Lindau, and Friedrichshafen.

Constantia, a district of the Cape Province, South Africa, lying on the eastern and north-eastern slopes of Table Mountain range, and distant from Capetown 7 miles by rail. It produces red and white wines of delicious aroma.

Constantina, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, 40 miles NNE. of Seville, with silver-mines. Pop. 12,000.

Constantine, capital of the easternmost province of Algeria, is very picturesquely situated on a nearly isolated chalk rock, 830 feet high, 40 miles SW. of its port Philippeville by rail. It is surrounded by walls, and consists of French and Arab quarters. The ancient capital of Numidia, called Carta by the Carthaginians, Cirta by the Romans, it was destroyed about 311 A.D., but was soon rebuilt by Constantine the Great, from whom it derives its present name. It manufactures woollen cloths, saddlery, leather goods, and carpets, and is a great trade centre. Pop. 60,000, of whom about half are French, with many Jews.

Constantinople, the capital of the Ottoman empire, in 41° N. lat., 28° 59′ E. long., was founded in 330 A.D. by Constantine the Great, from whom it derives its name, on a site partly occupied by the ancient Greek colony (658 B.C.) of Byzantium. The Turks call it Istambol or Stambol, i.e. Eis tēn polin, or, according to some, a mere mispronunciation of Con*stantinopo*lis. The original Byzantium was built on the apex of the triangular peninsula which juts out towards Asia on the southern side of the Golden Horn, where the present Eski Serai or 'Old Seraglio' stands, and its commanding position made it an object of strife among the nations—Persians, Gauls, and Greeks. In the 4th century B.C., the Athenians repelled the siege of Philip of Macedon, aided, according to the legend, by the supernatural appearance of a crescent in the sky, which revealed the presence of the invaders, and was forthwith adopted as the badge or crest of the city, as it is to this day.

Constantinople consists of two distinct parts—Stambol or Constantinople proper, and Christian Constantinople (Pera, Galata, Top-hâna).

The two are separated by the Golden Horn, a creek about five miles long and half a mile wide at the entrance, a safe and spacious harbour, and so deep that the largest ironclads of the Turkish navy can lie quite close to the shore. Stambol or Turkish Constantinople lies on the southern side of the Golden Horn, and Christian Constantinople lies on the north side: the two are connected by a couple of rude but convenient bridges. The old walls, in courses of stone and red brick, and 14 miles in circuit, show that the modern Turkish city occupies much the same area as the capital of the first Christian emperor. Within these walls the city rises, like Rome, upon seven low hills, crowned by noble mosques, with a wilderness of picturesque, tumble-down, filthy, wooden houses and bazaars climbing up their sides. In Stambol are nearly all the monuments and antiquities worth seeing in Constantinople. First is Agia Sophia, Saint Sophia, the church dedicated by Constantine to 'Eternal Wisdom,' rebuilt with added splendour by Theodosius (415) and by Justinian (538–568), and now converted into a mosque. Outside it is not worth a second glance; but within, the airy grace of its stupendous dome, and the beauty of its marbles and mosaics, despite all the ravages of Moslem and tourists' desecrations, fascinate and amaze the vision. Next, but not less beautiful, is the Suleymanîya, the mosque which the Great Suleyman erected in 1550–5. Scarcely less stately is the mosque of Sultan Ahmed I. in the Hippodrome, distinguished without by its six minarets (instead of the usual four). The mosque of the conqueror Mohammed II. is also notable. There are over two hundred other mosques in Constantinople, and an even larger number of chapels, besides hundreds of medresés or mosque colleges. The Fanar, or Greek quarter of Stambol, recalls the memory of famous Fanariote statesmen in the Turkish service. The Hippodrome (now called At-Meydân, or 'Horse Manège'), originally a circus surrounded by marble seats, long since removed, still shows remains of antiquity, such as the famous column of the Three Serpents which once stood at the Temple of Delphi, and an obelisk brought from Heliopolis in Egypt in the reign of Theodosius; whilst hard by are the Burnt Column, the column of Theodosius, and the Seraskier's Tower. Among the remains of Mohammedan splendour the Old Seraglio (Eski Serai) is the most important, though it has not been a royal residence since the days of Mahmûd II. Its first gate, Bab-i-Humayûn or 'Sublime Porte,' is said to have given its name to the Turkish government in its foreign relations.

Christian Constantinople, on the north side of the Golden Horn, comprises Galata, Pera, and Top-hâna. Galata is pre-eminently the merchant quarter, founded by a colony of Genoese merchants in 1216. The Tower of Galata, a Genoese erection, serves the same purpose as the Seraskier's Tower on the opposite side in giving alarms of fires. A tunnelled railway drags passengers up the steep ascent to Pera. Pera is the aristocratic quarter; here are all the embassies and consulates. The steep and badly paved Grande Rue is lined with fair if expensive shops, and boasts a rude opera-house, many cafés and restaurants, besides most of the principal hotels, and probably the worst morals in Europe. Turks preponderate at Top-hâna, which is so named from its cannon-foundry; the magnificent palace of Dolmabagché is on the brink of the Bosporus. Other suburbs are Kâsim Pasha, on the Golden Horn, the seat of the admiralty; Hasköi, and the picturesque village of Eyyûb. Along the European shore of the Bosporus are the summer-resorts of Therapia and Biyukderé. The Asiatic shore is also lined with settlements from Scutari (q.v.) to Candili. The new palace of Yildiz Köshki stands at the top of the hill of Beshiktâsh, beyond Pera. The population of Constantinople is estimated at about 1,250,000, of whom half are Mohammedans. The trade, chiefly in the hands of Europeans, is increasing, but much below what it might be if properly developed. The local manufactures are insignificant. The burden of vessels entering and clearing the port is about 20,000,000 tons. The first through express train from Paris (viâ Belgrade and Adrianople) reached Stambol in 1888.—In 330 A.D., impressed by its magnificent site, Constantine the Great abandoned the old capital of the Roman Empire on the Tiber, and founded in the place of Byzantium a new metropolis on the Bosporus, which he called Constantinople. Its walls and public buildings were enlarged and beautified by Justinian in 527–565. Since then it has undergone many sieges by Sassanians, Persians, Avars, Saracens (six times), Russians (in 9th to 11th century), Latins, and Turks; and of its twenty-six sieges and eight captures, that of the Latins under Baldwin and Dandolo in 1204 was by far the most disastrous, barbarous, and spoliating. In comparison, the Turkish sieges were humane and chivalrous: the first took place in 1356; Murâd II. failed in 1422; and Mohammed II. succeeded in 1453. It was threatened by the Bulgarians in 1912. The great church councils were held in 381 and 553 A.D.

Constanza. See Kustendji.

Contrexéville, a small place in the centre of the Vosges department, with alkaline mineral waters. Pop. 1000.

Conversano (Kon-ver-sâh'no), a cathedral city of South Italy, 18 miles SE. of Bari. Pop. 15,000.

Conway, a river of North Wales, rises in a mountain-lake where Merioneth, Denbigh, and Carnarvon meet, and runs 30 miles northward past Conway to Beaumaris Bay.

Conway, or Aberconway, a picturesque little seaport of North Wales, in Carnarvonshire, on the left bank of the river Conway at its estuary, 45½ miles WNW. of Chester by rail. The river is crossed by a fine tubular bridge (412 feet long), constructed by Stephenson in 1848, as well as by Telford's suspension bridge (1826). The town is triangular in form, and is surrounded by a high wall 12 feet thick and 1 mile in circumference, pierced by four Moorish-looking gates, and crowned by twenty-one round towers. In its south-eastern corner, rising proudly from a rock above the river, is the ruined castle, built soon after the Conquest by Hugh, Earl of Chester, and rebuilt in 1284 by Edward I., to check the Welsh. Its walls are 12 to 15 feet thick, with eight vast towers, four of which are each surmounted by a slender turret. The Plâs Mawr ('great mansion') is a noble timber house (1585), occupied by the Royal Cambrian Academy of Art. Conway (a chartered borough since 1876) is one of the six Carnarvon boroughs. Pop. 5200.

Cooch Behar. See Behar.

Cook, Mount, or Aorangi, one of the Southern Alps, on the western side of the South Island of New Zealand. It is 12,349 feet high, and is covered with perpetual snow.

Cook Islands, or Hervey Archipelago, a cluster lying midway between the Society and Navigator groups, are near 20° S. lat., and 158° W. long., some being volcanic, some coralline. The principal are Raratonga, Mangaia, Aitutaki, and Atiu. The inhabitants are 7000 in all. The islands were made a British protectorate in 1888, and annexed to New Zealand in 1901.

Cook's Garth, Captain Cook's birthplace, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, 7 miles W. of Guisborough.

Cookstown, a town of County Tyrone, 53 miles W. of Belfast by rail, with manufactures of linen and bleach-works. Pop. 3700.

Cook Strait, discovered by Captain Cook in 1769, separates the North and South Islands of New Zealand, and is 20 to 80 miles wide.

Cooktown, a town in the north of Queensland, 1050 miles NNW. of Brisbane, already one of the chief ports of the colony, though only founded in 1873. It is built along 1½ mile of the southern bank of the Endeavour River, and is almost environed by hills. There are already handsome public buildings, and a monument (1889) to Captain Cook, who beached his ship here in 1770. Near there are gold-diggings and tin-mines, with pearl and trepang fisheries. Pop. 2500.

Coolgardie, since 1893 a great gold-mining centre in Western Australia, 350 miles ENE. of Perth by rail. Pop. 30,000.

Coolins. See Cuchullins.

Coomassie, the capital of Ashanti, Western Africa, 120 miles NNW. of Cape Coast Castle. It occupies the side of a rocky hill, and is about four miles in circuit. The king's palace was burned by Wolseley in 1874. Pop. 10,000.

Coonoor (Kúnúr), a pass in the Neilgherry Hills, half-way between Coimbatore and Ootacamund, with a hill sanatorium.

Cooper's Hill, a ridge on the borders of Berks and Surrey, commanding a beautiful view of the Thames valley, and the scene of a famous poem by Denham. Cooper's Hill College (1870), training engineers for the Indian Works Department, with its forestry school (1885), was closed in 1906.

Coorg (a corruption of Kodagu, 'steep mountain'), a province under the government of India, lying below the Western Gháts and Mysore. Area, 1583 sq. m.; pop. (1871) 168,312; (1911) 174,976, speaking a Dravidian language akin to Canarese. Great part of its area is 3000 feet above the sea.

Cootehill, a town in County Cavan, Ireland, 88 miles NW. of Dublin. Pop. 1550.

Copaïs, or Topolias, a marshy lake of Bœotia, NW. of Thebes, was almost all successfully drained in 1876–86.

Copan, an Indian village in the south-western corner of the Central American state of Honduras, in a mountainous region, the site of a ruined city of great magnificence.

Copeland Forest, a Cumberland moorland, 2927 feet high, between Ennerdale and Wast Waters.

Copeland Islands, belonging to Bangor parish, County Down.

Copenhagen (Dan. Kjöbenhavn, 'Merchants' Haven'), the capital of Denmark, is situated on the low-lying eastern shore of the island of Zealand, in the Sound, which is here about 12 miles broad. The channel forms a fine and capacious harbour, which is bridged over so as to connect the isolated suburb of Christianshavn and the main part of the city at two points. Pop. (1835) 120,000; (1880) 235,254; now, including suburbs, 560,000. Copenhagen is still defended by the old citadel of Frederikshavn and by forts on the seaward side; the old fortifications, removed since 1863, have been succeeded by exterior works. Amongst its few buildings of historical interest or intrinsic beauty, the cathedral, rebuilt after the bombardment of 1807, possesses statues of Christ and the Apostles, and a baptismal font, designed and in part executed by Thorwaldsen. Trinitatiskirke is remarkable for its round tower, which is ascended by a spiral incline instead of steps; and an English church, built at a cost of £10,000, was consecrated in 1887. The royal palace, called Christiansborg, was rebuilt between 1794 and 1828, but suffered greatly from fire in 1884. In the castle of Rosenborg (1610–24) are kept the regalia; the palace of Charlottenborg (1624) is now used as an academy of arts. The university was founded by Christian I. in 1479, has 1500 students, and a library of 350,000 volumes; the royal library contains 600,000. Copenhagen is the centre, not only of Danish, but of northern literature and art, and is the seat of the unrivalled Museum of Northern Antiquities, and the Thorwaldsen Museum (1846). The exports include grain, rape-seed, butter, cheese, beef, cattle, wool, &c.; and porcelain, pianos, clocks, watches, mathematical instruments, chemicals, sugar, beer, and tobacco are manufactured. To counterbalance the prejudicial effect of the Baltic Ship Canal (see Baltic Sea) on the commerce of Copenhagen, the Danes established here in 1890–94 a great free port, fenced off from Danish customs territory, and designed to be an entrepôt between Baltic lands and the outer world.

In 1254 the village of Copenhagen obtained the privileges of a town, and in 1443 King Christopher made it the capital of the kingdom. It was several times attacked by the Hanseatic League; was besieged by the Swedes in the 17th century; was bombarded by the English, Dutch, and Swedes in 1700; suffered grievously by fires in 1728, 1794, and 1795; witnessed a great sea-fight in its roads on 2d April 1801, when the English, under Sir Hyde Parker and Nelson, destroyed the Danish fleet; and (to prevent the Danish fleet from falling into the power of Napoleon) was bombarded by the English from the 2d to the 5th of September 1807, when hundreds of persons lost their lives.

Copiapo (Co-pe-a-po'), capital of the Chilian dep. of Atacama, on the Copiapo River, 30 miles from its mouth; pop. 10,000.

Copinshay, a small Orkney island, 2½ miles from the SE. point of Mainland.

Coppermine River, so named, like the Copper Mountains to the west of it, from the copper of the vicinity, runs 250 miles through the North-west Territory of Canada to the Arctic Ocean, about 68° N. lat., and 116° W. long. Hearne discovered it in 1771.

Coppet (Coppay'), a Swiss village, 8 m. N. by E. of Geneva by rail, with a chateau, where Necker and his daughter, Mme. de Staël, are buried, and where the latter spent much of her life.

Coquet, a beautiful stream of Northumberland, flowing 40 miles to the sea below Warkworth. Coquet Island is 1 mile E. by S. of its mouth.

Coquimbo, or La Serena, capital of a province of Chili, near the mouth of the river Coquimbo, is a handsome town, with a cathedral. Pop. 16,000. The port of Coquimbo is on a bay 6 miles SW., and has a pop. of 7000.—Area of province, 13,500 sq. m.; pop. 180,000.

Coral Sea, between Australia and the New Hebrides.

Corato (Co-râh'to), a town of southern Italy, 25 miles W. of Bari; pop. 42,000.

Corbeil (Cor-bayl'), a town in the French dep. of Seine-et-Oise, on the Seine, 21 miles S. of Paris by rail; pop. 10,000.

Corbridge, a town of Northumberland, on the Tyne, 3½ miles E. of Hexham, with a Roman station (Corstopitum); pop. 2200.

Corcyra, the ancient name for Corfu (q.v.).

Cordilleras (Cor-dil-yay'ras; lit. 'chains'), a name of several American mountain-chains. The Andes include the Cordilleras of South America, those to which the name is most frequently given; and the Rocky Mountains those of North America. Those of Central America extend from Darien to the north of Mexico, and gradually increase in elevation from the Isthmus of Panamá, until they form magnificent plateaus, and reach a height of more than 17,000 feet in Mexico.

Córdoba, a central province of the Argentine Republic; area, 62,000 sq. m.; population, 570,000. The capital, Córdoba, lies in the valley of the Rio Primero, 246 miles WNW. of Rosario by rail. It has tramways, a cathedral, a handsome city-hall, a university (1613), &c. Founded by Cabrera in 1573, the town was famous as a centre of the Jesuit missions. It was afterwards falling into decay, but the opening of the railway in 1870 has greatly restored its prosperity. Population, 70,000.

Córdoba, a town of Mexico, 66 miles WSW. of Vera Cruz by rail; pop. 12,000.

Cor'dova, or Córdoba, a city of Spain, 81 miles ENE. of Seville by rail. It stands on the right bank of the Guadalquivir, here crossed by the Moorish 'Puente Viejo' of sixteen arches. The old turreted walls enclose gardens and vineyards; but the interior shows narrow and dirty streets. Founded in 152 B.C. by the Romans as Corduba, and a great Moorish town from 711 A.D. until 1236, it has a cathedral, built as a mosque in the 8th century, the most magnificent Mohammedan temple in Europe. Cordova was formerly celebrated for its manufacture of goat leather, called cordovan, whence the term cordwain, but that industry is now almost entirely extinct. It manufactures silverware, silk fabrics, &c. Cordova was the birthplace of Lucan, Seneca, and Averroes. Pop. 65,000.—Area of Cordova province, 5300 sq. m.; pop. 490,000.

Corea (native name Chosön, 'Morning Radiance'), a territory on the east coast of Asia, stretching as a peninsula from 34° 30′ to 43° N. lat., and from 124° 30′ to 130° 30′ E. long., between the Sea of Japan and the Yellow Sea, and separated by the Strait of Corea from the Japanese islands. From about the beginning of the Christian era Corea has been alternately dependent on Japan and China; from the 16th c. it was formally a vassal state of China, paying at least a ceremonial tribute. But even before the war between China and Japan in 1894–95, Japan had acquired commercial and fiscal predominance. In consequence of internal troubles in 1894 (fomented by Japanese residents), Japan intervened and drove the Chinese across the Yalu (see China), and Corea was declared an independent state. The growing power of Russia in Manchuria, and its encroachments on Corea, created great anxiety in Japan in 1900–4, and led to the war of 1904–5, in which the Japanese triumphed. Their predominating interest in Corea was fully recognised. Japan strengthened its hold on the country by degrees, until in 1910 Corea became finally an integral part of the Japanese empire.

Occupying about the same latitude as Italy, Corea, with an area of 86,000 sq. m., is also like Italy hemmed in on the north by alpine ranges, and traversed from north to south by a branch chain. Among the summits are Hienfung (8114 feet), Mount Popoff, and Coxcomb (4800), north-east of Seoul. The climate is healthy, bracing in the north, but colder in winter and hotter in summer than in corresponding European latitudes. Some of the rivers are frozen for from three to five months in the year. Among the products are rice, wheat, beans, cotton, hemp, maize, millet, sesame, and ginseng. Iron ores of excellent quality are mined; and there are copper-mines in several places. The principal industries are the manufacture of paper, mats woven of grass, split bamboo blinds, oil-paper, and silk. Three-fourths of the trade is with Japan, and one-seventh with China. Several railways have been constructed.

The population was in 1911 13,125,000. The language is intermediate between Mongolo-Tatar and Japanese, polysyllabic and agglutinating. It has an alphabetic system of its own; but Chinese characters partly replace Corean in correspondence. Japanese is much used officially. The philosophy of Corea is Confucian, but in spite of great restrictions on Buddhism there are numerous Buddhist monasteries. The government was a hereditary and absolute monarchy, carried on through three ministers, besides whom were ministers of six departments. Seoul, the capital, has a pop. of 280,000. Phyöng-yang, 36 miles from the sea, on the Tai-dong, has a pop. of 150,000. It is the centre of a silk industry, and 20 miles off, at Keum-san, are gold-washings. Kai-söng is important as the capital of the old dynasty, and for its cultivation of ginseng.

The earliest records of Corea carry us back to 1122 B.C., when Ki-tze with 5000 Chinese colonists brought to Corea Chinese arts and politics. Down to modern times Corea has remained perfectly secluded. Almost the first knowledge of Corea obtained by Europe was through the shipwreck of some Dutchmen on the coast in 1653. The missionary De Cespedes had, however, entered Corea at the end of the 16th century, and from 1777 other missionaries followed. In 1835 M. Maubant gained a footing in Corea, but in 1866, after thousands of converts had been put to death, the only three Catholic missionaries left had to flee for their lives. To avenge the death of the Catholics the French sent an expedition, which was, however, repulsed. Japan was the first to effect a footing in Corea in 1876, when a treaty was concluded between the two countries. Corea followed this up by treaties with China, the United States, and other countries (1882–86); and Chemulpo, Fusan, and Gensan were opened to foreign trade. The war of 1904–5 opened the country much more fully. In 1910 the last emperor abdicated and the country was placed under a Japanese governor-general. See works by Oppert (1880), Ross, Griffis, Lowell, Carles (1888), Cavendish, Landor, Bishop, Hamilton, Laguérie, and Whigham (1904).

Corentyn, a river of South America, rising in 1° 50′ N. lat., and flowing northward to the Atlantic between British and Dutch Guiana. It forms an estuary 25 miles wide.

Corfe Castle, a village-borough of Dorsetshire, in the 'Isle' of Purbeck, 4 miles SE. of Wareham. Its famous castle, the traditional scene of the murder of King Edward the Martyr, by his stepmother Elfrida (979), was gallantly defended in 1643 by Lady Bankes for six weeks against 600 Roundheads. Taken through treachery two years later, it was dismantled; and its beautiful ruins cover nearly 3½ acres. Pop. of parish, 1400.

Corfu, the most northerly and important of the Ionian Islands (q.v.), at the entrance to the Adriatic, separated from the mainland of Greece and Albania by a channel 2 to 12 miles broad. It is 40 miles long, 3½ to 20 miles broad, and culminates in Pantocrator (2997 feet). Area, 270 sq. m.; pop. 100,000. The surface of Corfu is largely covered with luxuriant groves of olive, cypress, and ilex. The principal products are olives and wine, oranges, citrons, figs, carob, silk, and honey. The minerals are sulphur, salt, coal, and marble. The principal town, Corfu (pop. 30,000), is finely situated on the east coast, and has a good harbour. It is the seat of a Greek archbishop and of a Catholic bishop, and has a royal palace, an Ionian academy, founded by Lord Guildford in 1823, with a library of 35,000 volumes, a gymnasium, theatre, &c. The ancient name of the island is Corcyra, but from its shape it was also called Drepane, or 'sickle.'

Cori (Coree; anc. Cora), a town of Italy, 30 miles SE. of Rome; pop. 7000.

Corigliano (Cor-eel-yâh'no), an Italian town, 4 miles from the Gulf of Taranto; pop. 15,000.

Coringa, a decayed seaport of Madras, at the northern mouth of the Godavari River, 8 miles S. of Cocanada.

Corinth, a city of Greece, celebrated in antiquity for its vices, situated on the rocky isthmus of Corinth (3¾ miles wide, and 262 feet high), which connects the Peloponnesus with the mainland. It lay under the northern declivity of the mountain (1886 feet high), on which stood its citadel (Acrocorinthus); and its position, midway between the Ægean and Adriatic, was exceptionally advantageous for trade. Founded, according to tradition, about 1350 B.C., Corinth at its zenith is said to have had 300,000 inhabitants, but was utterly destroyed by the Romans in 146 B.C. Exactly a century afterwards it was rebuilt by Julius Cæsar; in 1459 it was captured by the Turks. After being delivered from them in 1822, it slowly increased till 1858, when it was utterly destroyed by an earthquake. The town has since been rebuilt in a more convenient position, 3 miles to the north-east. Pop. 4000. A mile and a half ENE. of New Corinth, on the Gulf of Lepanto (anciently Gulf of Corinth), is the western mouth of the Corinth Ship Canal (1882–93) through the isthmus, 4 miles long. Two new towns have been laid out at its east and west mouths, the eastern named Isthmia, the western Posidonia.

Corinth, a town of Mississippi, 93 miles E. by S. of Memphis. Here the Confederates were defeated, October 3–4, 1862. Pop. 5000.

Corinto. See Leon.

Cork, a county of Munster, southmost and largest in Ireland; greatest length, 110 miles; greatest breadth, 70; area, 2890 sq. m. Cork is hilly, with great variety of surface. The west part is rocky, mountainous, and boggy; the east and south, rich, fertile, and picturesque. The ranges run east and west, except the Boghra Mountains, between the Lee and Blackwater. The coast is bold and rocky, and from its indentations, 250 miles long; the bays run 3 to 25 miles inland, the chief being Bantry, Dunmanus, Baltimore, Glandore, Clonakilty, Kinsale, Cork Harbour, and Youghal. There are many isles off the coast, including Cape Clear Island. In the west, Cork is divided from Kerry by a range running north-east and north, the chief points being 1200 to 2240 feet high. This range sends offshoots to the east, which divide the county into the parallel basins of the three chief rivers of Cork, the Blackwater, Lee, and Bandon. Part of the Munster coalfield occupies 400 sq. m. in the north-west. Cork has many small lakes in the west. The chief mineral products are coal, iron, copper, barytes, limestone, marble, fullers' earth, brick-clay, marl. There is a thermal magnesian spring at Mallow. The climate is moist but genial. The dairies are extensive, and Cork butter stands in high estimation. Of the total area, about 25 per cent. is under crops. The chief manufactures are leather, tweeds, whisky, porter; and the chief exports provisions. Pop. (1841) 854,118; (1851) 653,180; (1871) 517,076; (1881) 495,607; (1911) 392,104, of whom 90 per cent. are Catholics. Since 1885 the county returns seven members, the city two; Bandon, Mallow, Kinsale, and Youghal having been absorbed in the county.

Cork, a city and parliamentary borough of Ireland, capital of County Cork, and a county in itself, on the Lee, 11 miles above its mouth, and 166 SW. of Dublin by rail. Standing in the centre of a picturesque valley, it is built in part on an island, or group of islands, formerly a swamp, which the word Cork, Corcoch, or Corcaig implies; in part, on the slopes of the river-banks. Nine bridges cross the river to the islands. There are a spacious public park or racecourse of 400 acres; an elm-tree walk, the Mardyke, above a mile long, on the west of the city; and a beautiful public cemetery. The chief buildings are St Anne Shandon's Church, with a tower 170 feet high; the Protestant Cathedral, Early English in style, erected since 1865; University (formerly Queen's) College (1849), a fine Tudor-Gothic quadrangular building; and the Schools of Science and Art. The Lee is navigable to about a mile above the city, and a large sum has been expended on the improvement of the navigation. The extent of the quays is now above 4 miles, and ships of 2000 tons reach them. Cork Harbour, noted for its size and safety, is a basin of 10 sq. m., formed by the Lee's estuary. It could contain the whole British navy, and has been the main source of the rise and progress of the city. It is the port of call for the transatlantic steamers plying between Liverpool and New York. The estuary contains several large isles, rising abruptly and high above the water, with narrow channels between them. The entrance is by a channel two miles by one, defended by batteries. Adjoining the island of Haulbowline, on which are extensive government stores, is a large government dock, where vessels of the British fleet may be repaired. On the shores of the estuary are the towns of Passage and Queenstown, formerly Cove of Cork. The chief manufactures are leather, iron, gloves, ginghams, friezes, flour, malt liquors, and whisky; the chief exports grain, provisions, butter, livestock, leather, and tweeds. Cork returns two members to parliament. Pop. (1871) 78,642; (1881) 80,124; (1911) 76,673; of parl. borough (1881) 104,496; (1911) 102,435. Of these five-sixths are Catholics. Cork grew up around an abbey founded in 600 by St Finbar. Dermod Maccarthy, king of Cork or Desmond, surrendered it to Henry II. in 1172. Cromwell took it in 1649, and Marlborough in 1690. There is a statue of Father Mathew, who laboured here many years. See Miss Cusack's History of the City and County of Cork (Dublin, 1875).

Corleone (Cor-le-o'neh), a town of Sicily, 21 miles S. of Palermo. Pop. 15,000.

Corneto (Cor-neh'to), a picturesque, mediæval-looking town of central Italy, 12 miles N. of Civita Vecchia by rail, and 3 from the Mediterranean. Pop. 5000. It rose out of the ruins of the Etruscan city of Tarquinii.

Cornhill, a Northumberland village, 1½ mile ESE. of Coldstream.

Corniche. See Riviera.

Corning, capital of Steuben county, New York, on the Chemung River, 15 miles by rail WNW. of Elmira, with foundries, glass-works, &c. Pop. 14,000.

Corno, Monte. See Gran Sasso d'Italia.

Cornwall, a maritime county, forming the south-western extremity of England. Its extreme length is 81 miles; its extreme breadth 45 miles; and its area is 1360 sq. m., of which 63·4 per cent. is under cultivation. The surface is very irregular, and a ridge of bleak hills, interspersed with moors, stretches from the Tamar to the Land's End. Brown Willy (1368 feet) is the loftiest point. As this range is nearer the north of Cornwall than the south, the principal rivers are on the southern side, and run to the English Channel. With the exception of a few unimportant creeks, there are only two harbours on the north coast—the estuary of the Camel, on which is Padstow, and the bay of St Ives. Nearly all the north coast is formed of bold and picturesque cliffs; but at Perranzabuloe and Gwithian there are hills of blown sea-sand. The southern coast is also mostly bold and rocky, but indented with many headlands and bays. Between the Land's End (5° 41′ 31″ W.) and the Lizard Point is the deep indentation named Mount's Bay, from St Michael's Mount, with the harbour-works of Penzance. East of the Lizard is Falmouth Bay; and on the eastern boundary is another of the great havens of the kingdom, Plymouth Sound. The estuary of the Fowey also affords a small but perfectly sheltered deep-water harbour. The chief river is the Tamar, which practically divides Cornwall from Devon, rising within 3 miles of the north coast at Wooley Barrows. It is tidal, and navigable for 19 miles (total length 59) from its embouchure in Plymouth Sound. Its principal Cornish tributary is the Notter. The lower part of the estuary of the Tamar is called the Hamoaze. The Fowey is 30 miles long, and navigable for 6. The Fal is 20 miles long from its source to Falmouth Harbour. The Camel (also called the Alan) is 29 miles long, 10 being tidal. There is a tradition that a large tract of land between the Land's End and the Scilly Isles (q.v.) was submerged by the sea. This is the fabled Lyonesse. Mining has been carried on here from prehistoric times, and the county has been regarded as the Cassiterides of the Phœnicians and Greeks. It yields tin, copper, lead, iron, zinc, silver, cobalt, antimony, manganese, bismuth, tungsten, arsenic, pitchblende, &c.—a greater variety of minerals than any other part of the United Kingdom. Gold has been found in alluvial tin works or 'streams,' the largest nugget over two ounces. Of late years mining has been very much reduced, and almost all the mines now existing are tin, of which Cornwall yields nearly all that is raised in the kingdom. The pilchard, herring, and mackerel fisheries are extensive and important. The climate, mild though damp, has been turned to good account in the Scilly Isles and the Penzance district, by the development of market-gardening for the supply of early vegetables and of fruit to the leading markets. Pop. (1801) 192,281; (1861) 369,390; (1911) 328,098. Cornwall contains one parliamentary borough—Falmouth and Penryn, and six county divisions. It returned 40 members prior to 1832, 14 till 1867, 12 till 1885, and now 7 in all. The bishopric of Cornwall, merged in that of Exeter since Saxon times, was restored in 1876, and the see fixed at Truro.

Cornwall remained in the hands of its Celtic inhabitants, and under the rule of the British Church till 936. The ancient Cornish language, belonging to the Cymric or Brythonic group of the Celtic tongues, was generally spoken until the reign of Elizabeth, and until 1678 was used in public worship. It lingered in the extreme west of the county probably well into the 19th century; Bernard Victor (d. 1875) is by some regarded as the last who spoke it. Cornwall, which abounds in prehistoric remains, was created a duchy in 1337 for the Black Prince. The eldest son of the reigning sovereign is Duke of Cornwall; and the revenues derived from the duchy by the Prince of Wales average about £86,000 a year. See Tregellas's Cornwall (6th ed. 1891) and the 'Victoria History' (1906 et seq.).

Cornwall, a port of entry of Ontario, at the mouth of the Cornwall Canal, and separated by the St Lawrence from New York state, 67 miles SW. of Montreal. It has one of the principal woollen-mills in the Dominion. Pop. 6600.

Coro, a town of Venezuela, 210 miles WNW. of Carácas, near the Golfete de Coro; pop. 10,000. Its port is La Vela, 7 miles NE. by rail.

Coromandel Coast, a name used vaguely for the major part of the eastern coast of the province of Madras, on the Bay of Bengal. The name is probably a corruption of Cholamandalam, 'country of the Cholas,' an old Dravidian people.

Coronation Gulf, an inlet connected with the Arctic Ocean, south of Victoria Land, in 68° 30′ N. lat., and 110° W. long.

Coronea, a town of Bœotia, where in 447 B.C. the Bœotians defeated the Athenians, and in 394 Agesilaus the allied Greeks.

Corra Linn. See Clyde.

Corran Narrows, the strait between Loch Linnhe and Lower Loch Eil.

Corrèze (Cor-rehz'), a French dep. formed out of the old province of Limousin, and taking its name from a river, the Corrèze, flowing 52 miles SW. to the Vezère, a tributary of the Dordogne. Area, 2265 sq. m.; population, 310,000. The surface attains in Mont Odonze 3129 feet. The dep. is divided into the three arrondissements of Tulle (the capital), Brive, and Ussel.

Corrib, Lough, an isleted lake of counties Galway and Mayo, the second largest in Ireland. Lying only 30 feet above sea-level, it is 25 miles long from NW. to SE., and 1 to 6 broad, with an area of 68 sq. m. From its south end, 4 miles N. of Galway, it sends off the Galway River to Galway Bay. It receives the waters of Lough Mask, at its north end, through the Pigeon Hole and other caves, as well as those of the Clare, &c.

Corrichie, a moor on the borders of Kincardine and Aberdeen shires, 15 miles W. of Aberdeen. Here, on 28th October 1562, the Earl of Moray defeated the Catholic Earl of Huntly.

Corrie, an Arran coast-village, 5½ miles N. by E. of Brodick.

Corrientes, a province of the Argentine Republic, between the Paraná and Uruguay rivers. Area, 32,500 sq. m.; pop. 400,000.—The capital, Corrientes, 15 miles below the confluence of the Paraná and the Paraguay, takes its name from seven currents formed by points of rock above the city. Steamers from Buenos Aires (832 miles) touch here. Pop. 20,000.

Corrievrekin (Gael., 'Brecan's cauldron'), a whirlpool or dangerous passage scarcely a mile broad, off the west coast of Argyllshire, in the strait between Scarba and Jura.

Corry, a town of Pennsylvania, 37 miles SE. of Erie. It has machine-shops, saw-mills, and oil-refineries. Pop. 6000.

Corryarrick, Inverness-shire, a mountain-pass 7 miles SSE. of Fort Augustus.

Corsham, a Wiltshire market-town, 4 miles SW. of Chippenham. Pop. of parish, 4200.

Cor'sica, the fourth largest island of the Mediterranean, is 114 miles long by 52 miles broad, with 300 miles of coast-line. Area, 3378 sq. m.; pop. (1872) 258,507; (1911) 288,820. Corsica is separated from the twin island of Sardinia, to the south, by the Strait of Bonifacio. It is 54 miles SW. of Leghorn and 98 S. of Genoa. Though now a dep. of France, the island belongs geographically, historically, and linguistically to Italy. The interior is a labyrinth of mountains, the highest summits being about the middle: Cinto (8878 feet); Rotondo (8607); Pagli-Orba (8283). On the west side the mountains reach to the coast, but on the east, between mountains and sea, there extend alluvial plains, edged seawards with lagoons and swamps, highly fertile but malarious, so that in summer the occupants have to escape to the mountains. In the time of the Romans these plains were densely peopled, and recently eucalyptus plantations are beginning to overcome the malaria. Corsica is watered by numerous streams, none navigable, with cascades glittering in all directions. The climate generally is highly salubrious. The soil is very fertile, and over 43 per cent. of the entire area is arable land; yet flour, wheat, and hay are imported. Corsica presents a succession of climates and vegetation zones. About one-sixth of the whole is covered with forest, but this includes in many places only confused thickets. The moufflon or wild sheep is found; also wild boars, large foxes, and small deer, but no wolves or bears. The venomous ant is peculiar to Corsica, where are also the Malmignata spider and the tarantula. The minerals include copper, silver, lead, sulphide of antimony, iron, and manganese. Among the valuable stones are granite, porphyry, jasper, alabaster, and marble; and the Orezza mineral waters have a high medicinal value. The chief industries are fishing and rearing of cattle. Wines, timber, charcoal, olive-oil, and dried fruits are the principal exports. In 1888 a railway was opened from Bastia to Corte, and other lines have since been constructed. Corsica is divided into the five arrondissements of Ajaccio, Bastia, Calvi, Corte, Sartène. The capital is Ajaccio, but the most important town is Bastia. The language is a corrupt Italian. In early times known as Cyrnos, Corsica in the 8th century fell to the Saracens, in the 11th to Pisa. Thence it passed to the Genoese. The Genoese, unable to subdue the Corsicans, who had risen under General Paoli, surrendered Corsica to the French, who conquered it in 1768, since which time it has willingly united itself with France. Napoleon was 'the Corsican.' See works by Boswell (1768), Borde (1887), Barry (1893), and Caird (1899).

Corsicana, capital of Navarre county, Texas, 53 miles SSE. of Dallas. It is an important cotton port. Pop. 10,000.

Corstor'phine, a Midlothian village, adjoining Edinburgh to the W. On Corstorphine Hill is the Scottish Zoological Park. Pop. 3000.

Cortland, capital of Cortland county, New York, 36 miles S. of Syracuse: pop. 11,500.

Coruisk (Coroosk'), a fresh-water loch (1¾ × ⅓ m.) in Skye, among the Cuchullin Hills.

Corto'na (Lat. Crotona), in Tuscany, 69 miles SE. of Florence, stands 2130 feet above sea-level, looking down on the Trasimene Lake, and is one of the oldest cities in Europe, with mighty cyclopean walls, Etruscan and Roman remains. Pop. 4000.

Coruña, La (in English, Corunna), a fortified seaport of Spain, midway between Capes Ortegal and Finisterre, on a peninsula in the Bay of Coruña, 263 miles NW. of Leon by rail. The harbour is commodious; and in 1888 a quarantine harbour was completed. One mile north-west of the town stands the famous Torre de Hercules, restored by Trajan, which serves as a lighthouse, and is nearly 100 feet high. The chief imports are sugar and American raw petroleum, dried cod, hides, spirits, and English coal. The industries include the manufacture of cotton, cigars, glass-wares, and canned provisions. Pop. 47,000. Coruña, which was taken from the Phœnicians by the Romans in the 1st century B.C., for Englishmen has rare historic interest. Here in 1386 John of Gaunt landed to claim the crown of Castile in right of his wife; in 1554 Philip II. embarked for England to marry Queen Mary; and in 1588 the great Spanish Armada set sail for the conquest of England. Here also fell gloriously Sir John Moore (January 16, 1809), after his memorable retreat and his defeat of Soult. He is buried in the gardens of San Carlos.

Corvo, the most northerly of the Azores (q.v.).

Corwen, a town of Merionethshire, North Wales, on the Dee, 12 miles NE. of Bala by rail. Pop. of parish, 3000.

Corygaum, a village in the presidency of Bombay, 16 miles S. of Poona, the scene of the last of the three defeats of the Peishwa of the Mahrattas (January 1, 1818).

Cos (Italian, Stanko), a Turkish island of the Archipelago, off the coast of Asia Minor, seized by Italy in 1912, and held in pledge for the fulfilment of the Treaty of Ouchy. It consists mostly of fertile and well-tilled plains, partially of hilly country; and exports lemons, grain, wine, cotton, and silk. The chief town is Cos or Co, on the north-east coast. Cos was famous of old for its wine, its amphoræ, and its fine 'Coan garments.' It was the birthplace of Ptolemy Philadelphus, Apelles, and Hippocrates. Area 110 sq. m.; pop. 10,000, mostly Greeks.

Coseley, a south-eastern suburb of Wolverhampton.

Cosenza (Co-sentz'a; anc. Consentia), a cathedral city of Italy, 12 miles E. of the Mediterranean, and 262 SE. of Naples by rail, in a mountain-closed valley at the confluence of the Crati and the Busento. Pop. 25,000. Alaric died here 410 A.D.

Cosne (Kone), a town, with iron manufactures, in the French dep. of Nièvre, on the right bank of the Loire, 122 miles SSE. of Paris. Pop. 8000.

Cossimbazar' (Kasimbázár), near Murshidabad, was in the 17th century the chief English agency in Bengal.

Costanza. See Kustendji.

Costa Rica (Reeka), the most southerly republic of Central America, except Panamá, occupies the entire breadth from sea to sea between Nicaragua on one side and Panamá on the other; area, 23,000 miles, or about two-thirds that of Ireland; population, 400,000. The whites are mostly of pure Spanish descent. Except on the coast, the country is generally mountainous, with many volcanoes, all under 11,500 feet; on the Atlantic slope dense forests prevail, but wide savannahs are more frequent on the Pacific side. Prior to the discovery of gold in 1823, Costa Rica was a land of poverty, owing its title of 'The Rich Coast' solely to the anticipations of its first Spanish settlers; since then, foreign capital has opened up much of the country. Although rich in gold, silver, copper, and other metals, its chief industry is agriculture; but the population is very scanty, and only a twentieth part of the land is under cultivation. Besides valuable timber and dye-woods, it yields coffee, tobacco, sugar, cacao, caoutchouc, sarsaparilla, and vanilla, which, with hides, tortoise-shell, and mother-of-pearl, are largely exported. But to bananas, even more than coffee, is principally due the reviving prosperity of 'the Coffee Republic.' There are about 500 miles of railway. The chief ports are Punta Arenas and Limon; the other towns are San José, the capital, Cartago, Alajuela, and Heredia. Discovered by Columbus in 1493, and probably first settled on his fourth voyage, in 1502, Costa Rica has had much the same history, chequered by frequent revolutions, as its neighbours: it declared its independence in 1821. See works by Biolley (1889), Barrantes (Barcelona, 1892), and Villafranca (N.Y. 1895).

Côte-d'Or, a dep. in the east of France, formed of part of the old province of Burgundy. Area, 3383 sq. m.; population, 350,000. It contains four arrondissements: Beaune, Châtillon-sur-Seine, Dijon (the capital), and Semur.

Cotentin, The (Co-ton^{g}tan^g'), the peninsula projecting into the English Channel between the Bay of St Michel and the Gulf of Carentan, now the northern part of the dep. of La Manche. It is 55 miles long and 25 broad. The chief town is Cherbourg; the old capital is Coutances.

Côtes-du-Nord ('northern coasts'), a French Breton dep., washed by the English Channel. Area, 2659 sq. m.; population, 605,500. It is divided into the five arrondissements of St Brieuc, Dinan, Loudéac, Lannion, and Guingamp. The chief town is St Brieuc.

Coteswold, or Cotswold, Hills, a range running over 50 miles through Gloucestershire, from Chipping Campden in the NE., by Cheltenham and Stroud, to Bath in the SW. It has an average height of 500 or 600 feet, and separates the Lower Severn from the Thames's sources. The highest point is Cleeve Hill, 1134 feet.

Cothele, the ancient seat of the Earl of Mount Edgcumbe, in Cornwall, on the Tamar, 6¾ miles N. of Saltash.

Cöthen. See Köthen.

Cotonou, or Kotonu, a seaport and railway terminus of Dahomey.

Cotopaxi, the loftiest active volcano in the world (19,550 feet), is in Ecuador, in the eastern chain of the Andes, and 50 miles S. of the equator. The upper part of Cotopaxi, a perfect cone of 4400 feet, is entirely covered with snow, save that the verge of the crater is a bare parapet of rock. The first eruption recorded was in 1533. Others followed in 1698, 1743, 1744, and 1768, the most terrible of all. Cotopaxi was quiet till 1851. In 1854–56, 1877, and 1880 there were again eruptions. See Whymper's Travels among the Andes (1892).

Cotroné, a fortified coast-town of Italy, 35 miles NE. of Catanzaro by rail. Pop. 10,000.

Cotswolds. See Coteswolds.

Cottbus, or Kottbus, a town in the Prussian province of Brandenburg, on the Spree, 71 miles SE. of Berlin by rail. It manufactures woollen cloth, carpets, hats, linen, jute, leather, and tobacco. Pop. 50,000.

Cottingham, a town in the East Riding of Yorkshire, 4 miles NW. of Hull. Pop. 4700.

Coulmiers (Koolm-yay'), a French village, 12 miles WNW. of Orleans, the scene of a Bavarian defeat, 9th November 1870.

Coulport, Dumbartonshire, a pier on Loch Long, 4 miles N. of Cove.

Council Bluffs, a city of Iowa, capital of Pottawattamie county, 141 miles WSW. of Des Moines by rail, on a plain backed by the high bluffs from which it takes its name. The Missouri River, 3 miles to the west, is crossed by a grand railway bridge to Omaha, and five railways meet at the town, which manufactures paper, iron, carriages, and agricultural machines. Pop. 29,300.

Coupar-Angus (Coop'er-Ang'gus), a Perthshire police-burgh, near the Isla's left bank, 13 miles NNE. of Perth. Within a Roman camp here is the fragment of a Cistercian abbey (1164). Linen is manufactured. Pop. 2100. See also Cupar.

Courbevoie (Koorb-vwah'), a town on the left bank of the Seine, opposite the north-western suburbs of Paris. Pop. 40,000.

Courland, or Kurland (Koor'land), one of the Baltic provinces of Russia. Mostly level, with many lakes and forests, it was formerly an independent duchy—properly, indeed, consisting of two duchies, Courland and Semgallen—and belonged, along with Livonia, to the Teutonic Knights. The difficulty of resisting Russia led to the acknowledgment in 1561 of Poland's sovereignty; but in 1795 Courland was finally united to Russia. Area, 10,535 sq. m.; population, 740,000, mostly Protestants. Mitau is the capital, but Libau the most flourishing town.

Courtallum (Kúttálam), an Indian town, 38 miles NW. of Tinnevelli, stands amongst the Ghats near the south end of the peninsula; and though only 450 feet above sea-level, serves as the sanatorium of the district.

Courtmacsherry, a fishing-village of County Cork, 10 miles S. of Bandon.

Courtrai (Flem. Kortrijk), a walled town of Belgium, on the Lys, 54 miles SW. of Brussels by rail, and 6 from the French frontier. It has a fine old bridge flanked with towers, a noble town-hall (1526), belfry, and a beautiful Gothic church, founded in 1238 by Baldwin, Count of Flanders. Table damask, linen, and lace are the chief manufactures. Population, about 36,000. Here, in 1302, the citizens of Ghent and Bruges won over the French the 'Battle of the Spurs,' so named from the number of gilt spurs gathered from the dead.

Coutances (Kooton'ss), a town in the French dep. of La Manche, 5 miles from the English Channel and 57 S. of Cherbourg by rail. It has a fine cathedral. Pop. 6000.

Coutras (Kootrah'), a town in the dep. of Gironde, 32 miles NE. of Bordeaux. Here, in 1587, Henry of Navarre defeated the League. Pop. 4000.

Cove, a Kincardineshire fishing-village, 4¾ miles S. by E. of Aberdeen.

Cove and Kilcreggan, a Dumbartonshire police burgh, at the end of the Rosneath peninsula, 3½ miles by water NW. of Greenock. Pop. 900.

Coventry, a city, parliamentary, municipal, and county borough, and manufacturing town in the north of Warwickshire, on the Sherbourne, an affluent of the Avon, 18½ miles ESE. of Birmingham, and 94 NW. of London. It stands on a gentle eminence in a valley, with a ridge of hill on the south, and still contains some houses with timbered projecting fronts which belong to the 15th and 16th centuries. The modern buildings include a corn exchange, market-hall, baths, Free Public Library, School of Art, new grammar and other schools, many automobile and bicycle works, the Coventry and Warwickshire Hospital, and the Coventry Provident Dispensary. Coventry is rich in benevolent and charitable institutions, which have been greatly augmented by the benefactions of the late David Spencer. In 1887 he provided a building for a technical school; in 1883 he had given £4200 for a public recreation ground; and at his death (June 9, 1888) he bequeathed £100,000 for benevolent purposes. A statue of Sir Thomas White has been erected, and a memorial of James Starley, the inventor of the tricycle. At a cost of many thousands of pounds the principal streets have been widened, and an electric tramway runs through the city. Of the churches of Tennyson's 'three tall spires,' St Michael's (1230–1395) is said to be the largest parish church in England, and is one of the noblest of the lighter Gothic structures. Among many old buildings are Ford's and Bond's hospitals, with fine woodwork. St Mary's Hall (14th c.), for the Guild, is one of the finest specimens of ornamental work in England, with carved oak roof, ancient tapestry, and great painted window. Coventry returns one member to parliament. The chief manufactures are ribbons, watches, bicycles, motor-cars, cotton, worsted, and woollen goods, art metal works, engineering and ordnance works, and large silk-dyeing works. Coal is mined in the district and within the borough. Pop. (1901) 69,978; (1911) 106,349.

The name Coventry has been interpreted 'Convent-town' and 'town on the Couen,' Couen being explained as the Sherborne, but it is more likely to be 'Cofa's tree' (Cofan treo), though who Cofa may have been is quite unknown. In 1043 Earl Leofric and his wife, Lady Godiva, founded here a magnificent Benedictine monastery. Henry VIII. demolished the beautiful cathedral. Here occurred the famous meeting for the intended trial by battle between the Dukes of Norfolk and Hereford, immortalised in Shakespeare's Richard II. Two memorable parliaments were also held here in 1404 and 1459. In the 15th, 16th, and 17th centuries, Coventry was famous for woollens, broadcloths, caps, and blue thread bonnets. 'George Eliot' lived in Foleshill Road during 1841–42. See books by Miss Harris (1898–1911).

Covilhão, a Portuguese town, 103 miles by rail NNE. of Abrantes; pop. 16,000.

Covington, a city of Kentucky, on the Ohio, opposite Cincinnati, with which it is connected by a fine suspension bridge. It has distilleries, and manufactures of glass-ware, nails, and tobacco. Pop. 53,000.

Cowbridge, a mun. borough of Glamorganshire, on the Ddaw, 12 miles W. of Cardiff (17 by rail), with which and Llantrissant it returns one member. It has a grammar-school (1678). Pop. 1200.

Cowdenbeath, a coal-mining police burgh of Fife, 2 miles WSW. of Lochgelly; pop. 14,000.

Cowdenknowes. See EARLSTON.

Cowdray House. See MIDHURST.

Cowes, a watering-place in the north corner of the Isle of Wight, 11½ miles SSE. of Southampton by water, and 4 N. of Newport by rail. It consists of West and East Cowes, lying on opposite sides of the mouth of the Medina's estuary, and connected by steam-ferry. Standing on a hill-slope, West Cowes is the headquarters of the Royal Yacht Club (1815). Their club-house was originally a fort (1540). Yacht-building is the great speciality of Cowes, which has a fine promenade (1864), excellent hotels, baths, villas, &c. Slatwoods at East Cowes was Dr Arnold's birthplace, and in the vicinity are East Cowes Castle (1798), Norris Castle (1799), and Osborne House (1845). The last, built for Queen Victoria, was converted by Edward VII. into a convalescent hospital for naval and military officers, and contains the Royal Naval College. Pop. of West Cowes, 10,000; of East Cowes, 5000.

Cowie, a fishing-village near Stonehaven.

Cowlairs', a N. suburb of Glasgow, with great railway works.

Cowley, a S. suburb of Oxford, giving name to the Anglican mission order of the 'Cowley Fathers' (1865).

Cowpen, a Northumberland township, with coal-pits, at the mouth of the river Blyth, since 1907 part of the urban district of Blyth.

Cowslip Green, Hannah More's home, Somerset, 10 miles SSW. of Bristol.

Coxhoe Hall, the birthplace of Mrs Browning, 5½ miles SSE. of Durham.

Coxwold, a Yorkshire parish, 7½ miles SE. of Thirsk. Sterne was its parson.

Coyle, an Ayrshire stream, flowing 14½ miles through Kyle to the Ayr.

Cracow (Pol. Krakov, Ger. Krakau), a city of Austrian Galicia, 259 miles NE. of Vienna. It stands 672 feet above sea-level, in a wide, hill-girt plain on the left bank of the Vistula, which here becomes navigable, and is spanned by a bridge (1850) leading to Podgorze. The old walls, converted into promenades, have been superseded by a line of detached forts. On the Wawel rock rises the old castle of the Polish kings, degraded now to a barrack. The neighbouring cathedral (1320–59) is a splendid pile, containing the graves of John Sobieski, Poniatowski, and Kosciusko, with Thorwaldsen's statue of Christ. The university (1364) was reorganised and reopened in 1817, and now is attended by about 3000 students. Cracow has important fairs, and its trade and manufactures (chemicals, tobacco, beer, agricultural implements, &c.) have greatly revived. Three miles west of the city is a grassy mound, 150 feet high, reared in 1820–23 to the memory of Kosciusko. Pop. (1869) 49,835; (1890) 74,593; (1910) 151,300. Cracow was the Polish capital from 1320 till 1609. On the third partition of Poland (1795) it was assigned to Austria. In 1809–15 it was part of the duchy of Warsaw, and in 1815–45 a republic; but in 1846 it was re-annexed to Austria.

Cradock, a town and health-resort of the Cape, 2800 feet above the sea, in the upper valley of the Great Fish River, and half-way between Port Elizabeth and Colesberg. It is a centre of the wool trade. Pop. 7500.

Craigcrook, Lord Jeffrey's seat, 3¼ miles W. of Edinburgh.

Craigell'achie, (1) a Speyside village of Banffshire, 13 miles SSE. of Elgin.—(2) A Speyside height that 'stands fast' near Aviemore.

Craigendor'an, a steamboat pier, Dumbartonshire, 1 mile SE. of Helensburgh.

Craigenputtock, Carlyle's moorland home (1828–34), 15 miles WNW. of Dumfries.

Craig Gowan, a height (1437 feet) near Balmoral, with cairns to the royal family.

Craighall, NEW, a collier village of Midlothian, 2 miles WSW. of Musselburgh.

Craigmillar, a fine ruined castle (1427–1661), 3 miles SE. of Edinburgh.

Craignethan, a ruined castle (Scott's 'Tillietudlem') in Lanarkshire, 5½ miles WNW. of Lanark.

Craigneuk, part of Wishaw (q.v.).

Craigphadrick. See INVERNESS.

Crail an antique little coast-town in the 'East Neuk' of Fife, 2½ miles WSW. of Fife Ness, and 10 SE. of St Andrews. There is a fragment of a castle of David I.; and an interesting church, in which Knox preached, and of which Sharp was minister. A royal burgh since 1306, Crail with St Andrews, &c. returns an M.P. Pop. 1000.

Craiova. See KRAJOVA.

Cramond, a village at the Almond's influx to the Firth of Forth, 5 miles WNW. of Edinburgh.

Cranborne, a Dorset town, 9 miles NNE. of Wimborne. Pop. of parish, 700.

Cranbrook, a pleasant little market-town in the Weald of Kent, 46 miles SE. of London. It has a fine Perpendicular church, and a large trade in hops. From the 14th to the 17th century it was the centre of the broadcloth manufacture introduced by the Flemings. Pop. of parish, 4000. See Tarbutt's Annals of Cranbrook (1875).

Cranganore (Kodungalúr), a town in Cochin state, on the west coast of southern India. It stands on an opening of the Cochin backwater, 18 miles N. of Cochin town. Pop. 10,000.

Cranston, a town of Rhode Island, 4 miles by rail SW. of Providence, with calico and woollen works, &c. Pop. 18,400.

Crarae, a place with granite quarries on Loch Fyne, 9½ miles SSW. of Inveraray.

Craven Arms, Shropshire, a junction, 20 miles S. of Shrewsbury.

Crécy-en-Ponthieu, or CRESSY, a village in the French dep. of Somme, on the Maye, 12 miles N. of Abbeville. Here, on 26th August 1346, Edward III. won a great victory over the French.

Crediton, or KIRKTON, a Devon town, on the Creedy, a tributary of the Exe, 7 miles NW. of Exeter. It suffered much by fire in 1743 and 1769, but its church is a fine old cruciform structure. The traditional birthplace of St Boniface, the apostle of Germany, Crediton was the seat from 910 to 1050 of a bishopric, transferred then to Exeter. Its woollen manufactures are a thing of the past. Pop. 3600.

Creedmoor, part of New York, on Long Island.

Creetown, a Kirkcudbrightshire seaport, 4 miles NE. of Wigtown; pop. 900.

Creil, a French manufacturing town in Oise, and 22 miles SE. of Beauvais, where metal-work and earthenware are largely produced; pop. 9000.

Crema (Kray'ma), a cathedral city of Lombardy, 27 miles NW. of Cremona by rail; pop. 10,000.

Cremo'na, a decayed city of northern Italy, on the north bank of the Po, 60 miles SE. of Milan by rail. Among its buildings are the cathedral (1107–1606), with gorgeous interior; the neighbouring octagonal Baptistery; the Palazzo Pubblico (1245); the Campo Santo; and the famous Torrazzo (1288) or belfry—the loftiest campanile in Italy, 396 feet high. It has a river traffic, and manufactures of silk, cotton, earthenware, and chemicals; in the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries it was greatly celebrated for its violins, the most famous makers being the Amati, Stradivarius, and the Guarnieri. Pop. 40,400.

Creran, an Argyllshire sea-loch, curving 8 miles to Loch Linnhe.

Cressy. See CREÇY.

Creston, a town of Iowa, 115 miles W. of Ottumwa. It has machine-shops and railway-carriage works. Pop. 7000.

Crete (Ital. Candia, Gr. Krētē), a Greek island in the Mediterranean, was under Turkish suzerainty till the war of 1912–13. It is 60 miles S. of Cape Malea in Greece, 110 SW. of Cape Krio in Asia Minor, 100 SSW. of Rhodes, and 300 W. of Cyprus. Its length is 156 miles; its breadth varies from 30 to as little as 7 miles; and its area is 3326 sq. m., or twice the size of Hampshire. The climate is excellent; the rainfall about 27 inches. Crete is for the most part mountainous, especially in the west, where stand the White Mountains. In the centre Mount Ida, now called Upsiloriti, attains 8055 feet. Everywhere the numerous small valleys are exceedingly fertile. The rivers are dried up in summer; but springs abound all over the island. The coast-line, deeply indented on the north, includes some good harbours, as Suda Bay on the north, and on the south Kaloi Limenes or the Fair Havens (Acts, xxvii. 8). Three neighbouring islands are Clauda or Gavdo, off the south-west coast, 15 sq. m. in area, with a lighthouse; Dia; and Grabusa. Wheat and fruit are the most important products. Oranges and lemons particularly flourish. The grapes are good, but the wine, though abundant, is very inferior. The forests have almost entirely disappeared; but on the hills the cypress flourishes, and in the plain country the olive is the most important tree. The principal exports are olive-oil, soap, carobs, wool, cheese, valonia, acorns, and fruits. Sheep are largely bred, and the wool is exported. Sponges are found upon the coast. Pop. 344,000, mostly of Greek descent, 28,000 being Moslems. The Cretans are a turbulent race, of proverbial mendacity, bold and independent. Crete had once, according to Homer, 'a hundred cities;' there are now but three towns: Candia, pop. 25,000; Retimo, 9000; and Canea or Khania, 24,000. Crete was subdued by the Romans (67 B.C.), by the Venetians (1205), and by the Turks (1669). A series of rebellions ended in 1897 in the intervention of the powers, the expulsion of the Turkish officials, and the constitution of Crete an autonomous state under Turkish suzerainty and a Greek commissioner. After various attempts at union, Crete was allowed to become Greek in 1912–13. Since 1900 there have been momentous excavations at Knossos and elsewhere. See works by Spratts (1865), Edwardes (1887), Evans (1896–1909), Bickford Smith (1897), and Freese (1897).

Creuse (nearly Krehz), a river and a dep. in central France. The river flows 146 miles north-westward to the Vienne, a tributary of the Loire.—The dep., with an area of 2150 sq. m., has a pop. of 266,000.

Creusot, Le (Kreh-zo'), a town in the French dep. of Saône-et-Loire, 14 miles SSE. of Autun, and 236 SSE. of Paris. It owes its importance to the huge ironworks (1837) of Schneider & Co., at which cannon are largely made. Pop. 35,600.

Crèvecœur (Krehv-kehr'; Fr., 'heart-breaker'), a once famous Dutch fort at the confluence of the Meuse and Dieze, 4 miles NNW. of Bois-le-Duc. It figures in history 1587–1794.—The same name is borne by French villages in Nord and in Oise, and a ruined castle near Dinant.

Crevillenté (Kray-vil-yen'teh), a town of Spain, 20 miles WSW. of Alicante; pop. 12,000.

Crewe, a town of Cheshire, with a great railway junction and the huge works (1843) of the London and North-western Railway, to which it owes its present importance. It is 158 miles NW. of London, 43 SE. of Liverpool, 31 SSW. of Manchester, and 53 NW. of Birmingham. About 1840 there were only two or three houses where Crewe now stands; but since then its pop. has grown to 4500 in 1851, 17,800 in 1871, and 45,000 in 1911. Naturally Crewe is not an attractive place; still, the L. & NW. Company have erected many handsome buildings, done much in the way of sanitation, and in 1887–88 presented the town with a beautiful park of 40 acres. Crewe was incorporated in 1877, and the borough boundary was extended in 1892. Lord Crewe's seat, Crewe Hall, by Inigo Jones, was burnt in 1866, but has been since rebuilt.

Crewkerne, a Somerset urban district, in the fertile valley of the Parret, 15 miles SE. of Taunton. It has a cruciform Perpendicular church, with a splendid west front; a grammar-school (1499), occupying new buildings; and manufactures of sailcloth, girth-web, hair-seating, &c. Pop. 4000.

Criccieth (Krik'ki-eth), a Carnarvonshire watering-place, one of the five Carnarvon (q.v.) boroughs, on Cardigan Bay, 4 miles W. by S. of Tremadoc: pop. 1400.

Crichton (now Krī-ton; formerly Krihh'ton), a fine ruined castle of Midlothian, on the Tyne, 5 miles ESE. of Dalkeith. It figures in Marmion.

Crickhowell, a market-town of Brecknockshire, on the Usk, 13 miles SE. of Brecknock; pop of parish, 1200.

Cricklade, a town in Wiltshire, on the Isis or Thames, 7 miles NNW. of Swindon. Enfranchised under Edward I., it returned two members till 1885, the 'borough' since 1782 having included forty-four parishes and parts of six others, with a pop. of 51,000. Population of rural district (Cricklade and Wootton Bassett), 11,000.

Crieff (Kreeff), a Perthshire town, on the Earn's left bank, 18 m. W. of Perth by two branch-lines opened in 1856–66. It is situated in the midst of exquisite scenery, enjoys a pure dry climate, has a large hydropathic (1867), two old market-crosses, and Morrison's Academy (1859). Of many neighbouring seats, Drummond Castle (1491), Lord Willoughby de Eresby's, is famous for its gardens. Pop. 5600.

Criffel, a Kirkcudbrightshire hill (1867 feet), 2¼ miles S. by W. of Newabbey.

Crime'a (Tatar Krym, anciently the Tauric Chersonese), a peninsula of South Russia, between the Black Sea and Sea of Azov, joined to the continent of Russia by the Isthmus of Perekop, 18½ miles long by 5½ miles broad at its narrowest part, a canal through which was undertaken in 1888. The peninsula is 200 miles from east to west, by 125 miles from north to south, with 625 miles of coast-line, and an area of about 10,000 sq. m. Along the Siwash or Putrid Sea on the north, and the Sea of Azov, the coasts are flat and open. To the west of the wide bay of Kaffa or Theodosia the south coast becomes rocky and elevated, and forms a succession of capes and small gulfs. Balaklava, and more especially Sebastopol, have fine harbours. Limestone mountains from Cape Chersonese to Baffa Bay show deep erosion, presenting the ruins of a vast tableland, sloping gently northwards into the steppe, but hanging in abrupt precipices southwards. Chatîr Dagh or Tent Mount (anc. Mons Trapezus, 'table mount'), is the highest summit, 5450 feet. In the hilly district about Kertch are thermal and naphtha springs, and mud volcanoes. There are some fifty small rivers and rivulets, and four hundred salt lakes. The climate is healthy, and generally mild, but in winter the steppe is exposed to cold winds, frost, and snowstorms, while the south coast is sheltered and warm. The steppe, though not fertile, yet grazes innumerable herds of cattle, and yields porphyries and various coloured marbles. The northern mountain-slopes are laid out in pastures, thickets, orchards, and gardens watered from the rivers. In the uplands are still magnificent forests of oak, beech, elm, ash, willow, &c. On the southern slopes are famous health-resorts, with Livadia and other imperial residences. Good wine is largely produced, and some exported. Though the Crimea was once famous for its corn, it has suffered greatly from drought, and much good land is now uncultivated. Good coal is mined; an extensive field was opened in 1888. The population numbers about 900,000, of whom most are Tatars, 250,000 Russians, and the rest Greeks, Jews, Bulgarians, Germans, &c. The capital is Simferopol, the old Tatar capital being Bakchiserai. For Englishmen the peninsula's chief interest is in the Crimean War (1854–55), when Britain, France, and Sardinia defeated the Russians, at a cost to the first of 20,656 lives.

See J. B. Telfer, The Crimea and Transcaucasia (1876), and histories of the war by Kinglake (8 vols. 1863–87) and Hamley (1891).

Crinan Canal, 9 miles long, in Argyllshire, between Loch Gilp, a branch of Loch Fyne, and Loch Crinan, in the Sound of Jura, at the head of the peninsula of Kintyre. Constructed in 1793–1801 at a cost of £183,000, it is 24 feet broad and 10 deep, has 15 locks, and admits vessels of 200 tons.

Croaghpatrick (Kro-patrick), a mountain (2510 feet) of County Mayo, 4 miles SW. of Westport, connected with the story of St Patrick.

Croätia and Slavonia (Hung. Horvát-Szlavonország), form since 1881, together with their former 'Military Frontier,' a crown-land belonging to the Hungarian section of Austria, lying between the Adriatic Sea on the SW., where Croatia has a seaboard of about 84 miles, and Hungary on the NE. Area, 16,352 sq. m.; pop. about 2,600,000. The surface of Croatia falls mainly into a wooded mountain district, attaining 5751 feet. The province belongs to the basin of the Danube, its most important rivers being the Drave and Save. In Slavonia extensive marshes are found along the main rivers. Warm mineral springs are numerous, and earthquakes, especially about Agram, are frequent. The Adriatic coast is poorly supplied with harbours. The people are Slavs. Agram is the capital.

Croisic, Le (Krwah-seek'), a seaport in the French dep. of Loire-Inférieure, 20 miles W. of St Nazaire by rail. Pop. 2400.

Crom'arty, a town and naval station of Ross and Cromarty, on the Cromarty Firth, 2 miles from its entrance, and 19 NNE. of Inverness. Nothing remains of the old stronghold of the Urquharts, the most famous of whom was Rabelais' translator, Sir Thomas. Hugh Miller was a native. With Wick, &c., Cromarty returns a member to parliament. Pop. 2000.—Cromarty Firth, a land-locked inlet, extends 19½ miles north-eastward and eastward to the Moray Firth. It forms a noble harbour, 1 mile to 7¾ miles broad, and 5 to 35 fathoms deep; receives at its head the Conon; and narrows at its entrance to 7 furlongs, between the beetling North and South Sutors, 400 and 463 feet high. On its shores are the towns of Dingwall, Invergordon, and Cromarty.—Crom'artyshire, once a Scottish county, 369 sq. m. in area, consisting of ten detached portions scattered up and down Ross-shire, with which, under the Local Government (Scotland) Act of 1889, it is finally incorporated. It comprised the ancient sheriffdom of Cromarty, and outlying bits annexed thereto towards the close of the 17th century at the instigation of Viscount Tarbat (created Earl of Cromarty, 1703), who wished thus to hold jurisdiction over every part of his estates. See Sir W. Fraser's Earls of Cromarty (2 vols. 1876).

Cromdale, in Elginshire, on the right bank of the Spey, 5 miles NE. of Grantown. Here, on 1st May 1690, 800 Jacobite Highlanders were surprised and routed by a body of dragoons.

Cromer, a pleasant watering-place of Norfolk, 23 miles N. of Norwich by rail (1877). The sea has made great encroachments on the cliffs since 1350, though the town itself is now protected by a sea-wall, formed in 1877, with an esplanade and a jetty, at a cost of nearly £10,000. There are capital sands and golf-links (1887), and the church has a noble flint-work tower of 160 feet. Pop. of urban district, 4000. Lord Cromer (Sir Evelyn Baring) was born here. See W. Rye's Cromer Past and Present (1889).

Cromford, a town of Derbyshire, on the Derwent, 2 miles N. by E. of Wirksworth. Arkwright migrated hither in 1771. Pop. 1000.

Crompton, a northern suburb of Oldham.

Cronstadt, a strongly fortified Russian seaport, 20 miles W. of St Petersburg, on a narrow island 7 miles long, at the narrowest part of the Gulf of Finland, and over against the mouth of the Neva. Founded by Peter the Great in 1710, it is at once a great naval station and the most flourishing commercial port of Russia. It is the seat of the Russian Admiralty; has three harbours; and since 1884 has been connected with St Petersburg by a ship-canal 207 feet wide and 22 feet deep. Cronstadt contains a cathedral, a statue of Peter the Great, and a British seamen's hospital (1867). Pop. 62,000.

Cronstadt, in Hungary. See Kronstadt.

Crookhaven, a fishing-village of County Cork, 30 miles SW. of Skibbereen.

Crookston Castle, a ruined castle of Renfrewshire, 5¼ miles ESE. of Paisley. Darnley's betrothal to Queen Mary is falsely placed here.

Cropredy Bridge, near Banbury, gives name to Charles I.'s defeat of Waller (29th June 1644).

Crosby, Great, a watering-place 6½ miles N. by W. of Liverpool. Pop. 12,300.

Crossmaglen', an Armagh market-town, 3 miles NE. of Culloville. Pop. 800.

Crossraguel, a ruined Clugniac abbey (1244) in Ayrshire, 2 miles SW. of Maybole.

Cross River. See Calabar.

Crosthwaite, the parish containing Keswick (q.v.). In its churchyard is Southey's grave.

Crotona, or Croton. See Cortona.

Croton River. See New York City.

Crowborough, a village in East Sussex, 2 miles E. of Crowborough Beacon (804 feet). Pop. 5000.

Crowland, or Croyland, a Lincolnshire market-town, on the Welland, in the Fens, 10 miles NNE. of Peterborough. Here in 716 King Ethelwald founded a monastery, which, restored in 1113, became a mitred Benedictine abbey of singular magnificence. The north aisle of its church now serves as the parish church; the so-called 'triangular' bridge, now waterless, was built by an abbot about 1380. Pop. of parish, 2700. See Perry's Crowland Abbey (1867).

Crowle, an urban district of Lincolnshire, 7 miles E. by S. of Thorne. Pop. 3000.

Crown Point, a village of New York, on Lake Champlain. A British fort here was captured by Colonel Ethan Allen in 1775.

Croydon, a town in Surrey, 10½ miles S. of London Bridge, yet practically a suburb of London. It lies on the edge of the chalk and plastic clay, near the Banstead Downs, at the source of the Wandle, hence its name Croindene 'chalkhill') in Domesday. The archbishops of Canterbury had a palace here from the Conquest till 1757. Its Perpendicular hall (1452) and chapel (1633–63) were purchased by the Duke of Newcastle in 1887 and presented to the Sisters of the Church Extension Association. Addington Park, 3½ miles ESE., was from 1807 till 1897 the summer seat of the archbishops. Addiscombe House, at one time the residence of the first Earl of Liverpool, was converted in 1812 into the East India Military College, but was pulled down in 1863. The fine old Perpendicular parish church was destroyed by fire in January 1867, with the exception of the tower; but was rebuilt by Sir Gilbert Scott, and retains the monument of Archbishop Sheldon, with fragments of that of Archbishop Grindal. That of Archbishop Whitgift was restored in 1888 at a cost of £600. Whitgift's Hospital (1596) is a red brick quadrangular pile, whilst his grammar-school now occupies buildings of 1871, besides a large Whitgift middle school. Till the 18th century Croydon was famous for its 'colliers' or charcoal-burners; now its chief specialty is the manufacture of church clocks and carillons. It was made a municipal borough in 1883, a parliamentary one in 1885, and a county borough in 1888. Pop. (1851) 10,260; (1861) 20,325; (1871) 55,652; (1881) 78,953; (1891) 102,695; (1901) 133,895; (1911) 169,551.

Cuba, the most westerly and largest of the West Indian islands, since 1902 an independent republic, stretches in the form of a long narrow crescent, convex on the north side, at the entrance of the Gulf of Mexico, which it divides into two channels—the north-west, 124 miles wide, and the south-west, 98 miles at its narrowest part. Cuba is 759 miles long from east to west, with a breadth varying from 27 miles to 90 miles, a coast-line of 1976 miles, and an area of 44,000 sq. m. The shores are low and in many parts beset by reefs and banks, but there are numerous excellent havens. A watershed running lengthwise through the island, rises into mountainous heights only in the south-east, where the Sierra de Maestra in the Pico de Tarquino attains 8400 feet. The mountains, containing minerals, especially copper and iron, are wooded to the summits. The limestone rocks abound in caverns, with magnificent stalactites. Mineral waters are plentiful. The rivers, running north and south, are navigable for only a few miles by small boats, but are very serviceable for irrigation. The climate, more temperate than in the other West Indian Islands, is healthy in the elevated interior, but the coasts are the haunt of fever and ague. No month of the year is free from rain, the greatest rainfall being in May, June, and July. Earthquakes are frequent in the east; and a hurricane in 1846 demolished 1872 houses and sank 216 vessels. The soil is eminently fertile, a large part still covered with virgin forest containing magnificent mahogany, cedar, &c. Among the cultivated products are sugar, tobacco, coffee, cacao, rice, maize, cotton, esculent roots, and tropical fruits. The rivers and seas are well stocked with fish, and turtles abound in the shallows and sandy places of the beach. Sugar has long been the chief product; and there are some 1600 sugar plantations, 8500 tobacco plantations, and 700 coffee plantations.

Cuba, spoken of as the 'Queen of the Antilles,' was discovered in 1492 by Columbus, and first settled by Spaniards at Baracoa in 1511. Havana, founded in 1519, was reduced to ashes by the French in 1538, and again in 1554. In 1762 the English took and held Havana for a year. In 1818 the trade of Cuba was opened to the world, and for some years the island enjoyed unexampled prosperity. During the American civil war Cuba developed its sugar industry. An insurrection against the Spanish authorities went on from 1868 to 1878, a new one broke out in 1895, and the Spanish severities in suppressing it led to the intervention of the United States and the war, disastrous to Spain, of 1898–99. After the war Cuba was occupied by the Americans till 1902, when a separate constitution was given to it as an independent republic, closely connected with the United States by a 'reciprocal commercial convention.' Pop. (1910) 2,220,000. Havana is the capital; other towns are Puerto Principe, Santiago, Matanzas, Cárdenas, and Cienfuegos, united by railway. See works by Gallenga (1873), Goodman, Ballou, Davis (1897), Porter (1899), and Robinson (1905).

Cuchullins, or Coolins, a group of sublimely picturesque mountains in the south of Skye, attaining 3183 feet.

Cuckfield, a Sussex urban district, 12 miles NNW. of Lewes. Pop. 1900.

Cúcuta, San José de, an inland town in the north-east of Colombia, on the Rio Zulia, 35 miles S. of Puerto Villamizar by rail. It was rebuilt after the earthquake of 1875. Pop. 20,000. —Rosario de Cúcuta, to the SE., has also large plantations of coffee and cacao. Pop. 6000.

Cuddalore (Kúdalúr or Gudulúr), the chief town in South Arcot, on the Coromandel or east coast of India, 16 miles S. of Pondicherry. It has a large trade by land with Madras in oils, indigo, and sugar, and exports grain by sea. Cuddalore, for 77 years British, was in 1758 taken by the French, but finally ceded to Britain in 1785. Pop. 53,000.

Cuddapah, a town 161 miles NW. by rail of Madras. Pop. 18,982.

Cuddesdon, a village of Oxfordshire, 6 miles ESE. of Oxford. Here are the palace of the bishops of Oxford, rebuilt by Bishop Fell in 1679, and a theological college (1854).

Cuenca (Kwen-ka), a decayed city of Spain, 85 miles ESE. of Madrid, stands 2960 feet above sea-level, at the confluence of the Jucar and Huecar. It has a very interesting cathedral (1177–1669). Pop. 12,000.—Area of province of Cuenca, 6726 sq. m.; pop. 268,500.

Cuenca, a cathedral city of Ecuador, on the Rio Paute, 190 miles SSW. of Quito, on a fertile tableland, 8469 feet above the sea. Pop. 30,000.

Cuernaváca (Kwernavah'ka), capital of the Mexican state Morelos, 40 miles S. of Mexico City. Near it is the famed teocalli of Xochicalco. Pop. 13,000.

Cuevas de Vera (Kway'vas day Vay'ra), a town in the Spanish province of Almeria, on the Almanzora, 70 miles WSW. of Cartagena. Pop. 24,000.

Culbin, a sandy desert on the Moray Firth, 15 sq. m. in area, about the mouth of the Findhorn. It was formed between 12th and 17th centuries, and some of its drifted sand-hills are 100 ft. high.

Culebra (Coolay'bra), one of the Virgin Islands.

Culenborg, or Kuilenburg, a town of Holland, on the Lek, 11 miles SSE. of Utrecht. Pop. 10,000.

Culiacan', a city of Mexico, on the Rio de Culiacan, 100 miles SE. of Sinaloa. Pop. 14,000.

Cullen, a fishing-town of Banffshire, on the Moray Firth, 67 miles NW. of Aberdeen by railway (1885). Backed by the conical Bin Hill (1050 feet), it has a harbour (1817–34), a cruciform parish church, and Cullen House, a seat of the Earl of Seafield. A royal burgh since about 1200, Cullen unites with Elgin, &c., to return one member. Pop. 2000.

Cullera (Kool-yay′ra), a Spanish port, near the Jucar's mouth, 25 m. SSE. of Valencia. Pop. 13,000.

Cullod′en, or Drummossie Muir, a broad flat sandstone ridge, 300 to 500 feet high, 6 miles ENE. of Inverness. Planting and culture have changed its aspect much since 16th April 1746, when it was the scene of the defeat of Prince Charles Edward by the Duke of Cumberland. Since 1881 a cairn, 20 feet high, marks the battlefield. Within 2 miles stands Culloden House, the seat of Duncan Forbes.

Cullompton, a Devon town, on the Culme, 12½ miles NE. of Exeter. Pop. of parish, 3000.

Culna. See Kalna.

Culross (Koo′ros), a pretty old-world village of Fife (till 1889 Perthshire detached), on the north shore of the Firth of Forth, 7 miles W. by S. of Dunfermline. With memories of SS. Serf and Kentigern, it has remains of a Cistercian abbey (1217, restored 1906), but has lost its manufacture of 'girdles,' its salt-works, shipping, and submarine coal-mines. A royal burgh since 1588, it unites with Stirling, &c., to return one member. Pop. 450. See Beveridge's Culross (1885).

Cults, a Fife parish, the birthplace of Wilkie, 4½ miles SW. of Cupar.

Culzean (Kul-leen′), the Ayrshire seat (1777) of the Marquis of Ailsa, 4½ miles W. of Maybole.

Cumaná, a town of Venezuela, on the Manzanares, a mile above its mouth, where the port of Puerto Sucre lies on the Gulf of Cariaco. It is the oldest European town in South America, having been founded by Columbus's son Diego as New Toledo c. 1521. It was almost destroyed by earthquake in 1853. Pop. 10,000.

Cumania, a region in central Hungary divided into Great Cumania, east of the Theiss, and Little Cumania, between the Danube and the Theiss.

Cumberland, a Border county of England, washed on the W. by the Irish Sea and the Solway Firth. Eleventh in size of the English counties, it has a maximum length of 75 miles, a maximum breadth of 45, and an area of 1520 sq. m. The surface is mountainous in the south-west and east; the middle consists of hills, valleys, and elevated ridges, and the north and north-west districts, including the vale of Carlisle, are low, flat, or gently undulated. The mountains in the south-west are high, rugged, and sterile, with deep and narrow valleys, lakes, rivers, waterfalls, and woodlands. The chief mountains are Scaw Fell Pike (3210 feet), Scaw Fell (3162), Helvellyn (3118), Skiddaw (3058), Bow Fell (2960), and Cross Fell (2892). The largest lakes are Ullswater, Derwentwater, Bassenthwaite, Thirlmere, Buttermere, Wastwater, and Ennerdale. Six of the chief waterfalls are 60 to 156 feet high. The chief rivers are the Eden, the Esk, and the Derwent. Cumberland abounds in mineral wealth—silver, copper, lead, iron, plumbago, gypsum, limestone, coal, slates, marbles, marl, &c. In the mountainous parts the climate is wet and variable, especially from July to October; on the coast it is mild. The annual rainfall ranges from 50 inches to 244 at Styhead Pass (1077 feet). There are many small dairies. The estates are generally small, and farmed by the owners, or held under the lords of the manors by customary tenure. Many of the small proprietors, or 'statesmen,' have had their lands in their families for centuries. The chief towns are Carlisle, Cockermouth, Whitehaven, Workington, Maryport, Wigton, Penrith, Keswick, Egremont. Since 1885 Cumberland returns one member for each of the four divisions, North or Eskdale, Mid or Penrith, Cockermouth, and West or Egremont. Pop. (1801) 117,230; (1841) 178,038; (1911) 265,746. Near Keswick and Kirkoswald are two fine stone circles; and many Roman relics have been found. For centuries part of Cumbria or Strathclyde, the present county was finally annexed to England in 1157. Prior to the union of the crowns, it was the constant scene of war and devastation; and it suffered again in both the '15 and the '45. See Borders, Lake District; and R. S. Ferguson's History of Cumberland (1890).

Cumberland, a river of Kentucky and Tennessee, flowing 650 miles to the Ohio at Smithland—nearly 200 navigable for steamboats. For the Cumberland Mountains, see Kentucky.

Cumberland, (1) capital of Alleghany county, Maryland, on the Potomac, 178 miles W. by N. of Baltimore by rail. It has manufactures of brick, cement, flour, and leather. Pop. 22,000.—(2) The north-easternmost town of Rhode Island, with coal and other minerals. Pop. 10,000.

Cumberland Island (so called) is a peninsula of Baffin Land, extending into Davis Strait.

Cumbernauld, a Dumbartonshire village, 16 miles NE. of Glasgow. Pop. 1200.

Cumbrae, Big or Great, an island of Buteshire, in the Firth of Clyde, 2¼ miles E. of Bute at the narrowest, and 1⅛ mile WSW. of Largs. With the shape of a shark's tooth, it is 3¾ miles long, 2 broad, 10½ in circumference, and 5 sq. m. in area. It rises 417 feet, and consists of Old Red sandstone, with wall-like trap-dykes intersecting it. The Marquis of Bute is sole proprietor. Millport, on the south shore, 19 miles SSW. of Greenock, is a crowded resort in summer. Pop. of Great Cumbrae 1700, including 1600 in Millport.—Little Cumbrae, 1½ mile SSW. of Millport, is barely 1 sq. m. in area. It rises 409 feet, and has a lighthouse (1826). Pop. 13.

Cumbria. See Strathclyde.

Cuminestown, an Aberdeenshire village, 6 miles ESE. of Turriff. Pop. 400.

Cumnock, Old, a town of Ayrshire, on Lugar Water, 18 miles by rail E. of Ayr. The manufacture of wooden snuff-boxes was many years since transferred to Mauchline, and mining is now the chief industry. The Covenanting 'prophet,' Peden (1626–86), lies in the churchyard. Dumfries House (Marquis of Bute) is 2 miles to the west. Pop. 3400.—New Cumnock, on the Nith, 5½ miles SE. of Old Cumnock, has 2000 inhabitants.

Cumnor, a Berkshire village, 3¾ miles WSW. of Oxford. The house in which Amy Robsart was murdered is gone.

Cunaxa, east of the Euphrates, 60 miles N. of Babylon, the battlefield (401 B.C.) where Cyrus the younger, supported by Xenophon and 13,000 Greeks, was defeated by his brother Artaxerxes Mnemon, and slain.

Cundinamarca, a former dep. of Colombia. Area, 80,000 sq. m.; pop. 600,000. The capital was Bogotá, also capital of the republic.

Cunene (Koo-nay′nay), a river of Portuguese West Africa, flowing 600 miles southward and westward to the sea 60 miles north of Cape Frio.

Cuneo. See Coni.

Cunninghame, the northern of the three old divisions of Ayrshire.

Cupar, or Cupar-Fife, the county town of Fife, on the Eden, 10 miles W. by S. of St Andrews, and 30 NNE. of Edinburgh. There is a large corn-market. Lord Campbell was a native. The place has been a royal burgh since 1363 or earlier, and it unites with St Andrews, &c., to return one member. The Macduff earls of Fife had a castle in Cupar in the 12th century. Pop. 4400. See also Coupar-Angus.

Cura, Ciudad de, a town of Venezuela, 60 miles SW. of Carácas. Pop. 12,000.

Curaçao (Koo-ra-sâh'o; also spelt Curaçoa), the most important of the Dutch West India Islands. It lies 40 miles from the coast of Venezuela, is 36 miles long by 8 broad, and has a population of 33,000. The capital is Willemstad, on the Bay of St Anna, with 15,000 inhabitants. The chief produce is salt, but careful cultivation produces sugar, tobacco, maize, figs, cocoa, cocoa-nuts, lemons, and the oranges with which the Curaçoa liqueur is prepared in Holland. The colonial government has authority not merely over the neighbouring Windward Islands, Aruba and Bonaire, but also St Eustache, Saba, and the Dutch part of St Martin. Altogether the Dutch West Indies have a population of about 55,000. Curaçao was discovered by Spain in 1527, taken by the Dutch in 1634, by the English in 1807, and restored to Holland in 1815.

Curicó, a town of Chili, near the Rio Lontué, 140 miles SSE. of Valparaiso. Pop. 20,000.

Curragh, a large undulating down in Ireland, 2 miles E. of Kildare town. It is crown property, and in it is a large camp of exercise, established in 1855. It is even better known as a racecourse.

Currie, a Midlothian village, 6 miles SW. of Edinburgh. Pop. 600.

Curzola (Koortz'ola; anc. Corcyra), a Dalmatian island of the Adriatic, 30 miles long by 5 broad. Pop. 20,000 (7000 in Curzola town in the NE.).

Cusset (Küs-say'), a town 2 miles NE. of Vichy (q.v.), with two mineral springs. Pop. 6000.

Custozza (Koostotz'a), a village 10 miles SW. of Verona, where the Italians have twice—in 1848 and 1866—been utterly defeated by the Austrians.

Cüstrin. See Küstrin.

Cutch (Kachchh), a protected principality under the government of Bombay, stretches along the Gulf of Cutch and the Indian Ocean between Gujarat and Sind. Excluding the Rann of Cutch, it is 160 miles long from E. to W., 30 to 70 broad, and 6500 sq. m. in area. Earthquakes have occurred. The population is about 500,000. The capital is Bhúj. The Rann or Runn of Cutch—subdivided into two parts, the smaller, of nearly 2000 sq. m., on the east, and the larger, of 7000 sq. m., on the north—is a desert, being mainly caked, hard ground during the dry season, and in the rainy a sort of shallow lake. It is supposed to have been originally a permanent inlet of the ocean. The periodical disappearance of the waters leaves behind it one continuous crust of salt.

Cut Hill, a Dartmoor eminence (1971 feet).

Cuttack (Kataka, 'the fort'), a town of Orissa, India, immediately below the bifurcation of the Mahanadi, 220 miles SW. of Calcutta. It is chiefly notable for its filigree-work in gold and silver. Pop. 53,500.

Cuxhaven (Kooks-hâh'fen), a German town, on the Elbe's south bank, at its mouth, 72 miles NW. of Hamburg, to which it belongs. Pop. 15,000.

Cuyabá (Koo-ya-ba'), the capital of the Brazilian province of Matto Grosso, on the Cuyabá River, 980 miles NW. of Rio de Janeiro. Pop. 18,000.

Cuzco (Kooz-ko), a city of Peru, 11,440 feet above sea-level, in a valley of the Andes, 345 miles ESE. of Lima, was the Inca capital, and at its conquest by Pizarro (1533) had 200,000 inhabitants. Now with some 20,000, it is a fine city, with a cathedral (1572–1654), university (1598), and pre-Inca citadel (Sacsahuaman).

Cwmdû (Koom-dü'), a village of Glamorganshire, 6 miles NNW. of Bridgend. Pop. 8000.

Cyc'lades. See Archipelago.

Cydnus, a river of Cilicia, rising on the south side of the Taurus range, and flowing past Tarsus, and a broad sand-choked lagoon, into the sea. Alexander nearly lost his life through bathing in it when overheated.

Cynon, a river of South Wales, flowing 18 miles to the Taff.

Cyprus (Gr. Kupros, Turk. Gibris, Fr. Chypre, Ital. Cipro), a Mediterranean island. 60 miles W. of Syria, and 40 S. of Asia Minor, nominally belonging to Turkey, but actually occupied and administered by Britain. Its extreme length is 140 miles, of which 40 consist of the Carpas peninsula; the extreme breadth is 60 miles; and the area is 3600 sq. m., or a little larger than Norfolk and Suffolk together. The northern of two principal ranges of mountains extends from Cape St Andreas, at the extreme east, almost as far as Cape Kormakiti. Its highest mountains (including St Hilarion, 3340 feet) are north of Nicosia. South of this range is the great Messaorian plain, once famous for its cereals. The western range occupies great part of the western and south-western districts; its highest mountain is Mount Troödos (6352 feet), one of whose peaks bears the classic name of Olympus. Larnaca and Limassol, the chief seaports, are open, shallow roadsteads. The rivers only flow after heavy rain or the melting of the snow in the hills. The towns are Nicosia (the capital), Larnaca, Limassol, Famagusta, Papho, and Kyrenia. Population 274,000, of whom 56,500 are Mohammedan and Turkish-speaking, the rest mostly professing the Orthodox or Greek religion, and speaking Greek. Cyprus produces wheat, barley, carobs or locust beans, cotton, silk, flax, tobacco, madder, wool, gypsum, oranges, pomegranates, sponges, gum-mastic, and immense quantities of wine.

Cyprus was once celebrated for its copper-mines, which were worked by the Phœnicians and Romans; indeed the word 'copper' is derived from the name of the island. A little is still mined. Gypsum or plaster of Paris is manufactured and exported. Salt is produced by evaporation. The climate of Cyprus has been unduly vilified. Though some parts are malarious, for people who live regular lives and take reasonable precautions, the climate is not only healthy but pleasant. The people are healthy and well grown; the men, as a rule, handsome, the women rarely so. Among wild animals the moufflon or Cyprus sheep is becoming very scarce. Mules of peculiar excellence are bred. The forests (for which Cyprus was once famous) have well-nigh disappeared, and the climate and fertility of the country have greatly suffered in consequence; flocks of goats prevent any natural growth of trees on the mountains. Locusts, a greater scourge, are now almost exterminated.—Successively held by Phœnicians, Egyptians, Persians, and Egyptians again, till in 58 B.C. it became a Roman province, Cyprus at the division of the empire naturally belonged to the eastern half. Richard I. in 1195 sold it to Guy de Lusignan; in 1487 it fell to Venice; and in 1570 it was conquered by the Turks. Since 1878 it has been occupied by Britain, and in 1882 had a constitution granted it. Britain agreed to pay the Sultan a sum ultimately fixed at £87,800 (as excess of revenue), and £5000 for state lands, besides a large quantity of salt; but these sums are not actually paid over, but are retained as part payment for losses in connection with the Turkish guaranteed loan. See works by Cesnola (1877), A. H. Lang (1878), Hepworth Dixon (1879), Baker (1879), Mallock (1889), Fyler (1899), Hackett (1901), Cobham (1908).

Cyrene, a ruined city of North Africa, the capital of Cyrenaica. See BARCA.

Czaslau (Tchas'low; Czech Cáslav), a town of Bohemia, 40 miles ESE. of Prague by rail. In its church the Hussite leader Ziska was buried; and here Frederick the Great defeated the Austrians in 1742. Pop. 10,500.

Czegled (Tseg'led), a market-town of Hungary, 47 miles SE. of Budapest by rail. Pop. 34,000.

Czenstochau (Tchen'sto-how), or CZENSTOCHOWA, a town of Poland, 148 miles SW. of Warsaw by rail. A Catholic monastery (c. 1382) is visited yearly by over 50,000 pilgrims, as possessing the famous 'Black Virgin,' a murky Byzantine painting ascribed to St Luke. Pop. 70,000.

Czernowitz (Tcher-no'vitz), capital of the province of Bukowina, near the right bank of the Pruth, 165 miles SE. of Lemberg by rail. It has the palace of a Greek archbishop (1875); his cathedral (1864), on the model of St Isaac's at St Petersburg; an Armenian church (1875); a synagogue (1877); the 'Austria Monument' (1875); and a university (1875) with about 500 students. Pop. 90,000.

DACCA, a city of Bengal, 150 miles NE. of Calcutta, on the north bank of the Buriganga. From 1610 to 1704 capital of Mohammedan Bengal, it was from 1905 till 1911 headquarters of Eastern Bengal and Assam, thereafter second capital of Bengal. The suburbs formerly extended 15 miles northward, where mosques and brick buildings are still found buried in thick jungle. In the 18th century it became widely celebrated for its delicate muslins; but after 1817 this trade declined, under the competition of Manchester piece-goods, and the aspect of the city changed with the disastrous decay of its staple industry. The general development, however, of trade throughout the presidency, and the opening of the State Railway in 1886, has brought back a share of its former prosperity. A small colony of muslin-weavers still survives, and other manufactures are coarse cotton cloth, embroidery, silver-work, shell-carving, and pottery. Dacca was chosen in 1912 to be the seat of a teaching university. Pop. 108,500.

Dacia, the land of the ancient Daci or Getæ, including the country between the Danube, the Theiss, the Carpathians, and the Pruth.

Daer Water. See CLYDE.

Daghestan ('mountain-land'), a triangular territory of Ciscaucasia, between the Caucasus and the west coast of the Caspian Sea. Area, 11,425 sq. m.; pop. 676,000.

Dago, an island near the entrance of the Gulf of Finland, forming part of the Russian government of Esthonia. Area, 367 sq. m.; pop. 15,000.

Dagupan, an important commercial town of Luzon, Philippine Islands, in the Lingayen Gulf, connected with Manila by rail. Pop. 20,500.

Dahlak, three islands, with many smaller rocks, in the Red Sea, off Massowah.

Dahna. See ARABIA.

Dahomey, a French dependency in Africa, extending inland from the Slave Coast, bordering on Yoruba. The seaboard is confined to a district of 35 miles; and the long lagoon which, shut in from the ocean by a protecting bank of sand, affords an easy route along nearly the whole of this coast. About midway is the port of Kotonu, whence a railway extends to the Niger. Dense forests and dismal swamps cover nearly two-thirds of the tract between the coast and Abomey, but from the Great Swamp of Agrimé vast undulating plains rise for many miles, in the direction of the Kong Mountains. The Avon and Denham lagoons receive the rivers. The soil is extremely fertile. Groves of oil-palms encircle each town, and palm-oil is made in large quantities. Cotton cloth is made, and weapons and tools are forged from native iron. The Dahoman kingdom dates from the beginning of the 18th century, and reached its zenith about 1850. Fetich-worship prevailed, taking the form of serpent-worship on the coast; and wholesale murder was one of the chief features in religious and state ceremonies, as many as 500 human victims having been sacrificed at one of the grand 'customs' which took place annually. The revenue depended largely upon the sale of slaves. The French established a footing on the coast in 1851, and gradually extended their influence till, in 1894, the whole kingdom was taken in. The colony comprises, besides the native kingdom of Dahomey, all the French possessions between British Nigeria and German Togo. Area, 36,000 sq. m.; pop. 800,000. There are about 70 miles of coast. The capital is Kotonu or Cotonou (q.v.). Other centres are Abomey (the former capital), Allada, Agone, Grand Popo, Porto Novo (the former French capital), Whydah, and Nikki. The annual imports and exports (palm kernels and oil) reach a value of 35,000,000 francs. See works by Aubley (1894), Lee (1900), and Ellis (1890).

Dahra, a district of Algeria, to the east of Mostaganem, and near the coast.

Dailly, an Ayrshire village, on Girvan Water, 2 miles SSW. of Maybole. Pop. 600.

Daimiel, a town of Spain, 28 miles ENE. of Ciudad Real by rail. Pop. 12,000.

Dairen, or TAIREN (Russ. Dalny, Chin. Talien-wan), a great free port and Trans-Siberian railway terminus, capital of the Japanese leased territory of Kwantung, in Liao-tung, built by Russia (1899), and taken by Japan (1904). It trades in soy beans and silk. Pop. 50,000.

Dakar, a naval station with a magnificent harbour in Senegal, opposite the island of Goree (q.v.), capital of French West Africa, and terminus of the railway towards Timbuctoo. Pop. 25,000.

Dako'ta. See North and South Dakota.

Dalbeattie, a Kirkcudbrightshire town, near Urr Water, 15 miles SW. of Dumfries. Founded in 1780, it owed its importance to the neighbouring Craignair granite quarries (now largely exhausted). Pop. 3300.

Dalecarlia, or Dalarné, an old province of central Sweden, now the county of Kopparberg.

Dalgety, proposed as capital of the Australian Commonwealth, but set aside, is in the SE. corner of New South Wales, 296 miles SW. of Sydney.

Dalhousie Castle, the seat of the Earl of Dalhousie, in Midlothian, on the South Esk, 2¼ miles S. by W. of Dalkeith.

Dalias, a Spanish mining town, 18 miles WSW. of Almeria. Pop. 10,000.

Dalkeith, a town of Midlothian, 6 miles SE. of Edinburgh, on a tongue of land between the North and South Esks. There is a large corn exchange (1855); of nearly a dozen places of worship the only old one is the parish church, collegiate once, of which Norman Macleod was minister. Dalkeith Palace, a seat of the Duke of Buccleuch, is a Grecian edifice, built in 1700 by Sir John Vanbrugh for Monmouth's widowed duchess. Professor Tait was born here. Pop. 7000.

Dalkey (Dal-kee'), a delightfully situated coast-town, 8 miles SE. of Dublin. Pop. 10,500.

Dallas, capital of Dallas county, Texas, on Trinity River, 265 miles NNW. of Houston. A flourishing place, it has flour-mills, meat-packing works, foundries, and manufactures of machinery, cotton-seed oil-cake, &c. Pop. 92,000.

Dalles. See Columbia River.

Dalmahoy, the Earl of Morton's Midlothian seat, 1½ mile S. by E. of Ratho. Near it are the Dalmahoy Crags (680 feet).

Dalmally, an Argyllshire village, near the NE. end of Loch Awe, 24½ miles E. of Oban.

Dalmatia, a narrow strip of Austrian territory extending along the Adriatic. Area, 4940 sq. m.; population, 646,000. The coast is steep and rocky, and the chief towns, all on the coast, are Zara, Sebenico, Lissa, Spalato, Brazza, Ragusa, and Cattaro. The country is mountainous, Orjen, near Cattaro, attaining 6235 feet. Only one-ninth of the land is arable, mainly the coast strip. Nearly half is in pasture, and a third in wood. The numerous islands are not very fertile.

Dalmellington, an Ayrshire village, near the river Doon, 15½ miles SE. of Ayr. Near it are active collieries and ironworks. Pop. 2000.

Dalmeny, a Linlithgowshire village, near South Queensferry, with an interesting Norman church. Dalmeny Park is the seat of the Earl of Rosebery.

Dalny. See Dairen.

Dalriada, the name of two ancient kingdoms of Gaelic Scots, one in north Antrim, the other its colony (A.D. 498) in Argyll, the nucleus of the kingdom of the Scots of Alban.

Dalry, (1) a town of Ayrshire, on the Garnock, 23 miles SW. of Glasgow, with neighbouring ironworks (1845). Pop. 5000.—(2) A village in the north of Kirkcudbright, 8 miles NW. of New Galloway.—(3) A place in Perthshire, near Tyndrum, the scene of a skirmish between Bruce and Macdougal of Lorn (1306).

Dalswinton, an estate on the Nith, 7 miles NNW. of Dumfries. On its little loch a miniature steamboat was launched in 1788.

Dalton-in-Furness, a town of Lancashire, 16 miles WNW. of Lancaster, communicating with the sea by a canal (3½ miles). It has extensive malting and ironworks; and the ruins of Furness Abbey (q.v.) are in the vicinity. Romney was a native. Pop. 10,000.

Daman', an outlying portion of the Punjab and NW. Frontier Province, extending along the Indus and as far back as the Suliman Mountains.

Daman', a Portuguese settlement and port in the province of Gujarat, on the Gulf of Cambay, 100 miles N. of Bombay. The settlement consists of Daman proper (22 sq. m.) and the parganá of Nagar Havili (60 sq. m.), with magnificent teak forests to the east. The total population is about 56,300. The port stands at the mouth of the Daman-Ganga, a deep, navigable stream, with a bar at its mouth. The Portuguese have held Nagar Havili since 1780 only, but Daman has been occupied by them since 1558.

Damanhour, a town of Egypt, 38 miles ESE. of Alexandria by rail; pop. 40,000.

Daman-i-Koh ('skirts of the hills'), a hilly tract of Bihar, reserved for the Santals, &c. Area, 1366 sq. m.; pop. 353,413.

Dam'araland, or Damaland, in the west of South Africa, between Namaqualand and Ovampoland, extending from the Atlantic to about 19° 45′ E. long. Behind the waterless coast region (100 miles) rises a mountain district, with peaks over 8500 feet above the sea; and farther inland stretch wide prairies. The mountains are rich in minerals, especially copper. The produce of the interior consists of ivory, feathers, skins, &c. The Damaras, properly Herero, a Bantu stem, number about 80,000; they are nomads, and own large flocks and herds. The Hawkoin, or Hill Damaras, in the north-east, however, who are a much lower type, now speak Hottentot. Since 1886 Damaraland is part of German SW. Africa. The best harbour in this part of the coast is Walvisch Bay (q.v.), which is British, having been annexed to Cape Colony in 1884.

Damascus, the capital of Syria, and the largest town in Western Asia. It is called by the natives Dimashk es-Sham, or simply es-Sham, the name which is generally applied to all Syria. The city stands 1½ mile from the mouth of the gorge, through which the Barada, the Chrysorrhoas of the Greeks, forces its way into the plain; and is 70 miles ESE. of Beyrout on the Mediterranean, and 120 NE. of Acre, to both of which railways were opened in 1895. It is situated on the western side of a plain 500 sq. m. in area, at an elevation of 2260 feet above the sea, and immediately to the north-west of the city the Anti-Libanus rises to a height of 3840 feet. This elevated part of the mountain, called Jebel Kasyún, is crowned by the Kubbet en-Nasr ('Dome of Victory'), from whose base the best view of Damascus is obtained. The seven canals by which water is drawn off from the central Barada are called rivers, two of them the Abana and Pharpar of Scripture. The appearance of Damascus as viewed from the mountain resembles a tennis-racquet. The handle, which lies in a south-westerly direction, is the Meidân, a suburb which extends along the Mecca pilgrim-route for about a mile, and ends at the Bawabat Alla ('Gate of God'). The other part is concentrated on the rivers, and is enclosed within ancient walls and encompassed by luxuriant gardens. At the western side of the city within the walls stands the citadel. It is a large moated quadrangular structure, 300 yards long and 250 wide, with projecting towers. It was erected in 1219, and has a massive appearance, but it is a good deal dilapidated. The palace stands outside the walls west of the citadel, and 400 yards east of the citadel there towered above the city the Great Mosque, destroyed by fire in October 1893. It was erected at the beginning of the 8th century on the site of the church of St John, just as that church had been erected by Arcadius about the beginning of the 5th century on the site of a pagan temple, which probably occupied the site of the ancient Beit Rimmon. Damascus contains 70 other mosques, and more than 150 chapels for prayer and instruction. The tomb of Núr ed-Dîn is one of the ornaments of the city; the best baths are decorated with beautiful tiles and marble. The Jewish quarter lies to the south of the 'street called Straight,' which runs east and west for about a mile, with Roman gateways at either end. The Christian quarter lies north of the street called Straight in the eastern part of the city. The different industries are also carried on in separate quarters, there being bazaars for the silversmiths, the saddlers, the shoemakers, &c. Damascus is a meeting-place between the East and West; and enormous caravans of camels pass to and fro between it and Bagdad, exchanging the dates and tobacco and spices and carpets of the East for the produce of the looms and workshops of Europe. The chief exports are grain, flour, native cotton and silk manufactures, wool, apricot paste, raisins, and liquorice-root; the imports include textiles, indigo, tobacco, coffee, sugar, and leather. The Damascus-Mecca railway reached Medina in 1908. Pop. 170,000, of whom 20,000 are Christians (32,000 before the great massacre of July 1860), 6000 Jews, and the rest Mohammedans.

Dambula, or DAMBUL, a vast Buddhist rock-temple in Ceylon, 40 miles N. of Kandy, containing, among a profusion of carvings, colossal figures of Buddha.

Damietta (Arab. Dimyat), a town of Lower Egypt, on the right bank of the chief eastern mouth of the Nile, 8 miles from its mouth in the Mediterranean. Its commerce has been much injured by the prosperity of Alexandria, but it still carries on a considerable trade in exporting rice, fish (from Lake Menzaleh), coffee, and dates; and imports charcoal, soap, and manufactured goods. It is the terminus of a branch-railway from Cairo. The cambric known as dimity received its name from Damietta, where it was once manufactured; the famous leather-work has also declined. A bar at the mouth of the river impedes navigation. Pop. 30,000. The existing town was erected after 1251, but, prior to that, a city of the same name (anc. Tamiathis) stood more to the south.

Damodar, a river of India, rises in Chutia Nagpur, and flows 350 miles SE. to the Hooghly.

Damoh, a town of the Central Provinces of India, 50 miles E. of Ságar. Pop. 11,800.

Dampier, the name of several places in Australasia: (1) Dampier Archipelago, a cluster of about twenty small rocky islands off the NW. coast of Australia.—(2) Dampier Island, off the NE. coast of New Guinea, with a volcano 5250 feet high.—(3) Dampier's Land, a fertile peninsula of Western Australia, lying between King Sound and the Indian Ocean.—(4) Dampier Strait, between New Guinea and the archipelago of New Britain, forming, with Goschen Strait to the SE., the shortest route from Eastern Australia to China by some 300 miles.—(5) Dampier Strait, separating the island of Waygiou from the NW. extremity of New Guinea.

Danakil, a vaguely defined region of Eritrea and Abyssinia.

Danbury, a Connecticut town, 69 miles NNE. of New York. It manufactures hats and sewing-machines. Pop. 20,000.

Danebury, Hants, a famous training-ground, 3 miles WNW. of Stockbridge.

Danes' Dyke. See FLAMBOROUGH HEAD.

Dangan Castle, a mansion in County Meath, 4 miles S. of Trim, the seat of Wellington's father.

Dángs, a hill country in Bombay Presidency, about the N. end of the Western Gháts.

Dannemora, a Swedish town, 25 miles NE. of Uppsala, a great iron-mining centre. Pop. 5000.

Dantzic. See DANZIG.

Danube (Lat. Danubius; Ger. Donau; Hung. Duna; Slav. Dunai), next to the Volga the chief river of Europe, is formed by the Brege and the Brigach, rising in the Black Forest, Baden, and uniting at Donaueschingen, 2264 feet above sea-level. It has a total length of 1740 miles, and drains 300,000 sq. m. It flows first SE., and then NE. to Ulm (1519 feet). From the junction with the Iller above Ulm it is navigable for boats of 100 tons. At Ratisbon it reaches its most northerly point, and from thence its course is generally SE. Between Ulm and Passau, where it leaves Germany, it receives the Lech, Isar, and Inn, on the right, and the Altmühl and Regen on the left bank. At Passau its width is 231 yards, and its depth 16 feet. It flows E. to Presburg, receiving the Ens from the S., and the March or Morava from the N.; and it passes from Austria into Hungary through an opening called the Carpathian Gate. Near Waitzen it turns directly S., through the Hungarian plain, a vast sandy alluvial flat, in which it is continually forcing new channels and silting up old ones; receiving from the N. the Waag and the Gran, and the Drave from the W. Next the Danube turns again SE., and, increased by the waters of the Theiss, sweeps past Belgrade, where it is joined by the Save, as it is lower by the Temes, and forms the boundary between Hungary and Servia. Before touching the Roumanian frontier its width is greatly contracted and interrupted by eight rapids with rocky shoals. The most difficult passage is the shortest (1½ mile) of the eight—the 'Iron Gate,' properly so called, below Orsova. In 1890–95 the Hungarian government undertook, at a cost of £800,000, to improve, by blasting rocks and widening the course, the navigation here. In Wallachia the Danube flows in a wide stream, constantly broadening into a lake, or overspreading its banks with swamps. It forms the northern boundary of Bulgaria to near Silistria; and from here it turns northward, skirting the Dobruja, and flows between marshy banks to Galatz, receiving on the way the Jalomitza and the Sereth. From Galatz it flows E., and, after being joined by the Pruth from the N., SE. to the Black Sea. The delta is a vast wilderness (1000 sq. m.) cut up by channels and lagoons; the farthest mouths are 60 miles apart. Two-thirds of the Danube's volume passes through the Kilia, which, like the southern or St George branch, forms a double channel near the outlet; and so ships enter by the middle or Sulina mouth, deepened to 20 feet and straightened in 1858–1903. The steel cantilever bridge across the river (2878 metres) at Tchernavoda is one of the great railway bridges of the world. To defend Vienna against risk of inundation, the course of the Danube skirting it was, in 1868–81, diverted into an artificial channel. Similar works have been undertaken near Pesth. The Danube has about 400 tributaries, 100 of them navigable by the fleet of the Danube Steam Navigation Company (1830). The Danube is connected with the Rhine by means of the Ludwigs-Canal (1844), and canals connecting with the Elbe, Oder, Vistula, and Dniester are projected. See F. D. Millet, The Danube from the Black Forest to the Black Sea (1892).

Danubian Principalities, a name applied to Moldavia and Wallachia; see ROUMANIA. Servia and Bulgaria have sometimes been included under the name.

Danvers, a town of Massachusetts, 4 miles NW. of Salem. It manufactures shoes, carpets, bricks, &c., and is the seat of the state lunatic asylum. Peabody, 3 miles S., was formerly South Danvers. Pop. 10,000.

Danville, (1) capital of Vermilion county, Illinois, on the Vermilion River, 132 miles S. of Chicago. It is an important railway junction, and contains railway-shops, steam-mills, foundries, and organ and chair factories. Bituminous coal is mined near by. Pop. 28,000.—(2) Capital of Montour county, Pennsylvania, on the north branch of the Susquehanna, 68 miles N. by E. of Harrisburg. It was settled in 1768, and the Pennsylvania Ironworks here is the oldest establishment in the States for the manufacture of railroad iron. There are also blast-furnaces, foundries, and rolling-mills. Pop. 7500.—(3) A town of Virginia, on the Dan River, 141 miles SW. of Richmond, with large cotton and other mills, and a great trade in tobacco. Pop. 19,000.

Danzig, or DANTZIC (Polish Gdansk), a great seaport and fortress, capital of West Prussia, on the left bank of the western branch of the Vistula, 284 miles NE. of Berlin, and 4 from the river's mouth in the shallow Gulf of Danzig, an inlet of the Baltic. In the 10th century its possession was disputed by Danes, Pomeranians, Prussians, Brandenburgers, Poles, and the Teutonic Knights; the last held it 1308–1454, when it became a free city under Poland. In 1793 it fell to Prussia. The city is traversed by the Mottlau and Radaune, tributaries of the Vistula, the former of which admits vessels drawing 15 feet up to the Speicherinsel. The principal port is Neufahrwasser, at the mouth of the Vistula, below the sand-bars. Among the most noteworthy buildings are the large church of St Mary (1343–1502), with a noble 'Last Judgment,' probably by Memlinc, and a finely-carved altar of wood; the church of St Catharine (1326–30); the fine old Gothic town-hall; the old exchange; and the Franciscan monastery, now a museum and art gallery. Once a great Hanse town, Danzig is still one of the chief commercial cities of northern Europe. The manufactures include beer, spirits (Danzig Goldwasser), sugar, tobacco, flour, iron-wares, machinery, amber, gold and silver ornaments; and there are also an imperial dockyard and an artillery arsenal. Pop. 170,000.

Daoudnagar. See DAUDNAGAR.

Dapsang, a mountain in the part of the Himalaya system called Karakorum, in Baltistan or Little Tibet, 28,700 feet high.

Darabgherd, or DARAB, a town of Persia, 115 miles SE. of Shiraz. Pop. 4000.

Daraganj, a suburb of Allahabad, on the right bank of the Ganges. Pop. 15,159.

Darbhangah, a town of Behar province, on the Little Baghmati River, 78 miles NE. of Patna by rail. It has large bazaars and a handsome market-place, extensive tanks, a hospital, and the maharajah's palace, with fine gardens, menagerie, and aviary. There is an active trade in oil-seeds, food-grains, timber, salt, iron, lime, &c. Pop. (1891) 73,561; (1901) 66,244.

Dardanelles (anc. Hellespont), a narrow channel separating Europe from Asia, and uniting the Sea of Marmora with the Archipelago. The name is derived from the ancient city of Dardanus in the Troad, on the southern shore. The strait extends 40 miles south-westward, and has a varying breadth of 1 to 4 miles. From the Sea of Marmora a strong current runs through it to the Archipelago. Both sides are strongly fortified. A treaty concluded between the five great powers and Turkey in 1841 arranged that no non-Turkish ship of war should pass the Dardanelles without the express consent of Turkey. Xerxes and Alexander crossed the Dardanelles in 480 and 334 B.C., the former to enter Europe, and the latter to enter Asia. Leander, to visit Hero, nightly swam across—a feat performed in 1810 by Lord Byron.

Dardistan, a region of Central Asia, bordering on Baltistan, the north-western portion of Cashmere, consists of lofty mountains and high-lying valleys. Its interest depends mainly on the fact that its inhabitants, the Dards, are an Aryan people, speaking a Sanskritic tongue mixed with Persian words. They are Moslems. The chief districts are Hasora, Gilghit, and Tassin; some include Chitral.

Dar-es-Salaam, a seaport of German East Africa, 45 miles S. of Zanzibar. Pop. 25,000.

Dar-fertit, a thinly-peopled territory south of Dar-Fûr, beyond the Bahr-el-Arab, and north of the Niam-Niam country. Schweinfurth was the first European to visit the region in 1870–71.

Dar-Fûr, a country of Central Africa, one of the divisions of the Sûdân or 'Land of the Blacks,' situated approximately in 10° to 16° N. lat., and in 22° to 28° E. long. It is hilly in parts, and traversed by a mountainous ridge called Marra. Towards the north it is level, sandy, and almost destitute of water. During the rainy season (June—September) it exhibits a rich vegetation. Tobacco, which is used by the natives in every form, abounds. The chief minerals are copper and iron. The wealth of the inhabitants consists principally in cattle. Dar-Fûr, long a notorious centre of the slave-trade, was annexed to Egypt in 1875; but in 1884–98 was under the power of the Mahdi. Since 1900 trade with Egypt has been revived again, and is now considerable. Pop. 4,000,000, mainly zealous Moslems.

Dargai, in the Afridi hill country, near the Kohat Pass, in the NW. Frontier Province of India, was the scene of a brilliant feat of arms during the Tirah campaign in 1897.

Dariel. See CAUCASUS.

Darien, a name formerly applied to the entire isthmus of Panamá (q.v.), but now confined to the heavily-wooded hill-country lying between the Gulfs of Uraba (often called the Gulf of Darien) on the north and San Miguel on the south. William Paterson's Darien Scheme (1695–1703), to plant a Scottish colony on the Atlantic side of the Isthmus of Panamá, proved a total fiasco.

Darjeeling (Dárjíling), a sanitary station in the Lower Himalayas, is situated on a narrow ridge, 7167 feet above the sea. It is a very popular sanatorium (1883), with a good water-supply. The fashionable month is October, after the rains, when the clear atmosphere shows a view of unsurpassed grandeur. Pop. 14,200.

Darlaston, a Staffordshire town, 1½ mile NW. of Wednesbury, with ironworks and neighbouring coal and iron mines. Pop. 17,000.

Darling, a name applied to a river, a mountain-range, and two districts in Australia, is derived from Lieutenant-general Sir Ralph Darling (1775–1859), governor of New South Wales in 1825–31. (1) The river Darling, is formed by several head-streams, all rising in the great Dividing Range, and flows 1160 miles south-westward to the Murray at Wentworth, on the border between New South Wales and South Australia.—(2) The Darling Range, in Western Australia, runs parallel to the west coast, at a distance of 10 to 25 miles; in Mount William it attains 3000 feet.—(3) The Darling district at the SW. corner of New South Wales, scantily watered, has an area of 50,000 sq. m.—(4) The Darling Downs (6080 sq. m.) form the richest pastoral district of Queensland, in the south of the colony. It was discovered by Allan Cunningham, the botanist, in 1827.

Darlington, a town in the south of the county of Durham, on a slight elevation overlooking the Skerne near its junction with the Tees, 23 miles S. of Durham, and 45 NNW. of York. The chief industry is connected with the extensive locomotive works; there are also iron and steel works, breweries, tanneries, and wool-mills. Pop. (1821) 6551; (1851) 11,228; (1871) 27,730; (1911) 55,631, many of them connected with the Society of Friends. Darlington was incorporated in 1867, since then also returning one member to parliament. Its prosperity dates from the opening, on 27th September 1825, of the Stockton and Darlington Railway, the first passenger-line employing a locomotive-engine, which engine now stands on a pedestal inside the station. From the 11th century the town belonged to the bishops of Durham, and till 1867 a borough bailiff, appointed by the bishop, managed its affairs. St Cuthbert's collegiate church, a very fine specimen of Early English, was founded in 1160. It has a tower 180 feet high. Among the chief modern erections are the spacious new railway station (1887), a grammar-school, and a free library (1885).

Darmstadt, a town of Germany, capital of the grand-duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt, is situated on the small river Darm, 15 miles S. of Frankfort-on-Main. One of its two palaces, the old ducal palace, contains museums of painting, natural history, and archæology, and a library of 500,000 volumes; in the other, Prince Charles's palace, is Holbein's famous 'Meyer Madonna.' The post-office dates from 1881, the theatre from 1871, the museum from 1905. There are manufactures of chemicals, hats, machinery, tobacco, playing-cards, carpets, and beer. Pop. 87,000.

Darnaway, the Earl of Moray's seat, Elginshire, 3½ miles SW. of Forres.

Darnétal, a town in the French dep. of Seine-Inférieure, 2½ miles E. of Rouen. Pop. 6500.

Darnick, a Roxburghshire village, 1 mile W. of Melrose.

Darnley, a Renfrewshire barony, 1½ mile E. of Barrhead.

Dartford, a thriving market-town of Kent, in the narrow valley of the Darent, 2 miles above its influx to the Thames, and 17 ESE. of London. Edward III. here founded an Augustinian nunnery (1355); St Edmund's chantry was a great place of pilgrimage; and at Dartford Wat Tyler commenced his rebellion (1381). The church, with a Norman tower, has interesting monuments—one to Sir John Spielman, Queen Elizabeth's jeweller, who in 1588 established here the first paper-mill in England. Paper is still manufactured, besides steam-engines, machinery, gunpowder, &c. Pop. (1851) 6224; (1891) 11,962; (1911) 23,609. See works by Dunkin (1844) and Bayly (1876).

Dartmoor, a great granitic upland in Devonshire, the source of nearly all the principal rivers of the county, remarkable alike for its wild and rugged scenery, its antiquities, its wide, solitary, trackless wastes, and its mineral products. It is upwards of 130,000 acres in extent, the extreme length from north to south being 25 miles, and the extreme breadth 20. The central portion is the ancient royal forest of Dartmoor, whose rights belong to the Duchy of Cornwall; this is surrounded by a belt of open country, once known as the 'Commons of Devonshire,' portions of which have been enclosed. The attempts to cultivate Dartmoor itself have been very few, and the northern quarter for miles shows no trace of man. The valleys through which the rivers descend to the lowland country are singularly fertile, and at times full of beauty. The moor itself affords valuable mountain pasture to cattle, sheep, and large numbers of half-wild ponies. The average height of Dartmoor above the sea is upwards of 1200 feet, but its highest point, High Willhayes, is 2039 feet; and the next, Yes Tor, 2030. The hills are commonly called tors, and for the most part have granite crests, weathered into grotesque and picturesque shapes. Dartmoor is rich in minerals—tin, copper, iron, manganese, gold, and china-clay or kaolin, this last much the most important nowadays. Dartmoor is unrivalled in England in the extent and character of its prehistoric and rude stone antiquities. The chief centre of population is Prince Town, where is a prison, built (1806) for prisoners of war, and adapted (1850) to its present purpose of a convict prison. See works by Rowe (1856), and Page (1889).

Dartmouth, a seaport and municipal borough (till 1867 also parliamentary) of South Devon, 32 miles S. by W. of Exeter. It is built in picturesque terraces on a steep slope 300 to 400 feet high, on the right bank of the romantic estuary of the river Dart, at a short distance from the sea. The streets are narrow, and many of the houses very old, with overhanging stories, projecting gables, and wood-carvings. St Saviour's Church (c. 1372) has a richly sculptured pulpit, and a beautifully carved rood-loft. A battery, and the remains of a castle built during the reign of Henry VII., stand at the entrance to the harbour. In 1190 the Crusaders, under Cœur-de-Lion, embarked for the Holy Land at Dartmouth, which in 1643 was taken by Prince Maurice, but in 1646 retaken by Fairfax. Newcomen, the inventor of the steam-engine, was born here; Sir Humphrey Gilbert at Greenway, across the Dart; and John Davis at Sandridge. Here is a great Royal Naval School. Population, 7000.

Darton, a township in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 3½ miles NW. of Barnsley. Pop. 9300.

Darvel, an Ayrshire police-burgh, with muslin manufacture, 9 miles E. of Kilmarnock. Pop. 3600.

Darwen, a municipal borough of Lancashire, on the river Darwen, 3½ miles S. of Blackburn, and 9 N. of Bolton. Cotton is the staple manufacture; then come paper-making and paper-staining; and to these and other industries, with its water facilities, and the neighbouring coal-mines and stone quarries, Darwen owes its rapid growth and its well-being. It was incorporated in 1878. Among the chief buildings are the free library, the market-hall, the co-operative hall, and the public baths erected in memory of Sir Robert Peel. Pop. (1851) 7020; (1911) 40,332.

Darwin. See Port Darwin.

Darwin Sound and Mount Darwin are on the SW. side of King Charles's South Land, Tierra del Fuego. The mountain rises 6800 feet.

Datchet, a village of Bucks, on the Thames, 2 miles E. of Windsor.

Datia (Datee'a), a native state of Bundelkhand (area, 837 sq. m.; pop. 186,440). The chief town, Datia, 125 miles SE. of Agra, has a pop. of 24,566.

Daudnagar (Dâh-ood-nug'ur), a wretched-looking town in the Gaya district of Bihar, on the Son, 90 miles SW. of Patna. Pop. 9870.

Daulatabad (Dowlatabad'), a decayed town in the Deccan, 28 miles NW. of Hyderabad. Its fortress, a walled and moated conical rock, 600 feet high, surrendered to the Mohammedans in 1294, and has long been ungarrisoned. Pop. 1243.

Dauphiné, a former frontier province (capital, Grenoble) of south-east France, now forming the deps. Drôme, Isère, and Hautes Alpes.

Dauria, a mountainous region of south-eastern Siberia, between Lake Baikal and the river Argun, on the Chinese frontier.

Davarr Island. See Campbeltown.

Davenport, capital of Scott county, Iowa, on the Mississippi, opposite Rock Island (q.v.), 183 miles W. by S. of Chicago. It is the seat of Griswold College (1859), and manufactures flour, iron wares, woollen goods, &c. Pop. 43,000.

Daventry (pron. Daintry), an ancient municipal borough of Northamptonshire, at the sources of the Avon and Nene, 12 miles W. of Northampton, and 4 NW. of Weedon by a branch line opened in 1888. Charles I. spent six days here in 1645 before the battle of Naseby. Pop. 3500. Danes or Borough Hill, 1 mile E., is one of the largest Roman camps in the kingdom.

Davidson's Mains, or Muttonhole, a Midlothian village, 3½ miles WNW. of Edinburgh. Pop. 1000.

Davis Strait washes the western coast of Greenland, and connects Baffin Bay with the Atlantic Ocean. At its narrowest point, immediately north of the Arctic circle, it measures about 200 miles across. The navigator John Davys sailed through it in 1587.

Davōs', a small valley lying amongst the Alps of the Eastern Grisons, 16 miles SE. of Coire, and 31 SSE. of Landquart by rail. It has become famous as a health-resort in winter, especially for such as suffer from chest disease, the air being still and dry, with much bright, warm sunshine throughout the winter. Till lately mere out-of-the-way hamlets, the villages of Davos-Platz (5105 feet above sea-level) and Davos-Dörfli have now railway communication with Coire, &c. Skating and tobogganing are pastimes. Pop. 11,200. See English works on the place by Wise (1881), Muddock (1884), and J. A. Symonds (1892).

Dawley, a Shropshire urban district, 4 miles SE. of Wellington, with mineral industries. Pop. 7700.

Dawlish, a pleasant watering-place of SE. Devon, 12 miles SE. of Exeter, and backed by the Great Haldon (818 feet). Pop. 4000.

Dawson, at the confluence of the Klondike with the Yukon, 1500 miles from its mouth, is the capital of the Yukon territory of Canada, since 1896 the centre of the Klondike gold-mining industry. Pop. 3000.

Dax, a town in the French dep. of Landes, on the Adour, 93 miles S. by W. of Bordeaux by rail, with a 14th-century castle, now a barrack, remains of Roman walls, a cathedral, &c. Its hot sulphur-springs (77°–144° F.) were known to the Romans, who called the place Aquæ Tarbellæ; in the middle ages it was called Acqs. Pop. 8000.

Daylesford, a Worcestershire estate, 3½ miles E. of Stow-on-the-Wold, repurchased in 1788 by Warren Hastings, who died and was buried here.

Dayton, capital of Montgomery county, Ohio, on the Great Miami, at the mouth of the Mad River, 60 miles NNE. of Cincinnati by rail. The public buildings include a court-house of white marble and a large jail. Standing on the line of the Miami Canal (opened 1829), the city is a railway centre, and the water of the Mad River is brought through its streets by an hydraulic canal. It manufactures railroad-cars, cash-registers, cotton, woollen, and iron goods, oil, flour, paper, and machinery. It was devastated in 1913 by a tornado, fire, and flood. Pop. 117,000.

Dead Sea, the usual name, dating from the time of Jerome, for a most remarkable lake in the south-east of Palestine, called in the Old Testament The Salt Sea, Sea of the Plain, or East Sea; by Josephus, Lacus Asphaltites; and by the Arabs now, Bahr-Lût, 'Sea of Lot.' It is 46 miles long, 5 to 9 miles broad, and 1292 feet below the level of the Mediterranean. The depth of the greater part, the northern section, is about 1300 feet; but at the southern end the water is only from 3 to 12 feet deep. The Dead Sea is fed by the Jordan from the north, and by many other streams, but has no apparent outlet, its superfluous water being carried off by evaporation. Along the eastern and western shores there are lines of bold cliffs rising 1500 feet on the west, and 2500 on the east. The north shore, a great mud flat, is marked by the blackened trunks and branches of trees; the southern shore is low, also marshy and dreary. Lava-beds, pumice-stone, warm springs, sulphur, and volcanic slag prove the presence here of volcanic agencies at some period. The neighbourhood is frequently visited by earthquakes, and the lake still occasionally casts up to its surface large masses of asphalt. The water is characterised by the presence of a large quantity of magnesian and soda salts. Its average specific gravity is about 1166 (pure water being 1000). The proportion of saline matter is so great, that whilst sea-water contains only 3·5 per cent. of salts, the water of the Dead Sea contains upwards of 26 per cent. Rain hardly ever falls; the water is nearly as blue and clear as that of the Mediterranean; and though its taste is horribly salt and fetid, a bath in it is refreshing. Owing to the great specific gravity of the water, it is almost impossible for the bather to sink in it. According to Major Conder, 'it is now generally agreed that the Dead Sea and Jordan were formed by a great fault or crack in the earth's surface long before the creation of man, and that the district presents in our own days much the same aspect as in the days of Abraham. It is vain, therefore, to suppose that the "cities of the plain" were beneath the present sea, although this view was held as early as the time of Josephus' (Bible Geography, 1884).

Deal, a municipal borough and sea-bathing place of Kent, on a bold open beach, near the south extremity of the Downs, between North and South Foreland, 89 miles by rail ESE. of London. Till 1885 it was part of the parliamentary borough of Sandwich. A fine anchorage extends 7 or 8 miles between Deal and the Goodwin Sands. Deal has mainly arisen to supply the wants of the numerous vessels in the Downs, its chief industries being connected with boat-building, sail-making, piloting, victualling, &c. The handsome iron promenade pier was erected in 1864. Population, 11,300. Deal has been one of the Cinque Ports since the 13th century. Of the three castles built by Henry VIII. in 1539, Deal Castle is the residence of its 'captain;' Sandown Castle (where Colonel Hutchinson died), to the north of Deal, was pulled down in 1864 on account of the inroads of the sea; and, to the south, Walmer Castle is now the official residence of the Warden of the Cinque Ports. See Chapman's Deal: Past and Present (1891).

Dean, Forest of, a picturesque hilly tract, 34 sq. m. in extent, in the west of Gloucestershire, between the Severn and the Wye. An ancient royal forest, it was almost entirely disafforested by Charles I., on a sale to Sir John Wintour, but was re-afforested very shortly after the Restoration. The greater part still remains crown property; and about one-half is appropriated for the growth of timber for the navy. It is divided into six 'walks,' which contain woods of oak, beech, &c. There are coal and iron mines, and quarries of stone suitable for building and making grindstones, troughs, and rollers. The deer were exterminated in 1854.

Deanston. See Doune.

Death Valley, a peculiarly sterile depression in the Mohave Desert (q.v.) in California.

Debateable Land, a Border tract between the Esk and Sark, long a bone of contention between England and Scotland.

Deben, a Suffolk river, rising near Debenham, flows 30 miles SE. to the German Ocean. It is tidal and navigable from Woodbridge (8½ miles).

Debenham, a small Suffolk town, 8 miles NNE. of Needham Market. Pop. of parish, 1200.

De'breczen, a town of Hungary, in the midst of a wide plain, 130 miles E. of Pesth by rail. It is a large straggling place, indeed really a collection of villages. It has, however, a fine town-hall, a large Protestant college, a theatre, &c. The inhabitants are largely dependent on agriculture; enormous herds of cattle graze on the fertile stretches of plain. There are also manufactures of soap, saltpetre, flour, sausages, hams, and tobacco-pipes. Population, 93,000, nearly all Protestants. The 'Rome of the Calvinists,' Debreczen was long the headquarters of the Reformed faith, and suffered much therefor. It took a prominent part in the revolution of 1849.

Deca'tur, capital of Macon county, Illinois, on the Sangamon River, 39 miles E. of Springfield. It has woollen, planing, and flour mills. Pop. 31,000.

Decazeville (De-kâhz-veel'), a town in the dep. of Aveyron, 110 miles NNE. of Toulouse by rail, with iron and coal mines near by, and great blast-furnaces and ironworks. Pop. 10,000.

Deccan (from dakshin, 'the south'), a term applied sometimes to the whole Indian peninsula to the south of the Vindhya Mountains, which separate it from the basin of the Ganges, and sometimes restricted to the portion between the Nerbudda and the Kistna or Krishna.

Deception Island, a volcanic island belonging to the South Shetland group.

Deddington, an Oxfordshire market-town, 6 miles S. of Banbury. Piers Gaveston was seized in its ruined castle (1312). Pop. of parish, 1500.

Dédéagatch, a Bulgarian seaport and railway centre on the Ægean, 10 m. NW. of the Maritza.

Dedham, an Essex village, on the Stour, 3½ miles W. by N. of Manningtree, with a school (1571). Pop. of parish, 1500.

Dee, a Welsh and English river, issuing from Bala Lake, in Merionethshire, and flowing 90 miles NE., N., and NW. to the Irish Sea. Near Trevor it is crossed by the Ellesmere Canal, on an aqueduct 1007 feet long and 120 high; and also by the stone viaduct of the Chester and Shrewsbury Railway, of 19 arches, each 90 feet span and 150 high. At Chester, which it nearly encircles, it is 100 yards broad; thence it runs alongside marshes in an artificial tidal canal 7 miles long, which should admit ships of 600 tons, but which is rapidly silting up. Near Connah's Quay, between Chester and Flint, where its width is 160 yards, it is crossed by the great railway swing-bridge, whose first cylinder was laid by Mr Gladstone on 16th August 1887. The Dee ends in a tidal estuary 13 miles long and 3 to 6 broad, and forming at high-water a noble arm of the sea; but at low-water a dreary waste of sand and ooze (Kingsley's 'sands of Dee'), with the river flowing through it in a narrow stream. Its chief tributaries are the Treveryn, Alwen, Ceirog, Clyweddog, and Alyn. Canals connect the Dee with the rivers of central England.

Dee, a beautiful river of Aberdeen and Kincardine shires, rising at an altitude of 4060 feet among the Cairngorm Mountains, and running 87 miles eastward, till it enters the German Ocean at Aberdeen, where in 1870–72 a mile of its channel was diverted for harbour improvements. It makes a descent of 2084 feet during the first 2¾ miles of its course; at the Linn of Dee, 18 miles lower down, tumbles through a chasm 300 yards long, and at one point scarcely 4 feet wide; thereafter flows by Castleton of Braemar, Balmoral Castle, and Ballater; since 1864 has supplied Aberdeen with water; and is still a good salmon river, though not what it once was.—The Kirkcudbrightshire Dee issues from Loch Dee (750 feet above sea-level), and flows 38 miles south-eastward and southward, past Threave Castle and Kirkcudbright, to Kirkcudbright Bay. Midway it is joined by the Water of Ken, 28 miles long, a stream of greater volume than its own. It, too, affords fine fishing.

Deel, a river of Cork and Limerick, flowing 28 miles to the Shannon.

Deepdene. See Dorking.

Deeping, Market, a market-town of Lincolnshire, on the Welland, 7¾ miles SSE. of Bourn. Pop. of parish, 1000.

Deer, Old, a village of Buchan, Aberdeenshire, 36 miles N. of Aberdeen. Here, about 580 A.D., St Columba and Drostan, his nephew, established a monastery, which William Comyn, Earl of Buchan, refounded about 1219 for Cistercian monks. The larger village of New Deer, lies to the W.

Deés, a town of Transylvania, on the Szamos, 37 miles NNE. of Klausenburg by rail. Pop. 10,000.

Deggendorf, a town of Lower Bavaria, on the Danube, 39 miles NW. of Passau, with a church visited by thousands of pilgrims. Pop. 7000.

Dehra, headquarters of the Dehra Dun district of the Meerut division of Agra province, in a mountain valley 2300 feet above the sea, with a great imperial school of forestry. Pop. 29,000. See also DERAJAT.

Deil's Dyke, or PICTS' DYKE, an ancient fortification of Galloway, extending from Loch Ryan to the upper part of the Solway Firth.

Deir-el-kamar ('convent of the moon'), a town of Syria, formerly the capital of the Druses, 13 miles SSE. of Beyrout. Pop. 8000.

Delagoa Bay, a Portuguese possession, is a large inlet of the Indian Ocean on the south-east coast of Africa. Stretching for 70 miles between 26° 20′ and 25° 30′ S. lat., it is 25 miles wide, and for size and accommodation is the finest natural harbour in South Africa, although landing facilities were long very primitive. There are several islands and shoals in the bay, but its navigation is safe and easy, and the anchorage commodious and well sheltered. The settlement of Lourenço Marques and surrounding country have been notoriously unhealthy; but in 1887 the swamps behind the town were filled in, and other improvements have since been carried out. The rivers Maputa, Tembe, and Umbelosi (joining to form the English River), and the Komati, fall into Delagoa Bay. The first two are navigable for some distance for small craft. In 1887 a company was formed in London to work a concession from the Portuguese government for ninety years, for the construction of a railway from Delagoa Bay to Pretoria. The line (350 miles) was completed in 1895. Another line (1906–12) runs to Swaziland. See Rose Montiero, Delagoa Bay (1892).

Delaware, one of the Atlantic States of the American Union, forms a part of a peninsula lying between the lower reaches of the Susquehanna and Chesapeake Bay on the west, and the Delaware River and Bay and Atlantic Ocean on the east. With an area of 1960 sq. m., or little more than that of Northumberland, it is the smallest of all the states, except Rhode Island. Save in a small hilly section in the north, nearly all the surface is low and level, and in the extreme south there is much swampy land; while the most southern two-fifths of the area is in great part a sandy region. The coast-region has many salt-marshes; farther inland is a considerable body of extremely rich alluvial soil. The western border is generally well wooded, and in some places flat and marshy. The rivers are mostly small, but many are navigable. In the north kaolin and iron ore are found, and bog ore or limonite occurs in other parts. The state is well provided with railroad facilities, and is crossed by a canal connecting the Delaware and Chesapeake bays. The northern section has large and varied manufacturing interests. Peaches and the various small fruits, as well as market-garden products, are leading articles of export; the principal cereal crops are maize, wheat, and oats. Pop. (1870) 125,015; (1910) 202,322. The principal towns are Wilmington, New Castle, Dover (the state capital), and Smyrna. Delaware's first permanent white settlements were made by Swedes and Finns in 1638; Dutch and Swedes contended for this region, till in 1655 it passed under Dutch sway. After the transfer of New Amsterdam (now New York) to the English in 1664, Delaware became English also. Delaware, a slave-state until 1861–65, took no part in the secession movement.

Delaware, the capital of Delaware county, Ohio, on the Whetstone River, 24 miles by rail N. of Columbus. It has foundries, flour and woollen mills, &c., chalybeate and sulphur springs, and a Wesleyan University (1842). President Hayes was a native. Pop. 8000.

Delfshaven (Delfshâh'ven), a Dutch town, incorporated with Rotterdam in 1886, so as to become a western section of the city.

Delft, an ancient town of South Holland, on the Schie, 8 miles NW. of Rotterdam. Its town-hall (1618) is a picturesque and richly adorned edifice. The New Church (1476) contains a monument to William the Silent, who was assassinated here, 10th July 1584, as also the tomb of Grotius, and the burial-vaults of the present royal family. The Old Church contains the tomb of the naturalist Leeuwenhoek, and of the great admiral Tromp. Delft has also a state arsenal, an East Indian college, and a polytechnic. There are some manufactures of fine carpets, casks, baskets; but Delft has quite lost its high reputation for delf-ware, so famous from the 16th to the 18th century. Pop. 34,000.

Delhi (Del'lee), since 1912 the capital of the Indian Empire, and a Chief Commissionership, on the right bank of the Jumna, 954 miles NW. of Calcutta. It is the terminus of the East Indian and Rajputana railways, the former crossing the Jumna by a fine iron bridge. Delhi is walled on three sides, has ten gates, and stands on high ground, the famous palace of Shah Jehan, now the Fort, looking out over the river and a wide stretch of wooded and cultivated country. To the north, about a mile distant, rises the historic 'ridge,' crowned with memorials of the Mutiny, and commanding a fine view of the city, the domes and minarets of which overtop the encircling groves. The palace buildings comprise the cathedral-like entrance hall, the audience hall, and several lesser pavilions, covering in all an area of 1600 feet by 3200, exclusive of gateways. The beautiful inlaid work and carving of these buildings are the admiration of the world, and the diwan-i-khas is worthy of its famous inscription: 'If there is a heaven on earth, it is this—it is this!' In the heart of the city stands the Jama Masjid ('great mosque'), one of the largest and finest structures of the kind in India, which also owes its origin to Shah Jehan. Among the notable monuments in the neighbourhood are the imperial tombs, including that of Hamayun, second of the Mogul dynasty; the old Kala Masjid, or black mosque; and the 13th century Kutab Minar, 10 miles to the south, which is 238 feet high, and tapers gracefully from a diameter of 47 feet at the base to 9 feet at the summit. Modern Delhi is noted for its broad main streets, the chief being the Chandni Chauk, or Silver Street, with its high clock-tower, and the institute and museum. Delhi has a large trade in wheat and other produce, and its bazaars are noted for gold and silver work, precious stones, shawls, and costly fabrics. Across the river is the ruined fort of Salimgarh. Pop. (1891) 192,570; (1901) 208,385; (1911) 232,837.

Delhi was the capital of the Afghan or Pathan, and afterwards of the Mogul, empire. It was taken by Lord Lake in 1803, and has ever since been under British rule, except when it was held by the mutineers in 1857. The march of the mutineers from Meerut; the terrible 11th of May; the explosion of the powder-magazine by Willoughby and his heroic band; the assault, when the city was won (September 20) gate by gate and quarter by quarter—a success saddened by the death of the gallant Nicholson; the subsequent daring capture of the king of Delhi by Hodson; and the capture and shooting of his sons by the same officer, are memorable events. In 1877 Delhi was the scene of the Durbar at which Queen Victoria was proclaimed Empress of India, and in 1911 of that held by George V. in person.

Delitzsch (Day'leetch), a town of Prussian Saxony, on the Löbber, 12 m. N. of Leipzig. Pop. 12,000.

Dellys (Del-leess'), a port of Algeria, 50 miles E. of Algiers. Pop. 5000.

Delos (also anciently Asteria, Ortygia), an island in the Grecian Archipelago, the smallest (little more than 1 sq. m.) of the Cyclades, between the islands Rhenea and Mykonus. The town of Delos, which stood at the foot of Mount Cynthus, a granite crag 347 feet high, is now a mass of ruins. Still, however, the remains of the great temple of Apollo (whom Leto gave birth to here), and of his colossal statue, may be distinctly traced. Since 1877 extensive excavations have been prosecuted for the French Archæological Institute.

Delphi, an ancient Greek town in Phocis, celebrated chiefly for its famous oracle of Apollo, 8 miles N. of the northern shore of the Gulf of Lepanto, at the southern base of Parnassus. The modern town of Kastri now occupies the site, in the neighbourhood of the source of the still flowing Castalian spring.

Delvino, a town of Albania, 45 miles WNW. of Janina, with a strong castle. Pop. 6000.

Demavend, MOUNT, an extinct volcano of Persia, forming the loftiest peak (18,600 feet) of the Elburz chain, which separates the low shores of the Caspian from the high Persian tableland.

Dembea, LAKE. See TZANA.

Demerara (Dem-y-rah'ra), a county of British Guiana (q.v.), takes its name from the Demerara River, which rises in the Maccari Mountains, in about 4° 40′ N. lat., and after a northerly course of 200 miles, enters the Atlantic at Georgetown. The mouth is 1½ mile wide, but is obstructed by a bar at low tides.

Demir-Hissar ('iron-castle'), a town of Greek Macedonia, on a tributary of the Struma, 45 miles NE. of Salonica; pop. 8000.

Demmin, an ancient town of Prussia, on the Peene, 29 miles S. of Stralsund; pop. 13,000.

Demotica, a town of Turkey, on a tributary of the Maritza, 31 miles S. of Adrianople by rail. Pop. 12,000.

Denain (Deh-nan^{g}'), a town in the French dep. of Nord, near the Scheldt and Selle rivers, 20 miles NNE. of Cambrai by rail. It lies in the centre of an extensive coalfield, and has manufactures of iron, beet-root sugar, and brandy. An obelisk marks the scene of Marshal Villars's victory over the allies under Prince Eugene, 27th July 1712. Pop. 22,000.

Denbigh (Den'by), a municipal borough, county town of Denbighshire, near the middle of the Vale of Clwyd, 30 miles W. of Chester by rail. Its imposing ruined castle, which was rebuilt in 1284, and in which Charles I. took refuge (1645), was dismantled by the parliamentarians. Denbigh manufactures shoes and leather, but is residential more than commercial. With Ruthin, Holt, and Wrexham, it returns one member. A lunatic asylum for North Wales was erected in 1848, and in 1860 a noble institution for twenty-five orphan girls, and as many day pupils, from money left in 1540 by one Thomas Howell. Pop. 6900.

Denbighshire, a county of North Wales, on the Irish Sea, and between the Dee and the Conway. With 8 miles of coast, it is 41 miles long, 17 broad on an average, and 666 sq. m. in area. The surface is partly rugged and mountainous, with some beautiful and fertile vales, as that of Clwyd, 20 miles by 7. The highest mountain is Cader Fronwen, 2563 feet; and many others exceed 1500 feet. There occur coal, iron, slates, flags, millstones, limestone, lead, and copper. The chief rivers are the Dee, Conway, Elwy, and Clwyd. The Rhaiadr waterfall is 200 feet high in two parts. Llangollen vale is famed for romantic beauty and verdure, amid hills of savage grandeur. About two-thirds of Denbighshire is under cultivation; its corn, cheese, butter, and live-stock are greatly esteemed. It is also well timbered. Salmon are caught in the rivers. The towns are Denbigh, Wrexham, Ruthin, Holt, Llangollen, Llanrwst, Abergele, and Ruabon. Pop. (1801) 60,299; (1841) 88,478; (1911) 144,783. Denbighshire returns two members.

Denby, with Cumberworth, an urban district of Yorkshire, 8 miles W. of Barnsley. Pop. 3700.

Den'derah (Gr. Tentyra; Coptic Tentore, probably from Téi-n-Athor, 'Abode of Athor'), a village of Upper Egypt, once a populous town, near the Nile's left bank, in 26° 13′ N. lat., 32° 40′ E. long. Its temple, one of the finest and best-preserved structures of the kind in Egypt, dates from the period of Cleopatra and the earlier Roman emperors. It measures 300 by 135 feet.

Dendermonde (Dendermon'deh; Fr. Termonde), a town of Belgium, at the confluence of the Dender and the Scheldt, 18 miles E. of Ghent by rail. The fortifications, destroyed in 1784, were restored in 1822. Pop. 10,200.

Den Fenella, a romantic ravine in Kincardineshire, near Laurencekirk.

Denholm (Den'num), a Roxburghshire village, on the Teviot, 5 miles NE. of Hawick, with the birthplace of the poet Leyden. Pop. 400.

Denia, a port of the Spanish province of Alicante, near Cape St Martin. Pop. 12,000.

Deniliquin, the principal place in the Riverine district of New South Wales, 488 miles SW. of Sydney. Pop. 2700.

Denison, a city of northern Texas, 3 miles S. of the Red River, and 73 by rail N. of Dallas, with manufactures of cotton, flour, ice, artificial stone, &c. Pop. 12,300.

Denmark (Dan. Danmark), the smallest of the three Scandinavian kingdoms, consists of the peninsula of Jutland and a group of islands in the Baltic, and is bounded by the Skager-Rak, the Cattegat, the Sound, the Baltic, the Little Belt, Sleswick, and the North Sea. The sale of the Danish West Indies to the United States in 1902 was refused by the Landsthing.

The area of Denmark Proper—Jutland, and the islands of Zealand, Fünen, Laaland, Falster, &c.—with that of the Färoe Islands added, and the population are somewhat greater than half those of Scotland. The population, with the Färoe Islands, was in 1870, 1,794,723; in 1880, 1,980,259; in 1890, 2,185,235. Aarhuus, Odense, and Aalborg are, besides the capital Copenhagen (Kjöbenhavn), towns with over 30,000 inhabitants.

Except in Bornholm (q.v.), the surface of Denmark is very similar in every part of the kingdom, and is uniformly low, its highest point (in south-east Jutland) being only 564 feet above sea-level. The coast is generally flat, skirted by sand-dunes and shallow lagoons, especially along the west side. Both the continental portion and the islands are penetrated deeply by numerous fjords, the largest being Limfjord, which intersects Jutland, and has insulated the northern extremity of the peninsula since 1825, when it broke through the narrow isthmus which had separated it from the North Sea. There are several canals. The centre and west of Jutland is nearly bare of wood, but in the other parts of the peninsula the forests, especially of beech, cover about 215,000 acres, and in the islands over 291,000 acres. Peat, which is got in abundance from the bogs, brown coal or lignite, and seaweed are the chief fuel. The climate is milder, and the air more humid, than in the more southern but continental Germany; it is not unhealthy, except in the low-lying islands, such as Laaland, where the short and sudden heat of the summer occasions fevers.

The soils of Jutland are generally light, but those in the south-east part and in the islands are stronger; about 80 per cent. of the area of Denmark is productive, and of the remainder about one-sixth is in peat-bogs. Nearly half the population is engaged in agriculture; the land for the most part is parcelled out into small holdings. A third of the whole kingdom is arable, while over two-fifths is in meadow, pasture, or fallow land. The raising of cattle is taking more and more the place of arable farming in Denmark. Dairy produce has largely developed, and the export of butter greatly increased, owing to improved methods and the cooperative dairy system. Machinery, porcelain and delf wares, and bricks are leading manufactures; beet-root sugar refineries are increasing, and the distilleries, though declining, are still numerous; there are ironworks, ship-yards, tobacco-factories, and several paper-mills; and there are many large steam corn-mills. Though the peasants still continue to manufacture much of what they require within their own homes, linens and woollens, as well as wooden shoes, are now increasingly made in factories. The principal articles of export are cattle, sheep, swine, butter, hams, hides, wool, grain, fish, eggs, meat, and wooden goods. Among the imports are textile fabrics, cereals, and flour, manufactures of metal and timber, coal, oil, salt, coffee, sugar, and tobacco. About two-thirds of the export trade is carried on in native vessels. The total value of the imports in 1890–1911 ranged from 17 to 43 million pounds, and of the exports in the same period from 13 to 34 millions. The bulk of the foreign trade is with Germany, Great Britain, and the United States; the imports from Germany are double those from Britain, whereas the exports to Britain are about three times those to Germany. In 1911 Denmark sent to Britain butter to the value of £5,510,000. In 1913 there were 2300 miles of railway.

Elementary education is compulsory for children between the ages of seven and fourteen. Copenhagen University has 2000 students. The established religion is Lutheran, to which the king must belong; but complete toleration is enjoyed in every part of the kingdom. Only 1 per cent. of the population (including about 4000 Jews) belong to other forms of faith. The government of Denmark is a constitutional monarchy, the king being assisted by a cabinet of nine ministers. The national assembly or Rigsdag consists of the Folkething and Landsthing—the former partly nominated by the king, partly elected by the large taxpayers, the latter in the proportion of one to every 21,000 of the population, elected for three years by practically universal suffrage. The total revenue for the financial year 1911–12 was £9,398,676, and the expenditure £9,540,078. In the same year the net national debt was £19,539,000. The decimal system was introduced in 1875, the unit being the krone, or crown, of 100 öre; the average rate of exchange is 18 kroner to the pound sterling. The Danish army at peace strength is about 800 officers and 13,000 men; the war strength is 1250 officers and about 60,000 men. All the able-bodied men who have reached the age of twenty-two are liable to serve eight years in the regular army and reserve, and eight years in the territorial or extra reserve. The navy, for coast defence, is manned by 200 officers and 4000 men.

The early history of Denmark is lost in the twilight of the saga-period, with its Vikings and their valiant deeds. The Danes coming from the islands occupied the lands deserted by the Jutes and Angles who had in the 5th century migrated to England. The Danish monarchy was founded in 936 by Gorm the Old, whose son became a Christian. Waldemar I. (1157–82) ruled Norway also, and conquered Mecklenburg and Pomerania; under his son Waldemar II. further conquests were made in German and Wendish lands, so that the Baltic became a Danish sea. By the treaty of Calmar in 1397, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, already under one monarch, Margaret, were formally united into one state. In 1448 the Danes elected as king Christian of Oldenburg, a descendant of their royal family, who was also Duke of Sleswick and Holstein; and his line continued on the throne till 1863. Sweden became independent in 1523. Lutheranism was introduced into Denmark in 1527. In 1815 Denmark had to cede Norway to Sweden; and in 1848 the Germanic peoples of 'the duchies,' Sleswick and Holstein, rebelled against Denmark. For the time the Danes succeeded in retaining the duchies, but the controversy, renewed in 1863, led to the defeat of the Danes by Austria and Prussia (1864), followed by the incorporation of the duchies in the Germanic Confederation, and, after the Austro-Prussian war of 1866, in Prussia.

Dennewitz (Den'neh-veetz), a village 42 miles SSW. of Berlin. Here, on 6th September 1813, the Prussians defeated the French, Saxons, and Poles.

Denny, a mining town of Stirlingshire, 5½ miles WNW. of Falkirk, on the Carron, opposite Dunipace, with which since 1876 it forms a police burgh. Pop. 5200.

Dennystown, a suburb of Dumbarton.

Dent du Midi (Don^g dü Mi-dee'), a conspicuous Alpine peak of Valais which abuts on the valley of the Rhone, 12 miles S. of the east end of the Lake of Geneva; height 10,450 feet.

Denton, a Lancashire town, 3½ miles NNE. of Stockport. Pop. 17,000.

D'Entrecasteaux Islands (Don^{g}tr-cas-to'), since 1884 part of British New Guinea, lie north of the south-eastern extremity of New Guinea. With an area of 1083 sq. m., they comprise three chief islands, and are named after the French admiral and explorer, Bruni D'Entrecasteaux (1739–93), who visited them in 1792. His name is also preserved in D'ENTRECASTEAUX POINT on the south-west coast of Western Australia; and in D'ENTRECASTEAUX CHANNEL, separating the south of Tasmania from Bruni Island.

Denver, the capital of Colorado, on the South Platte River, 922 miles W. of St Louis. It lies on a level plain, 5196 feet above the sea, beyond which rise the snow-capped peaks and deep blue shoulders of the Rocky Mountains. Denver was founded on a barren waste, dry and treeless, in 1858, and in 1870 the population was 4759; in 1880, 35,629; in 1910, 213,381. In thirty years the mining-camp had been transformed into the 'Queen City of the Plains,' with stately buildings of brick and yellow stone, and wide, shaded streets, provided with the electric light, and with horse, cable, and electric tram-cars; and it has become the meeting-point of a great network of railways. It has an abundant water-supply, many of the houses are heated by steam, supplied by a company; and through the resident portion streams of water course past the unpaved footways. The clear invigorating air and dry climate of Denver are famous; the mean annual temperature is 48° F., and the rainfall 17 inches. Among the chief buildings are the city-hall, a handsome court-house and post-office, high school (1887), Episcopal cathedral, the state capitol (commenced in 1886, and measuring 383 by 313 feet), and the university. Denver is the centre of a great agricultural and mining district, and has a large trade in cattle, hides, wool, and tallow. It is chiefly, however, to its position as the centre of a great mining region that Denver owes its marvellous progress; the discovery, in 1878, of the fabulous wealth of the Leadville Hills attracted capital and emigration from all parts of the continent. It has a United States assaying mint, and is an important ore market.

Deoband', a town in the United Provinces, 15 miles N. of Muzaffarnagar. Pop. 20,500.

Deodar', a petty native state in the Palanpur Superintendency, Bombay Presidency. Area, 440 sq. m.; pop. 25,061.

Deori (De-o-ree'), a town in Nagpur district, 40 miles S. of Ságar. Pop. 8000.

Deptford, a town on the south bank of the Thames, 4½ miles below London Bridge, now one of the metropolitan boroughs and part of another. In 1885 it was constituted a parliamentary borough, returning one member. In its royal dockyard, dating from Henry VIII.'s reign, Queen Elizabeth knighted Drake when he returned from his voyage round the world. It was closed in 1869, when part of its site was fitted up by the London corporation as a foreign cattle-market. The Royal Victualling Yard is also here. Deptford was long famous for horticulture, but the gardens have mostly been built over or used for railway purposes. There is little shipbuilding now, but the General Steam Navigation Company employ a great many men here, and there are large and famous marine engineering establishments. In 1888–89 the Electric Lighting Company erected buildings here for supplying London with light. Peter the Great worked here as a shipwright. Lord Howard of Effingham, John Evelyn, Admiral Benbow, and Grinling Gibbons lived here; and Marlowe the dramatist was killed here, and is buried in St Nicholas, Deptford, churchyard (borough of Greenwich). Deptford is divided from Greenwich by the Ravensbourne, and over the creek there is a bridge where formerly the depe ford crossed the river. Pop. 109,500.

Derajat', the fluvial portion of Daman, a strip of territory between the Suliman Mountains and the Indus, was mostly incorporated in 1901 with the North-west Frontier Province.—Dera Ismail Khan, capital of a transferred district, is 4½ miles W. of the Indus. Pop. 35,000.—Dera Ghazi Khan is, though 2 miles W. of the Indus, still attached to the Punjab. Pop. 28,000.

Derayeh, a town of Arabia, 450 miles NE. of Mecca, was the capital of the Wahabis, and had a pop. of 60,000 prior to 1819, when it was nearly destroyed by Ibrahim Pasha. Pop. 1500.

Derbend' ('gateway'), a port and chief town of the Russian district of Daghestan, on the west shore of the Caspian, 140 miles NW. of Baku. The upper city forms the citadel, and contains the splendid palace of the ancient khans, now the seat of the Russian governor. Pop. 14,750.

Derby (often Dar'by), a parl., munic., and county borough, the capital of Derbyshire, on the Derwent, 92 miles SE. of Liverpool and 129 NNW. of London. The Roman station of Derventio was at Little Chester, a northern suburb. Derby was a royal borough in Edward the Confessor's time, but was first placed under a mayor in 1638. It has returned two members since 1295. The tower of All Saints (1509–27) is a grand example of Perpendicular architecture, 175 feet high, exclusive of the pinnacles; the Roman Catholic church of St Mary (1835) is a good specimen of Pugin's work. Other buildings are the town-hall (1866); the free library and museum and art gallery, all gifted, like a recreation ground, by Mr M. T. Bass, from 1848 to 1883 M.P. for Derby; the grammar-school, a modern erection, but founded in 1162; and the infirmary, whose foundation-stone was laid by Queen Victoria in May 1891. The choicely-planted arboretum (16 acres), near the central railway station, was the gift (1840) of Mr Joseph Strutt. Derby is the headquarters of the Midland Railway Company; their vast establishments employ over 5000 men. Its manufactures are silk, cotton, elastic web, lace, hosiery, iron, lead, shot, spar, porcelain, marble, colours, and chemicals. Silk, one of its staple manufactures, was begun here first in England by John Lombe in 1719. Porcelain was manufactured here from 1756 till 1814; and the Derby Crown Porcelain Company has recently revived this beautiful industry with much success. Richardson, the novelist, 'Wright of Derby,' the painter, and Herbert Spencer, were natives; and Derby is identified with the 'Stoniton' of George Eliot's Adam Bede. Pop. (1841) 32,741; (1911) 123,410.

Derbyshire, an inland county of England, lying between Yorkshire and Leicestershire, Notts, Staffordshire, and Cheshire. Its length is 56 miles; its greatest breadth, 34 miles; and its area, 1029 sq. m., or 658,624 acres. Pop. (1801) 161,567; (1841) 272,202; (1911) 683,423. The surface is much diversified, the south being mostly flat, the east of an undulating character, but the north exceptionally hilly and rugged. The high land here, called the Peak (which is the name of a district and not of any particular point or mountain), is the southern termination of the Pennine chain, and forms the watershed between the Trent and the Mersey. The chief summits are Kinder Scout (2082 feet), Axe Edge (1810), and Blakelow Stones, Mam Tor, and Lord's Seat (all about 1700). North Derbyshire is justly celebrated for its picturesque scenery, which chiefly centres in the valleys of the Derwent and Wye. Matlock and Buxton, with warm mineral springs, are the two chief places of resort. The other towns are the four municipal boroughs of Derby, Chesterfield, Glossop, and Ilkeston, and Ashbourne, Bakewell, Belper, and Wirksworth. Since 1885 Derbyshire returns nine members to parliament; two for the borough of Derby, and seven for the county, who sit respectively for Chesterfield, High Peak, Mid Derbyshire, Ilkeston, North-eastern Derbyshire, Southern, and Western. Besides important coal-mining, chiefly in the eastern division, Derbyshire is singularly wealthy in a diversity of minerals and metals—iron, lead, zinc, manganese, copper, gypsum, pipeclay and chert for potteries, marble, fluor-spar, and alabaster. The chief manufactures are cotton, silk, elastic web, worsted, metallic goods, porcelain and pottery, and spar ornaments. Though more a manufacturing and mining than an agricultural county, Derbyshire is not undistinguished for its pastoral and corn-growing properties, and, in the south, for its dairies. Of the total area, 78 per cent. is under crops of all kinds, bare fallow, and grass. There is much permanent pasture and large sheep-walks in the Peak district. Ecclesiastically Derbyshire is, since 1884, in the diocese of Southwell, with 19 rural deaneries and a suffragan bishop at Derby. There are ruined abbeys at Dale and Beauchief, and peculiarly fine churches at Melbourne, Ashbourne, and Tideswell. The Saxon crypt of Repton, and the churchyard crosses of Eyam, Bakewell, Hope, &c., are the oldest ecclesiastical remains. Of feudal and domestic buildings may be named the castles of Castleton, Bolsover, and Duffield, the manor-house of South Winfield (ruin), Haddon Hall, and Hardwick Hall. Chatsworth (q.v.) is unrivalled. Arbelow, near Youlgreave, is the most important 'stone circle' in England next to Stonehenge. Derbyshire's chief historic association is the retreat in 1745 of Prince Charles Edward, Derby being the turning-point in his enterprise. Natives have been Flamsteed, Chantrey, and Brindley. See works by Cox (5 vols. 1876–91) and Pendleton (1886), and the 'Victoria History' (1906 et seq.).

Dereham, East, a pleasant, thriving market-town of Norfolk, 17 miles (by rail 22) WNW. of Norwich. Here, in 650, St Withberga founded a nunnery. It was burned by the Danes, but refounded; and its cruciform church remains, with a detached belfry (the 'New Clocker'), St Withberga's well, and Cowper's grave. Bonner was a vicar; Dr Wollaston and Borrow were natives. Dereham manufactures agricultural implements. Pop. 6000.

Derg, Lough, the largest lake expansion of the river Shannon, between Tipperary and Galway and Clare, is 24 miles long, 2 wide on an average, and 80 feet deep.—Another Lough Derg, in the south of Donegal, 3 miles by 2½, has many small isles. Saint's Isle has remains of a priory; Station Island, the reputed entrance to St Patrick's Purgatory, a famous place of pilgrimage.

Derna, a port of Tripoli; pop. 10,000.

Derry. See Londonderry.

Derwent, (1) a river of Derbyshire, flowing 60 miles, past Derby, to the Trent, has waterworks for Nottingham, Leicester, Derby, and Sheffield.—(2) A river of Northumberland and Durham, flowing 30 miles to the Tyne, near Gateshead.—(3) A river of Yorkshire, flowing 57 miles to the Ouse at Barmby-on-the-Marsh.

Derwent, the principal river of Tasmania, from Lake St Clair winds 130 miles SE. to Storm Bay at Hobart, its estuary being 4 miles wide.

Derwentwater, a sheet of water, stretching south from Keswick, the most beautiful of the Cumberland lakes. Lying 238 feet above sea-level, and engirt by steep wooded crags and hills, it is 3 miles long by 1 broad, and 72 feet deep. Near its foot rise Castle Hill (529 feet) and Friar's Crag, commanding exquisite views; whilst at its head are the Lodore Falls and Borrowdale. This lake is an enlargement of the Derwent River, which traverses it in its course towards the Irish Sea at Workington. It has several wooded isles, besides a remarkable floating isle.

Desertas, three rocky Atlantic islets, SE. of Madeira, visited by fishermen and herdsmen.

Deseret. See Utah.

Desirade (Day-zee-râhd'), a French West Indian island, 4 miles E. of Guadeloupe. Area, 10 sq. m.; pop. 1400, who fish and cultivate cotton.

Des Moines (Deh-Moin'), capital of Iowa, on Des Moines River, at the mouth of Raccoon River, 174 miles W. of Davenport by rail. The river, rising in the SW. part of Minnesota, flows 550 miles generally SE. to the Mississippi. Founded in 1846, the city has a fine state-house ($3,000,000), a marble post-office and court-house, a university, a state library of over 22,500 volumes, and a public park, with fine groves of forest trees. There are foundries and planing and flouring mills, besides manufactories of machinery, engines, boilers, railway cars, &c. Population, 86,400.

Desmond, a former district of Munster, comprising the counties of Cork and Kerry.

Desna, a navigable river of Russia, rising in Smolensk province, and flowing 550 miles SE. and SW. to the Dnieper, almost opposite Kiev. It receives the Seim and the Snov.

Despoblado (Span., 'desert'), a treeless, uninhabited plateau, nearly 10,000 feet above the sea, on the Bolivian and Argentine frontier, to the north-east of Antofagasta.

Despoto Dagh. See Rhodope.

Dessau (Des'sow), a town of Germany, capital of the duchy of Anhalt, on the Mulde's left bank, near its junction with the Elbe, 70 miles SW. of Berlin. Its principal building is the fine ducal palace (1748). Pop. 56,000.

Desterro, an important port of Brazil, on the N. coast of the island of Santa Catharina, 240 miles NE. of Porto Alegre. Pop. 30,700.

Detmold, capital of the German principality of Lippe, on the Werre, 47 miles SW. of Hanover by rail. It has an old castle, a modern palace, and manufactures of tobacco, cards, and carved work. On a hill 2 miles off is Bandel's colossal statue of Arminius (1875). Pop. 14,300.

Detroit, the chief commercial city and port of entry of Michigan, on the Detroit River, 125 miles by water, and 178 by land, NW. of Cleveland, Ohio, and 284 ENE. of Chicago. Detroit is substantially built upon rising ground, its streets are broad, well paved, and shaded with trees; it is well supplied with the best of water; and its fire, police, and school departments are excellent. The principal manufactures include iron products, machinery, railroad cars, flour, malt liquors, cigars, leather, boots and shoes, &c. The public buildings embrace a Catholic cathedral, a city-hall erected at a cost of $600,000, a Board of Trade building, a United States marine hospital, &c. Detroit is among the oldest places in the United States. It came into possession of the French in 1610, was transferred to the British in 1763, and in 1796 passed to the United States. It was incorporated as a city in 1824. Pop. (1870) 79,577; (1880) 116,340; (1910) 465,766.

Detroit River, so called, on whose northwestern bank stands Detroit City, is the strait through which the waters of Lake St Clair and of the great upper lakes of the St Lawrence system flow into Lake Erie, and thence to the Atlantic. It is 20 miles in length, and at Detroit forms an excellent harbour.

Dettingen (Det'ting-en), a village of Bavaria, 10 miles NW. of Aschaffenburg by rail. Here, on 27th June 1743, George II. of England, commanding English, Hanoverians, and Austrians, defeated the larger French army under the Duc de Noailles.—There is another Dettingen (pop. 3500) in Würtemberg, 10 miles E. of Reutlingen.

Deutschbrod (Doitch-brod), a town in Bohemia, 15 miles from the Moravian frontier. Here in 1422 the Hussite general Ziska defeated the Emperor Sigismund. Pop. 7000.

Deutz (Doitz). See COLOGNE.

Deux-ponts (Duh-pon^g'). See ZWEIBRÜCKEN.

Deux-Sèvres (Duh-Sehvr'). See SÈVRES.

Dev'enter, an old Hanse town of Holland, on the Yssel, 11 miles NNW. of Zutphen by rail. It has a cathedral, a fine town-house, and manufactures of iron, carpets, and gingerbread. Here Thomas à Kempis and Erasmus were educated. Pop. 28,000.

Dev'eron, a beautiful salmon river, rising near the Buck of the Cabrach, at an altitude of 1847 feet, and winding 62 miles north-eastward to the Moray Firth at Banff.

Devil's Bridge, Cardiganshire, 12 miles E. by S. of Aberystwith, a double bridge over a ravine, the lower one built in the 11th or 12th c., the upper (30 feet in span, and 114 high) in 1753.

Devil's Ditch, a great earthwork of Cambridgeshire, running 7 miles south-eastward from Reach to Wood-Ditton.

Devil's Dyke, a kind of natural amphitheatre in the Downs, 5½ miles NW. of Brighton.

Devizes, a municipal borough of Wiltshire, near the Kennet and Avon Canal, 50 miles WSW. of Reading, and 20 ESE. of Bath. The old name Divisæ or Ad Divisas marked the ancient boundary between the English and Celts; but as a town, Devizes owes its origin to a splendid castle built here by Bishop Roger of Salisbury about 1132. It was stormed by Cromwell in 1645, and now is represented by mere fragments. There are two churches with much interesting Norman work; a market-cross (1814), commemorating God's judgment on a perjuress in 1753; a fountain with a statue of Sothern Estcourt (1879); a good museum; and a large corn exchange (1857). From Henry VIII.'s time till about 1820 Devizes was a great cloth mart; now its chief manufactures are tobacco, agricultural implements, and other machinery. It returned two members till 1867, then one till 1885. Pop. 6700. See A History of Devizes (1859).

Devon, a Scottish stream winding 34 miles from the Ochils to the Forth near Alloa.

Devonport (before 1824 called PLYMOUTH DOCK), a parliamentary, municipal, and county borough, maritime town, and naval arsenal, of Devonshire, on the estuary of the Tamar (which is 4 miles long by ½ mile broad, and called the Hamoaze), 2 miles WNW. of Plymouth. It stands on high ground, and is separated from its growing suburbs of Stoke and Morice Town by the glacis of its fortifications, once important, but now dismantled. Devonport owes its existence to the dockyard established here by William III. in 1689, and is one of the chief naval arsenals in Britain. The government establishments stretch for nearly 4 miles along the Hamoaze. The original dockyard, extended from time to time until it contained six building-slips, was supplemented in 1844 by the formation at Morice Town of the Keyham Steam Yard and Factory, which communicates with the dockyard and gun-wharf (designed by Vanbrugh) by a tunnel. Farther up the river are an engineers' college, seamen's barracks, magazines, and powder-works; and the Hamoaze itself contains many men-of-war. The official residences of the admiral of the port and of the lieutenant-governor of the western district are at Mount Wise, which is fortified. Here also are the chief barracks of the troops which garrison the 'three towns' of Plymouth, Devonport, and Stonehouse. The military hospital is on Stonehouse Creek. Pop. of municipal borough 81,700; of parliamentary borough, which includes East Stonehouse, and returns two members, 86,000.

Devonshire, a maritime county of south-west England between the Bristol and the English Channel. Its greatest length is 70 miles; its greatest breadth, 65; its coast-line, about 150; and its area, 2600 sq. m., of which about three-fourths are under cultivation. The north coast is the boldest, with several hills over 1000 feet. Its chief indentation is Bideford Bay, 18 miles broad and 8 deep, into which fall the Taw and the Torridge. The south coast is also lined with cliffs, chief among them being Bolt Head and Start Point. Tor Bay is 3 by 3½ miles; and Plymouth Sound, the combined estuary of the Tamar and Plym, is one of the finest harbours in the kingdom. Devonshire is hilly, the most elevated parts being the table-lands of Dartmoor in the south-west, Exmoor in the north-west, running into Somerset, and Blackdown in the east. These are mainly open moor-lands. Dartmoor is very rocky; the lower hills grassy. High Willhayse, on Dartmoor (2039 feet), is the highest point. Copper, tin, lead, iron, and manganese occur in commercial quantities, with ores of several other metals; china, terra-cotta, potter's, and pipe clays; granites, marbles, anthracite, lignite, gypsum, and other earthy minerals. The Tamar, 59 miles, is the longest of numerous rivers, and divides Devon from Cornwall; the Exe, 54 miles, rises in Somerset. The other rivers are the Dart, Teign, Taw, Torridge, and Plym (all rising in Dartmoor), Exe, and Tamar. The red deer still run wild on Exmoor. The climate, especially in the south, is mild and humid, and not liable to great extremes. Hence, several of the coast-towns have become famous as health-resorts—notably Torquay and Ilfracombe. Myrtles and aloes commonly flourish in the open air; and in specially favoured spots oranges and lemons, with a little protection, will thrive and fruit. The county is most fertile, especially in the South Hams, and on the 'red land' of the Vale of Exeter. The pastures are very rich, and dairy-farming and cattle-breeding are prominent in its agriculture. The red Devon cattle are one of the leading breeds; and the sheep and ponies of Dartmoor and Exmoor have more than a local reputation. 'Clotted cream' is a special product. There are extensive orchards, from which great quantities of cider are made. The fisheries are extensive and valuable. Though in the main agricultural, Devon has a varied industrial character. Mining and quarrying and clay-working are of considerable importance; and the manufactures include serges, lace, gloves; extensive potteries; manure, chemical, and soap works; paper-mills, breweries, and distilleries. The chief towns are Exeter, Plymouth, Devonport, Torquay, Tiverton, Barnstaple, Stonehouse, Tavistock, Teignmouth, Newton, Dartmouth, Exmouth, Ilfracombe, Paignton, and Brixham. Pop. 700,000. Under the Reform Act of 1885 Exeter returns one member, Plymouth and Devonport two each, and the rest of the county is divided into eight single-member constituencies. No county save Middlesex has given birth to so many great men—Raleigh, Drake, Hawkins, John Davis, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, Sir Richard Grenville, Monk, Marlborough, Bishop Jewell, Gay, St Boniface, Newcomen, Wolcott, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Coleridge, Kingsley, John Ford, among them. See works by Worth (1886) and Page (1893).

Dewas', a protectorate of Central India, held conjointly by two Rajput chiefs. Area, 289 sq. m.; pop. 172,073. The capital, Dewas, 20 miles NE. of Indore, has a pop. of 12,921.

Dewsbury, a manufacturing town and municipal and parliamentary borough in the West Riding of Yorkshire, at the base of a hill, on the Calder's left bank, 32 miles SW. of York, and 8 SSW. of Leeds. The Calder navigation connects the town with Liverpool and Hull. Dewsbury has a chamber of commerce (1861), an infirmary (1883), a new town-hall (1888), new county courts, and a grammar-school (St Augustine's). Along with Batley (q.v.) it is the centre of the shoddy trade. Blankets, carpets, yarns, and iron are also largely manufactured. Dewsbury obtained a municipal charter in 1872. Pop. of mun. borough (including Thornhill, &c.), 53,400; of parl. borough, which, formed in 1867, includes Batley and Soothill, and returns one member, 77,000.

Dhar, a town of Central India, the capital of a protected state, 33 miles W. of Mhov. Pop. 15,000. Area of state, 1740 sq. m.; pop. 169,474.

Dharmsala, a hill-station in the Punjab, 110 miles NE. of Lahore. Pop. 5522.

Dharwar, a town in the southern Mahratta country, Bombay presidency, separated by the river Tungabhadra from Madras. Pop. 32,841.

Dholka, a town of Bombay presidency, 22 miles SW. of Ahmadabad. Pop. 18,716.

Dholpore, a native state of Rajputana, Central India, on the north bank of the Chumbul, with an area of 1156 sq. m., and a pop. of 263,000. Capital, Dholpore, on the Chumbul, 34 miles S. of Agra by rail. Two religious fairs are held every year at Machkund, a lake 3 miles to the west, with 114 temples on its banks.

Dhuheartach, an Argyllshire islet, 15½ miles SW. of Iona, with a lighthouse (1867–72).

Dhwalagiri (Dwalagir'ree, g hard), once supposed to be the highest peak of the Himalayas, but really exceeded by several (26,826 feet). It is in Nepal, in 29° N. lat. and 82° 30′ E. long.

Diablerets (De-ab'ler-ay'), a four-peaked mountain (10,651 feet) of the Bernese Alps, Switzerland, on the frontiers of Bern and Valais. There were terrible landslips here in 1714 and 1749.

Diamantina (Dee-a-man-tee'na), an episcopal town in the Brazilian province of Minas Geraes; centre of a rich diamond district. Pop. 13,000.

Diamond Harbour, a port on the Hooghly, 38 miles SSW. of Calcutta by rail, 41 by river.

Diarbek'ir (anc. Amida), a decayed town of Asiatic Turkey, on the right bank of the Tigris, 390 miles NW. of Bagdad. It is walled, and commanded by a citadel built on a high basalt rock, against which the flat-roofed houses rise above each other in terraces. Pop. 40,000.

Didcot, the junction for Oxford, 53 miles W. by N. of London.

Diedenhofen. See THIONVILLE.

Diego Garcia (De-ay'go), a low coral island of the Indian Ocean, a dependency of Mauritius, in 7° S. lat. and 72°–73° E. long., extends 30 miles in a horseshoe shape, embracing between its extremities three minor islets (the Chagos Islands). It is convenient for coaling. Pop. 500.

Diego Suarez, a fine bay at the north end of Madagascar, ceded to France by treaty in 1885.

Dieppe (De-epp', or Dyepp'), a seaport in the French dep. of Seine-Inférieure, on the English Channel, 40 miles N. of Rouen by rail. It is situated among chalk-cliffs, at the mouth of the river Arques, and is regularly built. It has a castle (1433, now occupied as barracks), a fine Gothic church of the 13th century, a handsome bathing establishment and casino, and a harbour which admits vessels of 600 tons. It manufactures clocks, lace, and tobacco; and its carved articles of horn, bone, and ivory have long been famous. There are also shipbuilding yards, distilleries, and important fisheries. Dieppe's prosperity attained its zenith between the middle of the 14th century and the end of the 17th; many expeditions sailed hence for the west coast of Africa and Canada. But a terrible bombardment by the English and Dutch destroyed all but two or three buildings in 1694; the town never recovered its importance, and even before the rise of Havre had already sunk to a secondary port. Nevertheless, steamers ply regularly to Newhaven. Pop. 22,000.

Diest (Deest), a Belgian town, on the Demer, 37 miles SE. of Antwerp. Pop. 8200.

Digby, a seaport of Nova Scotia, on St Mary's Bay, reputed for its cured pilchards. Pop. 1300.

Digne (Deeñ), a cathedral city in the French dep. of Basses-Alpes, on the Bléonne, 70 miles NE. of Marseilles. Pop. 4600.

Dihong. See BRAHMAPUTRA.

Dijon (Dee-zhong'), chief town in dep. of Côte-d'Or, lies, spread out on a fertile plain, at the foot of Mont Afrique (1916 feet), at the junction of the Ouche and Suzon, and on the Canal de Bourgogne, 196 miles SE. of Paris by rail. Its importance as a railway centre has rendered it of consequence in the inner line of French defences towards the east, and strong forts now crown the neighbouring hills. Of the mediæval defences, the Gothic castle built by Louis XI. still remains, employed as a gendarmerie barrack; formerly it was a state-prison. Among the public buildings are the massive Gothic cathedral, dating from the 13th century, with a wooden spire (1742) 301 feet high; the churches of Notre Dame (1252–1334) and St Michel (1529); a handsome theatre; the palais de justice; and the former palace of the Dukes of Burgundy, which, commenced in 1366, is now the town-hall, and contains a rich museum and a library. The manufactures include beer, brandy, woollen cloth, blankets, mustard, candles, and pottery, and there is a noteworthy trade in flowers and agricultural produce; but Dijon's chief commercial importance is as the centre of the Upper Burgundy wine trade. Population 77,000. The Dibia of the Romans, Dijon in 1007 was united to the duchy of Burgundy, of which it became the capital. On Charles the Bold's death (1477) it came to France. In October 1870 it capitulated to the Germans. Charles the Bold, Crébillon, Bossuet, and Rameau were natives, and close by is the birthplace of St Bernard, of whom there is a statue by Jouffroy (1847).

Dillingen (Dil'ling-en), a Bavarian town, on the Danube, 51 miles WSW. of Ingolstadt. In the castle the bishops of Augsburg formerly resided, and here they founded a university (1554–1804), from 1564 an active Jesuit centre. Pop. 6000.

Dilman', a town of Northern Persia, 75 miles W. of Tabriz. Pop. 6000.

Dilston, the ruined seat of the Jacobite Earl of Derwentwater, in Northumberland, 2½ miles E. by S. of Hexham.

Dinájpur, a town in Rajshahi division (Kuch Behar), Bengal, on the Purnabhaba, 221 miles N. of Calcutta by rail. Pop. 12,560.

Dinan (Deen-on$^{g'}$), an old town in the French dep. of Côtes-du-Nord, on the Rance, 30 m. NW. of Rennes, and 14 S. of St Malo. Its situation, on the summit of a steep granite hill, with the Rance flowing through a valley 250 feet below, is highly romantic. The valley is crossed by a fine granite bridge of ten arches. The town is still partly surrounded by its ivy-covered walls; and the old castle of the Dukes of Brittany is now in part used as a prison. A fine Romanesque church contains the heart of Du Guesclin. Many English reside here. Pop. 8000. Four miles off lies the village of Corseult, on an old Roman site, where many antiquities have been found.

Dinant (Deen-on$^{g'}$), a town of Belgium, occupying a narrow site between the Meuse and a limestone hill, 17 miles S. of Namur by rail. On the cliff above stands the citadel (1530). There are manufactures of cotton, paper, leather, iron, gingerbread, &c., with black marble quarries; copper wares (Dinanderie) are still made. Pop. 8000.

Dinapore (Dánápur), military headquarters of the district of Patna in Bihar, on the Ganges, 12 miles W. of Patna. Pop. 35,000.

Dinard, the most fashionable watering-place in Brittany, on the Rance estuary opposite St Malo (q.v.) and St Servan. Pop. 5000.

Dina'ric Alps, the mountains connecting the Julian Alps with the Balkan system; the main range, stretching SE., separates Dalmatia from Bosnia and Herzegovina. The highest summits are Orjen (6225) and Dinara (5940).

Dinas Mowddwy (Din'as Mowth'ee), a market-town of Merionethshire, 10 miles E. by S. of Dolgelly. Pop. of Mallwyd urban district, 760.

Dingle, a seaport on the north side of Dingle Bay, in County Kerry, Ireland, 27 miles SW. of Tralee. Pop. 1800.

Dingwall (Scand., 'court hill'), the county town of Ross-shire, near the head of the Cromarty Firth, and at the entrance to the valley of Strathpeffer, 13½ miles NW. of Inverness (by rail 18½). A royal burgh since 1226, it unites with Wick, &c. to return one member. Pop. 2600.

Dinkelsbühl, an ancient walled town of Bavaria, 19 miles NNW. of Nördlingen. Pop. 5000.

Diomede Islands, a group of three small islands in Behring Strait, forming, as it were, stepping-stones between Asia and America.

Dirk Hartog Island, measuring 40 miles by 10, lies off the west coast of Australia. With Peron Peninsula to the south, it encloses the Freycinet Inlet, and, with two smaller islands to the north, forms the breastwork of Shark's Bay.

Dirleton, a Haddingtonshire village, with a fine ruined castle, 2½ miles WSW. of North Berwick.

Dirschau (Deer'show), a town of Prussia, 20 miles SSE. of Danzig, on the Vistula, here crossed by a railway viaduct and a road bridge. Polish from 1466 till 1772, it now has great railway works and sugar-factories. Pop. 15,000.

Disco, an island on the west coast of Greenland, in 70° N. lat. It is 90 miles long and 3000 feet high, and has good coal. The harbour of Godhavn is on the south coast.

Dismal Swamp, measuring 30 miles from north to south by 10 in breadth, lies chiefly in Virginia, but partly in North Carolina, and in the centre has Lake Drummond, 6 miles broad. It formerly was a frequent hiding-place of runaway slaves. Its dense growth of cypress and cedar has been greatly thinned, and part of the region has been reclaimed. It is intersected by a canal connecting Chesapeake Bay and Albemarle Sound.

Diss, a market-town of Norfolk, on a rising-ground above a mere of 5 acres, 19 miles SSW. of Norwich. Skelton was rector here. Pop. 3800.

District of Columbia, a district of the United States, containing Washington (q.v.) and Georgetown, is bounded west by the Potomac, and elsewhere by Maryland. Area, 60 sq. m.; population 331,000. Till 1871 the district remained an unorganised territory, under congress; but in that year a territorial government was organised, and in 1878 congress placed the whole control of it under three commissioners, appointed by the president and approved by the senate.

Ditmarsh, or DITHMARSCHEN, the western district of Holstein, low-lying and fertile, between the Eider and the Elbe, with an area of 531 miles.

Dïu, a seaport situated at the eastern extremity of a Portuguese island (7 × 2 miles) of the same name, off the south coast of Kathiawar, 180 miles NW. of Bombay. Once a city of 50,000 souls, it has sunk in importance till now the whole island has but 15,000 inhabitants, mostly fishermen. Some magnificent buildings still attest its ancient splendour, such as the Jesuit College (1601), now a cathedral. The place has been Portuguese since 1535, and stood a famous siege in 1545.

Dixon Entrance, a strait on the west coast of North America, separating Queen Charlotte Islands from the Prince of Wales Archipelago, and so dividing British territory from Alaska.

Dizful, a town of Persia, on the river Diz, 190 miles W. of Ispahan. Pop. 35,000. The ruins of Susa lie 14 miles SSW.

Djiboutil (Jee-boo'til). See Somaliland.

Dmitrov, a town of Russia, on a tributary of the Volga, 42 miles N. of Moscow. Pop. 10,000.

Dnieper (D'nee'pr; anc. Borysthenes), a river rising near the Volga and Western Dwina, in the N. of the Russian province of Smolensk, and flowing 1330 miles southward past Kieff, Ekaterinoslav, and Alexandrovsk to the Black Sea. Its embouchure (increased by the waters of the Bug) forms a gulf nearly 50 miles long, and 1 to 6 miles broad. Its principal affluents are the Desna and Soj from the east, and the Pripet, Beresina, and Druz from the west. At Dorogobush the stream becomes navigable, but below Kieff and at other points traffic is interrupted. The produce of the southern provinces is usually conveyed down the river to ports on the Black Sea, but many vessels pass annually from the Dnieper to the Baltic by the Brest-Litovsk canal (50 miles) and other water-ways. The stream is permanently bridged at Kieff only. At Smolensk, its waters are frozen from November to April; at Kieff, only from January to the end of March; and at Kherson it is frequently open all the year.

Dniester (D'nees'tr), a muddy river of Russia, rises in the Carpathian Mountains, in Austrian Galicia, and flows 650 miles SSE., separating Bessarabia from Podolia and Cherson, and entering the Black Sea by a shallow shore lake, 18 miles long and 5 broad.

Do'ab (Sanskrit, 'two rivers;' cf. Punjab), a term used in India for the country between any two rivers, but specially between the Jumna and the Ganges—a space extending from Allahabad to the base of the Himalayas, a distance of upwards of 500 miles, with an average breadth of 55 miles. It is the granary of Upper India.

Dobcross, a town of Yorkshire, 6½ miles NE. of Ashton-under-Lyne. Pop. 3000.

Do'beran, a town of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, 2½ miles from the Baltic, and 25 NE. of Wismar, has a ducal palace (1232), a sea-bathing establishment, and a chalybeate spring. Pop. 5000.

Dobritch. See Bazardjik, Dobrudja.

Dobrudja (also spelt Dobruja, Dobrudscha, Dobrogea), the south-eastern portion of Roumania, between the lower Danube and the Black Sea, transferred to Roumania by the Berlin Congress of 1878. The south-western part was ceded by Bulgaria in 1913. The north-east is occupied by marshes and the Danube delta; the rest is mostly a treeless steppe.

Dodworth, a Yorkshire urban district, 2¾ miles W. by S. of Barnesley. Pop. 3300.

Doesborgh (Doos'borhh; anc. Drususburg), a Dutch fortified town, at the confluence of the Old and New Yssel, noted for its mustard. Pop. 5000.

Doggerbank, an extensive flat sandbank in the German Ocean, between England and Denmark, 100 miles off the Yorkshire coast. It is 170 miles long by 65 broad, with a depth of from 8 to 16 fathoms. Its fisheries are most valuable. In October 1904 a Russian fleet on its way to the China seas fired on English trawlers off the Doggerbank, creating the 'Doggerbank incident.'

Dogs, Isle of, or Millwall, a low-lying peninsula on the Thames' left bank, formed by a sudden bend of the river opposite Greenwich.

Dol, an antique walled town in the French dep. of Ille-et-Vilaine, 10 miles SE. of St Malo. Its former cathedral is a granite building of the 13th century. To the north is the isolated Mont Dol (213 feet). Pop. 3500.

Dôle (anc. Dola Sequanorum), a town in the French dep. of Jura, the capital formerly of Franche-Comté, on the Doubs, 29 miles SE. of Dijon. It has a Gothic cathedral. Pasteur was born here. Pop. 10,000.

Dolgelly (Dolgeth'ly; 'dale of hazels'), capital of Merioneth, Wales, on the Wnion, 62 miles SW. of Chester by rail. It lies at the foot of Cader Idris, and in summer is frequented by tourists. It manufactures coarse woollens and flannels; its Welsh tweed is in great repute. Pop. 2200.

Dollar, a town of Clackmannanshire, at the foot of the Ochils, and near the Devon's right bank, 6 miles NE. of Alloa. Its academy, a domed Grecian edifice (1818–67), founded under the will of Captain John M'Nab (1732–1802), a Dollar herdboy and London shipowner, gives higher and secondary education to 800 pupils of both sexes. A mile north are the noble ruins of Castle Campbell, crowning an almost insulated knoll, with King's Seat (2111 feet) rising behind. It belonged to the Argylls from 1465 till 1805, in 1556 sheltered John Knox, and in 1645 was burned by Montrose. Pop. 1500.

Dollart, The, a gulf of the German Ocean, at the mouth of the Ems, between Hanover and Holland. It is 8 miles long by 7 broad, and was formed by inundations of the sea (1277–1362).

Dolnja Tuzla (Doln'ya Tooz'la), a town of Bosnia, 52 miles (by rail 154) NNE. of Sarajevo. Pop. 11,000.

Dolomite Mountains, a region of jagged outlines and isolated peaks, in the south-east of Tyrol and in the Carinthian Alp masses—Dolomite being a kind of limestone.

Domin'ica (Fr. Dominique), the largest and most southerly British island in the Leeward group of the Lesser Antilles, midway between the French islands of Martinique and Guadeloupe. Area, 291 sq. m.; population, 34,000, mostly negroes, with a few Caribs and whites, and two-thirds speaking a French patois. Dominica is of volcanic origin, with many hot and sulphureous springs. In 1880 there was a great eruption of volcanic ash from the 'Boiling Lake' at the southern extremity of the island. The temperature is cool and even chilly in the mountains, but sultry on the coast; rain falls nearly every month, and the annual rainfall is 83 inches. Nearly one-half of the surface consists of wooded mountains and deep ravines, and at one point the surface attains 5300 feet. Agriculture is confined to a narrow coast strip. The principal products are fruit, cocoa, essential oils, lime-juice, coffee, sugar, and timber, and the fisheries are valuable. The capital is Roseau, a port on the west coast, with a pop. of 9000. The majority of the inhabitants are Roman Catholics. Dominica was discovered by Columbus, on his second voyage, on Sunday (whence its name 'the Lord's Day'), 3d November 1493. In 1648 it was declared by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle a neutral island; but in 1759 it was captured by England, and in 1763 ceded by France, who, however, held it again in 1778–83, and in 1802–14, when it was finally restored to Britain.

Dominican Republic, or Santo (commonly San) Domingo, a state formed of the eastern portion of Hayti (q.v.). Area, 18,000 sq. m., or over two-thirds of the whole island; population, 700,000, mostly negroes or mulattoes. The state religion is Roman Catholic; the prevailing dialect is Spanish. Civilisation has not reached a high level; but of late years the country has made considerable progress under the impulse of American enterprise. Large sugar plantations and factories have been developed in the south and west; tobacco, coffee, bananas, and cocoa are grown; and the export of mahogany, dyewoods, and guano has been revived. Copper is worked. Gold, silver, quicksilver, iron and coal have been found; and there are 150 miles of railway. The president is chosen for six years, and the legislative power is a senate and chamber of deputies. The capital is San Domingo.—This portion of the island remained Spanish when the western part was ceded to France in 1697, and was united with the neighbouring state in 1795–1808 and 1822–43. In 1843 it assumed a separate standing as the Dominican Republic, reconstituted in 1865, after having reverted to Spain (1861–63). The customs were submitted to the charge of the United States in 1905–7.

Dominion. See Canada, New Zealand.

Domo d'Os'sola, a cathedral city of Piedmont, at the foot of the Simplon, near the Toce's right bank, 56 miles by rail N. of Novara. Pop. 3000.

Domremy-la-Pucelle, Joan of Arc's birthplace, a village in the French dep. of Vosges, on the Meuse, 8 miles N. of Neufchâteau.

Don, a river of the West Riding of Yorkshire, rising in the Penistone moors on the borders of Derbyshire and Cheshire, and running 70 miles SE. and NE. past Sheffield, Rotherham, Doncaster, and Thorne, to the Ouse at Goole.

Don, a salmon-river of Aberdeenshire, rising close to the Banffshire boundary in a peat-moss 1980 feet above sea-level, and winding 82 miles eastward to the German Ocean, 1 mile NE. of Old Aberdeen, and not far below the 'Auld Brig o' Balgownie' (c. 1320), commemorated in Byron's Don Juan. Its chief affluent is the Ury.

Don (anc. Tanais), a river of Russia, having its source in a small lake in the government of Tula, and flowing 1125 miles southward through the governments of Tula, Riazan, Tambov, Voronej, and the country of the Don Cossacks, till it enters the Sea of Azov by several mouths, of which the Aksai is the most considerable. Among its affluents are the Voronej, Donetz, Khoper, and Medvieditza. The Don is navigable for large boats below Voronej, and in its upper course is connected by canal and railway with the Volga. Its waters abound in fish.

Donabyú, a town of Burma, on the Irawadi, 35 miles S. of Henzada. Pop. 3273.

Dona Francisca, a German colony in the Brazilian province of Santa Catharina, 14 miles from its port, São Francisco. Area, 97 sq. m.; pop. 18,000. Chief town, Joinville (pop. 2000).

Donaghadee (Donahadee'), a seaport of County Down, 19 miles E. of Belfast and 21½ SW. of Portpatrick in Scotland. Pop. 2200.

Donauwörth (Dō-now-vert'), a decayed town of Bavaria, at the confluence of Wörnitz and Danube, 25 miles NNW. of Augsburg by rail. Pop. 3857. Marlborough carried the intrenched camp of the French and Bavarians near here in 1704; and here in 1805 the French defeated the Austrians.

Don Benito, a town of Spain, near the Guadiana, 69 miles E. of Badajoz by rail. Pop. 16,000.

Doncaster, a municipal borough in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and an important railway junction, on the right bank of the Don, 33 miles S. of York, and 156 NNW. of London. Fine old elms line the broad and level road from the town to the racecourse. Doncaster is well built, and the High Street is a mile long. The parish church was rebuilt by Sir G. G. Scott, after destruction by fire, in 1853–58. Its noble tower is 170 feet high. A coalfield was opened in 1912 at Rossington, near by. The town has manufactures of iron, brass, sacking, linen, and agricultural machines. The locomotive and carriage works of the Great Northern Railway are at Doncaster. The agricultural trade is large, and there is a corn-market. Electric tramways run to the suburbs. Pop. (1851) 12,042; (1881) 21,130; (1911) 30,516. Doncaster was the ancient Danum, and lay on the Roman road from York to Lincoln. It was the Dona Castre of the Saxons. The Saxon Northumbrian kings had a palace here. Doncaster was burned by lightning in 759, and frequently ravaged by the Danes. It has long been famous for its annual races, begun in 1703, and held a mile south-east of the town in the second week of September. Colonel St Leger, in 1776, founded stakes which have been yearly run for by the best horses in England. See Tomlinson's History of Doncaster (1887).

Dondra Head. See Ceylon.

Donegal (Don-eh-gawl'; 'fort of the stranger'), a seaport in the south of Donegal county, at the Eske's mouth, on a shallow creek of Donegal Bay (a valuable fishing-ground, especially for herrings), 157 miles NW. of Dublin. It has ruins of a castle and of a Franciscan monastery (1474), and near it is a chalybeate spa. Pop. 1100.

Donegal, a maritime county of Ulster, washed by the Atlantic on the north and west. Its greatest length is 84 miles, its greatest breadth, 41; area, 1870 sq. m. The bold and rugged coastline (166 miles long) is indented by many deep bays and loughs, and fringed with numerous islands. The surface generally is mountainous, moory, and boggy, with many small lakes and rivers; here is excellent fishing. The highest hill, Erigal, rises 2462 feet, and several others exceed 2000 feet. The largest stream is the Foyle, running 16 miles north-east into Lough Foyle. Lough Derg is the largest lake. Beautiful granites, unsurpassed freestone, and white marble are utilised. The climate in most parts is moist, raw, and boisterous. There are manufactures of woollens, worsted stockings, worked muslins, and kelp, and extensive fisheries. Pop. (1841) 296,448; (1911) 168,537—79 per cent. Catholics. Donegal sends four members to parliament. The towns are small, the chief being Lifford, the county town, Ballyshannon, Letterkenny, Bundoran, and Donegal. Till 1612, when James I. planted Ulster with English and Scotch settlers, the south part of Donegal was called Tyrconnel, and belonged to the O'Donnels. Donegal has many ruins and traces of forts, religious houses, and castles, and of the palace of the North Irish kings on a hill near Lough Swilly. Near Derry is the coronation-stone of the ancient Irish kings. Tory Isle, towards the entrance to Lough Swilly, contains the remains of seven churches, two stone crosses, and a round tower.

Doneraile, a market-town of County Cork, on the Awbeg, 5 miles SE. of Buttevant. Pop. 800.

Dongarpur (Dúngarpur), a town of Rajputana, Central India, 340 miles N. of Bombay. It is the capital of a protected state, with an area of 1440 sq. m., and a pop. of 180,000.

Don'gola, New, or Ordé, a town of Nubia, on the Nile's left bank, above the third cataract, and 750 miles S. of Cairo, with a citadel, and a pop.

of 10,000. In the operations against the Mahdi, in 1884–85, the town was employed by the British as a base; in March 1886 the British forces were withdrawn, and Dongola, with all Nubia, fell into the possession of the Sudanese.—OLD DONGOLA is a ruined town on the Nile's right bank, 75 miles SSE. of New Dongola. The capital of the kingdom of Dongola, it was destroyed by the Mamelukes in 1820.

Donnybrook, a former village and parish, now mostly embraced in the borough of Dublin, till 1855 celebrated for a fair notorious for fighting, which was chartered by King John.

Doon, an Ayrshire river, made classic by Burns, issues from Loch Enoch, and runs north-west, through Loch Doon, a gloomy sheet of water, 6 miles long by ¾ mile wide, past Dalmellington, Burns's Monument, and Alloway Kirk, and falls into the Firth of Clyde 2 miles S. of Ayr. Its whole length is 30 miles.

Dor, or MONT DORE (erroneously Mont d'Or), a chain of the Auvergne Mountains in the French dep. of Puy-de-Dôme. Puy-de-Sancy is the highest peak of Central France (6190 feet).

Dorak-el-Atek, a town of Persia, on the Jerrahi, 55 miles E. of Basra. Pop. 8000.

Dor'chester, a municipal borough, the county town of Dorsetshire, on the Frome, 8 miles N. of Weymouth, and 110 by rail (by road 119) WSW. of London. Till 1867 it returned two members to parliament, till 1885 one. It carries on a trade in beer, sheep, cattle, cereals, and butter; and has a free grammar-school (founded 1579), a county museum, a guildhall (1848), a corn exchange (1867), and a bronze statue (1889) of the Dorset poet, the Rev. W. Barnes. Population 10,000. Dorchester was the Roman Durnovaria or Durinum, a walled town with a fosse, and a chief Roman-British station. Part of the wall, 6 feet thick, still remains. Near Dorchester are the remains of the most perfect Roman amphitheatre in England, 218 by 163 feet, and 30 feet deep, the seats cut in the chalk for 13,000 spectators; as also a Roman camp, and a large British station with three earthen ramparts, 1½ mile in circuit, and pierced by intricate passages, and enclosing barrows. Its name of 'Maiden Castle' is merely a corruption of the Celtic-British Mai-Dun, 'hill fort;' and there are four or five others so named in England and Scotland. In 1645 Cromwell made the town his headquarters, and in 1685 Judge Jeffreys held his 'bloody assize' here, and sentenced 292 rebels to death. Thomas Hardy was born near by.

Dorchester, an Oxfordshire village, 9 miles SE. of Oxford, was the seat of the Mercian bishops from the 7th century till 1073, when the see was transferred to Lincoln. Its Augustinian abbey church (mainly 13th century) is lavishly ornamented. Pop. of parish, 800. See J. H. Parker's History of Dorchester (1882).

Dorchester, formerly a separate town of Massachusetts, 4 miles S. of Boston, was in 1869 annexed to that city.

Dordogne (Dor-doñ'), a dep. in the SW. of France, formed of the ancient Guiennese district of Périgord, with small portions of Agenais, Limousin, and Angoumois. Area, 3530 sq. m.; pop. (1861) 501,687; (1911) 437,432. It derives its name from the river Dordogne, which, after a course of 305 miles (185 navigable), unites with the Garonne to form the large estuary of the Gironde. Dordogne has five arrondissements—Bergerac, Nontron, Périgueux (the capital), Ribérac, and Sarlat.

Dordrecht. See DORT.

Dorking, a pleasant old-fashioned market-town of Surrey, stands in a picturesque valley near the base of Box Hill (590 feet), 24 miles SSW. of London. Its new church, with a spire 210 feet high, is a memorial to Bishop Wilberforce, who met his death riding over the Downs near Dorking (1873). Deepdene, the lovely seat of 'Anastasius' Hope, where Beaconsfield wrote Coningsby, is close by. Since 1904 there is a bishop-suffragan. Pop. 7800.

Dornbirn, an Austrian town in the Vorarlberg, 7 miles S. of Bregenz. Pop. 15,000.

Dornoch (Dor'nohh), county town of Sutherland, 40 miles NNE. of Inverness, stands near the entrance to Dornoch Firth, which, running 22 miles inland, separates Sutherland from Ross-shire. It has splendid golf-links, handsome county buildings, and the former cathedral of the see of Caithness (1245), which, burned in 1570, was rebuilt for the parish church in 1837. The last witch burned in Scotland suffered at Dornoch in 1722. It was made a royal burgh in 1628, and with Wick, &c. returns one member. Pop. 740.

Dorogoi (Dorohoi), a town of Roumania, in the extreme north of Moldavia, on the Shishja, 70 miles NW. of Jassy. Pop. 14,000.

Dorp, a manufacturing place in Rhenish Prussia, on the Wupper, now forming part of the town of Solingen.

Dor'pat (or DERPT, Russian Jurjev), a town in the Russian province of Livonia, on the Embach, here crossed by a fine granite bridge, 165 miles (247 by rail) SW. of St Petersburg. The Domberg Hill was formerly occupied by the citadel, cathedral, and bishop's palace, on whose site now rise an observatory, the university library, schools of anatomy, &c., with tasteful gardens; and close by are the other university buildings and the town-house. The university, founded in 1632 by Gustavus Adolphus, was re-established by Alexander I. in 1802, and since 1887 has been thoroughly Russianised. It has five faculties, above 90 teachers, and about 3000 students. There is a notable botanical garden. Dorpat was a Hanse town in the 14th and 15th centuries, and until 1704 was alternately captured by Swedes, Poles, and (finally) Russians. It possesses large printing establishments, breweries, and manufactories of cigars, tiles, and pianofortes. Pop. 44,000—80 per cent. German.

Dor'setshire, or DORSET, a county on the English Channel, between Hampshire and Devonshire. Its greatest length is 58 miles; its greatest breadth, 40; and its area, 978 sq. m., or 625,612 acres, of which a third is arable, a ninth waste, and the rest pasture. The coast-line is 75 miles long, with fine cliffs and headlands. St Alban's Head (354 feet high) and Golden Cap (619 feet high) are among the highest coast points between Dover and Land's End. About midway in the coast-line is the so-called Isle of Portland, connected with the mainland by the remarkable Chesil Bank (q.v.). Chalk downs run along the south coast, and through the middle of the county nearly from east to west. The highest point is Pillesden Pen (934 feet). The chief rivers are the Stour and the Frome. The chief mineral productions are the celebrated Purbeck and Portland building-stones, and white china and pipe clays. At Swanage is found the celebrated Purbeck marble, seen in many English cathedrals. The climate is mild. The chalk hills or downs are covered with short fine pasture, on which numbers of Southdown sheep are fed. The soil is chiefly sand, gravel, clay, and chalk. Pop. (1841) 175,054; (1871) 195,537; (1881) 190,979; (1911) 223,266. The county has sent four members to parliament since 1885, when Dorchester, Bridport, Poole, Weymouth and Melcombe Regis, Shaftesbury, and Wareham, formerly sending up ten members, ceased to be separate constituencies. Dorsetshire has ancient British and Roman remains, as stone circles, cromlechs, barrows, camps, an amphitheatre, three Roman stations, and a chambered long barrow, known as Gray Mare and Colts, near Gorwell. There are some remains of 40 abbacies, priories, hospitals, &c. The ruins of Corfe Castle (q.v.) are among the grandest in England. The scenery of Dorsetshire has been rendered familiar by the works of Barnes and Hardy. See works by Hutchins (1774; 3d ed. 1861–73), Worth (2d ed. 1889), Mayo (1885), and Moule (1894), and the 'Victoria History.'

Dort, or DORDRECHT, a Dutch town on an island formed by the Maas, 10 miles SE. of Rotterdam by rail. An inundation in 1421, which destroyed over 70 villages and drowned 100,000 people, separated its site from the mainland. Founded in 1013, it is one of the oldest, as it once was the richest, of the trading towns of Holland. Among its chief buildings are a Gothic cathedral (1363) and a fine town-hall (1339). The largest East Indiamen, and gigantic wood-rafts which come down the Rhine from the Black Forest and Switzerland, are accommodated in its roomy harbour. Close by are shipyards, corn and saw mills, and manufactories of oil, sugar, ironwares, and machinery. Population 47,000. Here in 1572, the revolted States of Holland held their first assembly; and here in 1618–19 sat the Protestant Synod of Dort which condemned the doctrines of Arminius. The brothers De Witt, Cuyp, and Ary Scheffer were natives; of the last there is a statue (1862).

Dortmund (Dort'moont), chief town of Westphalia, in the fertile Hellweg plain, near the Emscher, 74 miles NNE. of Cologne by rail. It is the mining headquarters of Westphalia, and an important railway centre; and it has iron and steel works, and manufactures of mining material, nail-making and other machines, safes, thread, bricks, timber, and flour, besides many breweries, most of the beer being exported. Figuring from the 8th century as Therotmanni, or Dorpmunde, it became a free Hanse town, but was ceded to Prussia in 1815 at the congress of Vienna. An aged linden marked the site of the famous free court of the Vehmgericht; but since the walls were removed in 1863, the general aspect of the town has become quite modern. Pop. (1846) 8732; (1910) 214,226.

Douarnenez (Doo-ar-nĕ-nay'), a French port of Finistère, on the Bay of Douarnenez, 8 miles NW. of Quimper by rail. It is important for the sardine-fishery, and has a pop. of 13,000.

Douay (Fr. Doo-ay', by English Catholics Dow'-ay; the Roman Duacum), a town in the French dep. of Nord, on the river Scarpe, 20 m. S. of Lille by rail. A great military town, it is strongly fortified, contains an important arsenal, a cannon-foundry, and a school of artillery. The principal buildings are the hôtel-de-ville, the public library, containing 100,000 volumes and 3000 MSS., the museum, hospital, and artillery barracks. The manufactures include lace, cotton, oil, soap, and iron machinery. Population about 36,000. During the middle ages Douay was a constant bone of contention between the Flemish counts and the French rulers. It became the seat of a university (1562), of a great English Catholic college (1568), and of a Scotch Catholic college (1594), which came to an end at the French Revolution, Douay having passed with the rest of Flanders under the dominion of Spain, but been taken by Louis XIV. in 1667.

Doubs (Doob), a dep. of France, on the E. frontier, adjoining Switzerland and Belfort. Area, 2000 sq. m.; population, 300,000. It is traversed by the river Doubs (total length, 270 miles), a tributary of the Saône. Doubs is divided into the four arrondissements of Besançon (the capital), Baume-les-Dames, Montbéliard, and Pontarlier.

Douglas, the capital of the Isle of Man, a seaport and favourite watering-place, is so called from its being situated near the junction of two streams—the Dhoo (black) and Glass (gray). It lies on a picturesque bay, on the east side of the island, 75 miles NW. of Liverpool, 46 W. of Barrow, and 94 NE. of Dublin. The old town, on the south-western edge of the bay, presents with its narrow tortuous streets a vivid contrast to the handsome modern terraces and villas which occupy the rising ground beyond, and the ground facing the north of the bay. It possesses an excellent landing pier; another pier and breakwater, constructed of concrete cement blocks, was opened in 1879; the new street and charming promenade following the line of the bay is one of its most agreeable features. Conspicuous in the centre of the crescent of the bay stands Castle Mona, built by the fourth Duke of Athole, but now converted into a first-class hotel and winter gardens. The Tower of Refuge, a picturesque object, occupies a dangerous rock in the southern area of the bay, called Conister, and was erected in 1833 for the safety of shipwrecked mariners. The foundation-stone of an Eiffel tower was laid in 1890, and the Douglas Head Marine Drive opened in 1891. Pop. 22,500.

Douglas, a decayed town of Lanarkshire, on Douglas Water, 11 miles SSW. of Lanark. Of the old kirk of St Bride, the burial-place of the Douglases till 1761, only the choir and a spire remain. Modern Douglas Castle (Earl of Home), ¾ mile NNE., is a poor successor to Scott's 'Castle Dangerous,' now represented by little more than a tower. Pop. 1300.

Douglas, a small town of County Cork, 4 miles SE. of Cork. Pop. 700.

Doune (Doon), a village of Perthshire, on the Teith, 9 miles NW. of Stirling by rail. Pop. 900. Doune Castle, built by Murdoch, Duke of Albany, in the early part of the 15th century, is now a magnificent ruin. It is described in Scott's Waverley, and was reduced to ruins by Hawley's dragoons in 1746. A mile to the west is Deanston (pop. 600), with its cotton-mills, long managed by the philanthropist, James Smith (1789–1850), the promoter of 'deep draining and thorough ploughing.'

Douro (Dooro; Span. form Duero), a large river of Spain and Portugal, rises in the Pico de Urbion (7369 feet), in Old Castile, 30 miles NW. of Soria. Thence it winds 490 miles SE., W., SW., and W. to the Atlantic below Oporto. It is navigable to Torre de Moncorvo, 90 miles.

Dove, a river rising 4 miles SW. of Buxton, and flowing 45 miles S. and SE. along the borders of Derby and Stafford shires to the Trent, at Newton Solney. It was the favourite fishing stream of Izaak Walton, who lived here with Charles Cotton; and it is still beloved of anglers.—DOVEDALE is a romantic glen, forming the course of this 'princess of rivers' for 3 miles, between Thorpe Mill and Mill Dale, below Alstonfield.

Dover, a Cinque Port and parliamentary and municipal borough of Kent, 77½ miles by rail ESE. of London. It is not only a charmingly situated watering-place, but, being the nearest point of the English coast to France, is a seaport of growing importance. Great harbour works were sanctioned in 1891. The commercial harbour has been extended, and a new national harbour was constructed in 1897–1909. Dover, see of a bishop-suffragan since 1898, is the seat of the packet service for Calais and Ostend, and is a transatlantic passenger port. The fortifications comprise Dover Castle, on the chalk-cliffs; Fort Burgoyne, Archcliffe Fort, the batteries on the Western Heights, where large barracks are situated, and some new forts built to protect the harbour. There are also remains of a Roman pharos or lighthouse, and of a so-called Romano-British church, which has been restored. Dover has a town-hall (1883), a museum, a hospital, a promenade pier (1893) 900 ft. long, &c. It is chiefly dependent on its shipping trade and its attraction as a watering-place, but shipbuilding and sail and rope making are carried on, and there are also flour and paper mills. Since 1885 it returns one member. Pop. (1841) 17,795; (1911) 43,645. The name (Roman Portus Duris; Norman Dovere) is from the Celtic 'Dour,' the name of the small river which runs through the town. Fortified by William the Conqueror, during whose reign it was nearly burned down, noted as the place of King John's submission to the pope, besieged by the French, held during the Civil War by the parliamentarians, threatened by the first Napoleon, and celebrated as the headquarters of the Lord Wardens of the Cinque Ports, Dover holds a distinguished place in English history. Three submarine cables connect it with the Continent. Coal is mined near Shakespeare Cliff.

Dover, (1) the capital of Delaware, U.S., on Jones's Creek, 48 miles S. of Wilmington by rail. Pop. 3700.—(2) The oldest town of New Hampshire, founded in 1623, on the Cocheco River, 68 miles N. by E. of Boston by rail, with large cotton-mills and print-works, and manufactures of boots and shoes, woollens, and iron. Pop. 13,000.

Dover, STRAIT OF (Fr. Pas de Calais), the channel between England and France, connecting the English Channel and the North Sea, whose tides meet here. It is 18 to 25 miles broad, and 6 to 29 fathoms deep. See CHANNEL (ENGLISH).

Dovercourt, a watering-place forming a southern extension of Harwich (q.v.). Pop. 5000.

Doveron. See DEVERON.

Dovrefjeld (Dov'reh-fyeld), part of the mountainous plateau of Norway, connecting the Kiölen Mountains with the Jotun Fjelde. The average elevation ranges from 2650 to 3600 feet; the highest point is Snehætten (7566).

Dowlais. See MERTHYR-TYDVIL.

Dowlatabad. See DAULATABAD.

Down, a maritime county of Ireland, in the south-east of the province of Ulster, 50 miles long (NE. to SW.) and 35 broad. Area, 609,239 acres; pop. (1841) 368,143; (1881) 272,107; (1901) 304,589 (39 per cent. Presbyterians, 31 Catholics, and 22 Episcopalians). The coast-line of 67 miles, or 139 counting inlets and islets, is indented by Belfast Lough, Strangford Lough, Dundrum and Carlingford Bays. The Mourne Mountains cover 90 sq. m. in the south, and rise in Slieve Donard to 2796 feet. The other parts are mostly undulating and hilly, with plains and fine meadows along the rivers. The chief rivers are the Upper Bann and the Lagan. The Newry Canal admits vessels of 50 tons, and with the Ulster Canal opens communication through almost all Ulster. Nearly one-half of the entire area is under crop, mostly oats, potatoes, turnips, wheat, flax, and barley. The chief manufacture is linen, especially the finer fabrics. Down contains 70 parishes, and since 1885 sends four members to parliament, besides one for Newry borough. Other towns are Downpatrick, Newtownards, Banbridge, Lisburn, Holywood, and Donaghadee. On the top of Slieve Croob (1755 feet) are twenty-three stone cairns.

Down, a village of Kent, 16 miles SSE. of London, residence from 1842 of Charles Darwin.

Downham Market, a town of Norfolk, on the Ouse, in a flat fen country, 11 miles S. by W. of Lynn. Pop. 2500.

Downpatrick, or simply DOWN, the capital of County Down, near the influx of the Quoyle into the south-west end of Lough Strangford, 27 miles SE. of Belfast. It takes name from St Patrick, and is the seat of the diocese of Down, united with Dromore in 1842. It returned a member till 1885. Pop. 3200.

Downs (Fr. dunes, from Celtic dun, 'a hill'), a term applied, like denes in Norfolk, to hillocks of sand thrown up by the sea or the wind along the sea-coast. It is also a general name for any undulating tract of upland too light for cultivation, and covered with short grass. It is specially applied to two broad ridges of undulating hills south of the Thames, beginning in the middle of Hampshire, and running eastward, the North Downs through the middle of Surrey and Kent to Dover (about 120 miles), and the South Downs through the south-east of Hampshire and near the Sussex coast to Beachy Head (about 80 miles). Between them lies the valley of the Weald. The highest point of the North Downs is Inkpen Beacon (1011 feet); and of the South Downs, Butser Hill (888). These uplands are covered with fine short pasture, which, from its aromatic quality, forms excellent feeding-ground for the famous Southdown sheep.

Downs, THE, a roadstead off the east coast of Kent, opposite Ramsgate and Deal, between North and South Foreland, and protected externally by the Goodwin Sands (q.v.). This large natural harbour of refuge is 8 miles by 6, with an anchorage of 4 to 12 fathoms. It is unsafe only in south winds. The obstinate but indecisive sea-fight of the Downs was fought with the Dutch in June 1666.

Downton, a Wiltshire town, on the Avon, here split into three branches, 6 miles SSE. of Salisbury. It has an Early English market-cross, a cruciform church, an agricultural college (1880), and a singular earthwork (the Moot); whilst 2 miles north is Trafalgar House, presented in 1814 by the nation to Lord Nelson's brother and successor. Pop. of parish, 3000.

Drachenfels ('Dragon's Rock'), a peak (1056 feet) of the Siebengebirge, on the Rhine's right bank, 8 miles SE. of Bonn. It commands a glorious prospect, and may be gained by a mountain railway (1883).

Draguignan (Dra-geen-yon^{g}'), capital of the dep. of Var, and at the base of the wooded Malmont (2151 feet), 51 m. by rail NE. of Toulon. Pop. 7000.

Drakenberge (Drâh'ken-ber-geh, g hard; in Dutch, the 'Dragon Mountains'), the range in the east of South Africa, between the Cape Province and the Vaal River. From 29° S. lat. the three chains which form the southern portion unite and extend north-eastward in one mass, its highest points the Mont aux Sources and Catkin Peak (10,360 feet). The range is crossed by Van Reenen (5415) and De Beers (5635) passes.

Drammen, a seaport of Norway, 33 miles SW. of Christiania by rail, on the Dramselv, which here discharges its waters through the Dramsfiord into the Gulf of Christiania, and which is crossed here by three bridges, one of them 345 yards long. There are sawmills and chicory factories. Pop. 25,000.

Drave (Ger. Drau), a river of Austria, rising in the Tyrol, at an altitude of 5477 feet, and flowing 447 miles ESE., through or along the borders of Styria, Croatia, Slavonia, and Hungary, till, 10 miles below Essek, it falls into the Danube. At first a mountain-torrent, from Villach downwards (379 miles) it is navigable.

Drayton, West, a Middlesex parish, with a racecourse, 3 miles S. of Uxbridge. Pop. 1700.

Drayton-in-Hales. See Market-Drayton.

Dren'the, a frontier province of the Netherlands, bordering on Hanover; area, 1030 sq. m.; pop. 178,000.

Dresden, the capital of Saxony, is situated in a charming valley on the Elbe, 116 miles SE. of Berlin, and 62 ESE. of Leipzig. The Altstadt and Friedrichstadt on the left bank of the Elbe, and the Neustadt and Antonstadt on the right or northern bank, are united by several bridges, including the Augustus Bridge, the Albert Bridge, and the Marienbrücke, which is at once a railway and a carriage bridge. The Brühl Terrace (1738), on the Elbe's south bank, is a charming promenade. The museum (1847–54) contains collections of engravings (400,000 examples) and drawings, besides the famous picture-gallery. The last, which owes its origin chiefly to Augustus III. of Saxony, who purchased the Modena gallery in 1745, contains about 2400 paintings, mainly by Italian and Flemish masters. The gem of the collection is Raphael's 'Sistine Madonna;' other masterpieces being Titian's 'Tribute Money,' and Correggio's 'Magdalene' and 'La Notte.' Adjoining the museum is the Zwinger, a remarkable rococo building of 1711–22, designed as the vestibule of an elaborate palace, and containing valuable collections of casts, zoology, mineralogy, &c. The Johanneum, erected as royal stables at the end of the 16th century, now accommodates the historical museum, founded in 1833, the gallery of arms, and the priceless collection of porcelain. The Augusteum, or collection of antiquities, chiefly Roman objects of the Imperial times, and the Royal Public Library, are deposited in the Japanese Palace, built in 1715 in the Neustadt. The library contains over 400,000 volumes, 20,000 maps, and 4000 MSS. The 'Green Vault' in the royal palace contains a valuable collection of precious stones, pearls, and curios, and articles in gold, silver, ivory, &c. The list of art treasures in Dresden may be closed with the collection of antiques (chiefly ecclesiastical), and the gallery of casts of the works of the sculptor Rietschel, both in the 'Lustschloss' (1680), in the Grosser Garten, a handsome public park 350 acres in extent. Other buildings not yet mentioned are the royal palace (1534–1902); the prince's palace (1718); the Brühl Palace (1737), now the Ständehaus; the town-house; and the magnificent theatre (1871–78). Of the churches, the finest are the Frauenkirche (1726–34), with a lofty dome and lantern 320 feet high; the Roman Catholic church (1737–56), in an elaborate baroque style, adorned on the exterior with sixty-four statues; the Sophienkirche (1351–57), restored and provided with towers in 1865–69; and the Kreuzkirche (1764–85). The Synagogue (1838–40) is also noteworthy. The most important industries are the manufactures of gold and silver articles, artificial flowers, machinery, chemicals, paper-hangings, artists' canvas and colours, chocolate, &c.; and straw-plaiting, brewing, and market-gardening. The so-called 'Dresden china' is manufactured not at Dresden but at Meissen. Pop. (1871) 177,087; (1900) 395,349; (1910) 548,308.

Dresden is of early Slavonic origin. Henry the Illustrious made it his capital in 1270, and after the division of the Saxon lands in 1485 it became the seat of the Albertine line, and its prosperity gradually increased. It suffered severely during the Seven Years' War; and again in 1813, when the Allies were repulsed by Napoleon, but, after he had left, forced the city to capitulate. During the revolution of 1849, also, very great damage was inflicted upon the town, which was occupied by the Prussians in 1866 during their war with Austria.

Dreux (nearly Dreh; anc. Durocassis), a town in the dep. of Eure-et-Loir, on the Blaise, 27 miles NNW. of Chartres by rail. It lies at the foot of a hill crowned with the ruins of the castle of the Counts of Dreux; from among them rises a beautiful chapel, erected by the mother of Louis-Philippe in 1816, to which were removed in 1876 the remains of him and other members of the House of Orleans who had died in exile. Pop. 8000. In 1562 the Constable Montmorency defeated the Huguenots here, and took the Prince of Condé prisoner.

Driffield, Great, the chief town in the Wolds, East Riding of Yorkshire, 11 miles N. of Beverley by rail, is connected with Hull, 19 miles S., by a canal. It manufactures flour, linseed-cake, and artificial manures. Pop. 5700.

Drighlington, a township in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 5 miles SE. of Bradford, with worsted-spinning and coal-mining. Pop. 4000.

Drogheda (Drŏh'he-da), a seaport of Louth, built mostly on the Boyne's north bank, 4 miles from its mouth, 32 N. of Dublin by rail. The Boyne is crossed here by a railway viaduct 95 feet high. There are linen and cotton manufactures, iron-works, tanneries, breweries, and salt-works, and a considerable export trade, chiefly with Liverpool (140 miles distant). Vessels of 500 tons reach the quay, and barges of 50 tons ply 19 miles up the Boyne to Navan. Pop. (1851) 16,845; (1911) 12,425, almost all Catholics. Till 1885 Drogheda returned one member. From the 14th to the 17th centuries, Drogheda (or Tredah) was the chief military station in Leinster. In 1649 Cromwell stormed the town and massacred the garrison; in 1690 Drogheda surrendered to William III. See D'Alton's History of Drogheda (2 vols. 1844).

Drohobycz (Dro'ho-bitch), a town of Austria, in Galicia, 50 miles SW. of Lemberg, with salt-works, paraffin-factories, and dyeworks. Pop. 20,000.

Droitwich (Droit'itch), a municipal borough in Worcestershire, on the Salwarpe, 6 miles NNE. of Worcester. Originally British, and probably the Roman Salinæ, it was called Wych from the salt-springs, to which Droit was afterwards prefixed, expressing a legal right to them. Its brine-springs yield over 100,000 tons of salt a year; and the saline baths are visited annually by thousands. Droitwich returned one member till 1885. Pop. 4200. See Bainbrigg's Droitwich Salt Springs (1873).

Drôme, a dep. of France, on the east bank of the Rhone. Area, 2508 sq. m.; pop. (1866) 324,231; (1911) 290,894. It is divided into the four arrondissements of Valence (the capital), Montélimar, Die, and Nyons.

Dromore, a town, with linen manufactures, in County Down, on the Lagan, 17 miles SW. of Belfast. It is still the seat of a Catholic diocese, but its Episcopal one was in 1842 united with Down. Jeremy Taylor was Bishop of Dromore, as was Thomas Percy. Pop. 2400.

Dronfield, a town of Derbyshire, 6 miles NNW. of Chesterfield. It has large edge-tool factories and neighbouring collieries. Pop. 4000.

Drontheim. See Trondhjem.

Droylsden, Lancashire, a suburb of Manchester, 3½ miles E. of it, with railway station. Pop. 13,000.

Drumclog, a moorland tract in west Lanarkshire, 6 miles SW. of Strathaven. Here, 2½ miles E. of Loudon Hill, Claverhouse was defeated on the 1st June 1679 by 200 Covenanters.

Drumlan'rig Castle, a seat (1689) of the Duke of Buccleuch (till 1810 Queensberry), in Upper Nithsdale, 17 miles NW. of Dumfries. See a work by Ramage (1876).

Drummond Castle. See Crieff.

Drummond Island, the most westerly of the Manitoulin chain, in Lake Huron, belongs to Chippewa county, Michigan. It measures 20 miles by 10.

Drumore, a Wigtownshire seaport, 17½ miles S. by E. of Stranraer. Pop. 400.

Dryburgh, a beautiful ruined Premonstratensian abbey, in Berwickshire, 5 miles ESE. of Melrose, on the Tweed, here crossed by a suspension bridge. It contains the dust of Sir Walter Scott and his son-in-law Lockhart. Founded in 1150 by David I., it was more or less destroyed by the English in 1322, 1385, 1544, and 1545. See Spottiswoode's Liber de Dryburgh (Bannatyne Club, 1847).

Dryfe Water, a Dumfriesshire stream flowing 18½ miles to the Annan, near Lockerbie.

Dryhope, a ruined peel-tower in Selkirkshire, ¾ mile N. of St Mary's Loch. It was the birthplace of the 'Flower of Yarrow.'

Dubitza, a fortified town of Bosnia, on the Unna, 10 miles from its confluence with the Save. Pop. 4000.

Dublin, a maritime county in the province of Leinster. Area, 354 sq. m., six-sevenths being in cultivation, and one-fortieth in wood. The coast, much indented with creeks and bays, is 70 miles long, and off it lie several islands. Dublin Bay, one of the finest in the kingdom, is 6 miles broad, with a sweep of 16 miles, and has precipitous hills, 500 feet high, both at the north and south ends. The surface inland is mostly a rich level plain, with slight undulations, but rising in the south in a hill-range, its highest point Kippure, 2473 feet. North of this range the only prominent eminence is the Hill of Howth, 563 feet. The chief river is the Liffey, running through Dublin city into Dublin Bay. There are copper and lead mines near the Scalp; granite and limestone are much quarried. There are many mineral springs, the most important at Lucan. In the north and west are grazing and meadow farms, and around Dublin city, villas, dairy-farms, and nursery-gardens. Dublin is the best cultivated county in Ireland. Along the coast there are important fisheries. The towns are Dublin and Kingstown. Pop. (1841) 372,775; (1911) 476,909—78 per cent. are Catholics. Dublin sends eight members to parliament—two for the county, four for the city, and two for the university.

Dublin (Irish Dubh-linn, 'black pool;' the Eblana of Ptolemy), the capital of Ireland, stands on the river Liffey, where it falls into Dublin Bay, in 53° 20′ 38″ N. lat., and 6° 17′ 30″ W. long. It is 64 miles W. of Holyhead, 138 W. of Liverpool, 223 SSW. of Glasgow, and 245 NW. of Bristol. Some of Dublin is built on land reclaimed from the sea, and the ground is generally flat. The river, running from west to east, divides the city into two almost equal portions. The fashionable quarter is to the south-east of the city; the principal shops are in the centre of the town; and there are many good private houses in the suburbs. The city is surrounded by a 'Circular Road' of nearly 9 miles in length. The most important street is Sackville Street, which is 700 yards long and 40 broad; at its north end stands the Rotunda, with Rutland Square; in its centre the beautiful Ionic portico of the General Post-office, and Nelson's Monument (134 feet high); while on the south it is terminated by O'Connell Bridge, and a wedge-like block of houses formed by the converging sides of Westmoreland and D'Olier Streets. A peculiar feature of Dublin is its squares, which are very numerous, spacious, and well kept. St Stephen's Green, the largest, laid out with great taste as a People's Park by the Guinness family, occupies an area of nearly 20 acres, and is about a mile in circuit. Somewhat smaller, but more fashionable, are Merrion Square (13 acres), and Fitzwilliam Square. The large park and quadrangles of Trinity College occupy more than 40 acres. Leinster House, once the town mansion of the Dukes of Leinster, now the home of the Royal Dublin Society, has been added to by the erection of a National Art Gallery and a Museum of Natural History. New buildings for a Science and Art Museum and a National Library were opened in 1890, having cost over £100,000. Among the other public edifices may be mentioned the Bank of Ireland (formerly the Houses of Parliament), Trinity College, the Custom-house, and the Four Courts, which, from the boldness of their design, and the massiveness of their proportions, have a very imposing effect. The Castle (the Lord Lieutenant's official residence) has no pretensions to architectural beauty. The Chapel is interesting, and contains some fine carved work of Grinling Gibbons. Dublin is remarkable in possessing two Protestant cathedrals. St Patrick's, founded in 1190, was restored in 1865 by the munificence of Sir Benjamin Lee Guinness; and Christ Church, dating from 1038, but not raised to cathedral rank till 1541, is a smaller but more beautiful edifice, also restored in 1878 by Mr Henry Roe. There are monuments of William III. in College Green (once a green, but now a paved street); of Nelson, the Duke of Wellington, Goldsmith, Burke, Grattan, O'Connell, &c.

Within the limits of the Circular Road, the Liffey is crossed by twelve bridges (four of iron), and throughout the whole extent of the city the banks of the river are faced with granite walls and parapets. On each side of these 'quays,' 2½ miles long, there is a roadway, with houses and shops. The quay proper extends eastward from the Butt Bridge. Near the Custom-house, a strikingly handsome classic building of native granite, are large docks in communication with the Royal and Grand Canals; the former connecting Dublin with the North Shannon and the west of Ireland, the latter with the southerly portion of the same river and the sea. A large basin, the 'Spencer Dock,' was opened in 1873; and the harbour has been much improved by the completion of two large breakwaters, the North and South 'Walls.' There is a bar at the mouth of the harbour, but even there the least depth at low tide is about 11 feet. The chief manufacture is porter, of which nearly half a million hogsheads are annually exported, 'Guinness' being, of course, the most important. Next in order is whisky, and then poplin. The municipal affairs are under the control of a town council, which consists of a lord mayor, twenty aldermen, and sixty councillors. The city sends four members to parliament, the university two. Pop. (1688) 64,500; (1804) 167,899; (1841) 232,726; (1881) 249,602; (1911) 309,272.

The university of Dublin, with a single college (Trinity), was founded in 1591, and has a teaching-staff of more than 80, and over 1000 students. Among its former alumni have been Berkeley, Brady, Lord Cairns, Congreve, Curran, Farquhar, Goldsmith, Sir W. Hamilton, Lever, Magee, Moore, Swift, Tate, Toplady, and Ussher. There is also a Roman Catholic university (since 1854). The Royal University of Ireland, superseded in 1880 the Queen's University, and was in 1908 superseded by the National University, with a new college here. For the humbler classes much has been done by the National Board, by the Church Education Society, Roman Catholic brotherhoods and sisterhoods such as the Christian Brothers, and other agencies. There are two botanic gardens—one at Glasnevin, belonging to the Royal Dublin Society, and one at Ballsbridge, connected with the university. The environs of Dublin are especially beautiful. Rathmines, a southern suburb, has become a large township, and, together with Monkstown, Kingstown, and Killiney, is the favourite residence of the wealthier part of the mercantile community. Glasnevin, on the north, has memories of Swift, Addison, Steele, Tickell, Thomas Parnell, and Thomas Sheridan; its cemetery, opened in 1832, is classic ground, and contains the ashes of Curran, O'Connell (under a round tower 150 feet high), and C. S. Parnell. The Phœnix Park is a magnificent area of nearly 2000 acres, finely timbered. Dublin, as a whole, with its fine bay—often compared to the Bay of Naples—its splendid park, massive public buildings, wide streets, spacious squares, regular quays, and beautiful environs, is one of the handsomest capitals in Europe.

The ancient history of Dublin is mainly legend, but we know that in the 9th century the Danes took the place, and it was in their hands for the most part until the English Conquest. Henry II. held his court there in 1171; the English residents were almost extirpated in the rising of 'Black Monday' in 1207. In 1689 James II. held a parliament in Dublin, and the town was immediately afterwards occupied by William III.

Dubovka, a town in the Russian province of Saratov, on the Volga. Pop. 20,000.

Dubuque (Doo-būke'), a city of Iowa, on right bank of the Mississippi, built partly on bluffs rising 200 feet above the river, which is here crossed by an iron railway bridge, 198 miles WNW. of Chicago. It has an Episcopal and a Roman Catholic cathedral, a city-hall, a custom-house of marble, and a German Presbyterian seminary. It is a seat of manufactures, and has a large river and railway trade. Julien Dubuque, a French trader, engaged in lead-mining here as early as 1788; but the first permanent settlement was made in 1833. Population 38,500.

Ducato, CAPE (Doo-kâh'to), an abrupt headland at the south-west extremity of Leukas or Santa Maura, one of the Ionian Islands.

Duddingston, a Midlothian village, 2½ miles SE. of Edinburgh, absorbed in 1901. Duddingston Loch measures 580 by 267 yards.

Duddon, a river of Cumberland and Lancashire, flowing 20 miles to the Irish Sea near Broughton-in-Furness. Wordsworth's sonnets have made it famous.

Dudley, a parliamentary, municipal, and county borough in a detached part of Worcestershire and the south of Staffordshire, 26 miles NNE. of Worcester, and 8½ WNW. of Birmingham. Situated in the heart of the 'Black Country,' it is a thriving town with coal-mining, busy brass and iron foundries, and works, besides tanning and brewing. The iron industries include the making of bedsteads, fenders, vices, and anvils. A chief ornament of the place is the Renaissance drinking-fountain, erected in 1867 by the late Earl of Dudley, a statue of whom was erected in 1888. On a hill to the north-east are the beautiful ruins of an old castle, said to have been founded in the 8th century by Dodo, a Saxon prince, and the keep of which dates from the 13th century. It was burned in 1750. Near it are remains of a Cluniac priory (1161). The vicinity yields abundant limestone, which is wrought out of caverns, and brought to the kilns through a tunnel 1¾ mile long, carried through the basalt of the Castle Hill. Pop. of parliamentary borough (1851) 37,962; (1911) 102,524, of whom 51,079 were in the municipal. Dudley has returned one member since 1832, the parliamentary boundary being extended in 1867; the municipal borough dates from 1865. See a work by Twamley (1867).

Duff House. See BANFF.

Duffield, a town of Derbyshire, on the Derwent, 4 miles N. of Derby. Pop. of parish, 2000.

Dufftown, a police burgh of Banffshire, 65 miles NW. of Aberdeen. Pop. 1600.

Duisburg (Doo'is-boorg), a town of Rhenish Prussia, 16 m. N. of Düsseldorf by rail, in a fertile district between the Ruhr and Rhine, with both of which it is connected by a canal. Its manufactures include tobacco, soda, sulphuric acid, soap, candles, starch, and sugar; and in and near it are great ironworks and coal-mines. Population 230,000 (nearly half Protestants).

Dukeries. See WORKSOP.

Dukinfield, a Cheshire municipal borough, mostly within Stalybridge parliamentary borough.

Dulcigno (Dool-cheen'yo; Serb Ultschin), a port of Montenegro, 20 miles SW. of Scutari, and till 1880 a Turkish town. Pop. 5000.

Duluth (Doo-looth'), a city of Minnesota, the capital of St Louis county, at the west end of Lake Superior, 156 miles NNE. of St Paul. It has one of the finest harbours in the United States, protected by a natural breakwater known as Minnesota Point, which is 7 miles long and about 750 feet broad; and great improvements have been effected in the matters of dredging, the construction of piers, and the extension of deep-water navigation to the falls of the St Louis River, 15 miles from the lake. The ship-canal (depth about 23 feet) through Minnesota Point forms the chief entrance way between Lake Superior and the harbour. Duluth contains a custom-house, United States land office, large steel-works, foundries, sawmills, stock-yards, &c. Advantageously situated at the head of navigation of the great chain of lakes, and with immense deposits of iron, granite, and freestone in the immediate vicinity, it has rapidly increased in population and in wealth. Coal, grain, flour, iron ore, and lumber are exports. Pop. (1880) 3483; (1890) 33,115; (1900) 52,970; (1910) 78,466.

Dulverton, a town of Somerset, on the Barle, 12 miles NNW. of Tiverton. Pop. 1500.

Dulwich (Dul'litch), a hamlet in the metropolitan borough of Camberwell, 4½ miles S. of St Paul's Cathedral, and a little to the west of Sydenham. It consists chiefly of villa residences, and is noted for its college and picture-gallery. The college was founded in 1619 by Edward Alleyn, the actor, and comprises almshouses, upper and lower schools, a chapel, &c., the upper school transferred in 1870 to new buildings erected at a cost of nearly £100,000. The picture-gallery was bequeathed to the college by the painter Sir P. F. Bourgeois (1756–1811). Dulwich was in 1885 included in Camberwell parliamentary borough. Pop. 102,000. See works by Hovenden (1873), Blanch (1877), Galer (1891), and W. Young (1891).

Dumbarton, or Dunbarton, the county town of Dumbartonshire, lies mainly on the left bank of the Leven, a little above its influx to the Clyde, and 15 miles WNW. of Glasgow. Its chief public building is the Burgh Hall and Academy, a French-Gothic pile of 1866, restored since the fire of 1883; and there are a pier on the Clyde (1875), and public parks, one of 32 acres (1885) gifted to the town at a cost of £20,000. Dumbarton ranks merely as a sub-port; but its shipbuilding, with the subsidiary industries, has attained important dimensions since the opening of the great shipyards of Messrs M'Millan (1834) and Messrs Denny (1844). Between the town and the Clyde rises the Rock of Dumbarton (280 feet), a double-peaked, basaltic eminence, which is crowned by the castle, a building of no great strength now or architectural merit, but one of the four Scottish fortresses that must be maintained in terms of the Treaty of Union. Dumbarton was made a free royal burgh in 1222, and unites with the other four Kilmarnock burghs to return one member to parliament. Population 22,000. The capital of the Britons of Strathclyde, Dumbarton was termed by them Alcluith ('height on the Clyde'), by the Gaels Dunbreatan ('fort of the Britons'); and the history of its Rock extends over more than a thousand years, from its capture by Picts and Northumbrians (756), by Vikings (870), to Wallace's captivity here (1305), the child Queen Mary's residence (1548), and its daring surprise by Crawford of Jordanhill (1571).

Dumbartonshire, a Scottish county, 25 miles long and 1¼ to 15½ miles broad, with an area of 270 sq. m., of which 30 belong to a detached south-eastern portion. Loch Lomond (22 by 5 miles) lies on the eastern boundary, and sends off the Leven 7 miles to the Clyde; the southern is washed by the Clyde's broadening estuary; and the western, for 17 miles by its offshoot, Loch Long, which forms with the Gare Loch (7 miles by 7 furlongs) the wooded Rosneath peninsula. The surface, almost everywhere hilly or mountainous, culminates in Ben Vorlich (3092 feet); and the scenery, with its sea-lochs, lake, woods, and glens, is lovely as that of few regions in Scotland. Coal is mined in the detached portion, which nowhere exceeds 480 feet above sea-level. The climate is mild and humid. Barely a fourth of the entire area is in tillage; but many sheep and cattle are reared. Colquhoun of Luss is much the largest proprietor. Rosneath Castle is a seat of the Duke of Argyll. Since 1728 bleach and print fields, dyeing and cotton works, have multiplied in the Vale of Leven; shipbuilding is an important industry. The chief towns are Dumbarton, Helensburgh, Kirkintilloch (in the detached portion), Alexandria, Renton, and Bonhill. Dumbartonshire returns one member. Anciently part of the Levenach or Lennox, it retains some vestiges of Antoninus' Wall, and has memories of St Patrick, Bruce, Rob Roy, Smollett, and Henry Bell. Pop. (1801) 20,710; (1881) 75,333; (1911) 139,831. See works by J. Irving (1860–79) and Sir W. Fraser (1860–74).

Dumdum (Dam Damá), a Bengal municipality, 4½ miles NE. of Calcutta. Here in 1857 was the first open manifestation by the sepoys against the greased cartridges. Pop. 18,000.

Dumfries', the county town of Dumfriesshire, the 'Queen of the South,' stands on the Nith's left bank, and is connected with its Kirkcudbrightshire suburb of Maxwelltown by three bridges, of which the middle one was founded about 1280 by Devorgilla Baliol. By rail it is 90 miles S. by W. of Edinburgh, and 33 WNW. of Carlisle. Corbelly Hill, in Maxwelltown, on which are a Catholic convent (1882) and an observatory, commands a splendid view of the surrounding hills, the Solway Firth, and the Cumberland mountains. Dumfries itself is scattered somewhat irregularly over a gentle elevation. It is built of red sandstone, and among its chief edifices are the Scottish baronial county buildings (1866); the new post-office (1888); the Mid Steeple (1707); Greyfriars' Church (rebuilt 1867), with a spire of 164 feet; the Academy (1802); and, in St Michael's churchyard, the mausoleum (1815) of Robert Burns, whose small house still stands, and a statue of whom was erected in 1882. The Crichton Institution (1835–70) is a lunatic asylum; rather nearer is the infirmary (1871). The manufacture of tweeds, introduced in 1847, is the leading industry. Hosiery ranks next; and there is a busy trade in pork and live-stock. The opening, however, of the railways in 1850–69 has greatly diminished the river traffic, though large sums had been spent in improving the 14 miles of the Nith's channel between the town and the Solway. Dumfries was made a royal burgh by David I., and it unites with Annan, Kirkcudbright, Lochmaben, and Sanquhar in returning one member. Pop. (parl. burgh), 19,500; (royal burgh), 16,000. For the town's memories of Bruce and Burns, of Border wars, of the '15 and the '45, see W. M'Dowall's History of Dumfries (2d ed. 1873).

Dumfriesshire, a Scottish Border county, bounded SE. by Cumberland, and S. for 21 miles by the Solway Firth. Its greatest length, from east to west, is 47 miles; its breadth varies between 13 and 32 miles; and its area is 1103 sq. m. From Clydesdale and Tweeddale it is shut off by a sinuous rim of high green rounded mountains—Lowther Hill (2377 feet), Queensberry (2285), Hartfell (2651), White Coomb (2695), and Ettrick Pen (2269). Thence, though broken by Cairnkinna (1813 feet), Birrenswark (920), and some lesser eminences, the surface has a general southward slope to the dead level of Lochar Moss, a peat bog, 10 by 3 miles, now largely reclaimed. Three beautiful rivers, the Nith, Annan, and Esk, all run to the Solway; and the Annan belongs wholly to Dumfriesshire. At Moffat are mineral springs. Besides seven lakes round Lochmaben, there is 'dark Loch Skene' (¾ by ¼ mile; 1680 feet above sea-level), which has its outlet by a waterfall, the Grey Mare's Tail. The Enterkin Pass has been rendered famous by Defoe and Dr John Brown. The minerals include coal (at Sanquhar and Canonbie), limestone, antimony, and (at Wanlockhead) lead, silver, gold. The climate is mild. Only 32 per cent. of the entire area is arable, the uplands being pastoral or waste. Sheep, cattle, and pigs are largely reared; and there are valuable salmon-fisheries. The county returns one member to parliament. Towns and villages are Dumfries, Annan, Lochmaben, Sanquhar, Moffat, Lockerbie, Langholm, Ecclefechan, Thornhill, and Gretna Green. Among the numerous antiquities are the Roman station at Birrenswark, the Ruthwell Cross, Lincluden convent, and the castles of Lochmaben and Caerlaverock. Among its worthies are Bruce, Allan Cunningham, Thomas Carlyle, and by residence, Robert Burns. Pop. (1911) 72,825.

Düna. See DWINA.

Dünaburg (Dünaboorg′), a fortified town of Western Russia, the capital formerly of Polish Livonia, on the Düna, in the government of Vitebsk, 127 miles SE. of Riga by rail. Pop. 72,000.

Dunbar, a town on the rocky coast of Haddingtonshire, backed by the Lammermuirs, 29 miles E. of Edinburgh by rail. Little remains of its sea-built castle, the stronghold from 1072 to 1435 of Gospatric and his descendants, the Earls of Dunbar and March. In 1339 'Black Agnes' held it for six weeks against the English; but it was dismantled in 1568, the year after Queen Mary's abduction hither by Bothwell. Dunbar was the scene, too, of Cromwell's great victory over Leslie, 3d September 1650. Fishing is the principal industry, and the new Victoria Harbour was formed in 1844. Dunbar was created a royal burgh by David II., and till 1885 it united with Haddington, &c. to return one member. Pop. 3300.

Dunbarton. See DUMBARTON.

Dunblane, a town of Perthshire, on the left bank of Allan Water, 5 miles N. of Stirling by rail. Founded by St Blane, a 7th-century bishop, its church was rebuilt in 1141 by David I. as a cathedral; but except for the Romanesque four lower stages of the steeple (128 feet), that cathedral is now a First Pointed edifice of a hundred years later—its glory the west window: Ruskin knew 'nothing so perfect in its simplicity.' The choir was restored in 1873; the ruinous nave in 1895. In 1661 Leighton chose Dunblane as the poorest and smallest see; his path near the river still bears the name of the Bishop's Walk, and the library which he bequeathed to his diocese is still preserved in the town. There are also a Queen Victoria School for soldiers' sons, an antique bridge, a mineral spring, and a fine hydropathic (1876); 2½ miles to the east is the battlefield of Sheriffmuir. Pop. 3000.

Duncannon, a coast village of County Wexford, 9 miles SE. of Waterford.

Duncansbay Head, a promontory, 210 feet high, forming the north-east extremity of Caithness, 18 miles N. by E. of Wick.

Dundalk (Dun-dawk′), a thriving seaport, the capital of County Louth, on Dundalk Bay, 55 miles N. of Dublin. It has salt-works, a distillery, an iron-foundry, flax-spinning, tanning, and shipbuilding. The harbour has been much improved. Pop. (1871) 11,327; (1911) 13,128. Dundalk sent one member to parliament till 1885. It was taken by Edward Bruce (1315), Cromwell (1649), and Schomberg (1689).

Dundas′, (1) a baronial castle, dating from the 11th to the 15th century, on the south bank of the Firth of Forth, near South Queensferry, the seat from about 1124 till 1875 of the Dundas family.—(2) A town of Wentworth county, Ontario, at the head of Burlington Bay, at the west of Lake Ontario, with mills and manufactories. Pop. 4300.—(3) An island of British Columbia, 40 miles NE. of Queen Charlotte Island.—(4) A group of nearly 500 coral islets (also called Juba Islands), off the east coast of Africa, in about 1° S. lat., with only one safe harbour.—(5) A strait, 18 miles wide, in North Australia, separating Melville Island from Coburg Peninsula.

Dundee (Lat. Taodunum, 'hill or fort on the Tay'), a 'city' (since 1889) of Forfarshire, on the left bank of the estuary of the Tay, here 2 miles broad, 10 miles from the sea, and 50 NNE. of Edinburgh. It stands mostly on the slope between Dundee Law (571 feet high) and Balgay Hill and the Tay. Its most striking architectural features are the Roman Ionic town-hall (1734), by the 'Elder Adam,' with a spire 140 feet high; the Albert Institute, free library, &c. (1865-89), in 15th-century Gothic, from designs by Sir Gilbert Scott; the Royal Exchange (1856), in the Flemish pointed style of the 15th century; the Eastern Club House; the Kinnaird Hall, holding 2000 people; the infirmary; the Justiciary and Sheriff Court Buildings; the Town's Churches, with the old steeple (156 feet). Dundee University College, instituted by Miss Baxter for the education of both sexes in science, literature, and fine art, was opened in 1883, and incorporated with St Andrews University in 1889. Dundee has several public parks, one of which, the gift of Sir David Baxter, on a beautiful slope to the east, is 37 acres in extent; another of 60 acres, to the west, occupies the hill of Balgay. Dundee is the chief seat in Great Britain of the manufacture of coarse linen fabrics (Osnaburgs, sheetings, ducks, dowlas, drills, canvas, and cordage). Manufactures of jute are also carried on here on an immense scale. Dundee besides is famous for its manufacture of marmalade and other confectionery; and it is the centre of the whale and seal fishing trade of Great Britain. Shipbuilding (both wood and iron) and machine-making are carried on. Besides the tidal harbour, Dundee has magnificent wet-docks, two graving-docks, and a slip for large vessels. The docks have been erected at a cost of upwards of £700,000; and the tonnage of vessels entering the port exceeds in some years half a million. The direct railway communication of Dundee with the south, established in 1878 by the Tay Bridge, was interrupted on 28th December 1879, when a great part of the bridge and a passenger-train passing over it were thrown into the river. A new and more substantial bridge was built, 20 yards higher up the river, at a somewhat lower elevation, and was opened for traffic in 1887. It is 3593 yards long, and has a clear height above high-water mark of 77 feet. Pop. (1841) 63,732; (1911) 165,004. Dundee returns two members. Since 1892 its chief magistrate is styled Lord Provost. Edward I. was here twice. Wallace is said to have taken the castle in 1297, and Bruce demolished it in 1313. The Duke of Lancaster burned Dundee in 1385, and the Marquis of Montrose pillaged it in 1645. On the refusal of Dundee to submit to Cromwell, General Monk, in 1651, sacked and burned it, massacring 1000 citizens and soldiers. In 1913 Broughty Ferry was incorporated with the burgh of Dundee. Dundee was one of the first Scotch towns to adopt the Reformation. Wishart the martyr preached here during the plague of 1544.

Dundee, a town of Natal, 236 miles NW. of Durban, with coal-mines and a battlefield (1899). Pop. 4000.

Dundon'ald, a village of Ayrshire, 5½ miles SW. of Kilmarnock. Its castle, now a ruin, was the death-place of Robert II., and gives the title of Earl to the Cochrane family.

Dundrennan, a ruined Cistercian abbey (1142), 5 miles ESE. of Kirkcudbright.

Dundrum Bay, an inlet of the Irish Sea, in County Down, 5 miles S. of Downpatrick. It is 13 miles wide at the entrance, and only 5 miles long, forming a long curve into the shore.

Dunedin (Dun-ee'din), capital of the provincial district of Otago, and the chief commercial city in New Zealand, at the head of Otago Harbour, on the east side of South Island, towards its southern extremity. It is 190 miles by sea from Lyttelton, and 150 from Invercargill (139 by rail). Since its foundation by members of the Free Church of Scotland in 1848, the city has rapidly increased in importance, chiefly after the discovery in 1861 of extensive gold-fields in the neighbourhood. It is the seat of an Anglican and a Roman Catholic bishop. There are many fine churches and buildings, one of the finest the Bank of New Zealand (1882). Other edifices are the post-office, hospital, government buildings, mechanics' institute, lunatic asylum, &c.; and there are also the Botanical Gardens, the grounds of the Acclimatisation Society, a carriage-drive through the reserve called the Town Belt, which encircles the city, and a fine racecourse, near Ocean Beach, 2 miles distant. The high school and the university flourish. Woollens are manufactured, and frozen meat prepared. Since the opening and deepening of the Victoria Channel from Port Chalmers, large steamers can approach the wharf. The city was to have been named New Edinburgh, but by a happy suggestion of Dr William Chambers of Edinburgh, its name was changed to Dunedin, the Celtic designation of the Scottish capital. Pop. (1871) 14,857; (1911) 41,529, or with suburbs, 64,200.

Dunfanaghy, a Donegal seaport, 40 miles NW. of Strabane. Pop. 400.

Dunferm'line, a 'city' of Fife, 16 miles NW. of Edinburgh, and 20 E. by S. of Stirling. It stands on a long swelling ridge, 3 miles from and 300 feet above the Forth, and, backed by the Cleish Hills (1240 feet), presents a striking aspect from the south. It is a place of hoar antiquity, from 1057 till 1650 a frequent residence of Scotland's kings, and for more than two centuries their place of sepulture. Malcolm Canmore here founded in 1072 a priory, which David I. remodelled in 1124 as a Benedictine abbey. The nave alone of its church, Romanesque to Third Pointed in style, was spared at the Reformation, and now forms a stately vestibule to the New Abbey Church (1818–21), in building which Robert Bruce's grave was discovered. There are ruins of the 'frater-house' or refectory, of the 'pended tower,' and of the royal palace (c. 1540); but of Malcolm's Tower only a shapeless fragment is left, and the 'Queen's House' (1600) was wholly demolished in 1797. Nor otherwise is there anything older than the great fire of 1624; indeed, the churches and the public buildings are almost all of quite recent erection. There are the Gothic corporation buildings (1876–79); the county building (1807–50); St Margaret's Hall (1878), with a fine organ; the Carnegie Public Library (1881); the Carnegie Baths (1877); and the handsome new high school (1886). The staple industry is damask linen-weaving, dating from 1716; bleaching, ironfounding, &c. are also carried on. A royal burgh since 1588, Dunfermline unites with the other four Stirling burghs to return an M.P. In 1902–3 Mr Carnegie made over £500,000 to be held in trust on behalf of the town; the Pittencrieff Park being one of the results. In 1912–13 the boundaries were greatly extended, so as to include the district of Rosyth. Pop. (1801) 5484; (1881) 17,085; (1911) 28,103. For its worthies, St Margaret, James I., Robert Henrysoun, Charles I., Ralph Erskine, Sir Noel Paton, and Mr Andrew Carnegie, and for its many memories, of kings, Scottish and English, of Cromwellian victory and Jacobite skirmish, see works by Chalmers (1844–59), Henderson (1879), and Beveridge (1888).

Dungannon, a municipal borough in County Tyrone, 40 miles W. of Belfast by rail. It manufactures linen and coarse earthenware; and near it are large lime-quarries and collieries. Till 1885 it returned one member. Dungannon was the chief seat of the O'Neils till 1607. Its castle was destroyed in 1641. Pop. 3800.

Dungarpur. See Dongarpur.

Dungarvan, a Waterford seaport, 141 miles SW. of Dublin. Population 5000, chiefly engaged in fishing. It has remains of an Augustinian abbey, founded in the 7th century by St Garvan, and of walls erected by King John, who also built the castle, now used as barracks. Till 1885 it returned one member. Dungarvan Bay is 3 miles long and 3 wide, and 1 to 5 fathoms deep.

Dungeness, a headland on the south coast of Kent, 10½ miles SE. of Rye, with a lighthouse.

Dungiven, a Londonderry market-town, on the Roe, 9 miles S. of Limavady. Pop. 660.

Dunipace. See Denny.

Dunkeld', a town of Perthshire, 16 miles NNW. of Perth. It lies in a deep romantic hollow, on the great east pass (of Birnam, q.v.) to the Highlands, on the left bank of the Tay, here spanned by Telford's handsome bridge (1805–9). A Culdee church was founded here about 815; and in 1107 Alexander I. revived the bishopric, one of whose holders was Gawin Douglas (1474–1522), translator of Virgil's Æneid. The Cameronians successfully held the place against 5000 Highlanders, 21st August 1689. The cathedral was built between 1318 and 1501, and comprises nave, choir (now the parish church), chapter-house, and tower, with the Wolf of Badenoch's monument (1394). The Duke of Athole's beautiful grounds include the cathedral; Craigvinean and Craig-y-Barns; 50 miles of walks, and 30 miles of drives; falls of the Bran (upper one 80 feet); and 20 sq. m. of larchwood. Pop. 500.

Dunkery Beacon. See Exmoor.

Dunkirk, or Dunkerque, the most northerly seaport of France, on the Strait of Dover, in the dep. of Nord, 189 miles N. of Paris by rail, and 67 W. of Ghent. It is a very strong place, as well from recent fortification works, as from the ease with which the surrounding country can all be laid under water. As a seaport, both naval and mercantile, it is also a place of much consequence; and great harbour-works have been carried out under the law of 1879, which authorised an expenditure of £2,000,000. The town itself is well built and cleanly, Flemish rather than French; its principal features, the Gothic church of St Eloi, the fine detached belfry (196 feet), and the statue of Jean Barth. Dunkirk has manufactures of linen, leather, cotton, soap, beet-root sugar, &c.; also metal-foundries, salt-refineries, great shipbuilding-yards, and cod and herring fisheries. Since becoming a free port in 1826, it has also carried on a good trade in wine and liqueurs. Population about 40,000. Dunkirk is said to owe its origin to the church built by St Eloi in the 7th century, in the midst of the dreary sandhills or dunes, and hence its name, 'Church of the Dunes.' It was burned by the English in 1388, taken by Cromwell in 1658, but sold to Louis XIV. by Charles II. for 5,000,000 francs in 1662.

Dunkirk, a port of New York, on Lake Erie, 40 miles SW. of Buffalo by rail, with a good harbour and a busy lake traffic. Pop. 17,200.

Dunlavin, a Wicklow market-town, 26 miles SSW. of Dublin. Pop. 450.

Dunlop', an Ayrshire village, 8 miles NNW. of Kilmarnock. Its cheese since 1855 is almost superseded by the Cheddar process. Pop. 500.

Dunluce, a ruined castle on the Antrim coast, 3½ miles E. of Portrush.

Dunmanway, a town of County Cork, 30 miles SW. of Cork. Pop. 1600.

Dunmore, a Stirlingshire village, 8 miles ESE. of Stirling. Near it are the seat of the Earl of Dunmore, and a pottery.

Dunmore, a coal-mining town of Pennsylvania, 2 miles by rail ENE. of Scranton. Pop. 18,000.

Dunmow, GREAT, a market-town of Essex, on the Chelmer, 39 miles NNE. of London.—At Little Dunmow, 2 miles ESE., are remains of a stately Augustinian priory, founded in 1104. The Dunmow Flitch of Bacon was a prize instituted in 1244 by Robert Fitzwalter, as a prize for contented married couples after a year's probation.

Dunmurry, a town of County Antrim, Ireland, 5 miles SW. of Belfast. Pop. 1500.

Dunnet Head, in Caithness (q.v.).

Dunnottar Castle, the ruined seat of the Keiths, Earls Marischal of Scotland, on the Kincardineshire coast, 1½ mile S. of Stonehaven. It crowns a sea-washed rock 160 feet high, sheltered the Scottish regalia in 1651, and in 1685 was the prison of 167 Covenanters.

Dunoon, an Argyllshire watering-place, extending, with Hunter's Quay and Kirn, 3 miles along the west shore of the Firth of Clyde, and 7 miles W. of Greenock. The seat of a castle of the Stewarts, in 1563 it received a visit from Queen Mary, and in 1643 was the place where thirty-six Lamonts were cruelly hanged by the Campbells. But the present well-built town has wholly arisen since 1822—with its steamboat-piers, its esplanade, its half-dozen churches, its numerous handsome villas, and the Convalescent Homes (1869). Population 7000—a number sometimes doubled by summer visitors.

Dunrobin Castle, the Duke of Sutherland's seat, on the Sutherland coast, 2 miles NE. of Golspie. It was built between 1098 and 1851.

Duns, a police-burgh of Berwickshire, 44 miles ESE. of Edinburgh (by rail 56), has superseded Greenlaw as county town. Thomas Boston was a native; and on round, turf-clad Duns Law, which rises 700 feet above the sea, and 280 above the town, the Covenanters encamped in 1639. Pop. 2000.

Dunsin'ane, one of the Sidlaw Hills in Perthshire, 1012 feet high, 8½ miles NE. of Perth. On its top are remains of a prehistoric fortress—'Macbeth's Castle.'

Dunsink, a hill 4 miles NW. of Dublin, the site of the observatory of Trinity College.

Dun'stable, a town of Bedfordshire, at the east base of the Chiltern chalk-hills or Dunstable Downs, 36 miles NW. of London by rail. An old-fashioned, brick-built place, with two main streets crossing at right angles, it has the fine church, partly Norman, of an Augustinian priory, which in 1110 was the scene of the earliest miracle play on record, so that Dunstable claims to be the birthplace of the English drama. It has also an ancient celebrity for larks and for straw-plait, which still is the staple industry. The grammar-school (1715) was rebuilt in 1888, at a cost of £10,000. Dunstable, which stood at the intersection of Watling and Icknield Streets, was the site of an Eleanor Cross (demolished 1643), and the scene of Queen Catharine's divorce by Cranmer. It was made a municipal borough in 1864. Pop. 8000.

Dunstaffnage, a ruined castle of Argyllshire, 3½ miles NNE. of Oban.

Dunstanburgh, a ruined castle (1315) on the Northumbrian coast, 7 miles NE. of Alnwick.

Dunster, a town of Somerset, 24 miles WNW. of Bridgwater. Pop. of parish, 1400.

Duntocher, a town of Dumbartonshire, 9 miles NW. of Glasgow. Pop. 3000.

Dunvegan, the Macleods' castle in Skye, on a sea-loch, 23 miles W. by N. of Portree.

Dunwich, a Suffolk coast village of 150 inhabitants, 4½ miles S. of Southwold. Made the episcopal see of the Anglic Southfolk in 630, it became a large place, but has mostly been swept away by the sea. It returned two members till 1832, and till 1883 was a municipal borough.

Dupplin, the castle (1832) of the Earl of Kinnoull, in Perthshire, 6 miles SW. of Perth. Here Edward Baliol defeated the Regent Mar (1332).

Düppel, or DYBBÖL, a village in the Prussian province of Sleswick-Holstein, 15 miles NE. of Flensburg. In 1848 its fortifications were stormed by the Germans; and again in 1864, by the Prussians, after a month's bombardment.

Dura Den, between Cupar and St Andrews, Fife, a small glen traversed by a tributary of the Eden, and famous for the numerous and beautifully preserved fossil fish entombed in its yellow sandstone. See Dr Anderson's Dura Den (1859).

Durance (Dü-ron^{g}ss'), a river of SE. France, rises in the dep. of Hautes-Alpes, and flows 225 miles to the Rhone, 3 miles below Avignon.

Durango (called also Guadiana and Ciudad de Victoria), an episcopal city of Mexico, on a dry plateau, 6700 feet above sea-level, 500 miles NW. of the City of Mexico. Pop. 34,000. Area of state of Durango, 38,000 sq. m.; pop. 436,000.

Durazzo (Serb Dratsch, Albanian Dúrresi; anc.

Epidamnos or Dyrrachium), a port of Albania, on the Adriatic, 50 miles S. of Scutari, coveted by Servia in 1912. Pop. 1200.

Durban, the seaport of Natal, is situated on the northern shore of a nearly landlocked tidal bay. It was laid out in 1834 by the Dutch, who had formed a republic in Natal before the British under Sir Benjamin D'Urban occupied it in 1842. Its public buildings include a town-hall, museum, library, theatre, &c. The Town Gardens form a conspicuous open space in the middle of the town, and besides the Botanical Gardens, there are several parks and a good racecourse. The residences are chiefly situated on the Berea, a low range of hills overlooking the town. The climate, though hot, is healthy; and the town is well supplied with water and tramways. Harbour-works have made the inner harbour accessible to large vessels. Durban is the terminus of railways into the Transvaal and Orange Free State. Pop. (1866) 5000; (1911) 72,500. See the history of the town by Ingram (1900).

Durdans, The, Lord Rosebery's seat, Epsom, Surrey.

Düren (Roman Marcodurum), an ancient town of Rhenish Prussia, on the Roer, 18 miles E. of Aix-la-Chapelle. It manufactures cloth, iron, paper, sugar, &c. Pop. 32,500.

Durham, a maritime county in the north-east of England, between the Tyne and Tees. It has 32 miles of coast, generally low, and an area of 1012 sq. m., two-thirds being arable. The surface is hilly, and slopes to the east. In the west, which is waste but rich in minerals, are branches of the Pennine chain, rising in Kilhope Law (2196 feet), Collier Law (1678), and Pontop Pike (1018). The chief rivers are the Wear, Tyne, and Tees, navigable respectively for 12, 15, and 10 miles. The valuable Durham coalfield measures 25 by 10 miles. Other mineral products are limestone, black marble, freestone, ironstone, firestone, slate, millstone, grindstone, iron pyrites, fluor-spar, zinc, and lead. The principal lead-mines are in Teesdale and Weardale; and there are many large iron-furnaces. Durham has the largest coal production of any county in England, the annual output being nearly 30,000,000 tons, and the number of persons employed above or below ground at the mines being over 100,000. The chief shipping ports are Stockton-on-Tees, South Shields, Sunderland, and Hartlepool. The Teeswater or Holderness breed of cattle and the Durham horses are alike famed. Many sheep are pastured on the hills. There are manufactures of iron, coke, pottery, glass, alkalies and chemicals, and salt, and much shipbuilding at Jarrow, Sunderland, South Shields, Hartlepool, and Stockton. Coal is the chief export. Durham is one of the three counties palatine, the other two being Lancaster and Chester. It is divided into four wards and 286 civil parishes, and is entirely in the diocese of Durham. Pop. (1801) 149,384; (1841) 307,963; (1881) 867,576; (1911) 1,369,860. The chief towns are Durham, the county town, Sunderland, Darlington, Gateshead, South Shields, Stockton, and Hartlepool. The county includes eight parliamentary divisions, each returning one member; and the following parliamentary boroughs: Sunderland (2 members), and Darlington, Durham, Gateshead, Hartlepool, South Shields, and Stockton (each 1). There are extensive remains of Roman stations at Lanchester, Binchester, and Ebchester. Durham formed part of the Saxon kingdom of Northumbria (547–827). Later it suffered severely from the Scots. See works by R. Surtees (1816–40), Fordyce (1855–1857), W. H. Smith (1885), Boyle (1892), and Lapsley (1900), and 'The Victoria History' (1906–12).

Durham, a parliamentary and municipal borough, near the middle of Durham county, 12 miles S. of Newcastle, is built around a steep rocky hill 86 feet high, nearly encircled by the Wear, and crowned by the cathedral and castle. Ancient walls partly enclose the hill, from which are fine views of the fertile wooded country around, and of the suburbs across the river. The chief manufactures are mustard, carpets, and iron. In the vicinity are coal-mines and coke-ovens. Since 1885 Durham has returned only one member. Pop. (1841) 14,151; (1911) 17,550. Durham arose about 995, when Bishop Aldhun brought hither St Cuthbert's bones from Ripon, and built a church to enshrine them. On the site of this church, Bishop William de Carilef in 1093 began the present cathedral, one of the noblest specimens of Norman architecture, alike from situation and from structure, that massive pile—'half church of God, half castle 'gainst the Scot.' Added to at various periods up till 1500, it has an extreme length of 510 feet, and a breadth across the transepts of 175 feet; whilst the height of the central tower is 214 feet, and of the two western towers 138 feet. The cathedral contains the tombs of St Cuthbert and Bede. The castle, formerly the residence of the bishops of Durham, but now occupied by the university, was founded about 1072, by the Conqueror, but has received many alterations and additions. The dormitory of the monastery, now the new library of the cathedral, is one of the finest in England. The see extends over the county of Durham (Northumberland having been detached in 1882 to form the diocese of Newcastle); among its bishops have been Bek, Aungerville, Wolsey, Cosin, Butler, and Lightfoot. The university of Durham was opened for students in 1833; and a royal charter in 1837 empowered it to bestow degrees. It has two collegiate establishments—University College and Bishop Hatfield's Hall. The College of Medicine and Armstrong College at Newcastle-on-Tyne are affiliated with Durham.

Durisdeer, a parish of upper Nithsdale, 21 miles NNW. of Dumfries. In its church are interesting monuments of the Queensberry family.

Dürkheim (Dürk'hime), a town of Rhenish Bavaria, 6 miles SW. of Mannheim. Pop. 7000.

Durlach (Door'lahh), a town of Baden, on the Pfinz, 4 miles E. of Carlsruhe by rail. Pop. 14,000.

Dürrenstein (Dür'ren-stine), a village of Lower Austria, on the left bank of the Danube, 45 miles WNW. of Vienna. In its ruined castle Richard Cœur-de-Lion was confined by Leopold of Austria for three months. Pop. 650.

Durrow, a market-town of Queen's County, 2 miles NW. of Attanagh station. Pop. 550.

Dursley, a town of Gloucestershire, near the Coteswold hills, 15 miles SW. of Gloucester by rail. Pop. of parish, 2600.

Düsseldorf, the chief town of the populous district of Düsseldorf, in Rhenish Prussia, on the right bank of the Rhine, at the influx of the Düssel, 24 miles NNW. of Cologne. Its ramparts were converted into promenades in 1802; its streets are regular and spacious, while the squares and garden-grounds in and near the town are tastefully laid out and embellished with fountains and statues. Düsseldorf has developed its trade and industries, but its chief importance is still as an art centre. In the market-place rises a colossal equestrian statue of the Elector Johann Wilhelm, who founded a famous picture-gallery here in 1690, most of which, however, was removed to Munich in 1805. The Düsseldorf Academy was founded in 1767, and attained great eminence during 1822–59, under the management of Cornelius and Schadow. The present building, an imposing Renaissance edifice, with a façade 520 feet in length, was finished in 1879. The Art Hall (1881–1902) contains a gallery of modern paintings. Other principal buildings are the old electoral palace (1710–1846; burned 1872); the present palace, the residence of the governor of the province; the government house, the observatory, town-hall (1567), theatre, gymnasium, public library (50,000 vols.), St Andrew's (1629), formerly the church of the Jesuits, and St Lambert (14th c.). The Hofgarten is one of the finest public gardens in Germany. The iron and cotton industries of Düsseldorf are very important, and it has also manufactures of pianofortes, paper, soap, beer, chemicals, tobacco, chocolate, glass, &c., besides mills of all kinds, and photographic, lithographic, printing, and other industries. Pop. (1875) 80,750; (1885) 115,190; (1910) 358,728—mostly Catholics. Made a town by the Duke of Berg in 1288, Düsseldorf became the capital of the duchy in 1385; in 1609 passed to the Palatinate; and in 1815 it was united to Prussia. The brothers Jacobi, Heine, Varnhagen von Ense, and Cornelius were natives.

Dwarka, a town with a lighthouse near the north-west corner of the peninsula of Kathiawar, 235 miles SW. of Ahmedabad. On an eminence stands a great temple of Krishna, visited annually by 10,000 pilgrims. Pop. 5000.

Dwina, two important rivers of Russia.—(1) The Northern Dwina is formed by the Suchona and the Jug, two streams rising in the government of Vologda, and uniting in 60° 46′ N. lat., 46° 20′ E. long. It flows north-westward through a flat country, to the Gulf of Archangel, which it enters by three principal mouths, of which only the easternmost is navigable. Its length is 450 miles (with the Suchona, 760). The chief tributaries are the Vaga, Emza, Pinega, and Vytchegda, the last 625 miles long (500 navigable). The river is free from ice from May to October. Its waters are rich in fish.—(2) The Western Dwina (Ger. Düna) rises in the government of Tver, not far from the sources of the Volga and the Dnieper, and flows 580 miles WSW. and WNW. to the Gulf of Riga, being navigable from the Mezha's confluence, although shallows and rapids greatly impede traffic. It is connected by canals with the Black Sea, the Caspian, the Gulf of Finland, &c.

Dyrrhachium. See DURAZZO.

Dy'sart, an old-fashioned seaport of Fife, on the Firth of Forth, 2½ miles NE. of Kirkcaldy, much of whose extended municipal burgh lies within Dysart's parliamentary boundary. It owes its name (Lat. desertum, 'a solitude') to St Serf's cave near Dysart House, Lord Rosslyn's seat. James V. made it a royal burgh, and with Kirkcaldy, &c., it returns one member. Pop. of royal burgh, 4200; of parliamentary, 18,500.

Dzungaria. See ZUNGARIA.

EAGLE, an island of County Mayo, 3 miles SW. of Erris Head.

Eaglehawk, a gold-mining town of Victoria, 4 miles NNW. of Bendigo. Pop. 10,000.

Eaglesham, a Renfrewshire village, 8½ miles S. of Glasgow. Pop. 700.

Ealing, a municipal borough (1901) of Middlesex, 5¾ miles W. of Paddington by rail. It is the birthplace of Huxley. Pop. 61,000.

Earlestown, part of Newton-in-Makerfield urban district, in Lancashire, 5 miles N. of Warrington. It manufactures sugar, iron, &c.

Earlsferry, a decayed royal burgh of Fife, just W. of Elie (q.v.). Pop. with Elie, 1000.

Earlston, or ERCILDOUNE, a Berwickshire village, 4 miles NNE. of Melrose. It manufactures ginghams, woollens, &c., and has a fragment of the 'Rhymer's Tower,' the traditional abode of Thomas the Rhymer; 1 mile S. is Cowdenknowes, with its 'bonny broom.' Pop. 1000.

Earn, a river and loch in the south of Perthshire, in the finely-wooded, beautiful valley of Strathearn. Lying 306 feet above sea-level, Loch Earn extends 6½ miles eastward, is 3¼ to 6¼ furlongs wide, and 600 feet deep; and sends off the river Earn 46 miles eastward, past Comrie, Crieff, and Bridge of Earn, to the Tay's estuary, 7 miles SE. of Perth.

Easdale, an Argyllshire island, in the Firth of Lorn, 16 miles SW. of Oban. It contains 1½ sq. m., and is separated from the much larger Seil Island by a channel 400 yards wide. Its slate-quarries date from about 1630, and extend to a depth of 220 feet below sea-level. Pop. 200.

Easingwold, a town in the North Riding of Yorkshire, 13 miles NNW. of York; pop. 2000.

East Anglia. See ANGLIA.

Eastbourne, a favourite Sussex watering-place and county borough (1911), nearly midway between Brighton and Hastings, and 66 miles S. of London. Roman remains bear witness to its antiquity, but nothing is known of its ancient history. In Domesday it is called Borne (after the burn or stream which still flows here). The fine 12th-century church clearly belonged to a much more important place than the four groups of houses and cottages which constitued the fishing-hamlets of East-Borne, South-Borne, Meads, and Sea-Houses at a late period. The last generation has witnessed the growth of the modern watering-place, which now challenges comparison, in respect of its attractions to visitors and advantages to residents, with any of its south-coast rivals. Its air is singularly healthy, and on the hillside bracing; whilst the close vicinity of the bold promontory of Beachy Head and the 'front-hills' of the South Downs affords unusual facilities for exercise. Defended by a redoubt of eleven guns and other fortifications, the sea-front boasts a parade two miles long, laid out in spacious terraces in three tiers, bordered by creeping plants. The streets are broad and lined with trees; and there are a pier 1000 feet long, the Devonshire Park, the Devonshire Baths, theatre, cricket, football, and other clubs, admirable golf-links, electric-lighting, &c. A large part of the improvements is due to the late Duke of Devonshire, but the town has also taken an enterprising share in them. The town-hall, costing £46,000, was opened in 1886, and the Princess Alice Memorial Hospital in 1883. Eastbourne was incorporated as a borough in 1883. Pop.

(1821) 2000; now 52,500. See Chambers's Handbook for Eastbourne (23d ed. 1893).

East Cape, the name of the south-eastern extremity of New Guinea, in Goschen Strait, and of the most easterly headlands of Madagascar, the North Island of New Zealand, and Siberia.

Eastchurch, a Kentish town, in the Isle of Sheppey, has a Naval Flying School (1912); pop. 1000.

East Dereham. See DEREHAM.

Easter Island, a lonely Pacific islet in 27° 8′ S. lat., and 109° 24′ W. long. Discovered by Roggeveen on Easter Day 1722, and visited in 1773 by Captain Cook, it is 47 sq. m. in area; is entirely volcanic, with many extinct craters rising more than 1000 feet; and is fertile, but badly off for water. Sheep and cattle grazing was started by a French firm in Tahiti, after the departure in 1878 of the missionaries, with 300 natives (fair Polynesians), for the Gambian Archipelago, 500 having been shipped to Tahiti four years earlier, and most of the adults kidnapped by Peruvians in 1863 to work the guano deposits. Thus the pop. has dwindled from 3000 to 100. The 555 rude stone statues, for which Easter Island is famous, are thought to have been effigies, not idols. Thin-lipped, disdainful of aspect, and capped by crowns of red tufa, they are 3 to 70 feet high (16 on an average), and stand on seaward platforms, 200 to 300 feet long, of cyclopean masonry. There are besides nearly a hundred stone houses with walls 5 feet thick, and interiors bearing paintings of birds, animals, &c. In 1888 Chili annexed Easter Island. See Thomson's Report of the U.S. National Museum (Wash. 1892), and Churchill's Easter Island (1912).

Eastern Roumelia. See BULGARIA.

East Ham. See HAM.

Eastham, a township of Cheshire, on the Mersey, 6½ miles SE. of Birkenhead, near the mouth of the Manchester Ship Canal; pop. 1000.

East Indies, THE, include the two great peninsulas of southern Asia, and all the adjacent islands from the delta of the Indus to the northern extremity of the Philippines. For the Dutch East Indies, see HOLLAND.

Eastleigh and Bishopstoke, a Southampton urban district, 5 miles NE. of Southampton; pop. 15,250.

East Liverpool, a town of Ohio, on the Ohio River, 44 miles WNW. of Pittsburgh by rail; pop. 20,400.

East London, a South African seaport, at the mouth of the Buffalo River, 700 miles E. of Capetown, with a large trade. It is the terminus of a railway to the interior. Pop. 23,000.

East Lothian. See HADDINGTONSHIRE.

East Main, a region of Canada, known for a time as Ungava, and comprising the peninsula of Labrador (q.v.) except the Atlantic coast strip (attached to Newfoundland) and the southern part. It was transferred from the North-west Provinces to Quebec in 1912. The East Main or Slade River runs 400 miles to James Bay.

Easton, capital of Northampton county, Pennsylvania, stands in the fork between the Delaware and Lehigh rivers, 67 miles N. of Philadelphia by rail. It carries on a considerable transport trade by rail and canal, and has foundries, rolling-mills, and manufactures of locks, wire, rope, flour, &c. Easton is the seat of Lafayette (Presbyterian) College (1832). Pop. 30,000.

East Orange, a manufacturing and residential city of New Jersey, adjoining Orange, and 13 miles E. of Jersey City; pop. 34,000.

East Providence, a town of Rhode Island, separated from Providence by the Blackstone River. Pop. 15,000.

East River, the strait between Long Island Sound and New York Harbour, separating Brooklyn (q.v.) and New York. It is 10 miles long, ⅛ mile wide at the narrowest, and navigable by the largest ships.

East St Louis, a town of Illinois, connected with St Louis, Missouri, by a bridge over the Mississippi. Pop. 58,500.

Eastwood, an urban dist. in the county, and 8 miles NW. of the town, of Nottingham; pop. 4700.

Eaton Hall, 3½ miles S. of Chester, the Duke of Westminster's splendid Gothic seat (1803).

Eau Claire (O Clair), capital of Eau Claire county, Wisconsin, at the mouth of the Eau Claire River, and at the head of navigation on the Chippewa River, 183 m. NW. of Madison by rail. It has a vast trade in lumber, and numerous saw-mills, besides planing-mills, foundries, machine-shops, &c. Pop. 18,300.

Eaux Bonnes (O Bonn), a French watering-place, in a gorge of the Pyrenees, 2454 feet above the sea, and 29 miles S. of Pau. Pop. 600, with 6000 to 10,000 visitors in the season (July to August). The springs, both hot (53° to 91° F.) and cold, contain sulphur and sodium, and are used for disorders of the chest and respiratory organs.

Eaux Chaudes (Ō Shoad), a watering-place of France, 27 miles S. by W. of Pau, situated in a narrow Pyrenean valley, 2215 feet above sea-level. Its sulphurous waters (50° to 93° F.) are useful for catarrh, rheumatism, and skin-diseases.

Ebal. See GERIZIM.

Ebbsfleet. See RAMSGATE.

Ebbw Vale (Ebboo), an urban district of Monmouthshire, 21 miles NNW. of Newport, lies in the middle of a rich iron and coal district, and has numerous ironworks; pop. 30,600.

Eberswalde (Ay'bers-val'deh), an industrial town of Prussia, 28 miles NE. of Berlin by rail, with manufactories of nails, paper, &c.; pop. 26,000.

Eboli (Eb'o-lee; anc. Eburi), a town of Italy, 49 miles SE. of Naples by rail. Pop. 10,000.

Eboracum. See YORK.

Ebro (Lat. Hibērus), a Spanish river, rising at an altitude of 2778 feet, in Santander province, within 20 miles of the Bay of Biscay. Thence it flows 442 miles SE. to the Mediterranean below Tortosa. The mouth is choked up with sand, but the San Carlos canal has been carried through the delta. Affluents are the Najerilla, Jiloca, and Guadalope from the right, and the Aragon, Gallego, and Segre from the left. Narrow and sometimes rocky, its course is obstructed by shoals and rapids; but this is partly remedied by Charles V.'s Imperial Canal, extending from Tudela to 40 miles below Saragossa.

Ecbat'ana. See HAMADAN.

Ecclefechan (Ek'kel-feh'han), a Dumfriesshire village, 20 m. NW. of Carlisle. The house in which Carlyle was born (4th Dec. 1795) still stands, and in the churchyard of the U.P. church he was laid beside his father and mother. Pop. 700.

Eccles, a municipal borough (incor. 1892), 4 miles W. of Manchester; pop. 42,000.

Ecclesfield, a township in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 6 miles N. of Sheffield, with which it is now partly incorporated. The chief industries are cutlery and coal-mining.

Eccleshall, a town of Staffordshire, 7¼ miles NW. of Stafford. Pop. of parish, 3700.

Eccleshill, a town of Yorkshire, on the Aire, in 1899 incorporated with Bradford.

Echuca (formerly Hopwood's Ferry), a town of Victoria, on a peninsula formed by the Murray and Campaspe rivers, 156 miles N. of Melbourne by rail. It has considerable trade in red-gum timber, wool, and wine, and important river traffic by steamer. A roadway and railway bridge, 1905 feet long (cost £124,000), connects it with Moama in New South Wales. Pop. 5600.

Ecija (Ay-thee'ha), a Spanish city, in the province of Seville, 34 miles SW. of Cordova by rail. An old Roman and Moorish town, it is popularly known, on account of the great heat, as the 'Frying-pan of Andalusia.' Pop. 25,000.

Eckmühl, a little village on the Laber, in Bavaria, 15 miles by rail S. of Ratisbon. Here, on 22d April 1809, Napoleon defeated the Archduke Charles of Austria.

Ecuador', a republic of South America, so named from its position on the equator, lies between 1° 23′ N. and 4° 45′ S. lat., and in about 73°-81° W. long. Bounded on the west by the Pacific, it is inserted like a wedge between Colombia and Peru. But its only certain limits are those defined by the ocean, where it has a seaboard of some 400 miles; most of the frontier east of the Andes has never been determined. The area, often stated at 160,000, is really under 120,000 sq. m. (i.e. rather less than the United Kingdom), including the 2400 of the Galapagos Islands (q.v.). The total population is stated at 1,500,000, of whom 1,000,000 may be Indians, 100,000 of European stock, and 300,000 of mixed blood. The principal cities are Quito, the capital (80,000 inhabitants), Guayaquil, the chief port (80,000), Cuenca (30,000), Riobamba, Latacunga, and Ambato. Ecuador consists of three divisions—the lowlands west of the Andes, the mountainous plateau of the interior, and the less elevated forest-country to the east. Besides the main range of the Andes (q.v.), forming the backbone of the country, there is an outer range, with peaks rising to 15,000 feet; from the cordillera proper numerous long spurs, attaining a height of 14,000 feet, are thrown out towards the east, between which rise great affluents of the Amazons, while the coast-range possesses only short and very precipitous spurs. The principal mountains of Ecuador either are or have been volcanoes. Tunguragua (16,690 feet) broke out in 1887; Pichincha is by no means extinct; Cotopaxi (q.v.) and Sangai (17,465) are constantly active. Of the coast-streams the principal are the Guayaquil River, and the Rio Esmeraldas; east of the Andes the chief rivers are the Napo and its affluents, flowing into the Marañon. In mineral wealth Ecuador has been ranked amongst the poorest states of South America; but gold is wrought, and silver, quicksilver, iron, copper, zinc, asphalt, and petroleum occur, as well as graphite and anthracite.

Ecuador is an agricultural country. The eastern winds become saturated as they pass over the Atlantic and up the Amazons; and their moisture is almost ceaselessly precipitated as they approach the snowy peaks of the Andes, producing a dense growth of vegetation on the eastern foothills. On the other side also, where the rain-clouds of the Pacific are caught, the gorges of the western spurs become very hothouses. Natural sabanas or open plains are, however, found on the western lowlands. Sarsaparilla, balsams, caoutchouc, vegetable ivory, and wax are collected, and coffee, rice, cotton, tobacco, &c. are grown, but in smaller quantities; while the trade in cinchona promises soon to be a thing of the past, owing to the reckless destruction of the trees. The plateau region and large tracts to the east are comparatively healthy; the valleys on the Pacific side are commonly full of disease. In the interior there is a very small thermometric range, and a perpetual spring reigns in the uplands. The fauna is rich: the mammalia include the jaguar, puma, ounce, ocelot, deer, tapir, peccary, capybara, and several species of monkeys and bats; fish abound, both in the rivers and along the coast; and among reptilia are the boa constrictor, turtles, and alligators. Chiefly, however, is Ecuador the paradise of birds (ranging from the condor to the humming-bird) and insects. The live-stock includes cattle, sheep, horses, mules, donkeys, and llamas.

The state religion, to the exclusion of every other, is the Roman Catholic; and in no country have the Jesuits had such a paramount influence as in Ecuador, or employed it so well. Quito possesses a university and an institute of sciences (1884), with three faculties. The manufactures are limited to coarse cloths, kerosene, ice, and the preparation of spirits from the sugar-cane, and of flour or starch from the yuca or cassava root. Guayaquil is famed for its hammocks and Panamá hats, made from the fibre of the 'pita' plant. Commerce is sadly handicapped by the want of roads. There are only about 400 miles of railway open; but the chief towns have been connected by telegraph, and there are even telephones in Quito and elsewhere. The value of the exports, chiefly cocoa, coffee, vegetable ivory, caoutchouc, and hides, varies from £1,200,000 to £3,500,000 per annum; the imports, chiefly cottons, other textiles, and provisions, vary between narrower limits. Great Britain, the United States, Germany, and France have large shares in the trade. Exports to Britain vary from £72,000 to £220,000 a year, and imports from Britain from £260,000 to £300,000.

Constituted as an independent state on the dissolution of Bolívar's Colombia (q.v.), the Republic of the Equator has, in little more than half a century, passed through a succession of violent political changes that render its history equally difficult and profitless to follow. Under its last constitution the executive is vested in a president, elected for four years, with a vice-president, a cabinet of five ministers, and a council of state; the legislative power is entrusted to a senate and house of representatives. The army consists of 8000 officers and men, and there is a small navy manned by about 200 men. The finance of the country is in hopeless embarrassment; the revenue, some £1,500,000, is usually exceeded by the expenditure. The foreign debt is stated at £1,000,000, and there are heavy arrears of interest.

Edam, a town of Holland, 13 miles NNE. of Amsterdam. Its specialty is cheese. Pop. 6400.

Edar, a Rajput state of Guzerat in the Mahi Kantha agency, tributary to Baroda, and subject to Bombay. Area, 4966 sq. m.; pop. 258,429. Edar, its capital, has 6223 inhabitants.

Eday, an Orkney island, 13½ miles NNE. of Kirkwall. Area, 11 sq. m.; pop. 500.

Eddystone, a group of gneiss rocks, daily submerged by the tide, in the English Channel, 9 miles off the Cornish coast, and 14 SSW. of Plymouth Breakwater. The rocks lie in 50° 10′ 54″ N. lat., and 4° 15′ 53″ W. long., and have 12 to 150 fathoms water around. The frequent shipwrecks on these rocks led to the erection of a wooden lighthouse, 100 feet high, by Winstanley, 1696–1700. The great storm of 20th November 1703 completely washed it away, with the architect. A similar lighthouse (1706–9) was burned in 1755. The next, constructed by Smeaton in 1757–59, was built of blocks, generally one to two tons weight, of Portland oolite, encased in granite, the granite being dovetailed into the solid rock, and each block into its neighbours. The tower, 85 feet high, had a diameter of 26¾ feet at the base, and 15 feet at the top. The light was visible at a distance of 13 miles. As the rock on which it was built is undermined by the action of the waves, the foundation of another was laid on a different part of the reef in 1879. The new lighthouse, completed in 1882 by Sir James N. Douglass, F.R.S., is, like its predecessor, ingeniously dovetailed throughout. Its dioptric apparatus gives, at an elevation of 133 feet, a light equal to 159,600 candles, and visible to a distance of 17½ miles. Smeaton's lighthouse was taken down to the level of the first room as soon as the new one was completed, the removed upper portion being re-erected on Plymouth Hoe.

Eden, a river of Westmorland and Cumberland, rising in the Pennine chain, and running 65 miles north-north-west past Appleby and Carlisle, to a fine estuary at the head of the Solway Firth. There is another Eden in Sussex and Kent (12 miles long), a third in Fife (29½), and a fourth in Berwickshire (23½).

Edenderry, a town of King's county, 37½ miles W. of Dublin. Pop. 2200.

Edenhall, the ancient seat of the Musgraves in Cumberland, 4 miles NE. of Penrith. Here is still preserved the famous 'Luck of Edenhall,' an old painted glass goblet (a chalice originally) said to have been snatched from the fairies; on its safety the welfare of the house depends.

Edenkoben, a town of the Bavarian Palatinate, 6 miles N. of Landau. Pop. 6000.

Edessa (Arabic Er-Ruha, called by travellers Orfa), a very ancient city, in the north of Mesopotamia, between Aleppo and Diarbekir, 78 miles SW. of the latter town. Made a Roman military colony (216 A.D.), it was an early seat of Christianity, but was conquered by the Moslems in 638. It was twice wrested from them (1031–86 and 1097–1144); in 1147 it was laid waste; and all who were not massacred were sold as slaves. Since 1515 it has formed a portion of the Turkish dominions. Edessa has numerous mosques and bazaars; manufactures of cotton goods, goldsmiths' wares, and morocco leather, and a large trade. Easterns, to whom it is the residence of Abraham, regard it as a sacred city. Pop. 20,000.

Edessa. See VODENA.

Edfu (Coptic Atbô, Egypt. Teb, Lat. Apollinopolis Magna), a town of Upper Egypt, on the Nile's left bank, in 25° N. lat., and 32° 45′ E. long. It contains the remains of two temples; the larger (451 by 250 feet) is the best-preserved monument of its kind in Egypt, and was founded by Ptolemy IV. Philopator about 210 B.C. Pop. 20,000.

Edgbaston, a western suburb of Birmingham. The Oratory here (1849) was founded by, and till his death was the home of, Cardinal Newman.

Edgehill, a hill-ridge on the border of Warwick and Oxford shires, 14 miles SSE. of Warwick. A tower, erected in 1760, marks the scene of the indecisive battle, the first in the Great Rebellion, which was fought on Sunday, 23d October 1642, between 12,000 royalists under Charles I. and 10,000 parliamentarians under the Earl of Essex.

Edgewater, once a town of Staten Island, since 1897 included in Richmond borough of New York.

Edgeworthstown, a town of County Longford, 67½ miles WNW. of Dublin. It was the home of Maria Edgeworth. Pop. 600.

Edgware, a village of Middlesex, 11¼ miles NW. of King's Cross station. In a forge here, where he had taken refuge from the rain, Handel conceived his 'Harmonious Blacksmith.' Pop. of parish, 1200.

Edinburgh (Ed'din-bur-ro), capital of Scotland, and county town of Midlothian, situated in 55° 57′ N. lat., 3° 11′ W. long. By rail 393 miles NNW. of London, 44 to 47¼ E. of Glasgow, it stands 2 miles from the Firth of Forth, on a series of ridges, and is overlooked by Arthur's Seat and other hills (see EDINBURGHSHIRE), now within the city boundary; of hills within the area of streets the highest are the Castle Rock (437 feet) and the Calton (349). Although the Castle Rock, which for centuries was considered an almost impregnable fortress, must have been a place of refuge and of arms from the earliest times, Edinburgh is first noticed in history in the beginning of the 7th century, as a stronghold of Northumbria, from whose king Edwin it is said to derive its name. In 1093 its castle figures in the story of St Margaret, queen of Malcolm Canmore, and the little Norman chapel on the summit of the rock, dedicated to her memory, is the oldest building connected with the city. In 1128 David I. founded the abbey of Holyrood, about a mile east of the castle, and round it grew up the little burgh of the Canongate, which maintained its separate municipality until 1856.

To the east of the castle, where the ground slopes down from the rock in a narrow 'hog's back,' there grew up the town of Edinburgh. In 1329 it was made a burgh by Robert the Bruce, by a charter which also granted the town the right of establishing a port at Leith, 2 miles distant; thus began the vassalage of the port to the capital, which continued until 1833, when Leith was made a burgh. It was during the 15th century, under the Stewart dynasty, that Edinburgh began to be recognised as the capital, and parliament regularly met here, at first within the great hall of the castle, and afterwards in the City Tolbooth, until in 1631 the present Parliament House was erected. James IV. and James V. confirmed its choice as the capital by building a palace within the abbey of Holyrood; and by establishing, in 1532, the Court of Session, as a supreme court of justice for Scotland. In 1450 the first wall was built; and in 1513, after the defeat at Flodden, an extended wall was erected to include the suburb of the Cowgate, which had meantime arisen in the valley to the south. The town was defended on the west by the castle; on the north by a morass, called the 'Nor' Loch;' and on the east and south by the city wall. As the population increased, the houses rose higher and higher, until the town abounded in great 'lands' of houses, which, being erected on the steep sides of the 'hog's back,' had entrances from two levels, and rose to ten, twelve, and even fourteen stories in height. In 1583 the university was opened; shortly after the middle of the 18th century the town wall was broken down in every direction, and the Nor' Loch was drained; whilst access was given to the country sloping down to the Firth of Forth, on which arose the New Town, by the erection in 1763–72 of the North Bridge (rebuilt in 1894–95). In 1785 the valley to the south, in which lies the Cowgate, was bridged, and the town spread southwards. In 1815–19 another bridge was thrown over a deep hollow on the north-east, and the Calton Hill was connected with the city; while in 1827–36 George IV. Bridge was built across the Cowgate parallel to the South Bridge.

The modern city now spreads on every side round the steep ridge to which for centuries she was confined. It is especially fortunate in its open spaces and public parks. The Princes Street gardens occupy the site of the old Nor' Loch, at the foot of the Castle Rock; the range of the Meadows and Links—the remains of the once extensive Burgh Muir—divides the town proper from the southern suburbs; the old royal hunting-ground attached to Holyrood—the King's Park and Arthur's Seat—is open to the citizens; on the north are the Botanic Gardens and the Arboretum (1824–81); and on the south Blackford Hill and the Braids have been added (1884–89) to the town property devoted to recreation. The view from either Arthur's Seat or Blackford Hill is a very noble and extensive one; that from the latter eminence is finely described in Scott's Marmion. On the wooded Corstorphine Hill, to the west, is the Scottish Zoological Park (1913), overlooking Saughton Park.

The Palace of Holyrood was rebuilt by Sir William Bruce of Kinross in 1671–79. Holyrood Abbey is represented by its ruined chapel. Of the castle, the earliest portion is St Margaret's Chapel; remains of David's Tower have been found; the old Parliament Hall, was restored (1888–92) by the late Mr William Nelson, publisher, while the Queen Mary portion contains the Scottish regalia; St Giles' Church, the old parish church of Edinburgh, dating most of it from the 15th century, was restored by the late Dr William Chambers, the work being completed in 1883; the Parliament House, erected in 1633 for the Scottish parliament, is now used as the 'Outer House' of the Supreme Courts, and adorned with many fine portraits and statues belonging to the Faculty of Advocates; John Knox's House was perhaps used by the great Reformer while minister of the town; the beautiful 17th-century building of Heriot's Hospital is now (since 1885) used as a technical school. Many of the modern buildings are fine. The Episcopal Cathedral of St Mary's, opened in 1879, is one of the largest churches built in Britain since the Reformation; and many of the other churches are handsome buildings; while the National Gallery (1850–58), the Royal Scottish Academy (1823–36), the Royal Scottish Museum (1861–89), the National Portrait Gallery and Antiquarian Museum (1885–90), the Observatory (1893–95), the Usher Hall, and many of the banks, insurance-offices, clubs, and public schools are fine buildings, and occupy sites made remarkable by the broken nature of the ground on which the city is built. Among its numerous monuments are the graceful Gothic spire (1844) in memory of Sir Walter Scott, and the National Monument.

Edinburgh has been long known for its educational institutions, and these draw many inhabitants to the city for the benefits they offer. At the head of these is, of course, the university, founded in 1582, and comprising the faculties of arts, science, divinity, law, medicine, and music, with 50 chairs and over 3000 students. The present university buildings were begun in 1789 from designs by the elder Adam, and completed in 1887 by the addition of a dome. New medical buildings were opened in 1884, a students' union in 1889, and the M'Ewan college hall in 1895. Besides the university there are colleges for instruction in medicine, art, agriculture, theology, a City Observatory, and normal schools for training teachers. The High School and Academy, and many of the private schools, have also attained a high reputation; but the most noteworthy feature perhaps is the exceptionally large sum which is annually derived for educational purposes from bequests left by citizens. Among the principal is the trust founded by George Heriot in Charles I.'s time, which now yields £30,000 per annum, applied by the Act of 1885 to the Heriot-Watt Technical College, and to the maintenance of a Science and Technical School; the trusts under the charge of the Merchant Company of Edinburgh, with an annual income of £40,000, applied principally to middle-class education; and the Fettes endowment, applied to higher-class education on the English model. In libraries Edinburgh is rich, having besides the University Library (260,000 vols. and 8000 MSS.), the magnificent collection of about 560,000 volumes belonging to the Faculty of Advocates, and the valuable library of the Society of Writers to the Signet, amounting to about 115,000 volumes. A free public library was also erected in 1887–89, the building being a gift of Mr Andrew Carnegie of Pittsburgh, U.S. The Royal Infirmary (1736), which occupies spacious new buildings of 1870–80, is a necessary adjunct to the great medical school, and is one of the most admirably appointed hospitals in Europe.

Edinburgh, as a residential town, is probably the most important shopkeeping centre out of London; it is not in any great measure a manufacturing town, its most important industries being brewing, printing, and publishing. It has been known for its printers since 1507, when Walter Chepman set up the first Scottish printing-press. The publishing of books, with the subsidiary businesses of printing, bookbinding, and type-founding, is now a most important industry; the publications of Messrs Blackwood, Chambers, Nelson, and numerous other firms are well known; and the book-factories are exceptionally large and well appointed. There are many paper-mills near the city; and in or near it there are distilleries, india-rubber manufactories, tanneries, and nurseries. Edinburgh is a great railway centre, and, besides suburban railways, has a complete cable system of tramways. It is divided, for municipal purposes, into sixteen wards, and for parliamentary purposes into four divisions. Portobello was incorporated in 1896, and Granton in 1900. Pop. (1831) 136,548; (1861) 221,846; (1901) 316,837; (1911) 320,318; parl. burgh, 293,491.

Edinburghshire, or MIDLOTHIAN, a Scottish county, extending 12 miles along the low southern shore of the Firth of Forth. Its greatest length from east to west is 36 miles; its greatest breadth, 24; and its area, 367 sq. m. The surface has a general southward rise to the Pentlands, culminating in Scald Law (1898 feet), and the Moorfoot Hills, whose highest point is Blackhope Scar (2136). Intermediate eminences are Arthur's Seat (822), Blackford Hill (500), Corstorphine Hill (520), Craiglockhart (550), the Braid Hills (698), and the Dalmahoy Crags (800). The streams —Esk, Water of Leith, and Almond—all flow to the Forth, with the exception of Gala Water, which runs to the Tweed. Coal has been largely mined for nearly three centuries; and ironstone, oil-shale, and fireclay are also raised. There are large quarries of sandstone at Craigleith and elsewhere. Agriculture is highly advanced, though only 57 per cent. of the entire area is in cultivation. Near Edinburgh are large market-gardens and sewage-meadows; and on the Esk and the Water of Leith there are paper-mills. The county returns one member to parliament, and contains the parliamentary burghs of Edinburgh, Leith, Portobello, and Musselburgh, besides the police-burghs of Dalkeith, Bonnyrigg, Lasswade, Loanhead, and Penicuik. Pop. (1801) 122,597; (1841) 225,454; (1911) 507,666. Midlothian's four battlefields are Roslin, Pinkie, Carberry Hill, and Rullion Green; its antiquities are the Catstane, the Roman remains of Inveresk and Cramond, Roslin Chapel, and the castles of Borthwick, Crichton, Craigmillar, &c. See works by Small (2 vols. 1883), and Miss Warrender (1890).

Edin's Hall, a ruined broch in Berwickshire, on Cockburnlaw, 4½ miles NNW. of Duns.

Edmonton, an urban district of Middlesex, 10½ miles NNE. of Liverpool Street Station, London. Lamb spent his last years here, and is buried in the churchyard; and here, too, is the 'Bell,' where John Gilpin did not dine. Pop. 65,000.

Edmonton, the capital of the Canadian province of Alberta, on the Saskatchewan River, has a university. The centre of a rich coal-mining and agricultural region, it is a rapidly growing city. Pop., including Strathcona (q.v.), 30,500.

Ednam, a Roxburgh parish, on the Eden, 2½ miles NNE. of Kelso. The poet James Thomson was a native.

Edom (Heb., 'red'), a name applied to the whole country extending from the Dead Sea southwards to the Gulf of Akabah. Its chief town, Sela, stood on the eastern slope of Mount Hor (4320 feet), the highest peak of Mount Seir, others being Maon (Maan), Bozrah (Buseirah), Punon, and the ports Elath and Ezion-geber.

Edward, LAKE. See ALBERT EDWARD.

Edwardesabad, a town and cantonment in the Kuram Valley, 50 miles up from the Indus, named from Sir Herbert Edwardes, who reduced the tribes here to order; pop. 10,000.

Edzell Castle, Forfarshire, 7 miles N. by W. of Brechin, a ruined seat of the Lindsays.

Eecloo, a town of Belgium, on the Liève, 12 miles NW. of Ghent by rail. It manufactures woollens, cottons, &c. Pop. 13,200.

Eel Pie Island, Middlesex, in the Thames, opposite Twickenham.

Egba, a SW. district in Nigeria, of which Abeokuta is capital.

Eger (Ay'ger; g hard), a Bohemian town, on the river Eger, 66 miles NW. of Pilsen by rail. It was formerly a border fortress of some importance, but its fortifications were razed in 1809; it is now a great railway centre. The ruins of the imperial burg consist of a square black tower, a chapel, and part of the great hall. The industries include weaving, brewing, shoemaking, &c. In the town-house Wallenstein was murdered (1634). Eger was taken by the Swedes in 1631 and 1647, and by the French in 1742. Pop. 27,000.—The river Eger rises 12 miles NW. of the town, in the Fichtelgebirge, at an altitude of 2362 feet and flows 190 miles ENE. to the Elbe opposite Leitmeritz. See also ERLAU.

Egerdir, a small town of Konieh vilayet, Asia Minor, gives name to a beautiful fresh-water lake, 30 miles long, between the Sultan Dagh and northern offshoots of the Taurus Mountains.

Egg. See EIGG.

Egga, an African trading town on the Niger, in Gando, since 1900 part of (British) northern Nigeria; pop. 15,500.

Egham, a Surrey urban district on the Thames, 1½ mile W. by S. of Staines; pop. 12,600.

Egilshay, an Orkney island, 11 miles N. of Kirkwall, has a ruined church with a round tower.

Eglinton Castle, the seat (1798) of the Earl of Eglinton, in Ayrshire, 2½ miles N. of Irvine. Here was held the Eglinton Tournament (1839).

Egremont (Eg're-mont), a Cumberland urban district on the Ehen, 6 miles SE. of Whitehaven, whither it sends by rail the iron ore mined in the neighbourhood. On an eminence to the west stands the ruined castle, the legend of whose horn was sung by Wordsworth. Pop. 6300.—(2) A NW. suburb of Birkenhead.

Egypt, a country in North-east Africa, extending from the Mediterranean to the first cataract of the Nile at Aswân, from 31° 36′ to 24° 6′ N. lat. The name is derived from the Greek Aigyptos, perhaps a transliteration of Hakeptah, 'the city of Ptah'—i.e. Memphis. In Hieroglyphics and Coptic, it was called Kemi (Black Land), from the colour of the soil; the Hebrew Mizraim is still preserved in the Arabic Misr. Egypt is literally, what Herodotus termed it, 'the gift of the Nile;' for it extends only so far as the annual inundation of the river spreads its layer of alluvial sediment, brought down from the washing of the Abyssinian mountains, and turning the barren rock into cultivable soil. Geologically and ethnologically, Egypt is confined to the bed of the flooded Nile, a groove worn by water in the desert; and the bordering deserts and the southern provinces of Nubia and the Soudan towards the equator form no part of the Egypt of nature or of history, though from time to time they have been politically joined to it. Thus limited, Egypt occupies little more than 11,000 sq. m., or about a third of the area of Ireland, and from Wady Halfa to the Mediterranean, with the desert, the area is nearly 400,000 sq. m.

The Nile, after breaking through the rocky barrier at Aswân, pursues a northerly course, varied by only one considerable bend near Thebes, until, a few miles north of Cairo, it divides into two main streams, terminating in the Rosetta and Damietta mouths, through which, after a course of 3300 miles, it pours during 'high Nile' some seven hundred thousand million cubic metres daily into the Mediterranean Sea. The other five mouths which existed in antiquity have silted up; the triangular or Δ-shaped district enclosed by them, formed the Delta, now called Lower Egypt. The basin of the Nile is bounded by the smooth rounded ranges of the Arabian hills (which are not in the Arabian peninsula, but in Egypt, between the Nile and the Red Sea) on the east, and the Libyan on the west; neither rising as a rule higher than 300 feet above the sea-level, though near Thebes the eastern hills attain an altitude of 1200 feet. One great physical peculiarity of Egypt is the general absence of rain; occasional showers have indeed become more frequent of late years, but the land still depends for irrigation upon the annual overflow of the Nile. The reservoir works at Aswân and Assiut (1902; see NILE) add greatly to the cultivable area. The climate is remarkably mild, especially south of the Delta and in the desert; from Cairo to Alexandria the air contains more moisture, while the Mediterranean coast is subject to rain, and infected by the belt of salt-marshes. From June till February cool northerly winds prevail; then till June comes a period of easterly, or, still worse, hot southerly sand-winds called the Khamâsin. The simoom is a rare but violent sand-wind. Earthquakes are occasionally felt. The temperature in winter in the shade averages 50° to 60° F., and in the heat of summer 90° to 100° in Lower Egypt, 10° higher in the upper valley. The most remarkable phenomenon is the regular increase of the Nile, fed by the fall of the tropical rains. In the middle of July the 'red water' appears in Egypt, and the rise may be dated from that time; it attains its maximum (an average rise of 36 feet at Thebes, of 25 at Cairo) at the end of September, and begins to decline visibly in the middle of October, loses half its height by January, and subsides to its minimum in April. By the end of November, the irrigated land, over which the water has been carefully equalised by drains and embankments, has dried and is sown; soon it is covered with green crops, which are reaped in March. Except in the dry air of the valley and desert, Egypt is by no means remarkably healthy.

The signal peculiarity of the vegetation of the Nile Valley is the absence of woods and forests. Even clumps of trees (except palms) are rare. The date and the doom palm, the sycamore, acacia, tamarisk, and willow are the commonest trees. Among fruit-trees, the vine, fig, pomegranate, orange, and lemon abound; apricots, peaches, and plums are of poor flavour; Indian figs (prickly pears) and bananas have been naturalised; and water-melons are at once the meat and drink of the people in the hot days. Of flowers, the lotus, or water-lily, has long been famous. The lack of jungle or cover of any sort accounts for the poverty of the Egyptian fauna. The hyæna, jackal, wolf, fox, hare, rabbit, jerboa, lynx, ichneumon, and weasel are common enough; the antelope is the chief quarry; but the wild ass and wild cat are almost extinct; and the crocodile, like the hippopotamus, scared by European rifles, is beating a retreat to the tropics. The ordinary beasts of burden are the ass and camel; and there are buffaloes and short-horned cattle; goats also are common. There are three or four varieties of vulture; eagles, falcons, hawks, and kites are common, as is also the ibis. Of reptiles, besides the vanishing crocodile, lesser saurians—chameleons and lizards—abound. Serpents are numerous, and among these the dreaded cobra and the cerastes. The Nile is full of fish, generally of rather poor flavour. The Sacred Beetle (Scarabœus sacer) is one of the most remarkable insects. The scorpion's sting is sometimes fatal. Egypt is essentially an agricultural country, and in some parts, by the aid of regulated artificial irrigation, the rich alluvial deposit will bear as much as three crops in the year. Wheat is the principal cereal; but barley, maize, durra, beans, lentils, clover, &c. are also largely grown, with very little trouble beyond the management of the water. The extensive culture of papyrus, which anciently supplied material for paper, has in modern times been superseded by that of the sugar-cane, cotton, indigo, and tobacco. Petroleum is obtained.

In ancient as in modern times Egypt was always divided into the Upper and the Lower, or the Southern and the Northern, country. For the divisions of the territory outside Egypt proper, annexed in 1876, abandoned in 1885, and known, since their recovery in 1896–98, as Anglo-Egyptian Soudan, see SOUDAN. The population of the country, placed at 7,000,000 under the Pharaohs, in 1844 was 2,500,000; in 1859, 5,125,000; and in 1907, 11,287,359 in Egypt proper. There are about 10,000 schools (seven-eighths elementary), with 17,000 teachers and 250,000 pupils; the government has under its immediate direction 200 schools, including schools for law, medicine, agriculture, and engineering. Of the inhabitants 91·84 per cent. are native Mohammedans; the Copts are 700,000; and the rest include Bedawis (Bedouins), Negroes, Abyssinians, Turks, Syrians, Armenians, Jews, Greeks, and other Europeans. The dominant population in antiquity appears almost certainly to have been of mixed origin, part Asiatic and part Nigritic; and there seems to have been an aboriginal race of copper colour, with rather thin legs, large feet, high cheekbones, and large lips. The chief towns of Egypt proper are Cairo (pop. 654,500); Alexandria (332,000); Tantah (54,500); Port Saïd, Mehalla el Kobra, and Mansura, over 40,000; Assiut, Damanhour, Fayum, and Zagazig, over 30,000. There are in Egypt about 150,000 foreigners, including 63,000 Greeks, 34,000 Italians, 20,000 Britons, and 14,000 Frenchmen. The Egyptian army is under the command of a British general, and officered partly by Britons and partly by Egyptians; its total strength is 18,000, while the British army of occupation, which, since the rebellion of 1882, has remained in Egypt, has a strength of over 6000. The finance of Egypt has improved enormously under British management, irrigation and cotton cultivation greatly helping; the revenues have been increased, the burdens on the people greatly lightened. The revenue in 1903 was £E11,000,000, the expenditure £E10,975,000; in 1910 the revenue was about £E16,000,000, the expenditure £E14,400,000. The chief sources of revenue are the land-tax, railways, the tobacco monopoly, and customs; the principal items of expenditure are the service of the debt and the internal administration. The total debt of Egypt amounted in 1911 to £E94,972,200, the interest on which was met by a total charge of £E4,596,154 in the year's budget, including the tribute to Turkey (£665,041). The total exports in 1889–1911 (chiefly cotton, cotton-seed, beans, sugar, and grain) increased from £E7,020,000 to £E28,600,000 (of which about one-half went to Britain); the imports (mainly cotton goods and other textiles, machinery, and coal) from £E11,950,000 to £E27,227,000 (about a third from Britain). Some cotton is now exported to the United States. The railway system embraces over 2300 miles, connecting Alexandria and Damietta with Cairo and the Suez Canal, and extending up the Nile Valley (towards the Cape) as far south as Shellal; the telegraphs reach 4000 miles, and there is a telephone between Cairo and Alexandria.

The epoch of Menes, the earliest known point in Egyptian history, is variously calculated at from 5004 B.C. to 3892. Egypt was in the height of its glory under the 19th dynasty, to which Rameses I. and II., and Meneptah (son of the latter, and probably the Pharaoh of Exodus) belonged. The Persians conquered Egypt in 527 B.C., Alexander the Great in 332 B.C., and the Romans after 31 B.C. The Arab and Moslem conquest took place in 641 A.D. Napoleon invaded the country in 1798; and a new epoch in recent Egyptian history began with the able reign of Mohammed Ali (Mehemet Ali) in 1805. Ismail Pasha, his grandson, obtained in 1867 the title of Khedive, and made extensive conquests in the Eastern Soudan, but was deposed by the Sultan in 1879, at the instance of the western powers, and succeeded by his son Tewfik. In 1881 came the revolt by Arabi Pasha, suppressed at Tel-el-Kébir by Britain, whose troops now occupied Egypt, France having withdrawn. The troubles with the Mahdi fall between 1881 and 1885, the year of Gordon's death. Egypt, still nominally a tributary province of the Ottoman empire, became under Ismail practically an autonomous state under an hereditary Khedive. Since the occupation in 1882 British influence is supreme, and the Khedive, who has a native ministry, is not allowed to contravene the advice of the British minister resident. Under Abbas II. (from 1892), who at first strove to escape from British control, the prosperity of the country has increased rapidly, and the Anglo-French agreement of 1904 removed the most serious embarrassment to the administration. The first Legislative Assembly was opened in January 1914.

Ehrenbreitstein (Ay-ren-brite'stine), a town of Prussia on the Rhine's right bank, is connected with Coblenz by a bridge of boats and a railway-viaduct. Pop. 6000. The fortress (1672), on a precipitous rock, vainly besieged by the French in 1688, was captured in 1799, and blown up in 1801. Assigned to Prussia in 1815, in 1816–26 it was thoroughly fortified.

Ehrenfeld, a busy town of Prussia, since 1888 incorporated with Cologne, manufactures glass-wares, railway fittings, chemicals, bricks, &c. Pop. about 30,000.

Eibenstock, a town of Saxony, 41 miles SSW. of Chemnitz by rail. It has since 1775 become a centre of lace-making industry. Pop. 8000.

Eichstätt (Īhh-stätt), a town of Bavaria, in a deep valley on the left bank of the Altmühl, 67 miles NNW. of Munich. Here are the palace of the Dukes of Leuchtenberg, the cathedral (1259), the town-house (1444), and, on a neighbouring eminence, the ruined Wilibaldsburg. Pop. 8000.

Eider (Ī'der), a river of N. Germany, forming the boundary line between Sleswick on the north and Holstein on the south, rises south-west of Kiel, and winds 117 miles westward to the North Sea at Tönning. It is navigable to Rendsburg, but the Eider Canal to the Baltic has been superseded by the Kaiser-Wilhelm Canal.

Eifel, THE (Ī'fel), a bleak plateau of Rhenish Prussia, between the Rhine, Moselle, and the frontier, 1500 to 2494 feet in altitude, is for the most part broadly undulating, and diversified by crater-like depressions and volcanic peaks and ridges, whilst towards its edges it is seamed by deep, wooded, rocky ravines.

Eigg, or EGG, a Hebridean island, 7½ miles W. of the mainland of Inverness-shire, and 5 SW. of Skye. With an utmost length and breadth of 6½ and 4 miles, it is 12 sq. m. in area, and culminates in the remarkable Scuir of Eigg (1346 feet), near which are columnar cliffs like those of Staffa. Population, about 200. Here in 617 St Donnan and fifty more monks from Iona were killed; and here, towards the close of the 16th century, 200 Macdonalds were smoked to death in a cave by Macleod.

Eil, LOCH, a sea-loch of Argyll and Inverness shires. It consists of Upper Loch Eil (6⅜ miles × ¾ mile), striking eastward, and Lower Loch Eil (9⅝ miles × 2 miles), striking south-westward. The latter is rather part of Loch Linnhe.

Eildons, a triple-crested height in Roxburghshire, S. of Melrose, whose middle and highest peak (1385 feet) commands a glorious view.

Eilenburg (Ī'len-boorg), a manufacturing town of Prussian Saxony, on an island in the river Mulde, 15 miles by rail NE. of Leipzig. Pop. 16,000.

Eimeo (Fr. Moorea), one of the French Society Islands, in the Pacific Ocean, 10 miles WNW. of Tahiti. Area, 51 sq. m.; pop. 1500. It consists of deep fertile valleys and abrupt wooded hills. Here Christianity was introduced in Polynesia; and here the South Sea College of the London Missionary Society was established.

Einbeck, or EIMBECK, a decayed town of Hanover, on the Ilme, 23 miles N. of Göttingen by rail. It was noted in the 15th century for its beer (Eimbecker Beer, whence 'Bock'). Pop. 9000.

Einsiedeln (Īne-zee'deln), a town in the Swiss canton of Schwyz, 27 miles SE. of Zurich by rail. It makes great numbers of prayer-books, images, rosaries, &c., but is chiefly celebrated for its Benedictine abbey (10th c.; rebuilt 1719), to which some 200,000 pilgrims resort annually to the shrine of a black image of the Virgin, the 14th September being the principal day in the year. Near the town the French defeated the Austrians, 14th August 1799. Pop. 10,000.

Eisenach (Ī'zen-ahh), a town of Saxe-Weimar, is beautifully situated at the north-western verge of the Thuringian Forest, 69 miles by rail SE. of Cassel, and 49 W. of Weimar. It has a ducal palace (1742), now used as a court-house; a spacious market-place, and manufactures of art pottery, leather, &c. Bach, of whom a statue was erected in 1884, was a native; and Fritz Reuter died here in 1874. Population, above 38,000. On an eminence rising 600 feet above the town, engirt by forests, stands the Wartburg, founded in 1067, and till 1440 the castle of the Landgrave of Thuringia. It is famous as the spot where the Minnesingers assembled to hold a poetic contest ('the war of the Wartburg') about 1207; as the home of St Elizabeth (1511–27); and as the ten months' asylum to which Luther was carried by the Elector of Saxony (May 1521). The chapel in which Luther preached, and the chamber in which he discomfited the Evil One by throwing the inkstand at his head, are pointed out. The pile was magnificently restored in 1847–70.

Eisenberg, a town of Saxe-Altenburg, between the Saale and Elster, 36 miles SE. of Leipzig. Pop. 11,000.

Eisenerz, a mining town of Austria, in the north of Styria, 20 miles NW. of Bruck. It stands in a narrow mountain-valley at the north foot of the Erzberg (5011 feet), a mountain so rich in iron ore that the miners quarry the rock from the outside. Pop. 7000.

Eisenstadt, a town of Hungary, 26 miles SE. of Vienna. The Esterhazy palace (1683–1805) here contains a valuable library. Pop. 3000.

Eisleben (Īze-lay'ben), Luther's birthplace, a mining-town of Prussian Saxony, 24 miles WNW. of Halle. Population, above 24,000. The house in which Luther was born was partially burnt in 1689, but was restored, as also have been the house in which he died, the church (Peter-Paulskirche) where he was christened, and another (Andreaskirche) in which he preached. In 1883, his quatercentenary, a bronze statue was unveiled of the Reformer, and a new gymnasium inaugurated, successor to the one which he founded two days before his death.

Ekaterinburg, a fortified town of Russia, on the east slope of the Urals, and on the Isset, 312 miles SE. of Perm by rail. It has two cathedrals, and a mint for copper coinage, and is in the centre of the Ural mining districts. Its manufactures include iron, copper, machinery, soap, candles, and linen. Pop. 40,000.

Ekaterinodar, a Russian town, capital of the province of Kuban, on the Kuban River, 100 miles from its mouth. It has a cathedral and a military hospital. Pop. 100,000.

Ekaterinoslav, a government in South Russia, reaching in the south-east to the Sea of Azov. Area, 26,050 sq. m.; pop. 2,153,543.—The capital, Ekaterinoslav (‘Catharine's fame’), on the Dnieper, 323 N. by E. of Sebastopol by rail, has a cathedral and large tobacco-factories. It was founded in 1784 by Prince Potemkin for the summer residence of the Empress Catharine II. It was the birthplace of Madame Blavatsky. Pop. 200,000.

Ekhmîm, or IKHMÎM (anc. Apu or Khemmis, Greek Panopolis), a town of Upper Egypt (pop. 15,000), on the east bank of the Nile, 15 miles S. of Girgeh.

Ekowe, the capital of Zululand (q.v.).

Ekron, the northernmost of the five great cities of the Philistines, on the borders of Judah and Dan.

El Araish, or LARAISH, a seaport of Spanish Morocco, 45 miles SSW. of Tangier; pop. 5000.

El Arish, an Egyptian town (pop. 17,000, on the Mediterranean, at the mouth of the Wady-el-Arish, held to mark the boundary between Egypt and Syria, Africa and Asia.

Elba (Gr. Aithalia, Lat. Ilva), an Italian island in the Mediterranean, 6 miles off the coast of Tuscany. Area, 85 sq. m.; pop. 30,000. The coast is precipitous, the interior traversed by three ranges which reach 3380 feet. The chief industry is iron-mining; serpentine, chalk, granite, and marble also are quarried, while salt is produced from salt-pans. Much wine is made, and the tunny-fisheries are important. Porto Ferrajo, the capital, has a pop. of 7000. Elba was the place of Napoleon's exile, 1814-15.

El Bassan, a town of central Albania, 75 miles SSE. of Scutari; pop. 15,000.

Elbe (the Roman Albis and the Bohemian Labe), an important river of northern Europe. It is formed by numerous streams which rise on the southern side of the Riesengebirge, a range on the borders of Bohemia, and unite at an elevation of 2230 feet above sea-level. Thence it winds 725 miles north-westward through Bohemia, Saxony, Anhalt, and Hanover, passing Pirna, Dresden, Meissen, Torgau, Wittenberg, Magdeburg, Harburg, and Hamburg, until it empties itself into the North Sea at Cuxhaven, where it attains a breadth of upwards of 10 miles. Here the tide rises about 10 feet; it is felt 100 miles up the river. The Elbe is navigable for 525 miles, as far as Melnik, but for sea-vessels only up to Hamburg (84 miles); and it drains an area of 55,000 sq. m., of which two-thirds is German territory. Of its fifty and more tributaries, the most important are the Moldau, Eger, Mulde, Saale, and Havel (with the Spree); and in connection with these is a fine system of canals. The Elbe is divided into several branches between Hamburg on the north, and Harburg on the south, by the numerous islands that there interrupt its course; and between Hamburg and the sea the sandbanks and shoals leave only a very narrow channel, 4 to 5 fathoms deep. The scenery of the Elbe, although generally pleasing, is not remarkable, except in the Saxon Switzerland, above Dresden, where the river's course is between fantastic sandstone cliffs.

Elberfeld, one of the manufacturing capitals of Germany, on the Wupper, contiguous with Barmen, 16 miles ENE. of Düsseldorf. It is famous for its dyeing, bleaching, and calico-printing establishments, also for its extensive manufactures of cotton, silks, tapes, ribbons, thread, lace, buttons, fancy woollen goods, &c. Its Turkey-red dyeworks are especially noted. There are also manufactures of machinery, iron and steel wares, pianofortes, paper, and carpets, besides large breweries. For miles around an immense number of weavers are labouring for the Elberfeld factories. There is a hanging railway over the river. Pop. 170,000.

Elbeuf (nearly El-buf'), a town in the French dep. of Seine-Inférieure, on the left bank of the Seine, 14 miles S. by W. of Rouen by rail. The manufactures of cloth, flannel fabrics, billiard cloth, and light woollens of every colour and description, employ some 25,000 men here and in the neighbouring towns (Caudebec, &c.), and the annual output of the district is valued at from 85,000,000 to 95,000,000 francs. Population, 15,000.

Elbing, a town of West Prussia, 48 miles by rail ESE. of Danzig, on the navigable Elbing, which enters the Frisches Haff 5 miles to the north. Founded in the 13th century by colonists from Lübeck and Bremen, it has a 14th-century church, and a public library with some 30,000 volumes. A canal connects it with the Dreventz, a tributary of the Vistula, and in 1877–84 a mole was constructed in the harbour, 3500 yards long and 5½ wide. Steamships and torpedo-boats are built here; and there are large iron and brass rolling-mills, and tinware, machine, and cigar factories, &c. The linen industry and the export of lampreys are also of importance. Population, 60,000.

Elburz (El-boorz'), a mountain-range of Persia, running for 450 miles along the southern border of the Caspian Sea, and culminating in Mount Demavend (q.v.).—ELBURZ is also the name of the loftiest summit of the Caucasus (q.v.).

Elché (El'tchay), a Spanish town, 13 miles SW. of Alicante by rail, fringed by an encircling grove of nearly 100,000 palms, which gives the place an appearance half Moorish. It has a fine collegiate church, with a lofty tiled dome. Pop. 30,000.

Elchingen (Elhh'ing-en), a Bavarian village, near the Danube, 5 miles NE. of Ulm. Here, on 14th October 1805, Ney defeated the Austrians.

Elcho Castle, a ruin, Perthshire, on the Tay, 5¼ miles ESE. of Perth.

Elderslie, a Renfrewshire village, 2¼ miles W. by S. of Paisley. It is the traditional birthplace of Wallace.

Eldon, a Durham township, 3½ miles SE. of Bishop Auckland.

Elephanta (native Ghárápuri), an island over 4 miles in circuit, in the harbour of Bombay, 6 miles E. of the city, and 4 from the mainland. It owed its European name to a large figure of an elephant near its former landing-place, which, after 1814, gradually sank into a shapeless mass. Of its far-famed Brahmanic rock-caves (9th c.), four are complete, or nearly so; the most important is the Great Temple, still used by the Hindus on Sivaite festivals. It is hewn out of a hard trap-rock, and measures 130 feet either way. The most striking of its many sculptures is a three-headed bust of Siva, nearly 18 feet high and 23 feet round the eyes.

Elephantiné (Arab. Gezîrat Aswân or Gezîrat-ez-Zahr, 'isle of flowers'), a small island of the Nile, with remains of an ancient city, lying opposite to Assouan (q.v.), on the confines of Egypt and Nubia, in 24° 5′ N. lat., and 32° 34′ E. long. Its ruins were much demolished in 1822.

Eletz. See JELETZ.

Eleusis, an ancient town of Attica, on the Bay of Eleusis, opposite Salamis. It was the seat of the worship of Ceres, whose mystic rites were performed here with great pomp. Its site is now occupied by the little village of Lefsina, 16½ miles WNW. of Athens by rail.

Eleu'thera, one of the Bahamas (q.v.), has an area of 238 sq. m., and a pop. of 6500.

Elgin (El'gin; g hard), county town of Elginshire, 5 m. by rail SSW. of its port, Lossiemouth, 37 ENE. of Inverness, 178 N. of Edinburgh. It lies on the Lossie, in the 'garden of Scotland;' and while it retains a few quaint old houses, two crosses, and its cathedral, bishop's palace, and other ruins, it has brightened up much. The Elgin Institution was erected in 1832 as an almshouse and school, out of £70,000 bequeathed by General Anderson. Other edifices are Gray's Hospital (1819) and the adjoining asylum (1834–65), the county buildings (1866), the court-house (1841), the market buildings (1850), the academy (1800), and the parish church (1828), with a tower 112 feet high. The once glorious Gothic cathedral (1224–1538) was 289 feet long by 120 across the transept, with two western towers, and a loftier central spire (198 feet). It was partially burned in 1270, and again in 1390 by the 'Wolf of Badenoch;' was dismantled in 1568; and in 1711 was finally reduced to ruins by the fall of the great tower. The chapter-house, with its 'prentice pillar,' is noteworthy. Little remains of the royal castle, which in 1296 lodged Edward I. of England; its ruins are surmounted by a monument (1839–55) to the last Duke of Gordon. A royal burgh since the reign of David I. (1124–53), Elgin unites with Banff, Macduff, Peterhead, Inverurie, Cullen, and Kintore to return one member. Pop. 8700.

Elgin, a city of Illinois, on the Fox River, 36 miles WNW. of Chicago, with large watch-works and manufactures of carriages and agricultural machinery. Pop. 26,000.

Elginshire, or MORAY, a Scottish county extending 33 miles along the low shore of the Moray Firth. It is 34 miles long, and 488 sq. m. in area, a former detached portion having in 1870 been annexed to Inverness-shire, whilst a corresponding portion was transferred from that county to Elginshire. The surface has a general southward ascent, and attains a maximum altitude of 2328 feet. Rivers are the Spey, Lossie, and Findhorn; and of several small lakes much the largest is Lochindorb (2 miles by 5 furlongs). West of the Findhorn's mouth are the sand-dunes of Culbin, due to drifting chiefly in 1694, and some of them rising 118 feet. Agriculture is highly advanced over all the flat fertile lower tract. Elgin and Nairn shires return one member to parliament. Pop. (1801) 27,760; (1841) 35,012; (1911) 43,427. The ancient province of Moray included Nairn, with parts of Banff and Inverness. Antiquities are the Roman remains at Burghead, Kinloss Abbey (1150), Pluscarden Priory (1230), a Romanesque church at Birnie, and the castles of Duffus, Lochindorb, and Spynie. See the history by Rampini (1897).

Elgon, a volcanic mountain mass, 40 miles square, in British East Africa, 50 miles NNE. of the Victoria Nyanza, first visited by Joseph Thomson in 1883; highest point of the crater's rim, 14,100 feet above the sea. The southern slopes show a series of vast caves, partly artificial.

Elie, a watering-place of Fife, 23 miles NE. of Edinburgh. Pop. with Earlsferry (q.v.) 1000.

Eliock House, the birthplace of the 'Admirable' Crichton, in Dumfriesshire, 3 miles SE. of Sanquhar.

Elizabetgrad, a fortified town of South Russia, in the government of Kherson, 283 miles by rail NE. of Odessa. Soap-boiling, tallow-refining, and candle-making are carried on. Elizabetgrad was founded in 1754, and named after the Empress Elizabeth. Pop. 75,500.

Elizabeth, capital of Union county, New Jersey, and formerly capital of the state, lies 5 miles SSW. of Newark by rail, with one quarter (Elizabethport) on Staten Island Sound. It is the seat of a large Singer sewing-machine factory, and of manufactories of oilcloth, pottery, ironwares, hats, combs, &c. Elizabethport has steamboat communication with New York City, 12 miles NW., and ships much anthracite coal. A great drawbridge over Staten Island Sound, 800 feet long, with a draw-span 500 feet long, connects New Jersey here with the Staten Island shore. Pop. 73,400.

Elizabetpol, a town of Russian Transcaucasia, on a tributary of the Kur. Pop. 50,000.

Elkhart, a town of Indiana, at the junction of the St Joseph and Elkhart rivers, 101 miles E. by S. of Chicago by rail, with manufactures of paper, machinery, flour, starch, &c. Pop. 19,300.

Elleray, the Westmorland seat of Prof. Wilson ('Christopher North'), close to Windermere village.

Ellesmere, a Shropshire town, near a beautiful lake or mere of 120 acres, 19 miles NNW. of Shrewsbury. Population, 2000. The Ellesmere Canal, connecting the Severn and the Mersey, passes here. It is carried across the Dee and the Vale of Llangollen by Telford's Ellesmere Aqueduct (1805), 1007 feet long and 127 high. Ellesmere Port, at the mouth of a branch, on the Mersey, is on the Manchester Ship Canal.

Ellesmere Land, part of the Arctic territory west of Smith Sound.

Ellice Islands, in the South Pacific, due N. of Fiji, and SW. of Samoa, extend for 360 miles from NW. to SE. between 5½° and 11° S. lat., and 176° and 180° E. long. They consist of nine groups of atolls or coral islands, one of which groups, known specially as Ellice Islands (the main island in it being Funafuti), was discovered in 1819 by the American Captain Peyster. Another had previously been discovered in 1781. The islands grow little but cocoa-nut trees, copra being the main export. They became British in 1892. Pop. 2500 Polynesians, mostly Christianised.

Ellichpur, a town in the north of Berar, at one time capital of the Deccan, and said to have contained 40,000 houses. Its buildings include a ruinous palace, a fort, and several handsome tombs of the nawábs. The military cantonment of Paratwada is 2 miles distant. Pop. 36,240.

Ellisland, Burns's farm in Dumfriesshire, on the Nith's right bank, 6 miles NNW. of Dumfries.

Ellon, an Aberdeenshire village, on the Ythan, 20 miles N. by E. of Aberdeen. Pop. 1300.

Ellora, a village in the Nizam's dominions, 13 miles NW. of Aurungabad. Of its wonderful rock-cut temples, which date from the 7th century, there are 34 of a large size, Buddhist, Brahmanical, and Jain. Some are cave-temples proper; but others are vast buildings hewn out of the solid granite of the hills, having an exterior as well as an interior architecture.

Ellore (Elûr), a town in the Kistna district, Madras, on the Jammaler River, 255 miles N. of Madras, with manufactures of woollen carpets and saltpetre. Pop. 39,382.

Elsass-Lothringen. See Alsace-Lorraine.

Elsinore (Dan. Helsingör), a seaport of Denmark, on the island of Zealand, and on the western shore of the Sound, at its narrowest part, 2½ miles nearly due west of Helsingborg in Sweden, and 37 by rail N. of Copenhagen. The harbour (enlarged in 1883–84) has 18 to 20 feet of water, and the roadstead outside affords excellent anchorage. Pop. 14,000. Saxo Grammaticus was born here, and here too Shakespeare lays the scene of Hamlet. A little east of the town is the castle of Kronborg, built by Frederick II. in 1580, while to the north-west stands the royal castle of Marienlyst.

Elster, the name of two rivers of Germany. The White Elster rises at the foot of the Elster Mountains, on the NW. boundary of Bohemia, and flows 122 miles N. to the Saale, above Halle, in Prussian Saxony. The Black Elster rises in Saxony, south of Elstra, and flows 112 miles NW. to the Elbe, 9 miles SE. of Wittenberg.

Elstow, Bunyan's birthplace, 1½ mile S. of Bedford.

Elstree, a village on the south border of Herts, 7 miles S. of St Albans, with a noted school. Pop. of parish, 2000. In a gig on the road near Elstree, Thurtell in 1823 shot Weare; and the 'Gills Hill murder' and trial largely occupied contemporary literature.

Elswick, a western part of Newcastle, forming three wards of the county borough. Here are the works of Sir W. G. (Lord) Armstrong. The engineering section dates from 1847, the ordnance-works from 1857. Elswick Park, including Elswick Hall, was opened as a recreation ground in 1878.

Eltham, seat formerly of a royal palace in Kent, now part of the metropolitan borough of Woolwich (q.v.).

Elton, a shallow, oval-shaped salt lake of Russia, 62 sq. m. in area, is situated in the government of Astrakhan, in lat. 48° 56′ N., and long. 46° 40′ E. The annual yield of salt ranges between 88,000 and 96,000 tons.

Elvas, the strongest fortified city of Portugal, near the Spanish frontier, 10 miles W. of Badajoz by rail. Pop. 10,000.

Ely (Ea'lie), a city of Cambridgeshire, crowns a low eminence on the left bank of the Ouse, amid the fen-land, 16 miles NNE. of Cambridge, and 30 SE. of Peterborough. Here, in 673, St Etheldreda founded a mixed monastery, which, burned in 870 by the Danes, was refounded in 970 as a Benedictine abbey. That abbey a century later became Hereward's 'camp of refuge,' until, in 1071, Abbot Thurstan had to surrender to the Conqueror. In 1083 the first Norman abbot laid the foundation of the present church, which was made a cathedral in 1109, and which, as we see it to-day, is one of the most glorious shrines in Christendom. A cruciform structure, 537 feet long by 179 feet across the great transepts, it offers examples of all styles of Gothic, from early Norman to late Perpendicular, and is a growth of more than four centuries. There is the western tower, 225 feet high (1174–1382); the late Norman nave (1150–89), 208 by 78 feet, with modern painted ceiling; the richly sculptured choir (1234–1533); and at the crossing, the exquisite Decorated 'octagon' and lantern (1322–42), built by Alan de Walsingham on the fall of the great central tower. This, 'the only Gothic dome in existence,' rises to a height of 170 feet. The 13th-century Guesten Hall is now the deanery, and the 'Ely Porta,' or great gateway (1380), houses a grammar-school founded by Henry VIII. in 1541. The Bishop's Palace is a fine brick Tudor building. Cromwell lived here 1636–40. There is a weekly market; and oil, earthenware, and clay-pipes are manufactured. The population is about 7900. The 'Isle' of Ely contains also March and Wisbech. Till 1837 a county palatine, it is an administrative county. Pop. 70,000.

Emba, a river in the Kirghiz territory, Asiatic Russia, flowing 450 miles SW. to the Caspian.

Embrun (On^{g}brun$^{g'}$; anc. Ebrodunum), a fortified town in the French dep. of Hautes Alpes, on the Durance, and at the base of Mont St Guillaume (8344 feet), 23 miles E. of Gap by rail. The cathedral of its former see (374–1802) has a lofty Romanesque tower. Pop. 3800.

Emden, a port and naval station in the Prussian province of Hanover, a little below the embouchure of the Ems into Dollart Bay, 77 miles WNW. of Bremen by rail. Walled and moated, it is well built, with several lofty antique houses in the Dutch style, and is intersected by numerous canals. A canal runs south from the town to Dollart Bay, a distance of two miles, and forms outer and inner harbours, the former accessible to sea-going vessels. The finest building is the town-hall (1574–76). Emden has a large shipping trade and several manufactures; the principal industry, however, is its deep-sea fishing. Pop. 24,000. Emden belonged originally to East Friesland, and after various vicissitudes was created a free imperial town under Dutch protection in 1595, but in 1744 passed to Prussia. After belonging successively to Holland, France, and Hanover, it again became Prussian in 1866.

Emilia, a compartimento of Central Italy, comprising the provinces of Bologna, Ferrara, Forli, Modena, Parma, Piacenza, Ravenna, and Reggio Emilia. Through them passed the ancient Via Æmilia, and hence the name.

Emmerich (Em'mer-ihh), an old town of Rhenish Prussia, on the Rhine, 94 miles by rail E. of Rotterdam. It manufactures iron, glass, tobacco, &c. The seat of a famous Jesuit seminary from 1592 to 1811, its pop. dwindled from 40,000 in the 15th century to 8000; it is now 12,000.

Em'poli, a town of Italy, on the Arno, 22 miles WSW. of Florence; pop. 10,000.

Emporia, capital of Lyon county, Kansas, on the Neosho, a tributary of the Cottonwood River, 61 miles SSW. of Topeka by rail; pop. 10,000.

Ems, a river of north-west Germany, rises in Westphalia, on the south-west slope of the Teutoburger Wald, and flows 205 miles NW. and N. to Dollart Bay, an estuary of the German Ocean. It is navigable as far as Greven (139 miles), and canals connect it with the Lippe and Jade.

Ems, or BAD EMS, a German bathing-place known to the Romans, on the river Lahn, 10 miles ESE. of Coblenz by rail. Pop. 6600, a number more than doubled by patients. Its warm mineral springs (80–135°) contain soda and carbonic acid gas. Here, in 1870, Benedetti got his final answer from King William.

Emsworth, a small seaport of Hampshire, 2 miles ESE. of Havant.

Enara, an isleted lake in the extreme north of Finland, 550 sq. m. in area.

Enarea, formerly a kingdom, now part of Abyssinia, with an area of over 1100 sq. m., and 40,000 inhabitants. It is a land of forest-clad hills, over 8000 feet high, their slopes covered with the wild coffee-plant. Its people, a stem of the Gallas, are mostly Mohammedans. The chief town is Saka, near the river Gibbe.

Enderby Land lies in 65° 57′ S. lat., 47° 20′ E. long., discovered by the whaler John Biscoe in 1831, and named after his employer, Samuel Enderby, an adventurous London merchant, the grandfather of Chinese Gordon.

Endor, a village of Palestine, 4 miles S. of Tabor, now a poor mud hamlet.

Endrick, a Stirlingshire stream, winding 20 miles westward to the foot of Loch Lomond.

Enfield, a town of Middlesex, 13 miles N. of London. The government small-arms factory here is capable of turning out 5000 rifles a week; the ordinary output is, however, about 1800. Pop. 56,300.

Engadine (Eng'ga-deen), a famous valley in the Swiss canton of the Grisons, and one of the loftiest inhabited regions in Europe, extends 65 miles NNE. along the Inn and its lakes, from the foot of Mount Maloja to the village of Martinsbruck. It is divided into two portions—the Upper Engadine towards the south-west, and the Lower Engadine to the north-east, the latter the wilder and bleaker of the two. The Inn has many villages upon its banks, the highest of which, St Moritz, is 6090 feet above sea-level, while the lowest, Martinsbruck, is 3343 feet. Most of these villages have of late years become health and pleasure resorts. Pop. 12,000, almost all of the Reformed Church. The language most generally spoken is the Ladin (a corruption of Latin), a Romance tongue, resembling Italian.

Enghien (On^{g}-ghe-an$^{g'}$), a watering-place and summer-resort, 7 miles N. of Paris, on a small lake. It has five sulphur-springs, good for the skin and throat. Pop. 3000.—(2) In the Belgian province of Hainault, a busy manufacturing place (beer, salt, lace, linen, and cloth). Pop. 4000.

England is the southern, the larger, and by far the more populous portion of Great Britain, the largest and most important of European islands. Separated from Belgium, Holland, Germany, and Denmark by the North Sea, from France by another 'streak of silver sea,' the Channel, and from Ireland by St George's Channel and the Irish Sea, the kingdom of England and Wales has only one short land frontier, that towards Scotland. In shape it forms an irregular triangle, of which the eastern side measures in a straight line 350 miles, the southern 325 miles, the western 425; but its shores are so deeply indented by bays and estuaries as to make the coast-line longer in proportion to the size of the land than in any other country but Scotland and Greece. The area of the British Islands (120,832 sq. m.) is less than $\frac{1}{400}$th of the land-surface of the world. The colonies and dependencies of the empire of which England is the centre now cover about a fifth of the land-area of the globe. England without Wales (50,873 sq. m.) is about the size of Roumania, less than a fourth of France or of Germany, and but little larger than the single state of New York (49,170 sq. m.); and England with Wales (58,339) is not equal in area to the state of Georgia (59,475), nor a fourth of the size of Texas. Twenty-nine of the states or territories in the Union are each larger than England, several much larger than the whole United Kingdom. Her name England owes to the Engle or Angles, who with the kindred Jutes (Geátas) and Saxons (Seaxe) descended on Albion or Britain, inhabited by Celts and Celticised Iberians, and conquered and occupied the greater part of it in the 5th–8th centuries. These kindred peoples all learned to call themselves Englisc or English, and by Englaland they understood the whole area now occupied by them—an area which in the 7th century extended from the Forth to the English Channel. South-eastern Scotland, as occupied by Angles, and not by Saxons or Jutes, was in the stricter sense English; and the people of the non-Celtic parts of Scotland, though now markedly differing from the southern English, are in blood and in mental and physical type at least as English in the wider sense as the people of Oxford or Kent. Political circumstances led the English and Anglicised Celts of North Britain beyond Solway and Tweed to become the subjects of the alien Scottish king, but their language they still called Inglis, as distinguished from the Gaelic of their Highland fellow-countrymen.

The people of the southern kingdom constitute nearly four-fifths of the inhabitants of the three kingdoms; the English language in some form is that of all but a small minority in any of the three; the English literature is the common inheritance of the whole; the constitution and polity of England, slightly modified, is the British constitution under which the three kingdoms have unitedly become glorious. Hence it is not strange that not merely by Englishmen, but by all foreigners, the name of England is used for what, after the union of the crowns of Scotland and England in 1603, became officially Great Britain, and even for the whole empire, which, since the Irish Union of 1801, is strictly the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. For the physical features, geology, climate, and statistics of England, see GREAT BRITAIN.

The area of England without Wales is 50,873 sq. m.; that of Wales, 7366; together, 58,339. So that, as the area of the United Kingdom, with Scotland, Ireland, Man and the Channel Islands, is 120,382, England alone covers 42 per cent. of the whole, Wales 6, and England and Wales 48 per cent. The pop. of England and Wales in 1650 is estimated to have been 5,450,000. In 1750 it was probably 6,400,000. From that date the increase was rapid; and the census of 1801 showed a pop. of 8,892,536. In 1841 the pop. of England alone was 15,002,443; in 1851 it was 16,921,888; in 1861, 18,954,444; in 1871, 21,495,331; in 1881, 24,613,926. At the census of 1891, England had 27,483,490, and Wales 1,519,035 or together 29,002,525. In 1911 the population of England was 34,045,290, and of Wales 2,025,202; together 36,070,492, making 79·8 per cent. or four-fifths of the total population of the United Kingdom. The density of the pop. in England is greater than in any other European country (disregarding Monaco) save the kingdom of Saxony (829 per sq. m.). In 1911 it was for England alone 670 per sq. m.; for England and Wales, 620; for Scotland, only 156. In England and Wales there were, in 1911, 44 towns with more than 100,000 inhabitants, in Scotland only 4, in Ireland 2. In England there were 98 above 50,000, in Scotland 9, in Ireland 3. For the Welsh counties, see WALES. Under the Local Government Act of 1888, the county of London was created for administrative purposes out of Middlesex and adjoining counties. In 1911 the areas and populations of administrative counties, with associated county boroughs, were as follows:

The situation of Britain in the centre of the land-masses of the globe is a great advantage, which England, nearer the European shores, enjoys in higher measure than its sister-kingdoms. Its seas are less stormy, and it has a greatly more developed system of navigable rivers. The north-west is hilly, the east and south mainly a plain crossed by lines of low hills. The fertility of England is much greater than that of Scotland or Ireland, especially that of the wheat-bearing area of eastern England. The agriculturally productive area of England is estimated at 80 per cent. of its total, and of Wales 60 per cent., whereas that of Scotland is only 28·8 per cent., and of Ireland 74. England, whose surface has been said for variety to be an epitome of Europe, is very rich in minerals, of which coal and iron are incomparably the most important, making nine-tenths in value of the whole. The output of coal and iron in England is vastly greater than in Scotland, and Ireland is exceptionally poor in both.

England (peopled by a mixed race descended from pre-Aryan 'Euskarians,' Celts, 'Anglo-Saxons,' Danes, Normans, and other elements) became the special home and headquarters of agricultural enterprise, mineral production, machine-making of all kinds and steam-power, of commerce, navigation, and shipping. But the great and rapid advance which made the commerce and manufactures of England the wonder of the world dates only from the later half of the 18th century, and is largely owing to the unparalleled development of machinery, the use of steam as a motive power, improved communication, and later, steam-navigation, railways, and electricity. It is very observable that the local distribution of the great industries of England has changed very greatly since the 17th century. At the Revolution period, most of the greater towns of England were in the south and east; but these have now been long outstripped by northern rivals, and what were then important manufacturing towns have in many cases sunk into mere villages. Now English manufacturing industries have most of their special seats in the north and midlands. The greater wealth of England as compared with Scotland and Ireland may be shown by a few figures. The census of production (1907) shows a gross output (sales and work done, exclusive of agriculture) for England and Wales of £1,483,000,000, for Scotland £208,000,000, for Ireland £66,000,000. Of exports and imports 91·3 per cent. falls to England and Wales, 7·3 per cent. to Scotland, and 1·4 per cent. to Ireland. Of the coal raised in the United Kingdom in 1910 (264,433,028 tons) Scotland produced 41,335,132 tons. Though this indicates with approximate accuracy the movement of shipping, it is true that a share of the vessels in English ports belongs to Scottish owners, and Scotland builds in some years almost as large a tonnage as England does. The annual value of property and profits assessed to income-tax in 1910–11 in the United Kingdom was £1,045,833,775; the share of England being £909,959,166; of Scotland, £95,215,223; and of Ireland, £40,659,386.

On England, besides the histories, see for physical geography works by A. Geikie, Seeley, Hull, Ramsay, Green, Avebury, Mackinder, &c.; also works named at Great Britain and in Anderson's Book of British Topography (1881); Escott, England (1879; 2d ed. 1886); Grant White, England Without and Within (1881); Thorold Rogers, Agriculture and Prices in England (1866–1902); T. England, New. See New England.

English Channel. See Channel (English).

English Harbour, a port of Antigua (q.v.).

English River, (1) an estuary on the west side of Delagoa Bay; (2) another name for the Churchill River (q.v.).

Enkhuizen (Enk-hoi'zen), a town of North Holland, one of the 'dead cities of the Zuider Zee,' 35 miles NNE. of Amsterdam. It was the first town to throw off the Spanish yoke (1572), and was Paul Potter's birthplace (1625). Pop. 8000.

Enna. See Castrogiovanni.

Ennerdale Water, a Cumberland lake (2½ miles × ½ mile), 7½ miles ESE. of Whitehaven.

Ennis, a municipal borough of County Clare, on the Fergus, 151 miles WSW. of Dublin by rail. Here are the Catholic cathedral of Killaloe diocese, a fine court-house, the Clare lunatic asylum, large flour-mills, a school founded by Erasmus Smith (1689), a column to O'Connell (1863), and a memorial to the 'Manchester martyrs.' Till 1885 Ennis returned one member. Pop. 5500.

Enniscorthy, a Wexford market-town, on the navigable Slaney, 78 miles S. of Dublin by rail. It has a Norman castle, a church by Pugin, with a good spire, and a large corn-trade. Population, about 5500. Cromwell took Enniscorthy in 1649; and the rebels from Vinegar Hill stormed and burned it in 1798.

Enniskillen, a municipal (till 1885, also parliamentary) borough, the capital of County Fermanagh, 87 miles WSW. of Belfast, is beautifully situated on an isle in the river between Upper and Lower Loughs Erne. It has barracks, a lofty monument to Sir Lowry Cole, the Royal Portora School, and a manufacture of straw-plait. Population, about 5000. Enniskillen is famous for the victory, in 1689, of William III. over James II. The Enniskilleners, or 6th Dragoons, were drawn from the brave defenders of the town.

Enns, an Austrian river, rises in Salzburg, 12 miles S. of Radstadt, and flows 190 miles (only 20 navigable) northward to the Danube below Linz. It receives the Salza and the Steier.

Enoch, a little lonely loch of Kirkcudbrightshire, 6 miles SSW. of the head of Loch Doon.

Enos (anc. Ænos), a Turkish seaport, in Thrace, on a rocky isthmus near the Maritza's mouth, 35 miles NW. of Gallipoli; pop. 8000.

Enschede (En-skay'deh), a town of Holland, 30 miles ENE. of Zutphen. Rebuilt since the fire (1862), it has yarn and cotton mills. Pop. 35,000.

En'terkin, a Dumfriesshire (q.v.) burn, rising on Lowther Hill, and running 5¼ miles SSW. to the Nith between Sanquhar and Thornhill, with a descent of 1720 feet.

Entrecasteaux. See D'Entrecasteaux.

Entre Douro e Minho (Entray Dooro-ay-Meen'yo), or simply Minho, a province of NW. Portugal, is bounded N. by the river Minho, and S. by the Douro. Area, 2800 sq. m.; pop. 1,200,000. It comprises three districts, Braga, Vianna, and Oporto (the capital).

Entre Rios (Entray Ree'ōs, 'between rivers'), a province in the 'Mesopotamia Argentina,' between the Paraná and the Uruguay. Area, 29,000 sq. m.; pop. 416,000. Capital, Paraná.

Eperies (Ay-pay-ree-esh'; Slovak Pressova), an old town of Hungary, on the Tarcza, 150 miles NE. of Pesth by rail. A fire of 7th May 1887 destroyed 400 houses. It manufactures earthenware, linens, and woollens; and in the vicinity are the Sovar salt-works. Pop. 15,000.

Épernay (Ay-per-nay'), a French town in Marne, the headquarters of the wines of Champagne, on the Marne's left bank, 19 miles WNW. of Chalons. It manufactures earthenware, hosiery, refined sugar, and leather. Pop. 20,000.

Eph'esus, an ancient Ionic city of Asia Minor in Lydia, near the mouth of the Caÿster, celebrated for the famous temple of the Ephesian Diana, the largest Greek temple ever built. It was the seat of one of the Seven Churches of Asia, and the scene of a great church council in 431, but perished utterly during the later Byzantine empire. There is now a wretched village, Ayasaluk, on its site; the ancient ruins include the theatre, the odeon, and the temple, excavated by Wood in 1869–74, and since 1894 by Austrian archæologists and Hogarth.

Épinal (Ay-pee-nâhl'), capital of the French dep. of Vosges, at the western base of the Vosges Mountains, on the Moselle, 46 miles SSE. of Nancy by rail. It has a ruined castle, a church founded about 960, and manufactures of cotton, paper, &c. Pop. 30,000, largely increased by the influx of Alsatians.

Epirus (Ep-ī'rus), a mountainous region of the Balkan Peninsula, between Mount Pindus and the Ionian Sea. Peopled largely since the 14th century by Albanians, it formed latterly a part of Turkey. Turkey was induced to cede the eastern part to Greece in 1881. The west fell to Greece and Albania by the war of 1912–13.

Epping, an urban district of Essex, at the north end of Epping Forest, 16 miles NNE. of London. It is noted for its cream, butter, sausages, and pork. Pop. 4300.—Epping (formerly Waltham) Forest once covered all Essex, and extended almost to London. Enclosures gradually curtailed it from 60,000 acres to 12,000 in 1793, and to less than 4000 in 1871, when the corporation of London undertook the preservation of all that was left, and the recovery of the more recent enclosures. As an outcome of their exertions, and at a cost of about £500,000, the Queen declared 5600 acres of Epping Forest free to the public on 6th May 1882. Reached easily from Loughton, Chingford, and other stations, Epping Forest is still a glorious place alike for naturalist and mere holiday-maker. Its 9 sq. m. of almost unbroken woodland, which at High Beech or Queen Victoria's Wood attain 379 feet above sea-level, form one of the most extensive and beautiful pleasure-grounds in Europe. Separated by a stream from Epping Forest is Hainault Forest (the 'garden fair' of Sir W. Besant), disafforested in 1851. Here, till 1820, stood Fairlop Oak, the scene of a July fair, as famous in its way as the old Epping stag-hunt on Easter Monday.

Epsom, an urban district of Surrey, on the margin of the Banstead Downs, 15 miles SSW. of London. The sulphate of magnesia springs, which made Epsom so fashionable a resort in the later half of the 17th century, gave name to the Epsom salt formerly manufactured from them. The Royal Medical College (1851), on the Downs, provides education for the sons of medical men, and affords a home to decayed members of the profession and their widows. Population, about 20,000. On the Downs, 1½ mile S. of the town, the famous horseraces are held yearly; the Derby stakes dating from 1780.

Epworth, a Lincolnshire market-town, in the 'Isle' of Axholme, 10 miles NNW. of Gainsborough. John Wesley was a native. Pop. 1800.

Ercildoune. See Earlston.

Erdington, an urban district of Warwickshire, 5 miles NE. of Birmingham; pop. 32,000.

Erebus, Mount, an active volcano (13,350 feet) in MacMurdo Sound, discovered in 1841 by Ross.

Eregli (Heraclea), two towns of Asia Minor—(1) a Black Sea port, 125 miles E. of the Bosporus; (2) a town on the Bagdad railway, 120 miles ESE. of Konia.

Eretria, an ancient trading town on the SW. coast of Eubœa.

Erfurt (Er-foort'), a city of Prussian Saxony, once capital of Thuringia, stands in a highly cultivated plain, on the Gera, 13 m. W. of Weimar by rail. Till 1873 it was strongly fortified. Its two citadels, the Petersberg and the Cyriaksburg, were formerly monasteries. The cathedral is one of the most venerable Gothic buildings in Germany, with a very rich portal, and a bell cast in 1497, and weighing 13½ tons. The monastery of St Augustine, famous as the residence of Luther, whose cell was destroyed by fire in 1872, was converted in the year 1819 into a foundling asylum. From 1378 to 1816 Erfurt was the seat of a university, of which the academy of sciences and the library (60,000 volumes and 1000 MSS.) alone remain. The growing of flowers and vegetables, and an extensive trade in flower-seeds are carried on. The principal manufactures are woollen, silk, cotton, and linen goods, lamps, machines, shoes, beer, malt, &c. Pop. about 111,500. Erfurt, originally called Erpesford or Erpesfurt, was made a bishopric in 741. In the 15th century its woollen and linen manufactures raised it to the position of one of the foremost cities of Germany. Since 1803 (except during 1806–14) it has belonged to Prussia.

Ergasteria, or Laurion, a mining town of Attica, near Cape Colonna, with ancient lead and silver works, reopened in 1864. Pop. 10,000.

Ericht, Loch, a lonely lake between Perth and Inverness shires, 1 mile from Dalwhinnie station, and 60 miles NW. of Perth. Lying 1153 feet above sea-level, it stretches 14¾ miles SSW., is 512 feet deep, is overhung by Ben Alder (3757 feet), and sends off a stream 6 miles to Loch Rannoch.—Another Ericht runs 10 miles SE. to the Isla near Coupar-Angus.

Erie (Ee'ry), the most southern of the five great lakes which empty themselves by the St Lawrence, separates the province of Ontario, in Canada, from Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York. It receives at its western extremity the waters of Lakes Superior, Michigan, and Huron by the river Detroit, and discharges them at its north-east by the Niagara into Lake Ontario. With a length of 240 miles, Erie has a breadth varying from 30 to nearly 60 miles, with an area of 9960 sq. m. It is 8¾ feet below Lake Huron, and 326 and 573 respectively above the Ontario and the Atlantic. The shores are for the most part low and clayey. At its south-western extremity are several wooded islands, the largest 14 miles in circumference. It is by far the shallowest of the five great lakes. Its mean depth is 70 feet, its maximum 210 feet; and from this comparative shallowness and the consequent liability to a heavy ground-swell, as well as the small number of good harbours, the navigation is difficult and dangerous; still the amount of traffic is enormous. It is connected by one canal with the Hudson, and by more than one with the Ohio; while, on the British side, it communicates with the Ontario by means of the ship-channel of the Welland Canal. From the beginning of December it remains more or less frozen till March or April. Lake Erie was the scene of a naval defeat of the British by the Americans, September 10, 1813.

Erie, the capital of Erie county, Pennsylvania, on Lake Erie, 88 miles SW. of Buffalo, and 95 NE. of Cleveland. It is a port of entry and important centre of trade, its harbour, one of the largest and best on the lake, being formed by an island 4 miles long, whose name, Presque Isle (Fr., 'peninsula'), preserves the memory of its having been once connected with the mainland. The belt of water thus sheltered forms a natural harbour; it is now protected by a breakwater, is 3 to 4 miles long and 1 mile wide, and varies in depth from 9 to 25 feet. The town's important industrial works include oil-refineries, tanneries, iron-foundries, paper, flouring, and planing mills, factories for railroad cars, engines and boilers, &c. It is a Roman Catholic bishop's see. A natural-gas well was opened here in 1889. Pop. 66,500.

Erin. See IRELAND.

Eriskay, an Inverness-shire island, 2 miles S. of South Uist. Here Prince Charles Edward landed, 23d July 1745. Pop. 450.

Erith, an urban district of Kent, on the Thames, 15½ miles by rail E. of Charing Cross. It is a summer resort and the yachting centre; in the Erith and Plumstead Marshes are large powder-magazines, the scene of a great explosion (1864). Here the Grace de Dieu was built in 1515. Pop. 28,000.

Eritrea, an Italian colony on the Red Sea coast of Africa, including the Dahlak Islands. Asmara is capital, Massawa the chief port. Area, 50,000 sq. m.; pop. 450,000.

Erivan' (Persian Rewán), the fortified capital of a Transcaucasian government, on the elevated plain to the north of Ararat, on the river Sanga, 3432 feet above sea-level. The town dates probably from the 7th century A.D.; in later years it was held alternately by Persians and Turks. Pop. 29,000. The province has an area of 10,165 sq. m. and a pop. of 1,000,000, nearly all Armenians and Tatars. See ETCHMIADZIN.

Erlangen (Er'lang-en), a town of Bavaria, on the Regnitz, 12 miles N. of Nuremberg. As old as the 10th century, it owes its prosperity to the settlement here of French Huguenots (1685), and to its university (1743), which is celebrated as a school of Protestant theology. A statue of its founder, the Margrave Frederick of Brandenburg-Baireuth, was erected in the market-place in 1843. There are manufactures of hosiery, gloves, mirrors, tobacco, and especially beer. Burned in 1449 and 1632, Erlangen came to Bavaria in 1809. Pop. 25,000.

Erlau (Er'low; Hung. Eger), a city of Hungary, on the Erlau, 89 miles NE. of Pesth. It has a domed cathedral, built since 1837 at a cost of £67,000, and 328 feet long; a lyceum (1761–99), with library and observatory; a hospital (1830); and two warm baths. The Erlau red wine is the best of Hungary. Pop. 28,000.

Ermeland (Er'meh-lant), a district of the old province of Prussia, inland of the Frisches Haff.

Ermenonville (Erm'non^{g}veel'), a village 18 miles NNE. of Paris. Rousseau died here.

Erne, a river of Ulster, rising in Lough Gowna, on the borders of Longford and Cavan counties, and flowing 72 miles north-west, through Loughs Oughter and Erne, to Donegal Bay. Lough Erne extends 40 miles through Fermanagh county, consisting of two lakes, the Upper and Lower, which are joined by a network of channels 10 miles long. Both are studded with green hilly islands, and teem with salmon and trout.

Erroman'go, one of the New Hebrides (q.v.), the scene of the martyrdom of the missionary John Williams.

Eryx, the ancient name of a mountain in NW. Sicily, near Drepanum (mod. Trapani), with a famous temple of Venus, hence called Erycina.

Erzberg. See EISENERZ.

Erzerûm (Er-zer-oom'), a town in Turkish Armenia, not far from the Kara-Su, or western source of the Euphrates. It stands 6200 feet above sea-level, surrounded by mountains. In spite of the Transcaucasian Railway, Erzerûm is still an entrepôt between Europe and the interior of Asia, particularly Persia. It imports shawls, silk goods, cotton, tobacco, rice, indigo, &c., and exports corn, sheep and cattle, horses, mules, gall-nuts, and copper and iron wares. Pop. 40,000. Erzerûm, which passed to the Turks in 1517, had early in the 19th century 100,000 inhabitants; but it suffered much in the wars of 1829, 1854–55, and 1877–78.

Erzgebirge (Ertz'ge-bir'ge, g hard; 'Ore Mountains'), a mountain-chain stretching SW. and NE. for 96 miles on the confines of Saxony and Bohemia, from the Elbe valley to the Fichtelgebirge, and culminating in the Keilberg (4052 feet) and Fichtelberg (3980). Silver and lead are the chief metals; next come copper, tin, iron, nickel.

Esbjerg (Es-byerg), the best port on the west coast of Jutland, exports cattle, &c., mostly to England. Its harbour was rebuilt in 1868–88, and the pop. has grown from 4000 to 18,000.

Eschscholtz Bay (Esh-sholtz), the innermost part of Kotzebue Sound, in Alaska. It was named after the naturalist Eschscholtz (1793–1834), who sailed with Kotzebue.

Eschwege (Esh'vay-ge; g hard), a town in the Prussian province of Hesse-Nassau, on the Werra, 40 miles ESE. of Cassel by rail. Pop. 12,000.

Eschweiler (Esh'vei-ler), an industrial town of Rhenish Prussia, 8 miles ENE. of Aix-la-Chapelle, has important iron, zinc, and tin works, machine-shops, tanneries, &c. Pop. 25,000.

Escorial, or ESCURIAL (Span., 'mining rubbish,' cf. scoriæ), an immense royal palace, mausoleum, and monastery of Spain, 31 miles NW. of Madrid, on the south-eastern slope of the Sierra Guadarrama, at an altitude of 3700 feet. Of dark-gray granite, stern and forbidding of aspect, it was built by Philip II. in 1563–84, partly to provide a royal burying-place for the kings of Spain, partly to commemorate his victory over the French at St Quentin on St Lawrence's day, 10th August 1557. Its general shape is that of a quadrangular parallelogram, 706 feet long by 550 broad, with a smaller square projecting from the east side, in shape thus somewhat resembling St Lawrence's gridiron. At each corner rises a tower 200 feet high; and in the centre a cupola 312 feet. The library, once one of the richest in Europe, still contains some 40,000 vols. and many valuable MSS., including a great number in Arabic. In the palace the most interesting apartment is the cell of Philip II., in which he spent his last days. The Escorial was for the second time greatly injured by fire in 1872.

Esdraelon (Ez-dra-ee'lon), or PLAIN OF JEZREEL, a fertile valley of Palestine, constituting the basin of the Kishon, extends westwards from Mount Hermon to the slopes of the Carmel range. Here Gideon defeated the Midianites, and here in 1799 the Turks were defeated by the French.

Esher, a pretty village of Surrey, on the Mole, 15 miles SW. of London by rail. Here are Esher Place, a brick gate-tower of Wolsey's palace, and Claremont (q.v.). Pop. with the Dittons, 12,500.

Esk (Cymric wysg, Gael. uisge, 'water,' akin to Exe), the name of several small Scotch rivers. The Dumfriesshire Esk, formed by the Black and White Esks (12 and 14 miles long), runs 22 miles SSE., next 5 furlongs along the Border, and lastly 8 miles SSW. through Cumberland to the head of the Solway Firth. It passes Langholm and Longtown, receives the Tarras, Liddel, &c., and affords capital fishing.—The Edinburghshire Esk, formed by the North and South Esks (17 and 19 miles long), flows 4 miles northward to the Firth of Forth at Musselburgh. Its scenery is very pretty, the northern branch passing Habbie's Howe, Roslin, Hawthornden, and Melville Castle.—In Forfarshire the South Esk runs 49 miles SE. and E. to the North Sea at Montrose, and the North Esk 29 miles SE. to a point 4 miles N. of Montrose; both give earls' titles to branches of the Carnegie family—Southesk (1633) and Northesk (1662).—There is an Esk in SW. Cumberland, and one in the Cleveland district of Yorkshire.

Eski-Djumna, a town of Bulgaria, 20 miles WSW. of Shumla. Pop. 10,000.

Eskilstuna, 55 miles W. of Stockholm, is a very important centre of the Swedish iron and steel industries, and is very famous for its cutlery. Pop. 30,000.

Eski-Shehr, an important railway junction in the NW. of Asia Minor, 165 miles W. of Angora. Pop. 20,000.

Eski-Zagra, now STARA-ZAGORA, a town of Bulgaria, at the southern base of the Balkans, 70 miles NNW. of Adrianople. Pop. 22,000.

Esla, a northern tributary of the Douro.

Esmeraldas (Span., 'Emeralds'), the most northerly maritime province of Ecuador. Area, 5200 sq. m.; pop. 14,600.—The capital, Esmeraldas (pop. 3000), stands 10 miles from the mouth of the navigable river Esmeraldas.

Esné, a town of Upper Egypt, on the Nile's left bank, 36 miles above Luxor, with some interesting remains of antiquity. Pop. 20,000.

Espir'ito Santo (Port., 'Holy Spirit'), a maritime state of Brazil. Area, 17,000 sq. m.; pop. 300,000. Capital, Victoria.

Espir'itu Santo, (1) the largest and most westerly island of the New Hebrides, with an area of 1868 sq. m., and a pop. of 20,000.—(2) An island in the Gulf of California, 30 miles N. of La Paz.—(3) A cape of Tierra del Fuego.

Esquimalt, a port with docks at the south end of Vancouver Island, on Juan de Fuca Strait, 3 miles W. of Victoria. Till Canada assumed military and naval responsibility in 1906–10, it was used as a British naval station. Its admirable harbour, connected by rail with the coalfield of Nanaimo, has increased since the opening of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the connected Japanese and Australian mail routes. Pop. 4000.

Essek (Roman Mursia), the capital of Slavonia, on the right bank of the Drave, 12 miles above its confluence with the Danube, and 189 S. of Pesth by rail. It has been the seat of a bishopric since 335 A.D. Pop. 31,000.

Essen, a town in Rhenish Prussia, 22 miles by rail NE. of Düsseldorf, stands in the midst of a rich coal and iron district. It possesses numerous establishments for manufacturing iron, chief among them being the celebrated Krupp works and cannon-foundries, whose hands have risen from 74 men in 1848 to over 60,000. There are other manufactures. Pop. 300,000. Although its industrial activity is recent, the town itself dates from the foundation of the Benedictine nunnery in 873.

Essendon, in Victoria, 5 miles NW. of Melbourne, has a pop. of 22,500.

Essequi'bo, the most westerly of the great rivers of British Guiana, rises in the Acarai Mountains, 46 miles N. of the equator, and after a course of 620 miles enters the Atlantic, forming an estuary 15 miles wide, in which lie numerous fertile islands, but the entrance to which is much silted up. Navigable for 35 miles only, owing to cataracts, it receives a number of large tributaries, as the Rupununi, and the united Cuyuni and Mazaruni; on the Potaro, another affluent, is the grand Kaieteur Fall, 741 feet in sheer descent, discovered in 1870.

Essex, a county in the east of England, washed by the North Sea, and separated from Kent by the Thames estuary, from Suffolk by the Stour. Measuring 57 miles from east to west, and 44 from north to south, it has an area of 1530 sq. m. The low flat seaboard is close on 100 miles long, deeply indented by shallow creeks, and much of it fringed by desolate salt-marshes. Inland the surface becomes gently undulating or even hilly, with Danbury Hill (317 feet), Laindon Hill (378), and High Beech (350), and in the NW. nearly 500 feet. The rivers are the Thames, Stour, Lea, Stort, Colne, Blackwater, Crouch, Roding, and Chelmer—rivers that sometimes flood the low-lying lands. In 1884 an earthquake, proceeding from north-east to south-west, did almost £10,000 damage. Nearly 79 per cent. of the entire area is in cultivation. Epping Forest (q.v.) is a mere remnant of the once wide woodlands, whose total area is now reduced to less than 44 sq. m. Fishing is not very actively prosecuted; but the Colne has long been famous for its oysters. Brewing is an important industry, especially at Romford; but outside of the metropolitan area there are no great manufactures. Essex from 1877 was included in the new diocese of St Albans till 1913, when that of Chelmsford was erected. Since 1885 Essex has returned one member to parliament for each of its eight divisions. Chelmsford is the county town; and other towns are Colchester, West and East Ham, Walthamstow, Harwich, Southend, Leyton, Woodford, Grays Thurrock, Romford, Maldon, Saffron Walden, Stratford, Barking, Braintree, Brentwood, Coggeshall, Dunmow, Halstead, Harlow, Ilford, Ongar, and Witham. Population, 351,000. The kingdom of Essex was named after the East Saxons. Castle Hedingham and Audley End are famous mansions. Among Essex worthies have been Tusser, John Ray, Quarles, Sydney Smith, and Isaac Taylor. See works by Morant (1768), Suckling (1845), E. Walford (1882), and Barrett (1892).

Essex, a manufacturing village of Middlesex county, Connecticut. Pop. 3000.

Esslingen (Ess'ling-en), a town of Würtemberg, on the Neckar, 9 miles by rail ESE. of Stuttgart. The chief buildings are the old citadel; the Liebfrauen Church (1440), with a beautiful spire 246 feet high; the old (1430) town-house, and the new (1742). It has great machine-shops, and manufactures 'Esslingen champagne,' besides woollens, cotton and woollen yarns, lackered iron, &c. Population, 32,000.

Essouan. See ASSOUAN.

Es'te (anc. Ateste), a town of Italy, on the southern slope of the Euganean Hills, 17 miles SSW. of Padua. Pop. 10,000.

Estella, an ancient city of Spain, on the Ega, 27 miles SW. of Pamplona. Pop. 6000.

Estepa, a town of Spain, 60 miles ESE. of Seville. Pop. 9000.

Estepona, a maritime town of Spain, 26 miles NNE. of Gibraltar. Pop. 9000.

Esthonia, called by the natives Wiroma, the most northerly of the Baltic provinces of Russia, is bounded S. by Livonia, W. and N. by the Baltic. Area, 7600 sq. m.; pop. 467,000. A large part of the surface is covered with forests, moors, and small lakes; rivers are numerous, but mostly small and sluggish in flow; erratic boulders of granite are common everywhere. The chief town is Revel (q.v.). The population consists of two divisions, the Esths and the Esthlanders. The latter are a mixed race of immigrants, the German element strongly preponderating. The Esths, a people of Finnish race, constitute the peasantry, some 366,000 in number, and the original possessors of the soil. About 519,000 of this people are also found in Livonia, and those elsewhere in Russia, America, &c. must bring the number to a million. In spite of six centuries of slavery to their German lords, the Esths have preserved their national characteristics—language, customs, clothing, dwelling, physical attributes. In religion they are mostly Lutherans, though the Russians are making strenuous efforts to bring them over to the Greek Church. Esthonia was conquered by Waldemar II. of Denmark in 1219; but in 1346 it was sold to the Teutonic Knights, and incorporated with Livonia. From 1561 it belonged to Sweden, in 1710 it was seized by Peter the Great. Serfdom was abolished in Livonia in 1816, and in Esthonia in 1819.

Esthwaite Water, a lake of Lancashire, 2 miles long by ½ mile wide, extending from Hawkshead towards the W. shore of Windermere.

Estremadu′ra, a district of Spain, lying between Portugal and New Castile, and watered by the Tagus and the Guadiana. It was divided in 1833 into the provinces of Badajoz and Cáceres. Area, 16,700 sq. m.; pop. 956,000.

Estremadura, a Portuguese province containing Lisbon. Area, 7000 sq. m.; pop. 1,440,000.

Estremoz, a town of Portugal, 23 miles NE. of Evora. It makes porous red jars. Pop. 8000.

Eszek. See Essek.

Étampes (Ay-ton^{g}p′), a French town of Seine-et-Oise, 35 miles SSW. of Paris by rail. An ancient place, with a street 4 miles long, it has a fragment of a royal castle (c. 1160), a statue of Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire, a mediæval hôtel-de-ville, large flour-mills, market-gardens, &c. Pop. 8500.

Étaples, a French port and watering-place in Pas-de-Calais, 15 miles S. of Boulogne. Peace with England was made there in 1492. Pop. 5000.

Eta′wah, a town of the Doab, picturesquely situated among the ravines near the Jumna's left bank, 70 miles SE. of Agra. Cloth, horn combs, and sweetmeats are manufactured. Close by are some famous Hindu temples. Pop. 45,000.

Etchmiadzin, a monastery near Erivan, the ecclesiastical metropolis of the Armenians since 302 A.D.

Ethiopia, a term of ancient geography, somewhat vaguely and variously used. Originally, all the nations inhabiting the southern part of the globe, as known to the ancients, or rather all men of dark-brown or black colour, were called Ethiopians (assumed by the Greeks to be from the two Greek words aithō ōps, and to mean 'burnt-face;' but more probably a form of an unknown Egyptian word). Later, this name was given more particularly to the inhabitants of the countries south of Libya and Egypt, on the Upper Nile, extending from 10° to 25° N. lat., 28° to 40° E. long.—the present Nubia, Sennaar, Kordofan, Abyssinia. The nucleus of the kingdom of Ethiopia, which threw off the Egyptian yoke, conquered Egypt (c. 800 B.C.), and gave it a dynasty, was conquered by Cambyses of Persia in 530, and became Roman and Christian in due time, was Meroë on an island in the Nile; and the dominant people, the Ethiopians proper, were a Semitic people originally from the other side of the Red Sea, speaking the Ethiopian, a well-marked Semitic dialect, closely akin to old Sabæan, a form of Arabic. See Abyssinia.

Etive (Et′iv), a salmon-river and a sea-loch of Argyllshire. The river runs from a loch on the Moor of Rannoch, near Kingshouse Inn, 15 miles south-westward to the loch, which itself extends 10½ miles south-westward, then 8¾ westward, until at Dunstaffnage Castle, 3½ miles NNE. of Oban, it merges in the Firth of Lorne. Narrowing from 1½ mile to less than 2 furlongs at Connel Ferry, its reef-barred entrance, where the depth too decreases from 420 feet to 6 at low-water, this loch offers a good example of an ancient submerged glen. Its scenery is magnificent, the upper reach closely engirt by mountains, of which the loftiest are Ben Cruachan (3689 feet) and Ben Starav (3541). See Ardchattan and Dunstaffnage.

Etna (modern Sicilian Monte Gibello—the last part of the name being the Arabic Jebel Italianised), an isolated volcanic mountain close to the east coast of Sicily, with a base 90 miles in circumference, and a height of 10,758 feet. It slopes gently up to a single cone, containing the crater, a chasm 1000 feet in depth and from 2 to 3 miles in circumference. The regularity of the slope is, however, broken on the east by an immense gully, 4 or 5 miles in diameter, and 2000 to 4000 feet deep. Many secondary cones are dotted all over the flanks of the mountain, the principal being the Monti Rossi, 450 feet high, twin peaks which were cast up in 1669. The slopes are divided into three sharply defined zones, the cultivated, the woody, and the desert region. This last, extending from about 6300 feet upwards, is a dreary waste of black lava, scoriæ, ashes, and sand, covered during the greater part of the year with snow. The wooded region, which stretches down to the line of 2000 feet, is planted with forests of chestnuts, beeches, birches, pines, maples, and oaks. Below this lies the cultivated zone, a thickly peopled region of great fertility. The ascent is usually made from Catania (q.v.), a town on the coast to the south. In 1169 Catania was destroyed; in 1329 a new crater opened near the Val del Bove; in 1444 the cone fell into the crater; in 1537 two villages perished; from 1603 to 1620 Etna was almost continually in activity; and in 1666 three new craters were formed. In 1669 a chasm 12 miles long opened in the flank of the mountain; in 1755 a large flood of water was poured down from the eastern gully; in 1852–53 there was a violent nine months' eruption, when a torrent of lava, 6 miles long by 2 broad, and some 12 feet in depth, was ejected. There were great eruptions in 1879, 1886, 1892, and 1910. In 1880 an observatory was built on the south side of the mountain, 9075 feet above the sea (nearly 1000 feet higher than the hospice of the Great St Bernard).

See Rodwell, Etna and its Eruptions (1878); and Sartorius von Waltershausen, Der Aetna, edited by Von Lasaulx (2 vols. Leip. 1880).

Eton, a town in the south of Buckinghamshire, on the left bank of the Thames, 21 miles WSW. of London. It lies opposite to Windsor, in Berkshire, and is included in its parliamentary borough. Eton College was founded by Henry VI. in 1440, and its beautiful buildings were completed in 1525, though many additions have been made from time to time, notably in 1889. The boys number about 1000, of whom 70 are king's scholars or collegers, and the rest oppidans. Famous Etonians have been Bolingbroke, Boyle, Canning, Chatham, Derby, Fielding, Fox, Gladstone, Gray, Hallam, Kinglake, Lyttelton, Milman, Porson, Praed, Pusey, Shelley, the Walpoles, Wellesley, and Wellington. Pop. 3200. See works by Lyte, Creasy, Jesse, Lubbock (1899), Benson, Cust, Brock (1900), and Stone (1910).

Étretat (Aytr-tâh'), a Norman watering-place, 18 miles NE. of Havre. Pop. 2000.

Etruria, the country inhabited or ruled by the Etruscans, a very ancient people of Italy. Lying west of the Tiber and the Apennines, and including the Arno valley, it was a confederation of twelve cities or states. Some of these cities are now deserted sites, marked only by vast cemeteries and the remains of cyclopean walls, while others still retain more or less of their old importance. See works by Dennis (2d ed. 1878), K. O. Müller (1877), and Jules Martha (1888).

Etruria, a village of Staffordshire, in the county borough of Stoke-on-Trent. Here, on 13th June 1769, Josiah Wedgwood and Thomas Bentley opened their celebrated Etruria potteries, so named after the Etruscan ware.

Etset. See ADIGE.

Ettrick Water, a stream of Selkirkshire, rising on Capel Fell, and winding 32 miles north-eastward to the Tweed, 3 miles below Selkirk, and 5 from the influx of its chief affluent, the Yarrow. In Ettrick churchyard, towards the stream's source, lie Boston and Hogg the 'Ettrick Shepherd.' Ettrick Forest, erst so 'fair,' now treeless and pastoral, included all Selkirkshire, with parts of Peebles and Edinburgh shires.

Eu (Öh; nearly Uh), a French town of Seine-Inférieure, on the Bresle, 2 miles from its mouth, and 21 NE. of Dieppe by rail. The Château d'Eu (1578), a low red brick building, with high roofs of slate, was purchased by Mademoiselle de Montpensier in 1675; eventually, in 1821, it came to Louis-Philippe, who here received Queen Victoria in 1843. In 1874 Viollet-le-Duc restored it for the Comte de Paris. Pop. 4500.

Eubœa (anc. Euboia, Turk. Egripo, Ital. Negroponte), an island of Greece in the Ægean Sea, runs 98 miles south-eastward parallel to the mainland, its breadth varying from 30 miles to 4. Area, 1457 sq. m., or a little smaller than Suffolk. About midway along its west shore, the strait (Euripus) separating Eubœa from the mainland contracts to 120 feet, and is spanned by a bridge, resting on a rocky islet in the middle. The island is traversed longitudinally by a chain of wooded mountains, culminating in Mount Delphi (5725 feet). Iron and copper occur in the mountains; and at Carystos, in the south of the island, the marble called cipolino is quarried. Hot springs (sulphur) exist in the north. The east coast is steep and rocky; the west side of the island slopes gradually. The chief towns are Chalcis on the west coast and Carystos (pop. 4000) on the south coast. Pop. of the island, 120,000, mostly Greeks and Albanians. Eubœa was successively subjugated by the Athenians, by Philip of Macedon, by the Romans, by the Venetians (1351), and by the Turks (1470); since 1830 it has been part of the kingdom of Greece.

Euganean Hills, a range of well-wooded hills, lying SW. of Padua in Northern Italy, and culminating in Monte Venda (1749 feet). On their slopes stand several villas, amongst them Petrarch's house at Arquà.

Eupatoria (formerly Koslov), a Russian seaport, on a bay in the west of the Crimea, 40 miles NW. of Simferopol. The principal building is the Tatar mosque (1552). Pop. 20,000.

Eupen, a town of Rhenish Prussia, on the Vedre, close to the Belgian frontier, and 12 miles by rail S. of Aix-la-Chapelle. It has flourishing woollen manufactures, besides dyeworks, machine-shops, breweries, &c. French refugees settled at Eupen after the peace of Lunéville (1801); in 1814 it came from Limburg to Prussia. Pop. 15,000, almost all Catholics.

Euphrates (Pers. Ufratu, Heb. Phrat, Syr. Ephrat, Arab. Furat), the largest river in Western Asia, has its source in the heart of Armenia in the Kara-Su (270 miles) and the Murad (300 miles), of which the former rises NE. of Erzerûm, and the latter over 130 miles to the east, near Lake Van—uniting close to Keban Maadin (2664 feet above the sea). The united stream breaks through the Taurus in a succession of rapids and cataracts for about 40 miles. Flowing south and then south-east, it separates Mesopotamia from Syria and the deserts of Syrian Arabia, and is joined by the Tigris at Kurna. The joint river, taking the name of the Shat-el-Arab, empties itself by several arms (only one of which is navigable by large vessels) into the Persian Gulf, 60 miles below Basra, after a course of fully 1700 miles. The principal of its few tributaries are the Sajur, Balik-su, and Khabúr, besides the Persian river Karún, which enters the estuary at Mohammera. The chief towns now on its banks are Sumeysát, Bír, Ana, Hít, and Hilla, Basra lying really on a creek a short distance from the main stream; the river between Ana and Hít is studded with islands, many of them inhabited. The Euphrates is more or less navigable for light craft as far as Hít. A scheme of irrigation adopted in 1911 will partly restore the fertility of ancient times, when canals and embankments regulated the river's inundations, and exercised the same beneficial effect on the country as those of the Nile on Egypt. Numerous remains of ancient cities are still to be traced near the banks, such as the famous site of Babylon, and the Birs Nimrúd. In 1831 Captain F. R. Chesney, R.A., descended the Euphrates, and established the fact that the river was navigable for vessels of moderate draught, at least as high up as Ana. He maintained that this was the shortest and best route to Bombay, and in 1835 he commanded a second and equally successful expedition. Attempts to establish a railway, in 1856 and 1862, collapsed. Sir W. Willcocks planned (1900–5) a railway from the Mediterranean by Tadmor to the Euphrates and Bagdad. The German Bagdad railway of the 20th century crosses the Euphrates and follows the Tigris valley. See works by Chesney (1850), Cameron (1888), Ainsworth (1888); reports and articles by Willcocks (1900–10); and Miss Bell's From Amurath to Amurath (1911).

Eure (Öhr; nearly Ehr), a dep. of Normandy, south of the dep. of Seine-Inférieure; area, 2290 square miles; population, 324,000. The river Eure flows 141 miles to the Seine. The arrondissements are Évreux (the capital), Louviers, Les Andelys, Bernay, and Pont-Audemer.

Eure-et-Loir (Ehr-ay-Lwar), a dep. of France, south of the preceding; area, 2260 square miles; population, 272,000. It is divided into four arrondissements, Chartres (the capital), Châteaudun, Dreux, and Nogent-le-Rotrou.

Eureka, (1) a port and capital of Humboldt county, California, on Humboldt Bay, with lumber-mills; pop. 10,000.—(2) A town, capital of Eureka county, Nevada, 90 miles by rail S. of the Palisades station on the Central Pacific Railroad. Here are silver and lead mines; pop. 1000.

Europe, historically and politically the most important of the five great divisions of the world, is, next to Australasia, the smallest in area, but Asia alone exceeds it in population. Geographers are agreed that, apart from its history and significance for the history of civilisation, it should be regarded rather as a peninsula of Asia, or as a portion of the great joint Eurasian continent; for in regard to physical geography, fauna, and flora, it is difficult to draw a sharp line between Europe and Asia. On three sides Europe is bounded by sea—north by the Arctic Ocean, west by the Atlantic, south by the Mediterranean, Sea of Marmora, and Black Sea. But on the east the Urals, Ural River, and Caspian, though commonly assumed as the boundary towards Asia, do not mark a precise limit in respect of climate, flora, fauna, or physical conditions generally; the governments of Perm and Orenburg in European Russia extend far beyond the Urals. Between the Caspian and the Black Sea, the ridge of the Caucasus seems a convenient dividing line between Europe and Asia, but the Manytch depression is really, from the geographical point of view, a more correct boundary; physically the whole lieutenancy of the Caucasus is part of Asia. It is more curious that North Africa and South Europe are very closely related in many respects, geological and biological. It has even been said that the mountains of Auvergne divide northern France more sharply from Provence than the Mediterranean (q.v.) does southern Provence from Morocco and Algeria.

Various etymologies have been proposed for the name Europe. The old mythological one was that it was named from Europa—the Phœnician damsel whom the enamoured Zeus, in the form of a bull, bore off to Crete. Another was that it came from Eurus, the south-east wind. A third notes that the name is first applied, not to the whole continent, but (in the Homeric Hymn to Apollo) to the mainland of Thrace, as distinguished from the Peloponnesus and the Greek islands, and suggests that Europe therefore means Broad Land (eurus ōps, 'broad face'). Of late the tendency is to assume that the name was first given by Phœnician traders, and is from the word Erebh, 'darkness'—i.e. the land of sunset, of the west. The area to which the name of Europe was applied grew with the extension of Greek geographical knowledge.

Europe has a total length from Cape St Vincent on the south-west to the mouth of the Kara River on the north-east of 3400 miles; and from North Cape in Norway to Cape Matapan, the southernmost point of Greece, a total breadth of 2400 miles. The continent of Europe, irrespective of islands, lies within 36° 20′—71° 10′ N. lat., and 9° 30′ W.—66° 30′ E. long. Its area is estimated at 3,800,000 sq. m., being about a third of that of Africa, a fourth of that of America, and a fifth of that of Asia. It does not greatly exceed the total area of the United States. Its indented coast-line is, owing to the number of deep inlets and gulfs, more extensive in proportion to its size than that of any other great natural division of the globe, and is estimated to measure little less than 50,000 miles. It has a pop. of above 446,000,000, which gives an average of over 117 for every square mile.

The body of the European continent divides itself naturally into two great portions—the great plain in the north-east, and the highlands from near the centre towards the south-west, the mountainous peninsula of Scandinavia lying apart from either. The plain occupies about two-thirds of the continent, reaching from the eastern boundary, north to the Arctic Ocean, south to the Caucasus and the Black Sea, and westward over the whole extent of the continent. In shape this plain resembles a triangle; its base rests on the eastern boundary, and it may be said to reach its apex on the shores of Holland. It separates the two mountain-systems of Europe—the Scandinavian system (highest summit 7566 feet) on the north, and on the south the system of southern Europe. The mass of the Alps, covering an area of nearly 100,000 sq. m., forms the centre of the mountain-system of southern and western Europe, and stretches down on four sides towards France, Germany, Hungary, and Italy; the highest summit being 15,732 feet. The other chief mountain-masses are the Carpathians (8343 feet), the Balkans (9750), the Apennines (9574), the Pyrenees (11,170), and the Sierra Nevada (11,670), and in Sicily, Etna (10,758).

Europe is surrounded by water on three sides. The White Sea comes in from the Arctic Ocean; the German Ocean (with the Baltic) and the Mediterranean from the Atlantic. The most important peninsulas are in the north Scandinavia, and in the south Crimea, the Balkan Peninsula, Italy, Spain. Except Iceland, the islands cluster closely round the mainland, the chief being Great Britain and Ireland, Iceland, Nova Zembla, Sardinia, Corsica, and Crete. The lakes of Europe are small as compared with those of Africa or America, the largest being Ladoga and Onega in Russia, and Wener in Sweden. The Volga (1977 miles), the Danube (1740), the Ural (1450), the Don (1125), the Kama (1050), the Petchora (975), and the Rhine (760) are the largest rivers of Europe. The details of the geography of Europe are given under the names of its several political divisions, and of its lakes, rivers, and mountains.

In respect of climate, by far the greater portion of the area of Europe belongs to the northern section of the temperate zone, though parts of Norway, Sweden, and Russia lie within the Arctic Circle. The southern parts of Spain, Sicily, and Greece are some twelve degrees from the northern tropic. The natural history of Europe very much agrees with that of the corresponding latitudes of Asia. The most northern regions have the arctic flora and fauna; whilst the natural history of the most southern countries assumes a subtropical character. The temperature of western and northern Europe being raised by the Gulf Stream drift and the winds from the great mass of dry and desert land in Africa above what is elsewhere found in similar latitudes, the flora and fauna exhibit a corresponding character, affected, however, by the great amount of moisture derived from the Atlantic Ocean, and also to a still greater degree by the comparative uniformity of temperature which the proximity of the ocean produces. The effect of the last-mentioned causes is so great that the northern limit of some plants is sooner reached on the shores of the Atlantic than in the more central parts of Europe, where the winters are much colder, and the average temperature of the year is lower. Of this the vine and maize are notable examples. Plants which require a mild winter will not grow in the north—and scarcely even in the centre of Europe—but they advance along the western coast under the influence of the maritime climate, Thus, the myrtle—although not indigenous—grows even in the south of England. Amongst plants the date-palm, and amongst mammals a species of ape, are found in the south of Europe (the ape only on the Rock of Gibraltar): whilst some strictly African birds are frequent visitants, and many birds—as the cuckoo, swallow, stork, &c.—are common to Europe and Africa, inhabitants in summer even of very northern regions, and returning in winter to the warm south. Of the plants now most commonly associated in our thoughts with the southern countries of Europe, many have probably been introduced from Africa or from the East. This has probably been the case even with the myrtle, and certainly has been the case with the vine, olive, orange, lemon, fig, peach, almond, apricot, &c. Some fruits are certainly indigenous to Europe, as the apple, pear, plum, and cherry, although even of these the first improved varieties may have been introduced from the East. Among the wild animals of Europe, the bison is still reckoned; and the ox existed at no very remote period in a truly wild state. The reindeer inhabits the extreme north; the elk, the stag, the fallow-deer, and the roebuck are found in more southern regions; the ibex or bouquetin exists on the high central mountains; two species of antelope—the chamois of the Alps, and the saiga of the Russian plains—connect the European fauna with the Asiatic and African. Of mammals peculiar to Europe, the most notable are the chamois, musk rat, and fallow-deer, while the civet, ichneumon, and porcupine are not found in any other part of the palæarctic region but in Europe. Of carnivorous animals, the most noteworthy are the bear, wolf, fox, and lynx. The European seas afford valuable fisheries, particularly of herring and of cod in the north, and of tunny, anchovy, &c. in the Mediterranean.

The population of Europe seems to be derived mainly from three races or types, now variously mixed. Whether they originated in Europe or elsewhere is not yet determined. In the north-west is a tall race with long skull, narrow face and nose, blue eyes, and very fair hair. It includes, in part, peoples of Celtic as well as of Teutonic speech. Another long-skulled race inhabits the European as well as the African coasts of the Mediterranean. It differs from the northern race in having dark hair and eyes, medium stature, and a broader nose. Between these is driven a wedge of short-skulled men, the Alpine race, whose range extends or extended along the Carpathians and the Alps to Brittany and Britain. Whether an intrusion from the east or a modification produced by local conditions from the same stock as the other two, it is in some respects intermediate, while in others it differs from both where these agree. Its characters are light chestnut hair, hazel-gray eyes, heavy nose, medium stature, and thick frame. The most obvious basis of classification is language. By this test nearly all Europeans are Aryans, speaking languages whose centre of origin is probably to be sought in Europe itself. Some 120,000,000 are Teutonic (German, English, Dutch, Flemish, Swedish, Norwegian, Danish); 134,000,000 Slavs (Russian, Polish, Czech, Slovak, Serb, Croat, Slovenian, Bulgarian); 100,000,000 Romance-speaking (French, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, Roumanian, Walloon, Rhætian); 4,000,000 Letts and Lithuanians; 7,000,000 Greeks and Albanians; 3,600,000 Celtic (Welsh, Breton, Irish, Gaelic, Manx); 1,000,000 Armenians, Ossetians, and Gypsies. Some 18,000,000 are non-Aryan (Magyars, Finns, Ugrians, Tatars, Turks, Kalmucks, Basques, Circassians, &c., and Maltese). Upwards of fifty languages are spoken in Europe. But language is by no means a sure test of race; thus, the Normans quickly took to speaking the Romance tongue of their Romanised Gallic subjects, whilst the French—Celts, with a strong infusion of Frankish-Germanic blood, and a smaller infusion of Italic blood—speak a modified Latin tongue. Many parts of the German-speaking area are mainly Wendish or Prussian (Slavonic) in blood. The Bulgarians, speaking a Slavonic tongue, are originally Ugro-Finnic.

The table gives a comparative view of the states of Europe before the Balkan wars of 1912–13:

States.	Extent in English sq. m.	Population.
Andorra	175	6,000
Austria-Hungary (with Bosnia)	261,091	51,312,877
Belgium	11,373	7,423,784
Bulgaria	24,380	4,337,516
Denmark (with Iceland, &c.)	56,029	2,860,165
France	207,054	39,610,519
Germany	208,780	64,925,993
Gibraltar	2	25,367
Great Britain and Ireland, &c.	121,407	45,367,058
Greece	25,014	2,631,952
Holland	12,648	5,980,154
Italy	110,659	34,686,683
Liechtenstein	65	9,854
Luxemburg	998	259,889
Malta	117	228,534
Monaco	8	19,121
Montenegro	3,630	225,000
Norway	124,130	2,391,782
Portugal (without Azores, &c.)	34,300	5,500,000
Roumania	50,720	7,250,000
Russia (in Europe), Finland	2,055,720	133,879,100
San Marino	22	10,820
Servia	18,650	2,911,701
Spain (without Canaries, &c.)	191,888	19,144,630
Sweden	172,876	5,521,943
Switzerland	15,976	3,753,293
Turkey (in Europe), Crete	68,000	6,500,000

The density varies from 653 per sq. m. in Belgium (670 in England without Wales, and 2390 in Monaco, which is mainly two towns) to 30 in Andorra and 11 in Norway.

Europe is practically a region of monotheists; though there are Buddhist Kalmucks in South Russia, and Pagans amongst the Lapps, Finns, Samoyedes, and Tcheremisses. The Turks, some Russian Tatars, many Albanians, and some Slavs are Mohammedans (6,600,000), and there are nearly 8,000,000 Jews; but the bulk of Europeans are professing Christians. The Catholic Church may number some 188,600,000 adherents, the Greek Church 120,000,000; while the various Protestant communions number about 100,000,000.

Eurotas (mod. Iri or Vasilo), the chief river of Laconia in Greece, rising in Arcadia, and flowing past Sparta to the Laconian Gulf.

Euston, the seat of the Duke of Grafton, in Suffolk, 4½ miles SE. of Thetford.

Eutaw Springs, a small affluent of the Santee River, in South Carolina. Near it, in the last serious battle in the War of Independence, 8th September 1781, the Americans were repulsed.

Euxine. See BLACK SEA.

Evans, CAPE. See ANTARCTICA.

Evanston, a city of Illinois, on Lake Michigan, 12 miles N. of Chicago by rail, with the Garrett Biblical Institute, the North-western University (Methodist), &c. Pop. 25,000.

Evansville, a port of entry and capital of Vanderburg county, Indiana, on the Ohio, 162 miles ESE. of St Louis by rail, with a city-hall, a court-house, a handsome post-office and custom-house, and a public library and art gallery. Coal and iron ore abound near by, and the town has a large number of mills, foundries, &c. Pop. 70,000.

Evanton, a Ross-shire village, 6 miles NE. of Dingwall. Pop. 400.

Evenlode, a river of Gloucester and Oxford shires, flowing 35 miles SE. to the Thames.

Everest, Mount, a peak of the Himalayas, in Nepal, and the highest ascertained point on the globe's surface, attains 29,002 feet above the sea, in 27° 59′ 12″ N. lat., and 86° 58′ 6″ E. long. It was named in honour of Sir George Everest (1790–1866), surveyor-general of India.

Everett, (1) a manufacturing town of Massachusetts, 3 miles N. of Boston; pop. 33,500.—(2) A lumber and mineral port of Washington; pop. 25,000.

Everglades. See Florida.

Eversley, a Hampshire parish, 13 miles NE. of Basingstoke. Charles Kingsley was curate and rector from 1842 till his death in 1875, and he rests in the churchyard.

Everton, a NE. district of Liverpool.

Evesham (Eevz'am), a borough of Worcestershire, on the right bank of the navigable Avon, 15 miles SE. of Worcester. It lies in a fertile vale, and the chief industry is market-gardening. There are a fine modern bridge, public gardens, water-works (1884), a 16th-century guildhall, &c.; the stately Benedictine abbey (709) is represented chiefly by a beautiful Perpendicular belfry (1533). Till 1867 Evesham returned two members, till 1885 one. Simon de Montfort was defeated here, 4th August 1265. Pop. 8300.

Évian-les-Bains, a French town in Haute Savoie, on the Lake of Geneva, has mineral springs; pop. 2500.

E'vora (anc. Ebora), the capital of the Portuguese province of Alemtejo, 72 miles E. of Lisbon by rail. It is surrounded by ruinous walls and incomplete modern fortifications. A very ancient city, it has an archiepiscopal cathedral (1186) and a Roman temple, an old aqueduct, and a beautiful tower, the two last partly demolished. There are some manufactures of cotton, cloth, and hats, and a trade in wine. Pop. 18,000.

Évreux (Ayv-ruh'; named from the anc. Eburovices), the capital of the French dep. of Eure, in the fertile valley of the Iton, a feeder of the Eure, 67 miles by rail WNW. of Paris. Among its buildings are the cruciform cathedral (11th to 18th c.); St Taurin's, with the 13th-century shrine of that saint, the first Bishop of Évreux; the episcopal palace (1484); and the 'Tour de l'Horloge,' of the same century. Évreux manufactures paper, linen, &c. Population, about 13,000. At the neighbouring village of Vieil Évreux excavations have disclosed remains of a theatre, an aqueduct, baths, &c.

Ewe, a river and sea-loch of NW. Ross-shire, the former running 3¼ miles from Loch Maree to the sea-loch (10 × 3 miles) at Poolewe.

Ewes Water, a Dumfriesshire stream, flowing 8 miles S. by W. to the Esk at Langholm.

Exe, a river of Somerset and Devon, rising in Exmoor, and flowing 54 miles SE. and S. to the English Channel at Exmouth. The lower 5 miles form a tideway a mile broad, with wooded shores. An ancient canal connects the estuary with Exeter. Tributaries are the Barle (24 miles), which also rises in Exmoor, Batham, Loman, Culm, and Creedy. The Exe passes Dulverton, Bampton, Exeter, and Topsham.

Ex'eter, the capital of Devonshire, 171 miles by rail WSW. of London, and 75 SW. of Bristol. Dominated by higher hills, it is built on the summit and slopes of a flat ridge, rising 150 feet from the left bank of the Exe; and, having been modernised chiefly in its suburbs, it is a pleasant antique city. The quaint old High and Fore Streets, crossed by North and South Streets, still follow the line of the Ickneld Way; and the walls in great part remain, though their four gateways were demolished between 1769 and 1819, and though Rougemont Castle (1068) was almost all swept away in 1774. In 932 Athelstan founded here a Benedictine monastery, and hither in 1050 Edward the Confessor translated the western bishopric from Crediton; but St Peter's Cathedral was not begun till sixty-two years afterwards. Measuring 408 feet by 76 (or 140 across the transepts), and 66 feet high, it is a long, low edifice, with massive transeptal towers—a feature imitated at Ottery St Mary, but otherwise unique. These towers, 140 feet high, are the original Norman ones, but the rest of the pile, rebuilt between 1280 and 1369, is mainly in the purest Geometrical Decorated. Special features are the exterior western screen (c. 1388), adorned with sixty-seven statues of saints and princes; the beautiful choir-screen (1324), surmounted by the fine organ (1665); the minstrels' gallery (1353); a clock, dating from 1317 or earlier; the Great Peter bell, brought from Llandaff in 1482, recast in 1616, and weighing 12,500 lb.; and the chapter-house (1420–78), containing 8000 MSS. and early books. The picturesque guildhall (1464) has a cinque-cento façade (1593); of modern buildings, the most noteworthy are the Devon and Exeter Hospital (1743), the Lunatic Asylum (1865), the Albert Memorial Museum (1868), and the University College (new buildings, 1911). A ship-canal (1563–1827) extends 5 miles to the tideway at Topsham; and Exeter has large nurseries and manufactures of gloves, agricultural implements, &c., besides being the chief mart of 'Honiton' lace. The 'ever loyal city' got its earliest charter from Henry II. some time prior to 1162; in 1537 was made a county of itself, in 1888 a county borough; and in 1885 lost one of its two members. Pop. of mun. borough (as extended in 1900), 49,000; parl. borough, 58,000. The Celtic Caerwisc, the Roman Isca Damnoniorum, and in 876 the Exanceaster of the West Saxons, who till 926 shared it with the Britons, Exeter was six times captured between 876 and 1646, and three other times besieged. Natives were Archbishop Baldwin, Cardinal Langton (doubtfully), John Vowel or Hoker, the historian of Exeter (1525–1601), the Judicious Hooker, Sir Thomas Bodley, and Henrietta of Orleans. See works by P. Freeman (1873), E. Freeman (1887), and Worthy (1892).

Exmoor Forest, in the west of Somersetshire and north-east of Devon, is a wild, mostly uncultivated waste, consisting of long ranges of steep hills and lonely valleys, and bordered by deep wooded glens. The hills rise in Dunkery Beacon to 1707 feet, in Chapman Barrow to 1540, and in Span Head to 1610. The 'forest' proper is about 25 sq. m. in area, but with the adjacent commons Exmoor extends over 100. The outlines are less bold and rugged, and the general aspect far less stern and desolate than that of Dartmoor, ribbed and spread with granite. Though 'improvements' were attempted in 1818, and many trees planted by Mr J. Knight, who had purchased the forest from the crown, Exmoor is still in the main covered with grass, bracken, and heather, with dangerous bogs near the hilltops. Where it ranges down to the coast near Lynton, the scenery is very bold and picturesque. The Exe, Barle, Mole, and the two Lyns are the chief streams rising here. Gold has been found in Northmolton parish, and copper-mines have been worked there from time to time. There is a native breed of very small ponies, known as Exmoor ponies, stout and hardy, as well as a local breed of horned sheep of high quality; and Exmoor is the only place in England where the red deer still run wild. Staghounds have been kept here and stag-hunting followed since at least 1598. Exmoor is the chief scene in Blackmore's Lorna Doone, which is based largely on local traditions, and which abounds with admirable descriptions of its most characteristic scenery. See also works by H. B. Hall (1849), C. P. Collyns (1862), J. Fortescue (1886), E. J. Rawle (1893), Snell (1903), and MacDermot (1911).

Exmouth, a Devonshire watering-place, at the east side of the mouth of the Exe, 11 miles by rail SSE. of Exeter. A sheltered spot, with fine climate, good beach, and beautiful views, it had dwindled from a considerable seaport to a poor fishing-village, when, about the beginning of the 18th century, it rose into repute as a seaside resort; and now it has terraces, hotels, baths, promenades, and pleasure-grounds along the seashore, and docks constructed in 1869. Population, 12,000. See Webb's Memorials of Exmouth (1873).

Exuma. See Bahamas.

Eyam (pron. Eem), a village in North Derbyshire, 5 miles N. of Bakewell. Pop. of parish, 1200, chiefly engaged in lead-mining. By a visitation (1665–66) of the plague, then raging in London, 260 out of a population of 350 perished. See Wood's History of Eyam (4th ed. 1865).

Eye (A.S. ig, 'island'), a municipal borough of Suffolk, 20 miles N. of Ipswich. It has a fine Perpendicular flint-work church, with a tower 101 feet high, a small ruined castle, a corn exchange, and a grammar-school. Till 1885 it returned one member. Pop. 2000.

Eyemouth, a fishing-town of Berwickshire, 8 miles by rail NNW. of Berwick-on-Tweed. A new harbour was formed in 1885–87. Pop. 2500.

Eylau (I'low), a town (pop. 3500), 23 miles S. of Königsberg by rail. Here Napoleon repulsed the Russians and Prussians, February 8, 1807. The place is called Preussisch-Eylau, to distinguish it from Deutsch-Eylau (pop. 9000), 89 miles NE. of Bromberg.

Eyre, Lake, a salt lake of South Australia, lying due N. of Spencer Gulf, at an altitude of 79 feet, and with an area of 3706 sq. m. Except in the rainy season, it is generally a mere salt-marsh. Eyre discovered it in 1840.

Eyrecourt, a Galway village, 12 miles SE. of Ballinasloe.

Eyria Peninsula, a rich pastoral district on the south coast of South Australia, triangular in shape, its base being formed by the Gawler Range, whilst its sides are washed by Spencer Gulf and the Great Australian Bight.

FABRIANO (Fabreeâh'no), a cathedral city of Italy, at the eastern base of the Apennines, 44 miles by rail SW. of Ancona. It has paper and parchment manufactories (established 1564). Pop. 25,000.

Faenza (Fah-en'tza; anc. Faventia), an Italian town, 31 miles SE. of Bologna by rail, has an imposing cathedral, an arcaded market-place, and numerous palaces. Its manufacture of faience has declined, and its chief industries now are silk, linen, and paper. Pop. 25,000.

Fahlun. See Falun.

Faifley, an eastern suburb of Duntocher (q.v.), Dumbartonshire.

Fail, Ayrshire, 1¼ mile NNW. of Tarbolton, the seat of a friary (1252).

Failsworth, a Lancashire urban district, 4½ miles NE. of Manchester. Pop. 16,000.

Faioum. See Fayum.

Fairford, a village of Gloucestershire, 9 miles E. of Cirencester. Its fine 15th-century church is famous for its splendid twenty-eight stained-glass windows, often attributed to Dürer, but really of Flemish workmanship. Keble was a native. Pop. of parish, 1400.

Fair Head, or Benmore, a precipitous promontory (636 feet) of the north coast of Antrim, Ireland, opposite Rathlin Isle.

Fair Isle, a solitary Shetland island, 24 miles SSW. of Sumburgh Head. It is 3 miles long by 2 broad, and 3 sq. m. in area, with high rocky cliffs and promontories, rising to 480 feet in the Sheep Craig. Pop. 140, chiefly engaged in fishing, or knitting parti-coloured woollen articles—the latter art said to have been learnt from sailors of one of the ships of the Spanish Armada, which was shipwrecked here (1588).

Fairlie, a coast-village of Ayrshire, on the Firth of Clyde, 2¾ miles S. by E. of Largs. It is famous for its yacht-building. Pop. 600.

Fairlight, a Sussex coast-parish, 2½ miles ENE. of Hastings.

Fairnilee, a Selkirkshire mansion, on the Tweed, 5¼ miles NNW. of Selkirk. Alison Cockburn, author of The Flowers of the Forest, was born here.

Faizabad (Fyzabad'), capital of the Afghan dependency of Badakhshan (q.v.), on the Kokcha, 180 miles NE. of Kabul. It is noted for its rubies. —For the Indian town, see Fyzabad.

Faizpur, a town of Bombay presidency, 200 miles E. of Surat. Pop. 9640.

Fakenham, a Norfolk market-town, on the Wensum, 9½ miles S. of Wells. Pop. of parish, 3200.—Great Fakenham, a Suffolk parish, on the Brandon, 5¾ miles SSE. of Thetford, is described by Bloomfield in his Farmer's Boy. Pop. 160.

Falaise, a town in the French dep. of Calvados, on the Ante, 23 miles (by rail 31) SSE. of Caen. Crowning a rocky platform, with steep cliff or falaise, stands the noble ruined castle of the dukes of Normandy, the birthplace of William the Conqueror. Pop. 5000.

Falcón, a maritime state of Venezuela (q.v.).

Falemé, an important tributary of the Senegal, rising in Futa-Jallon, and flowing northward to a point above Bakel.

Falkirk, a town of Stirlingshire, 3 miles SW. of its seaport Grangemouth, 22 NE. of Glasgow, and 26 WNW. of Edinburgh. Including now the suburbs of Grahamston, Bainsford, Laurieston, and Camelon, it was constituted a parliamentary burgh in 1832, and with Airdrie, Hamilton, Lanark, and Linlithgow returns one member. Its parish church—the Eglais Bhrec, Varia Capella, or Faw ('speckled') Kirk of chartularies and local tradition—was rebuilt in 1810. The famous cattle 'trysts' or fairs, where stock was sold to an annual value of £1,000,000, have been largely superseded by the weekly auctions. The iron manufacture is carried on busily at Carron (q.v.), &c. There are electric tramways. Pop. 33,600. At Falkirk on 22d July 1298 Edward I. disastrously defeated Wallace, and on 17th January 1746 Prince Charles Edward defeated Hawley. Antoninus' Wall (q.v.) is the chief antiquity.

Falkland, a royal burgh (since 1458) of Fife, at the NE. base of the steep East Lomond Hill (1471 feet), 22 miles N. of Edinburgh. Nothing remains of the old castle of the Earls of Fife, in which David, Duke of Rothesay, was starved to death (1402); but there are stately remains of the later royal palace (c. 1450–1542). It was the deathplace of James V. With the estate and a modern mansion (1844), it was purchased in 1888 by the Marquis of Bute, and by him elaborately restored. Pop. 830. See Wood's Historical Description of Falkland (Kirkcaldy, 1888).

Falkland Islands, a British colony in the South Atlantic, 250 miles E. of Patagonia. The group consists of East Falkland and West Falkland, with about 100 small islands, besides the dependencies of South Georgia (q.v.), the South Shetlands, the South Orkneys, the South Sandwich group, and Graham Land. Many of the islands are occupied only by myriads of penguins. Pop. 3300. The shores are deeply indented, and contain many good harbours; the surface culminates in Mount Adam (2315 feet); small streams and lakes are numerous; there are no trees; brown cannel is found, and peat plentiful. The climate is healthy, resembling that of the Orkneys, but is characterised by severe gales and abundance of moisture. The industries are sheep-breeding and whaling. Wool, frozen meat, live sheep, tallow, skins, and hides are exported. The capital is Stanley (pop. 800), on East Falkland. The group, sighted by Davis in 1592, was renamed in 1689 by Captain Strong after his friend Lord Falkland. It was definitely occupied by Great Britain in 1833, and utilised as a penal colony until 1852.

Fall River, a busy manufacturing city and port of entry of Massachusetts, at the mouth of the Taunton River, 49 miles S. of Boston by rail. It has a deep and capacious harbour, and is well built, the handsome city-hall and many other buildings being constructed of a fine granite quarried in the vicinity. Fall River is noted for its cotton-mills, other manufactures being nails and machinery. Abundant water-power is supplied by a tributary of the Taunton, which falls 130 feet in its last half-mile. Pop. 120,000.

Falmouth, a Cornish seaport, on the south side of the Fal's estuary, 18 miles NNE. of the Lizard, and 66 by a branch line (1863) WSW. of Plymouth. The harbour, one of the best in England, is 5 miles long by 1 to 2 miles wide, and 12 to 18 fathoms deep. The entrance is defended on the west by Pendennis Castle (c. 1544), which crowns a rock 198 feet high, and which in 1646 surrendered to Fairfax after a five months' siege; on the east, by St Mawes Castle (1543). Pop. of municipal borough (1881) 5973; (1911) 13,132 (within boundary as extended in 1892); of the parliamentary borough of Penryn and Falmouth, since 1885 returning only one member, 17,624. From 1688 to 1850 Falmouth was a principal packet-station for foreign mails. There is a considerable pilchard-fishery. The chief exports are tin, copper, pilchards, and fuel. Here orange and lemon trees yield plenty of fruit on open garden-walls. Falmouth has arisen since 1613, and was incorporated in 1661; once it was a stronghold of Quakerism. See works by C. J. (Truro, 1876) and Caroline Fox (1882).

False Bay. See CAPE PROVINCE.

False Point, a cape and a good harbour of Orissa, 43 miles E. of Cuttack by canal.

Falster, a Danish island in the Baltic, south of Zealand. Area, 183 sq. m.; pop. 40,000.

Falun, or FAHLUN, a town of Sweden, 57 miles W. of Gefle by rail. It has for over six centuries been famous for its copper-mines, though the annual yield of ore has dwindled from 3150 tons in 1650 to about 400 tons. The excavations extend for miles underground. Pop. 11,600.

Famagosta, or FAMAGUSTA, a reviving seaport on the east coast of Cyprus, on the supposed site of ancient Arsinoë. Pop. 4300.

Fanning, or AMERICAN ISLAND, a coral island in the Pacific, 3° 51′ N. lat. and 159° 22′ W. long., British since 1888, a cable station with a good harbour. Area, 15 sq. m.; pop. 200. The name Fanning Islands is sometimes given to the group comprising Fanning, Christmas, New York or Washington, Jarvis, and Palmyra Islands.

Fano (Fâh-no; Lat. Fanun Fortunæ, from the temple of Fortune commemorating Hasdrubal's defeat on the Metaurus), a seaport of Italy, on the Adriatic, 29 miles NW. of Ancona by rail. It has a cathedral, and a marble triumphal arch raised in honour of Augustus. Pop. 12,000.

Fareham, an urban district and watering-place of Hampshire, on a creek at the north-west end of Portsmouth harbour, 9 miles NW. of Portsmouth. It has earthenware, sack-cloth, and rope manufactures. Pop. 10,000.

Farewell, CAPE, a bluff nearly 1000 feet high, on an island off the southern extremity of Greenland, in 59° 44′ N. lat. and 43° 54′ W. long.

Fargo, capital of Cass county, North Dakota, on the Red River of the North, 254 miles W. of Duluth by rail. From an insignificant village in 1874 it has become the commercial centre of the state. Flour is the chief manufacture. A fire in 1893 did immense damage. Pop. 14,300.

Faribault (Far-ee-bo'), capital of Rice county, Minnesota, on the Cannon River, 53 miles S. of St Paul by rail. It manufactures flour, bricks, furniture, &c. Pop. 10,000.

Faridkot (Fa-reed-kote'), one of the Sikh cis-Sutlej states, SE. of Firozpur. Area, 643 sq. m.; pop. 130,000. The town of Faridkot (pop. 7000) is 60 miles SSE. of Lahore.

Faridpur, a town in the delta of the Ganges, 110 miles NE. of Calcutta. Pop. 10,263.

Faringdon, a town of Berks, 36 miles WNW. of Reading. Pop. 3000.

Farnborough, an urban district on the east border of Hampshire, 32 miles SW. of London, contains part of the camp of Aldershot (q.v.) and the Royal Aircraft Factory. Near it is Farnborough Hill, the residence of the Empress Eugénie, with the mausoleum of her husband and her son. Pop. 14,200.

Farne, Fearne, or Ferne Isles, or the STAPLES, a group of seventeen islets and rocks (area, 80 acres), 2 to 5 miles off the Northumbrian coast, opposite Bamborough. There are two lighthouses, and on House Island are remains of a Benedictine priory, dedicated to St Cuthbert. Here Grace Darling rescued the survivors of the Forfarshire (1838).

Farnham, a town of Surrey, on the Wey, 38 miles SW. of London by rail. The old castle of the bishops of Winchester, razed by Henry III., and afterwards rebuilt, was garrisoned by Charles I., and restored in 1684 to its present state by Bishop Morley. A handsome Italian town-hall was built in 1866. Moor Park, the seat of Sir William Temple, with memories of Swift and 'Stella,' is in the vicinity; so, too, are the remains of Waverley Abbey (1128), whose Annales Waverlienses suggested to Scott the name of his first romance. The chief trade is in hops, a very fine variety being grown here. Toplady and Cobbett were natives. Aldershot Camp (q.v.) is 3 miles NE. Pop. 7400.

Farnworth, a Lancashire urban district, 12 miles ESE. of Liverpool. It manufactures sail-canvas, watches, files, &c. Pop, 28,000.

Faro, the capital of the Portuguese province of Algarve, on the south coast, behind three islands which form a good roadstead. It was burned by the English in 1596, and partly destroyed by the earthquake of 1755. Pop. 13,000.

Faroe Islands (Dan. Faar-Öer, 'sheep islands'), a Danish group of islands, twenty-two in number, of which seventeen are inhabited, lying between the Shetlands and Iceland, 200 miles NW. of the former, in 61° 25′—62° 25′ N. lat., and 6° 19′—7° 40′ W. long. Area, 540 sq. m.; population, about 18,000. Seaward they present precipitous cliffs, 1000 to 2300 feet high, whilst inland they rise into flat-topped pyramidal mountains, which attain 2502 feet in Strömö and 2895 in Österö. The currents that run through the sounds are swift and dangerous; storms and whirlwinds are frequent; and the harbours and anchorages in the fjords and bays are not very secure, but, on the other hand, nearly always free from ice. The islands yield peat and coal. Trees there are none, owing to the storms; timber for building purposes is imported from Norway. The principal sources of wealth are sheep-farming, wild-fowling, and fishing; and the products of these, including wool, feathers, salt and dried fish, train-oil, and skins, are the principal exports. The largest islands are Strömö (28 miles long by 8 broad), Österö, Vaagö, Sandö, and Süderö. The capital of the group is Thorshavn in Strömö, with 2000 inhabitants; Kirkebö, on the same island, was formerly the seat of a bishop. The inhabitants, of Norse descent, are Lutherans, and speak an Old Norse dialect, though modern Danish is the language of law-courts, churches, and schools. Since 1854 they have enjoyed a certain amount of self-government. From the time of their first colonisation in the 9th century the Faroe Islands belonged to Norway down to 1380, in which year they passed to Denmark.

Farrar, a river of Ross and Inverness shires, flowing 28 miles eastward, and uniting with the Glass to form the Beauly.

Farringford, Freshwater, near the western extremity of the Isle of Wight, 2½ miles SW. of Yarmouth, a home from 1853 of the poet Tennyson.

Fars, or FARSISTAN (anc. Persis), a sparsely peopled province of Persia, bordering on the Persian Gulf. Area, 53,500 sq. m. The capital is Shiraz; the port, Bushire, on the Persian Gulf.

Farsley, a town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 4 miles NE. of Bradford. Pop. 6000.

Farukhabad, a city of the United Provinces of India, near the right bank of the Ganges, 83 miles NW. of Cawnpore. Pop. 68,000.

Fasano (Fa-zâh'no), a town of Italy, 35 miles NW. of Brindisi by rail. Pop. 20,000.

Fasher, a province of Dar-Fûr (q.v.).

Fatshan, an important manufacturing city of China, 6 miles SW. of Canton. Pop. 450,000.

Fauldhouse, a mining-town of Linlithgowshire, 7 miles WSW. of West Calder. Pop. 3200.

Favara, a town of Sicily, 4 miles SE. of Girgenti. Pop. 25,000.

Faversham, an ancient municipal borough and river-port of Kent, 52 miles by rail ESE. of London, and 10 WNW. of Canterbury. It has a valuable oyster-fishery, and the creek on which it stands admits vessels of 200 tons. In the vicinity are important powder-mills. Population, about 10,600. As Favresfield it was a seat of the Saxon kings, where Athelstan in 930 held a Witenagemot. It has scanty remains of a Clugniac abbey founded (1147) by King Stephen, whose tomb is pointed out in the parish church, a fine cruciform building, with a spire 148 feet high. Near it is the house of 'Arden of Feversham,' whose murder by his wife in 1551 forms the theme of an anonymous tragedy (1592). A grammar-school (1527) was rebuilt outside the town in 1879. In 1688 James II. was seized at Faversham, attempting to flee to France. See local histories by Jacob (1774) and Giraud (1876).

Fayal (Fī-al'), one of the Azores (q.v.), with an area of 69 sq. m., and a pop. of 25,000, attains 3000 feet in height, and on its SE. coast has a safe bay with the town of Horta.

Fayetteville, capital of Cumberland county, North Carolina, at the head of navigation on the Cape Fear River, 82 miles by rail (55 direct) S. of Raleigh. Pop. 7000.

Fayyûm, or FAYOUM (Fī-yoom'; Egypt. Phiom, 'marsh-land'), a province of Egypt (pop. 380,000), a nearly circular basin or oasis, about 30 miles in diameter, or 670 sq. m. in area, sunk beneath the level of the Libyan desert, 50 miles SW. of Cairo, and connected with the Nile Valley by a narrow pass, through which an ancient canal pours the fertilising water which renders the Fayyûm one of the most productive parts of Egypt. The irrigation was anciently regulated by a large reservoir, called Lake Mœris (q.v.), and the overflow now forms the large sheet of brackish water, 35 miles long, known as the Birket-el-Karn, which marks the eastern boundary of the oasis. On the banks of Lake Mœris was the famous 'labyrinth,' reckoned one of the wonders of the world—a vast palace whose remains are seen in the ruins near the brick pyramid of Hawâra. For recent explorations in Fayyûm, see Petrie's Hawâra, Biahma, and Arsinoë (1889), and Grenfell's Fayum Towns (1901).

Fear, CAPE, the most southerly point of North Carolina, forms the southern extremity of Smith's Island, at the mouth of the Cape Fear River.—Cape Fear River, formed by the Deep and Haw rivers, runs 250 miles SE. to the Atlantic.

Fearne Islands. See FARNE.

Feather River, California, rises in two forks in the Sierra Nevada, and flows 250 miles S. to the Sacramento.

Featherstone, a Yorkshire urban district, 2½ miles W. by S. of Pontefract. In a coal-strike riot here (1893) two men were killed and six others wounded. Pop. 14,400.

Fécamp (Fay-kon^{g}'), a town and seaport in the French dep. of Seine-Inférieure, 28 miles NNE. of Havre by rail. It has a fine abbey church (c. 1220), cotton-mills, sugar-refineries, tanneries, shipbuilding-yards, &c. Population, 16,000.

Fehrbellin, a town of Prussia, with 2000 inhabitants, 40 miles NW. of Berlin by rail. Here the Great Elector defeated the Swedes in 1675. A tower (1879) marks the battlefield.

Felaniche, or FELANITX, a town of the island of Majorca. Pop. 12,000.

Felegyhaza, a town of Hungary, 80 miles SE. of Budapest by rail. Pop. 35,000.

Felixstowe, a coast-village of Suffolk, 10½ miles by rail SE. of Ipswich. It is named from a priory (1105), dedicated to St Felix, a Burgundian, the first bishop of Dunwich (631–647). With a fine beach for bathing, a pier, good golf-links, and many Roman remains near by, the place is rapidly becoming a popular resort. Pop. with Walton, 1 mile to the west, 8700.

Felstead, an Essex village, 3½ miles ESE. of Dunmow. It has a richly-endowed grammar-school (1554). Pop. of parish, 2000.

Fergus, a river of County Clare, flowing 25 miles SE. to the Shannon.

Fermanagh (Ferman'a), an Irish county in the south-west of Ulster, 45 miles long by 29 broad; area, 714 sq. m., one-fourth arable and one-half pasture. The surface is mostly a succession of hills, culminating in Cuilcagh (2188 feet). Some coal, iron, and marble occur. The chief river is the Erne. Fermanagh is divided into 8 baronies and 23 parishes; it returns two members. Pop. (1851) 116,047; (1911) 61,836 (34,740 Catholics). Enniskillen is the county town.

Fermo (anc. Firmum), a town of Italy, 36 miles SSE. of Ancona. It is the seat of an archbishop, and once had a university. Pop. 20,000. Its port is Porto San Giorgio (pop. 5000), on the Adriatic.

Fermoy, a town in County Cork, Ireland, on the Blackwater, here spanned by a noble bridge (1866), 19 miles NE. of Cork city. In the 12th century it became the seat of a Cistercian abbey; but the present town was the creation of a Scotch merchant towards the close of the 18th century. It contains a Catholic cathedral, St Colman's College, and barracks for 3000 men. Population, 7000.

Fernandina (Fernandee'na), a port of entry and capital of Nassau county, Florida, on an island 28 miles NNE. of Jacksonville. It is the seat of the Episcopal bishop of Florida, and a popular bathing-resort. Pop. 7000.

Fernando Noronha (Noron'ya), a Brazilian volcanic island in the Atlantic, in 3° 50′ S. lat., and 32° 25′ W. long. Measuring 5½ by 1¼ miles, it is cultivated by 2000 Brazilian convicts.

Fernando Po, an island on the west coast of Africa, in the Bight of Biafra, and in 2° 39′ N. lat. Area, 739 sq. m. Its northern half is almost entirely occupied by the volcanic peak (9300 feet) known to the English as Mount Clarence, to the Spaniards as Pico Santa Isabel. The island is covered with luxuriant vegetation. The average annual temperature at Santa Isabel, the capital (pop. 1500), is 78° F. The island is inhabited by 20,000 Bubis, a Bantu tribe, and some negroes. Discovered by the Portuguese in 1472, the island has belonged successively to Spain (1777–1827), England, and Spain (since 1841).

Ferrandina (Ferrandee'na), a town of Italy, 43 miles ESE. of Potenza by rail. Pop. 8000.

Ferrara (Ferrâh'ra), capital of the Italian province of the same name, in the marshy delta of the Po, 30 miles from the Adriatic, and 29 NE. of Bologna by rail. First made a walled city in 604, it still is fortified with walls, bastions, ditches, and a citadel. It has a cathedral, a small university (1264), and the old ducal palace of the Estes, built in the Gothic style in the 14th and 15th centuries. Under the patronage of the Dukes of Este, Ferrara produced a good school of painters; in literature it is closely associated with Tasso, Ariosto, and Guarini, who, as well as Savonarola, was born at Ferrara. At the height of its prosperity, Ferrara had 100,000 inhabitants. It was subject to the House of Este from the close of the 12th century until 1598, when it passed to Pope Clement VIII. In 1860 it was incorporated in the kingdom of Italy. Pop. 95,000.

Ferro, or HIERRO, the most westerly of the Canary Islands (q.v.), was selected as a first meridian by a scientific congress called together at Paris by Richelieu in 1630.

Ferrol, a Spanish seaport in Galicia, stands on a narrow arm of the sea, 11 miles by water and 33 by rail NE. of Corunna. A poor fishing-town until 1752, it is now one of the strongest fortified places in the kingdom, its large arsenal comprising dockyards, naval workshops, &c. The harbour is safe and capacious, and has a very narrow entrance, defended by two forts. The town manufactures naval stores, linen, cotton, and leather. In 1805 a French fleet was defeated by the English off Ferrol, which was taken by the French in 1809 and 1823, and in 1872 was the scene of a republican rising. Pop. 26,000.

Ferryden, a Forfar fishing-village, at the South Esk's mouth, opposite Montrose. Pop. 1200.

Fesa, or FASA, a town of Persia, 60 miles SE. of Shiraz. Pop. 18,000.

Festiniog, an urban district of Merionethshire, Wales, 22 miles by rail WNW. of Bala, and 3½ S. of Blaenau-Festiniog. Standing amid waterfalls and mountains (the loftiest Moelwyn, 2529 feet), it is a great tourist centre. Blaenau-Festiniog, 27 miles SSW. of Llandudno Junction, and 13 NE. of Port Madoc by the 'Toy Railway' (1869), is a town of recent growth, inhabited chiefly by slate-quarrymen. Pop. (1851) 3460; (1881) 11,274; (1911) 9674.

Fettercairn, a Kincardineshire village, 12 miles NNW. of Montrose. Pop. 300.

Fettes College (Fet'tez), a fine Gothic public school (1870), on the N. side of Edinburgh.

Fez, or FAZ, one of the capitals of the sultanate of Morocco, in the French zone, lies in a hill-girt valley, 100 miles E. of Rabat on the Atlantic. With crumbling walls, and narrow, dirty, sunless streets, Fez has for over a thousand years been one of the sacred cities of Islam, renowned for its university and schools of learning. The university, attached to the venerated mosque of the Cherubim or of Muley Edris, is frequented by 1500 pupils from all parts of the Mohammedan world, and has about forty professors. Attached to this mosque is a library, containing 30,000 MSS. The extensive palace of the sultan is now partly in ruins. Although thus falling into decay, Fez is nevertheless one of the busiest commercial towns of north-west Africa; its merchants import European manufactured wares, which they despatch by caravans to Timbuktu and the interior of Africa, and export fruits, gums, gold, morocco leather, fez caps, pottery, and gold and silver wares. The pop. is very variously estimated from 150,000 to 54,000. Fez was founded by Muley Edris in 808. From 1086 it was the capital of an Almoravid kingdom, and ranked, both as a sacred city and for its learning, as one of the first cities of Islam. Incorporated with Morocco in 1548, it decayed. It was occupied by a French relieving force in 1911.

Fezzan, a region of Italian Libya, to the south of Tripoli, transferred with it from Turkey by the Treaty of Ouchy after the war of 1911-12. Extending some 390 miles N. and S., and 300 E. and W., Fezzan belongs to the desert region of North Africa. It consists of a huge depression, fenced in on all sides except the west by ranges of hills (2000 to 3000 feet high), and traversed by barren, stony, shelterless plateaus, between which lie long shallow valleys, containing numerous fertile oases. The entire region slopes gently towards the east. The oases, mostly depressions in the valleys, are the only cultivated spots, where a little grain and a few vegetables are raised, and where grows the date-palm, the principal source of food. The climate is on the whole uniform and healthy, although malarial fever is very frequent. Fezzan is both hotter in summer and colder in winter than Tripoli; its temperature ranges from 23° to 112°, the annual mean being 70° F. The atmosphere is very dry; rain scarcely ever falls. There is no export trade except in soda, obtained from extensive salt lakes north-west of Murzuk. The 50,000 inhabitants are a mixed race. In religion they are Sunnite Mohammedans. The principal town is Murzuk (pop. 6500).

Ffestiniog. See FESTINIOG.

Fichtelgebirge (Fihh'tel-ge-beer'geh, g's hard), a mountain-system of NE. Bavaria, once covered with pines (Fichte, 'pine'), the watershed of the Elbe, Rhine, and Danube. It culminates in Schneeberg (3461 feet) and Ochsenkopf (3334).

Fidra, an islet with a lighthouse, 2½ miles WNW. of North Berwick.

Field Place. See HORSHAM.

Fiesole (Fyay'zo-lay; Lat. Fæsulæ), one of the most ancient of Etruscan cities, 3 miles NE. of Florence. It has a cyclopean wall, a Roman amphitheatre, a cathedral (1028), &c. Pop. 3000.

Fife, a peninsular Scottish county, washed by the Firth of Tay, the German Ocean, and the Firth of Forth. Its extreme length is 42 miles, its extreme breadth 21, and its area 513 sq. m. The surface offers a succession of cultivated vales and hills, the most prominent eminences being the East and West Lomonds (1471 and 1713 feet), Largo Law (965), and Burntisland Bin (632). Almost the only streams are the Eden (30 miles long) and the Leven (16); whilst of seven lakelets the chief are Kilconquhar Loch (4 by 3 furlongs) and Lindores Loch (7 by 3). Coal is largely mined, besides shale, ironstone, limestone, and freestone. The soil is some of it very fertile, especially in the Howe of Fife, or Stratheden; and whilst barely one-fourth of the whole of Scotland is in cultivation, in Fife the proportion is nearly three-fourths. Many towns and fishing-villages skirt its shores—Culross, Inverkeithing, Burntisland, Kinghorn, Kirkcaldy, Dysart, Leven, Largo, Elie, St Monans, Pittenweem, the Anstruthers, Kilrenny, Crail, St Andrews, Ferryport, Newport, and Newburgh. Inland lie Cupar, Dunfermline, Falkland, Lochgelly, &c. Under those towns, as also under Balcarres, Balmerino, Cults, Leuchars, Lindores, and Magus Muir, are noticed the manufactures, the chief antiquities, the illustrious natives, and the outstanding points in the peaceful history of the 'Kingdom of Fife.' Fife, exclusive of parliamentary burghs, returns two members to parliament. Pop. 267,739. See works by Sibbald (1710), Wood (1862), Æ. Mackay (1890), Geddie (1894), and A. H. Millar (1895).

Fife Ness, the eastmost point of Fife, is a low headland. A mile NNE. in the sea is the dangerous Carr Reef, with (since 1886) a lightship.

Figeac (Fee-zhak'), a town in the French dep. of Lot, 32 miles ENE. of Cahors. Pop. 4000.

Figueira (Fee-gay'ee-ra), a watering-place in the Portuguese province of Beira, at the mouth of the Mondego, 23 miles W. by S. of Coimbra. Pop. 7500.

Figueras (Fee-gay'ras), a town in the north-east corner of Spain, 25 miles N. of Gerona by rail, below the fortress of San Fernando. Pop. 12,000.

Fiji Islands (Fee-jee), a British crown colony of the South Pacific Ocean, in 15°—22° S. lat. and 176° E.—178° W. long. Their nearest neighbours are the Tonga or Friendly Islands, 200 to 300 miles to the south-east; and they are about 700 from New Caledonia, 1100 from Auckland in New Zealand, 1700 from Sydney, and 4700 from San Francisco. The island of Rotumah, 250 miles N. by W., has been since 1881 included in the colony. The islands were sighted in 1643 by Tasman; and Turtle Island (or Vatoa), in the extreme south-east, was discovered by Cook in 1773; but the Fiji or Viti Archipelago was little known before the 19th century. In 1804 some escaped convicts from Australia are said to have settled here; in 1835 Wesleyan missionaries first came over from Tonga; and trade in bêche-de-mer, sandalwood, &c., gradually led to a small white settlement. In 1858 the sovereignty of the islands was offered to Great Britain by the chief Thakombau; but it was not till 1874 that they were taken over. The governor is also H.M. Commissioner for the Western Pacific.

The Fiji Islands, over 200 in number, lie in a ring, open on the southern side. On the west and north are the two large islands of Viti Levu (4250 sq. m.) and Vanua Levu (2400), with a group of small islands and reefs outside them; and on the east there is a long string of small islands. The total area of the colony (including Rotumah) is 7435 sq. m., or about the same as Wales. Since 1882 the capital has been Suva, with a fine harbour, on the south coast of Viti Levu; till then Levuka, on the little island of Ovalau, off the east coast of Viti Levu, also possessing a good harbour, was the European capital. The Fiji Islands are of volcanic formation, the shape of the mountains (the highest of which attain 4500 feet) and the existence of hot springs testifying to volcanic agency; and they are surrounded by coral reefs, which act as natural breakwaters. They are well supplied with harbours, and have an abundant water-supply, a rich soil, and a climate which, though tropical and somewhat enervating to Europeans (who are subject to dysentery), is not unhealthy or extreme. They suffer, however, from the ravages of hurricanes, and earthquakes occasionally occur. Besides bananas, bread-fruit, cocoa-nut palms, &c., the products include sugar, grown with the help of Indian and Polynesian labour, maize, cotton, vanilla, tea, and coffee. The pop. in 1911 was 139,541, of whom 3700 were Europeans and 87,000 native Fijians. They are in race akin to the Papuans, but an admixture of the lighter Polynesians has, especially in the eastern islands, leavened the native Melanesian breed. The Fijians were notoriously ferocious cannibals; but now the Christian religion is almost universal in the islands, the adherents of the Wesleyans being estimated at about 100,000, and of the Roman Catholics at more than 10,000. The revenue, derived mainly from customs duties and native taxation, has varied from £65,000 in 1867 to £240,000 in 1911, in which last-mentioned year the expenditure amounted to £265,000. The exports have a total annual value of from £350,000 to £1,275,000; the imports, from £250,000 to £950,000. Sugar, in spite of the depression of the industry, is far the most important export, and next to it in value come coconuts (mainly in the dried form known as copra) and fruit. The export of cotton has greatly diminished, but that of tea has increased. The trade is almost entirely with Australia and New Zealand.

Filey, a rising watering-place on the east coast of Yorkshire, 9 miles SE. of Scarborough by rail, occupies a picturesque site on cliffs overlooking Filey Bay. It has a spa and an ancient cruciform church. Population, 3200, engaged mainly in fishing.

Finchley, a Middlesex urban district, 7¼ miles NNW. of London. Pop. 40,000.

Findhorn, (1) a beautiful Scottish river, rising among the Monadhliath Mountains at an altitude of 2800 feet, and running 62 miles north-eastward through Inverness, Nairn, and Elgin shires, till it enters the Moray Firth at Findhorn village by a triangular lagoon, 2 miles long and 2⅗ wide. Its waters abound in salmon and trout. At one place it rose nearly 50 feet in the disastrous floods of August 1829, known as the 'Moray floods.'—(2) An Elginshire seaport, 5 miles N. of Forres. Pop. 400.

Findlay, capital of Hancock county, Ohio, 37 miles SW. of Fremont, with foundries, flour-mills, &c. Pop. 15,000.

Findochty, a Banffshire fishing-village, 3½ miles W. by N. of Cullen. Pop. 1800.

Findon, a Kincardineshire village, 6 miles S. of Aberdeen. Findon (Finnan) haddocks owe their name to confusion of Findhorn with Findon.

Fingal's Cave. See STAFFA.

Finhaven, a ruined castle, Forfarshire, 5¼ miles NNE. of Forfar.

Finistère (Fee-nis-tair'; Lat. finis terræ, 'land's end'), a western dep. of France, comprehending a part of the former duchy of Brittany, and washed on three sides by the English Channel and the ocean. Area, 2585 square miles. Population, about 810,000. It is divided into the five arrondissements of Brest, Châteaulin, Morlaix, Quimper (the chief town), and Quimperlé.

Finisterre, CAPE, a promontory at the north-western extremity of Spain, off which Anson defeated the French (1747).

Finland (Finnish Suomi or Suomenmaa, 'the land of fens and lakes'), a grand-duchy annexed to Russia in 1809, which, though nominally enjoying administrative autonomy, has (since 1890 especially) been deprived of many of its most cherished privileges. Finland, which from the 13th to the 19th century belonged to Sweden, lies between 60°–70° N. lat. and 20°–32° E. long. Area, 144,255 sq. m. (a sixth larger than the United Kingdom); population, 3,000,000, of whom 2,600,000 are of the native Finnish race, 400,000 Scandinavians, 6000 Russians, and the rest Germans and Lapps. All but 50,000 Greek and 800 Roman Catholics are Lutherans. The inhabitants of Helsingfors, the capital (pop. 147,400), are mostly of Swedish descent, as is also the case at Abo (50,000), and all along the south and west coasts. About 80 per cent. are agriculturists, mostly peasant-proprietors. The coast is much indented, and studded with thousands of small islands, whilst the interior of the country is dotted with countless lakes, some of vast size, and mostly connected with each other naturally or artificially by means of canals. About 12 per cent. of the total area is occupied by lakes, and 15 per cent. by marsh and bog. The largest of the lakes—besides Lake Ladoga, of which part belongs to Russia—are Lakes Saima, Enare, Kemi, Uleå, and Päijänne. The Saima consists of 120 large lakes and several thousand smaller ones, all connected, and having a natural outlet into Lake Ladoga, over the famous Imatra Falls or Rapids—the finest in Europe both from the scenery and volume of water. Lake Saima is likewise connected with the Gulf of Finland by means of a splendid canal 36 miles long, with twenty-eight locks for a fall of 250 feet. The highest mountain is Haldefjäll, in Lapland (4126 feet high), near the frontier of Norway. From the lack of mountain-ranges, the rivers are unimportant, the principal being the Kemi and Uleå in the north, and the Kymmene in the south. In spite of rocks and rapids, they are well suited for floating logs from the forests of the interior, they drive many mills, and are also rich in fish. The forests cover three-fifths of the land-surface, and more than half of them belong to the state. Of cereals, oats are the most grown, then rye, barley, and wheat; this latter, however, rarely ripens beyond lat. 61°. The potato flourishes as far north as lat. 69°. Among wild animals we find the bear, wolf, fox, lynx, ermine, otter, and hare; the elk and beaver are now rare. Seals are plentiful along the coast, as also in the Saima and Ladoga lakes. Reindeer are employed in the far north. Finnish horses are remarkable for their speed, hardihood, and docility. Of birds there are 211 species, and of fish 80 species.

The climate of Finland is very rigorous in winter, even on the south coast, where 20° and 25° below zero (Fahrenheit) are often registered; but it is generally healthy, and, owing to the proximity of the sea, it is far milder than North Russia. The summer, though short, is occasionally very hot in June and July. The ground is generally covered with snow from the middle of November till April; then follows a brief spring, accompanied by a rapid growth of vegetation. The emperors of Russia are grand-dukes of Finland. The senate consisted of twenty members, appointed by the grand-duke from among his Finnish subjects; the diet of four chambers—nobles, clergy, burgesses, and peasantry. In 1899–1903 a series of edicts transferred some of the powers of the senate to the governor-general, introduced the Russian military system, and made Russian (to the general still a quite unknown tongue) an official language along with Finnish and Swedish (the latter the literary language of the educated). In the crisis of 1905 a national strike wrung from Russia a restoration of autonomy. For the senate and diet was substituted a single chamber, every man or woman of twenty-four years having an equal vote and being eligible. There was a reversion to the Russianising policy in 1908–11. Education in Finland is, taking all things into consideration, very advanced, upwards of 90 per cent. of the population being able to read and write; the university of Helsingfors has about 2800 students.

The railways of Finland have a total length of 2400 miles. The revenue in 1911 was £6,377,000, whilst the expenditure was about £6,242,000. The public debt of Finland amounted in 1911 to £7,000,000, nearly all expended on public works, education, and the like, and is more than balanced by the state property. Finland has a thriving commercial marine. The value of the exports (timber, butter, paper being the most important) in 1911 was £12,800,000. The imports amounted to £17,900,000, the chief items being cereals, iron and steel, coffee, textiles, and sugar. Over a fourth of Finland's trade is with Germany; Russia being second, and Great Britain third on the list. Large quantities of iron are found in Finland, and copper, tin, silver, and gold exist. Physically the Finns proper are a strong, hardy race, with round faces, square shoulders, fair hair, and blue eyes, though intermarriage with Scandinavians and Russians has in many cases caused variations. Ethnographically they belong to the Ugro-Finnic (Mongolian) stock, and their language is akin to that of the Lapps, the Voguls and Ostiaks in Siberia, and the Magyars in Hungary. Their chief literary monument is the Kalevala, an ancient epic poem composed of innumerable popular traditions and songs in the rhythm imitated by Longfellow in Hiawatha.

See the Kalevala translated by J. M. Crawford (1888); J. C. Brown, The People of Finland in Archaic Times (1893); works in French or German by Koskinen (1863), Ignatius (1878), Jonas (1886), Fisher (1899), De Windt (1902), and Frederiksen (1902); in English by Renwick (1911) and Young (1912).

Finland, Gulf of, the eastern arm of the Baltic Sea, receives the waters of the great lakes Onega and Ladoga, and is shallow and only very slightly salt. The navigation on the N. coast is very dangerous, owing to the numerous islands and shoals.

Finmarken, the most northern province of Norway. Area, 18,000 sq. m.; pop. 38,000, principally Lapps. The capital is Hammerfest.

Finnan. See Glenfinnan and Findon.

Finsbury, a parliamentary borough of north London, with three one-member divisions (Holborn, Central, East); the two latter form since 1899 the metropolitan borough of Finsbury.

Finsteraarhorn (Finsterâhr′horn), the highest peak (14,026 feet) of the Bernese Alps.

Finsterwalde (Finsterval′deh), a town of Prussia, 71 miles S. by E. of Berlin. Pop. 12,000.

Fintry Hills, Stirlingshire, 1676 feet high, and 17 miles N. by E. of Glasgow.

Fir′miny, a town in the French dep. of Loire, 9 miles SW. of St Etienne by rail. It has rich coal-mines, and manufactures nails, ribbons, buttons, &c. Pop. 15,000.

Firozabad, a decayed town of India, United Provinces, 24 miles E. of Agra. Pop. 16,000.

Firozpur, or Ferozepore, a town in the Punjab, 3½ miles from the left bank of the Sutlej, Founded, it is said, by Firoz Shah (1351–87), it had sunk into insignificance before it became in 1835 a British possession; but since then it has regained much of its former consequence. It possesses the largest arsenal in the Punjab, and a church in memory of those who fell in the Sikh wars (1845–46). Pop. 50,000.

Firozshah, a battlefield in Firozpur district, 12 miles from the Sutlej's left bank, the scene of the capture by the British of the Sikh camp, December 21, 1845.

Fisherrow. See Musselburgh.

Fisher's Hill, in the Shenandoah valley, Virginia, 30 miles S. of Winchester. Here Sheridan defeated the Confederates, 21st September 1864.

Fishguard, a seaport for Ireland (G.W.R.) and New York, one of the seven Pembroke boroughs, 14½ miles N. of Haverfordwest. The French made a small descent here in 1797. Pop. 3000.

Fishkill-on-Hudson, or Fishkill Landing, opposite Newburgh, and 58 miles N. of New York, was in 1776–86 a great military depôt. Pop. 3700.

Fitchburg, a city of Massachusetts, on the Nashua River, 50 miles WNW. of Boston. Pop. 38,000.

Fitzroy, the largest river of Western Australia, flows 380 miles to the southern end of King Sound.

Fiume (pron. Fū'mā; Illyr. Rika, Lat. Fanum Sti. Viti ad flumen), a great seaport of Hungary, at the mouth of the Fiumara, 142 miles WSW. of Agram by rail, and 35 miles ESE. of Trieste across the Istrian peninsula, stands at the head of the beautiful Gulf of Quarnero, in the Adriatic, where the Julian Alps end. Its extensive industries include manufactures of paper, torpedoes, tobacco (government factory, with over 2000 hands), sails, ropes, chemicals, starch, and liqueurs, besides a large petroleum-refinery, rice and flour mills, &c. The tunny-fisheries of the Gulf also are valuable. Fiume's chief importance, however, is as the entrepôt of a great and steadily increasing commerce. A free port from 1717 till 1891, it has a harbour with a lighthouse and several breakwaters, which was greatly improved by the Hungarian government in the years following 1872, when new moles and quays with warehouses, and petroleum and other docks, were added, with the immediate effect of increasing the trade (mainly transit) fivefold within the next twelve years. Further improvements were begun in 1888 and in 1902. Pop. 50,000.

Flamborough Head, a Yorkshire promontory, forming the northern horn of Bridlington Bay, 18 miles SE. of Scarborough (by road 24). It terminates a range of steep chalk-cliffs, 300 to 400 feet high, and pierced with many caverns. On the Head is a lighthouse, 214 feet above sea-level, and 80 feet high, seen 21 miles off. Across the peninsula runs the so-called Danes' Dyke, really an ancient British earthwork.

Flanders (Flemish Vlaenderen), the country of the Flemings, a territory lying adjacent to the North Sea, between the Scheldt and the Somme, which embraced the present Belgian provinces of East and West Flanders, the southern portion of Zealand in Holland, and the greater part of ancient Artois in France.

Flannan Islands, or The Seven Hunters, a small group of uninhabited islets off the outer Hebrides, 20 miles NW. of Gallon Head in Lewis.

Flatbush, a former village of Long Island, adjoining (now part of) Brooklyn, with an asylum.

Flattery, Cape, a headland of Washington state, U.S., washed NE. by the Strait of Juan de Fuca, and SW. by the Pacific.

Flèche, La (Flehsh), a French town, in Sarthe, on the Loir, 60 miles NW. of Tours by rail. It manufactures paper, oil, leather, &c., and since 1764 has been the seat of a famous military school (Prytanée), founded in 1607 as a Jesuit college, where Prince Eugene and Descartes were educated. Here, too, are the heart and a statue (1857) of Henri IV.; and here David Hume spent three years (1734–37). Pop. 10,000.

Fleetwood, a seaport and military station of Lancashire, at the mouth of the Wyre, 21 miles NW. of Preston by rail. Founded in 1836, it has an excellent harbour, and is a favourite resort for sea-bathing. A new dock was opened in 1877. Steamers ply daily to and from Belfast, and there is a regular service to the Isle of Man. Rossall School (q.v.) is 2 miles to the SW. Population, 16,000.

Flensborg, a seaport in the Prussian province of Sleswick-Holstein, at the extremity of Flensborg Fjord, an inlet of the Baltic, 19 miles N. of the town of Sleswick. It has iron and machine works, copper and zinc factories, shipbuilding-yards, &c.; fishing and fish-curing are also carried on. Pop. 61,000.

Flers (Flayr), a French town, in Orne, 41 miles S. of Caen by rail, with large cotton and linen spinning, bleaching, and dyeing works. Its old castle, burned down in the Chouan war, has been restored. Pop. 10,000.

Fletching, a Sussex parish, 8 miles N. of Lewes. A Palæolithic skull was found at Piltdown in 1912.

Fleurus (nearly Fleh-reece'), a town (pop. 6000) of the Belgian province of Hainault, on the Sambre, 15 miles W. of Namur. Three great battles have been fought here: (1) in 1622, when the Germans defeated the Spaniards; (2) in 1690, when the French routed the allied Germans and Dutch; and (3) in 1794, when the French, under Jourdan, defeated the Austrians and their allies.

Flint, the county town of Flintshire, North Wales, on the left side of the Dee's estuary, 13 miles NW. of Chester. In the vicinity are extensive alkali-works, besides copper-works, collieries, and lead-mines. Pop. about 5500. It unites with Caergwrle, Caerwys, Holywell, Mold, Overton, Rhuddlan, and St Asaph to return one member. Flint Castle, built by Edward I., was captured by the parliament in 1643, and dismantled in 1647. Here Richard II. surrendered to Bolingbroke, 19th August 1399. See Taylor's History of Flint (1873).

Flint, a maritime county of North Wales, bounded NE. by the river Dee, and N. by the Irish Sea. The main portion of the county is 26 miles long by 10 to 12 broad, and the detached hundred of Maelor, lying 8 miles SE. of the main part, measures 9 miles by 5. Area, 255 sq. m. The coast is low and sandy, but along the Dee estuary fertile. The county is bisected by a low range of hills stretching almost due north. Coal, iron, lead, copper, calamine, zinc, and limestone are the chief mineral products. There are numerous well-watered and picturesque valleys. The uplands afford good pasturage. The Dee in the east and the Clwyd in the west of the county are the principal rivers. Pop. 92,700. Flintshire returns one member to parliament. The chief towns are Flint, Mold, St Asaph, Holywell, and Hawarden.

Flint, capital of Genesee county, Michigan, on the Flint River, 64 miles NNW. of Detroit by rail, with sawmills and manufactures of beer, flour, bricks, paper, machinery, &c. Pop. 38,600.

Flint River, in Georgia, U.S., rises 10 miles S. of Atlanta, and flowing southward 400 miles (150 navigable for steamboats), unites with the Chattahoochee to form the Appalachicola (q.v.).

Flintshire. See FLINT.

Flodden Field, a battlefield on the northern slope of Flodden Hill, one of the eastern and lowest of the Cheviots, 6 miles S. of Coldstream. Here, on 9th September 1513, the Scots met with a grievous defeat at the hands of the English under the Earl of Surrey. They lost from 5000 to 12,000 men, including King James IV. and the flower of his nobility.

Florence (Lat. Florentia; Ital. Firenze), a city of Italy, capital of the former duchy of Tuscany, 194 miles NW. of Rome, and 62 E. of Leghorn. Pop. (1881) of town, 132,039, of commune, 169,001; in 1911, 232,860. The Arno, spanned by four fine bridges, divides the city into two unequal parts, the chief on the northern bank of the river. Beyond the line of the ancient walls (now razed) are thickly peopled suburbs, and a lovely, fertile, and healthy neighbourhood, encircled by sloping hills, and studded with picturesque villas and fruitful vineyards and gardens. The massive and austere forms of Florentine architecture impart an air of gloomy grandeur to the streets, for the most part regular and well kept. The Duomo or Cathedral was founded in 1298, and built from the plans of Arnolfo di Cambio, Giotto, and Brunelleschi; the façade was completed in 1887. The church contains sculptures by Ghiberti, Luca della Robbia, Michelangelo, Sansovino, Bandinelli, and other famous artists. At the side of the cathedral springs Giotto's famous Campanile; and in front is the octagonal Baptistery of San Giovanni, with the glorious bronze gates in basso-rilievo by Ghiberti. The church of the Santa Croce, the Pantheon of Florence (built in 1294—architect, Arnolfo), contains monuments to Galileo, Dante, Macchiavelli, Michelangelo, Alfieri, &c. The church of San Lorenzo, consecrated in 393 by St Ambrose, and rebuilt by Brunelleschi in 1425, contains in its New Sacristy the two famous monuments by Michelangelo to Julian and Lorenzo de' Medici. The Medicean chapel, gorgeous with the rarest marbles and most costly stones, agate, lapis lazuli, chalcedony, &c., stands behind the choir. Annexed to the church of San Lorenzo is the Laurentian Library, with its inexhaustible store of rare MSS., founded by Giulio de' Medici. The beautiful church of Santa Maria Novella, formerly Dominican, dates from 1278 to 1360, and has famous frescoes by Cimabue, Orcagna, Filippino Lippi, and Ghirlandajo. The church of San Marco dates from 1436; adjoining it is the former monastery of San Marco, now secularised as a museum. Fra Angelico, Savonarola, and Fra Bartolommeo were inmates, and it is still adorned with the famous frescoes of Fra Angelico. Amongst the numerous palaces Il Bargello, long a prison, now a national museum, was formerly the abode of the republican magistrate, the Podestà. The Palazzo Vecchio, the seat of the old republican government, is an imposing mass of building, surmounted by a lofty tower 260 feet high. Adjoining the palace is the Piazza della Signoria, a square with fine statues, and a noble arcade, the Loggia dei Lanzi, under the porticoes of which are magnificent groups of sculpture. The Palazzo degli Uffizi contains archives of public offices, also the Magliabecchi Library, now united with that of the Pitti Palace to form a national library of 500,000 volumes and 20,000 MSS. On the second floor, in a suite of twenty-three rooms, is contained the famous Florentine gallery of art, rich in paintings, engravings, sculpture, bronzes, coins, gems, and mosaics—one apartment, the Tribuna, containing the rarest treasures of the collection. The Palazzo Pitti, formerly the grand-ducal residence, boasts of a superb gallery of paintings; behind it are the beautiful Boboli Gardens. The Palazzo Riccardi is the residence of the prefect. The Palazzo Strozzi is a fine type of Tuscan architecture. The Instituto di Studi Superiori has adopted the ordinary university curriculum, and confers various degrees. The School of Social Science, the school of art, the musical institute, the hospital of Santa Maria Nuova with its ancient college of medicine and surgery, the Academy of the Fine Arts, the Museum of Natural History, deserve mention, as do the Accademia della Crusca and the Accademia dei Georgofili. There are nearly a dozen theatres. Florence is the see of an archbishop, the seat of a prefecture and of numerous provincial courts, as well as the military headquarters of the district. The chief industrial occupations of the Florentines are the fabrication of silk and woollen textures, and of straw-plaiting for hats, &c., jewellery, and exquisite mosaics in rare stones. The Florentines are famous for their caustic wit and natural gifts of eloquence, as well as for their shrewd thriftiness and unflagging labour. The beauty of the city and neighbourhood, her grand historical monuments, and her unique collections of art, attract many foreigners to fix their residence here.

Florence originated in the old Etrurian town of Fiesole (q.v.), on the hill behind, was a Roman military colony under Sulla, but was not an important place till the time of Charlemagne, when it was governed by a duke. By the 11th century the Florentines were wealthy traders, and the city had practically republican government—at first aristocratic, but gradually becoming more popular. In 1215 Florence became involved in the deadly feud of Guelphs and Ghibellines, and was never free from the contests of these and other factions, native or alien, till the family of the Medici secured supreme power at the close of the 15th century. Her liberty was extinguished, but under the Medici the city was the focus of literature and art. In 1569 the Medici became grand-dukes of Tuscany, with Florence as their capital; and Tuscany, after several changes of dynasty, became part of the Italian kingdom in 1860, Florence being the capital of Italy from 1864 till 1871. Among Florentine worthies have been Dante, Boccaccio, Machiavelli, Guicciardini, Amerigo Vespucci, and Florence Nightingale. Savonarola laboured and was executed here; to Florence belong the painters Botticelli, Cimabue, Orcagna, Masaccio, Ghirlandajo, the Lippis, Andrea del Sarto, Carlo Dolci; the sculptors Luca della Robbia, Donatello, and Ghiberti; and the musicians Lully and Cherubini.

Florence, a town in the Staffordshire Potteries, 2 miles SW. of Newcastle-under-Lyme.

Flores, (1) one of the Sunda islands in the East Indies, lying due south from Celebes. Area, 6026 sq. m.; pop. 250,000. It is heavily timbered, and mountainous in the interior. The western half, Mangarai, is subject to a native chief; the eastern half, known as Endeh, belongs to Holland. The trade is principally in tortoiseshell, cinnamon, sandalwood, and edible birds'-nests. —(2) An island of the Azores (q.v.), where in 1591 Sir Richard Grenville in the little Revenge held at bay fifteen Spanish war-ships till his own was a mere wreck—the subject of Tennyson's poem.

Florianopolis, official name of Desterro (q.v.).

Flor'ida, called the 'Everglade State' and 'Peninsula State,' lies in the extreme SE. of the United States, between the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico, and bounded N. by Georgia and Alabama. The state is nearly 400 miles long, 84 miles in mean breadth, and 58,680 sq. m. in area (about one-fifteenth water surface). Florida has nineteen navigable rivers (1000 miles in all), with many swamps, marshes, lakes, and ponds. Of the largest lake, Okeechobee, a shallow fresh-water sheet of about 1000 sq. m., the Everglades form a dwindling expansion with thousands of islands. The long coast-line is dotted with innumerable islands and keys. In climate and products Florida is like a great tropical island. It is cooled by sea-breezes from the gulf, making the climate remarkably equable; and the state is a favourite winter-resort, both for tourists and invalids, although malarial fevers prevail in some parts, and yellow fever has occasionally, as in 1889, visited the seaports heavily. The range between the mean summer and winter temperature is only about 20°; the greatest recorded extremes are 105° and 10° F. The soil, while much of it seems a sterile sand, is helped to fertility by the moisture, the rainfall being about 54 inches annually. Large areas are devoted to orange orchards, while lemons, limes, grapes, pine-apples, bananas, pears, guavas, figs, &c. grow with equal luxuriance; and coffee, rice, cotton, and tobacco are natural products. Cocoa-nuts also are grown in the subtropical region. Market-gardening has become important. Florida is not rich in minerals. Mineral springs are numerous. Large tracts of alluvial swamp and shallow lake-lands are being reclaimed by drainage. Next to these are the low hummocks or bottom-lands, dry enough for cultivation, and producing large crops of cotton, sugar-cane, grain, fruits, and vegetables. The high hummocks have a dark, gray soil, very rich at first, but soon running out if not kept well fertilised. Then come first-class pine, oak, and hickory lands, sandy, but containing a good deal of lime. There is a second-class pine land that is barren, but supplies a tolerably good pasturage. Indian corn is largely raised. In the central and southern parts the black bear, the cougar, the panther, wild-cats, wolves, foxes, raccoons, opossums, fish-otters, deer, and smaller game are at home; alligators, turtles, and manatees are found in the waters. The lumber trade, the preparation of naval stores, turpentine, tar, rosin, pitch, and cigar-making are amongst the industries; all along the coast there are valuable fisheries, oysters abound in many parts, and the inland waters also teem with fish; and the evaporation of salt, the production of cotton-seed oil and meal, the manufacture of fertilisers, and sponge and coral fisheries are profitable pursuits. The chief towns are Key West, Jacksonville, Pensacola, Tampa, St Augustine, and Tallahassee (the capital). The State University is at Gainesville. Pop. 752,600, of whom nearly half are negroes.

Florida was discovered on Easter Day (Pascua Florida), 1513, by Juan Ponce de Leon. In 1539 it was explored by De Soto, and in 1565 a body of French Calvinists were butchered or driven out by the Spaniards. Spanish till 1763, English from 1763 till 1781, and Spanish again till 1819, it was acquired by the United States and became a territory; it was admitted into the Union as a state in 1845. In 1835–42 it was the theatre of a desperate war with the aborigines (Seminoles). In the civil war the state took the Confederate side, and was not readmitted to the Union till 1868.

Florida, capital of an Uruguayan dep., 67 miles N. of Montevideo by rail. Pop. 12,500.—The dep. has an area of 4650 sq. m., and a pop. of 50,000.

Florida Strait, the channel separating the American state of Florida from Cuba and the Bahamas. It is 310 miles long, 50 to 100 miles wide, and 2220 to 5070 feet deep. The Gulf Stream flows through it.

Floors Castle. See KELSO.

Flüelen, a village at the southern end of the Lake of Lucerne, on the St Gothard Road and the St Gothard Railway.

Flushing (Dutch Vlissingen), a strong Dutch fortress and seaport, on the south coast of the island of Walcheren, at the mouth of the Western Scheldt, 87 miles SW. of Rotterdam. Formerly an important naval station, it was converted into a commercial harbour in 1865–73. A daily service of steamers connects Flushing with Queenborough in Kent (8 hours' passage). There is a royal dockyard here; and, since 1875, a large floating-dock. Pop. 21,600.

Flushing, since 1897 included in the City of New York, is in Long Island, on Flushing Bay, a branch of Long Island Sound.

Fly, a river of New Guinea, flowing to the west side of the Gulf of Papua, and forming at its mouth a wide delta. First ascended for 90 miles by MacFarlane and D'Albertis in 1875, it was explored in 1885 by Everill for 200.

Foch'abers, a village of Elginshire, on the Spey, 9 miles ESE. of Elgin. Milne's Free School (1846) is the chief edifice. A mile north is Gordon Castle, the old 'Bog of Gight,' the seat now of the Duke of Richmond and Gordon. Pop. 1000.

Foggia (Fodj'a), capital of an Italian province, 76 miles NW. of Bari by rail. Supposed to have been built from the ruins of the ancient Arpi, it has a cathedral dating from 1172, but partially rebuilt after an earthquake in 1731. Pop. 76,500.

Föhr, a fertile island in the North Sea, off the west coast of Sleswick. Area, 28 sq. m.; pop. 4500, Frisians by race. The chief town is Wyk (pop. 1500).

Foix (Fwah), capital of the French dep. of Ariège, in a Pyrenean valley, 44 miles S. of Toulouse by rail. Of the ancient castle of the counts of Foix (1362) there remain only three towers. The town has iron and steel works. Pop. 6000.

Fokshani, a town of Roumania, on the Milkoff, a tributary of the Sereth, 123 miles by rail NE. of Bucharest. Pop. 25,000.

Földvar, DUNA, a town of Hungary, on the Danube, 48 miles S. of Pesth. Pop. 15,000.

Foligno (Foleen'yo), a cathedral city of central Italy, 25 miles SE. of Perugia. Pop. 10,000.

Folkestone, a municipal borough, seaport, and watering-place of Kent, 7½ miles WSW. of Dover, and 71½ ESE. of London. Built on uneven ground, at the foot of hills 575 feet high, it has rapidly extended and improved since the opening of the railway (1844), and of a daily service of steam-packets to Boulogne. The harbour is much used by boats employed in the herring and mackerel fisheries. In the vicinity are the remains of Roman entrenchments. Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation, was a native, and a statue of him was erected in 1881. Folkestone is included in the parliamentary borough of Hythe (q.v.). Pop. 33,500.

Fond du Lac (Fon^g dü Lac; Fr., 'end of the lake'), capital of a Wisconsin county, at the southern end of Lake Winnebago, 63 miles NNW. of Milwaukee by rail. It carries on a large trade in lumber, and is supplied with water by numerous artesian wells. Pop. 20,000.

Fondi (Fon'dee), a walled cathedral city of Italy, 14 miles NW. of Gaeta. Pop. 10,000.

Fonse'ca, a bay on the Pacific coast of Central America, discovered in 1552 by Gil Gonzalez de Avila.

Fontainebleau (Fon^{g}tehn-blō'), a French town in Seine-et-Marne, near the Seine's left bank, 37 miles SE. of Paris. It is chiefly famous for its royal château, and the beautiful forest, 65 sq. m. in area, that surrounds it. The château, said to have been founded by Robert the Good towards the end of the 10th century, was rebuilt in 1169 by Louis VII., and enlarged by Louis XI. and his successors. After being allowed to fall into decay, it was repaired and embellished by Francis I., Henry IV., Napoleon I., and Louis-Philippe. Pop. 10,000.

Fontarabia, or Fuenterrabía, a picturesque old frontier town of Spain, at the mouth of the Bidassoa, opposite the French town of Hendaye, below the west extremity of the Pyrenees. It was long an important fortress, often taken and retaken. In the Roland legend, it is associated with the defeat at Roncesvalles (q.v.). Pop. 5000.

Fontenay-le-Comte (Fon^{g}t'nay-le-kon^{g}t'), a town in the French dep. of Vendée, on the river Vendée, 27 miles NE. of La Rochelle. It has a beautiful Romanesque church, with a Gothic spire 311 feet high; a fountain from which it is said to have derived its name; and manufactures of hats, woollens, linen, &c. Pop. 7000.

Fontenoy, a village (pop. 1000) of Belgium, 5 miles SE. of Tournay. Here, on 11th May 1745, the French under Marshal Saxe, defeated the allies (English, Dutch, and Austrians) under the Duke of Cumberland. The victory was in great measure due to the courage of the 'Irish Brigade' in the French army.

Fontevrault (Fon^{g}t-e-vro'), a town in the French dep. of Maine-et-Loire, 8 miles SE. of Saumur. A celebrated abbey was founded here in 1099; the 12th-century church contains sepulchral monuments to Henry II. of England, his queen, Eleanor of Guienne, Richard Cœur-de-Lion, and Isabella, the queen of John. Since 1804 the monastic buildings have been used as a prison for 2000 convicts. Pop. 1000.

Foochow (Fû-Châu), capital of the Chinese province of Fû-chien, with suburbs extending to the river Min, 25 miles above its mouth. The town proper is surrounded with walls nearly 30 feet high, and 10 feet wide at the top. The river is thronged with floating houses, and is crossed by a great bridge, 329 yards long. The Min provides an easy communication with the interior, with which a large trade is carried on in timber, paper, and cotton and woollen goods; and the port, opened to foreign commerce in 1842, is one of the principal tea-markets and mission stations in China. The imports are chiefly cotton goods and lead. There are manufactories of silk and cotton fabrics and paper; and on an island 3 miles down the stream there is a large government arsenal managed by Europeans. The French bombarded Foochow in 1884. Pop. 630,000.

Forbach, a manufacturing town in Lorraine, 6 miles SW. of Saarbruck. Here, on 6th August 1870, the French had to retreat. Pop. 10,000.

Fordoun, a Kincardineshire parish, 6 miles N. by E. of Laurencekirk.

Foreland, North and South, two promontories of England, on the east coast of Kent, between which are the Downs and Goodwin Sands.

For'far, the county town of Forfarshire, at the E. end of Forfar Loch, 14 miles NNE. of Dundee. It was a royal residence as early as the reign of Malcolm Canmore, whose son, David I. (1124–53), made it a royal burgh; but in 1308 Bruce razed the castle—its site is marked by the town-cross of 1684. The making of brogues by the 'Forfar souters' is a thing of the long past; and linen is now the leading manufacture. The Reid public hall (1869) may be noticed, and the Reid public park (1894). With Montrose and three other burghs it returns one member. Pop. of the royal burgh 11,000.

For'farshire, or Angus, a Scottish county, washed on the east by the German Ocean, on the south by the Firth of Tay. It has an utmost length and breadth of 36 and 36½ miles, and an area of 870 sq. m. The surface is finely diversified, the rich plain of Strathmore—the Howe of Angus—dividing the Sidlaw Hills (1399 feet) from the Grampian Braes of Angus in the north-west, which culminate in Cairn na Glasha (3484 feet) on the Aberdeenshire boundary, and exceed 2000 feet in twenty-two other summits. The chief streams are the North and South Esks and the Isla; and Loch Lee (9 by 2 furlongs) is the largest of several small lakes. Somewhat less than half of the entire area is in cultivation, and more than one-nineteenth under wood. Linen and jute are the staple manufactures of the towns. These include Dundee, Montrose, Arbroath, Brechin, Forfar, Broughty-Ferry, Kirriemuir, and Carnoustie. The county returns one member to parliament. Pop. (1801) 99,053; (1841) 170,453; (1911) 281,417. The antiquities include vitrified and other hill-forts, cairns and standing-stones, weems, Roman camps, the sculptured stones of Meigle, Aberlemno, St Vigeans, Glamis, &c., the ruins of Restennoth priory and Arbroath abbey, the round tower of Brechin, and the old castles of Glamis, Edzell, Finhaven, Airlie, &c. See Warden's Angus or Forfarshire (4 vols. 1880–83).

Forli (For'lee; anc. Forum Livii), an Italian city at the foot of the Apennines, 40 miles SE. of Bologna by rail. It has a cathedral, a citadel (1361, now a prison), and manufactures of silk, shoes, hats, and cloth. Pop. 46,000.

Formia (anc. Formiæ; formerly Mola di Gaeta), a seaport of Italy, on the Gulf of Gaeta, with the ruins of Cicero's villa. Pop. 10,000.

Formosa (Chinese and Japanese Taiwan), an island separated from the coast of China by the Fû-chien Strait, 90 to 220 miles wide. It has a maximum length of 235 miles, a varying breadth of 70 to 90 miles, and an area of 13,500 sq. m. The backbone of the island is formed of a range of densely-wooded mountains, which culminate in Mount Morrison (14,270 feet). Eastward of this range lies a narrow strip of mountainous country, presenting to the Pacific a precipitous cliff-wall with in many places a sheer descent of from 5000 to 7000 feet. West of the range is a broad alluvial plain. The rainfall of the northern, central, and eastern portions of the island is heavy. The mean temperature of summer is 80° to 90° F. ; of winter, 50° to 60°. Malarial fever is prevalent in the north, and violent typhoons are very common at certain seasons. The island is famous for its rich vegetation. Of animal life there are at least forty-three species of birds peculiar to the island, whilst insects are scarce, and noxious wild animals few. The principal commercial products are tea, sugar, coal, turmeric, rice, sweet potatoes, groundnuts, bamboos, grasses, tobacco, timber, and sesamum-seed. In the south the staple crops are sugar and turmeric, and in the north tea. The imports consist principally of opium, cotton and woollen piece goods, and lead. Sulphur, iron, and petroleum exist, but are not worked to any extent. Camphor, once the chief product, has again under Japanese rule become an important product; and since 1895, when Formosa was ceded by China to Japan, the Japanese have done marvels for the development of the island—in mining, roads, artesian wells, railways, post-offices, savings-banks, sanitation, hospitals, and education. The savage tribes of the interior have been reduced to order, not without some trouble. (See Formosa Past and Present, 1903, by J. W. Davidson.) Formosa forms a province of Japan under its Chinese name of Taiwan. Taiwan and Takow are ports on the south-west, and Tamsui and Kelung on the north. The inhabitants, 3,400,000 in 1911, consist of Chinese settlers and of aborigines, mainly of Malayan and Negrito descent, with some 60,000 Japanese. The Pescadores, a group of islands with 60,000 inhabitants, 20 miles to the west, were ceded to Japan at the same time as Formosa. In the 14th century the Chinese established several colonies in Formosa. Although Portuguese and Spanish navigators began to visit the island in the 16th century, the first European people to establish themselves on it were the Dutch, who in 1624 built Fort Zealandia, near the modern Taiwan. They were, however, expelled in 1661 by a Chinese adventurer, Koscinga, who retained possession of the island for twenty-two years. Some years later a regular Chinese colonisation of the western half of the island was carried through. Subsequently the island became notorious for piracy, and for its ill treatment of shipwrecked crews.

Formosa, a territory in the extreme north of Argentine Republic, formed in 1884. The capital is Formosa (1000 inhabitants), on the Paraguay, 100 miles NNE. of Corrientes.

For′res, a royal burgh of Elginshire, 5 miles S. of Findhorn village on the Moray Firth, and 25 ENE. of Inverness, with which and Nairn and Fortrose it returns a member. On its Castle Hill, a royal residence from 1189 to 1371, stands an obelisk (1857), 65 feet high, to the Crimean hero, Dr Thomson of Cromarty; on wooded Cluny Hill are a hydropathic and the Nelson tower (1806), 70 feet high. Sueno's Stone is a sculptured monolith ascribed to the year 900; the Witch's Stone recalls the fame enjoyed by Forres even before Macbeth's time. Pop. 4400.

Forst, a town of Prussia, 80 miles SE. of Berlin by rail, with manufactures of buckskins, cloth, and leather. Pop. 34,000.

Fortaleza, the official name of Ceara (q.v.), an important seaport of Brazil.

Fort Augustus, a village on the Caledonian Canal, at the head of Loch Ness, 33 miles SW. of Inverness. In 1730 General Wade named a fort here after the Duke of Cumberland. Sold to Lord Lovat (1857), it was presented to the Benedictines, and in 1876–90 converted into a stately abbey. Pop. 600.

Fort de France (formerly Fort Royal), capital of Martinique (q.v.), in the French West Indies, on the west coast. Pop. 27,000.

Fort Dodge, capital of Webster county, Iowa, 85 miles NW. of Des Moines. It has important manufactures and coal-mines. Pop. 15,500.

Forteviot, the ancient capital of the Picts. Its site is 7 miles SW. of Perth.

Fort Garry. See WINNIPEG.

Fort George, a fortress 12 miles NE. of Inverness, on a low sandy projection into the Moray Firth, here only 1 mile broad. Built in 1748 at a cost of £160,000, it covers 12 acres, and can accommodate 2180 men.

Forth, a river and firth of Scotland. The river is formed by two head-streams, Duchray Water and the Avondhu, which, rising on and not far from Ben Lomond, at altitudes of 3000 and 1900 feet, run 14 and 9 miles to a confluence near Aberfoyle, the Avondhu traversing Lochs Chon and Ard. From their confluence, 80 feet above sea-level, the Forth itself winds 39 miles to Stirling, then 12½ (the 'Links of Forth') to Alloa, the distances in a straight line being only 18½ and 5¾ miles. It receives the Teith, Allan Water, and Devon, and traverses or divides Stirling, Perth, and Clackmannan shires. The Firth of Forth extends 51 miles eastward from Alloa to the German Ocean, between Clackmannanshire and Fife on the north, and Stirlingshire and the Lothians on the south. It has a width of ½ mile at Kincardine, 3 miles above Bo'ness, 1¼ at Queensferry, 5 between Granton and Burntisland, 17 at Prestonpans, and 8¼ at Elie. Its waters, 3 to 37 fathoms deep, encircle the islands of Inchkeith (fortified 1878–81), Inchcolm (with a ruined abbey), Cramond, &c., whilst at the entrance are the Bass Rock (q.v.) and the Isle of May. On the two last and on Inchkeith are lighthouses. Rivers falling into it are the Carron, Avon, Almond, Water of Leith, Esk, and Leven. White fish are plentiful. In 1882–90 a great cantilever railway bridge was erected across the firth at Queensferry. It consists of two main spans of 1700 feet each, and two of 675, its total length, inclusive of piers, being 8296 feet, or a little over 1½ mile. The clear headway under the centre of the bridge is 152 feet at high-water, and the highest part of the bridge is 361 feet. Designed by Fowler and Baker, the bridge with approaches cost £3,368,000. Above the bridge are the roadstead of St Margaret's Hope, and Rosyth, the new naval base (1904).

Fort Madison, capital of Lee county, Iowa, on the Mississippi, 19 miles SW. of Burlington with manufactures of chairs, boots, &c. Pop. 9000.

For′trose, a watering-place of Ross-shire, on the inner Moray Firth, 10 miles NNE. of Inverness (26 by railway). With capital links and good bathing, it is one of the Inverness burghs; and its two portions, Chanonry and Rosemarkie, were constituted a royal burgh in 1590. The seat of a Columban monastery in the 6th century, of the bishopric of Ross from 1124, it retains the south aisle and chapter-house of a fine cathedral, demolished to furnish materials for Cromwell's fort at Inverness. Pop. 1000.

Fort Royal. See Fort de France.

Fort Scott, capital of Bourbon county, Kansas, on the Marmiton River, 98 miles S. of Kansas City. It has foundries, machine-shops, &c. Pop. 10,500.

Fort St David, a ruined fortress (British from 1690) on the coast of Madras presidency, 100 miles S. of Madras, on the outskirts of Cuddalore. Clive became its governor in 1756.

Fort St George. See Madras.

Fort Sumter. See Sumter.

Fortunate Islands. See Canaries.

Fort Wayne, capital of Allen county, Indiana, at the confluence of the St Joseph and St Mary's rivers, which form the Maumee, and on the Wabash and Erie Canal, 148 miles ESE. of Chicago. It is an important railway centre, and manufactures organs, woollens, engines, &c. It is the seat of a Catholic bishop, and has Methodist (1846) and Lutheran (1850) colleges. Pop. 64,000.

Fort William. See Calcutta.

Fort William, a police-burgh and great tourist centre of Inverness-shire, near the head of salt-water Loch Linnhe, the west base of Ben Nevis, and the south end of the Caledonian Canal, 66 miles SSW. of Inverness. A fort, built here by Monk in 1655, and rebuilt in 1690, was vainly besieged by the Jacobites in 1746. It was dismantled about 1860, and in 1890 made room for the station of the West Highland Railway from Glasgow. Pop. 2000.

Fort William, a port and summer resort of Ontario, Canada, on Lake Superior, 4 miles from Port Arthur. Pop. 16,500.

Fort Worth, capital of Tarrant county, Texas, on the Trinity River, 33 miles W. of Dallas by rail. Pop. 73,000.

Fossa'no, a town of North Italy, 15 miles NE. of Cuneo by rail. Pop. 10,000.

Fossombro'ne, a cathedral city of Italy, 10 miles E. of Urbino. Pop. 8000.

Fotheringhay, a village of Northamptonshire, on the Nen, 9 miles SW. of Peterborough. Its castle, founded shortly after the Conquest, in which Mary, Queen of Scots, was beheaded in 1587, was allowed to fall into decay after James I.'s accession to the English throne.

Fougères, a town in the French dep. of Ille-et-Vilaine, 23 miles by rail N. of Vitré. It has a picturesque old castle, granite-quarries, and manufactures of sailcloth, leather, &c. Here the Vendeans defeated the republicans in November 1793. Pop. 20,000.

Foula, a lonely island of Shetland, 16 miles WSW. of the nearest point of the mainland. Measuring 3¼ by 2½ miles, it is 5 sq. m. in area, and culminates in the Sneug (1372 feet). The Old Red Sandstone cliffs on its north-west side, rising 1220 feet almost sheer from the sea, are denizened in the breeding season by myriads of sea-fowl—puffins, kittiwakes, and the rare great skua or 'bonxie,' which formerly was preserved by the islanders to keep down the eagles. The only landing-place is at the fishing-hamlet of Ham, on the south-east. Foula was the last island where the old Norse tongue lingered on into the 19th century. Pop. 200.

Fountains Abbey, one of the largest and best-preserved monastic edifices in England, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 3 miles SW. of Ripon. Founded for Cistercians in 1132, it was not completed till the 16th century.

Fourchambault (Foor-shong-bo), a town in the French dep. of Nièvre, 5 miles NNW. of Nevers, near the Loire, here crossed by a suspension bridge. There are large iron-foundries, nail-works, and wire-works. Pop. 4000.

Four Lakes, a chain of deep lakes (Mendota, Menona, Waubesa, and Kegonsa) in Dane county, Wisconsin, connected by short outlets. Madison, the state capital, stands on an isthmus between Mendota and Menona.

Fourmies, a town in the French dep. of Nord, 12 miles SE. of Avesnes by rail, with mines, iron-works, and mills. There were great labour riots here in 1891. Pop. 13,000.

Fowey, or Foy, an old Cornish town, on the right bank of the river Fowey, 11 miles SSE. of Bodmin. It is the 'Troy Town' and the home of Quiller-Couch. Pilchards are cured, and 'china-stone' and iron ore exported from its harbour. Pop. 2300.

Fox Channel, the northern portion of Hudson Bay, washing the western shores of Baffin Land, and named from Luke Fox, an English navigator, who explored Hudson Bay in 1631.

Fox Islands. See Aleutian Islands.

Foyers (Fi'ers), a stream of Inverness-shire, running 9 miles N. to the east side of Loch Ness, and driving aluminium-works.. During the last 1¼ mile it descends 400 feet, and forms two magnificent cascades, 40 and 165 feet high.

Foyle, Lough, an inlet of the Atlantic, on the north coast of Ireland, between Londonderry and Donegal counties. It is 15 miles long, 1 mile wide at its entrance, and 10 miles along its south side. Vessels of 600 tons ascend the lough, and also as far as Derry, its principal tributary the Foyle, which, formed near Lifford by the Finn and the Mourne, has a NNE. course of 72 miles.

Fraga, a town of Spain, on the Cinca, 63 miles ESE. of Saragossa. Here, in 1134, the Moors defeated Alfonso I. of Aragon. Pop. 8000.

Framingham, a town of Massachusetts, on the Sudbury River, 24 miles W. by S. of Boston by rail. The township includes Saxonville and South Framingham, with manufactures of blankets and straw goods. Pop. 13,000.

Framlingham ('strangers' town'), a Suffolk market-town, 22 miles NNE. of Ipswich by a branch line. The fine flint-work church, restored in 1888–89, has a tower 90 feet high, and contains noble altar-tombs of the Howards (the third Duke of Norfolk, the poet Earl of Surrey, &c.). Separated by the Mere from the red-brick Albert middle-class college (1864) rises the great Edwardian castle, the stronghold successively of Bigods, Mowbrays, and Howards, and Queen Mary's refuge after Edward VI.'s death. Pop. 2400. See Hawes's History of Framlingham (1798).

Francavilla, a town of Italy, 22 miles WSW. of Brindisi. Pop. 20,000.

France, occupying a most advantageous position between the Atlantic and the Mediterranean, is a compact hexagonal mass, bounded N. by the Channel and the Strait of Dover, NE. by Belgium and Luxemburg, E. by Lorraine, Alsace, Switzerland, and Italy, S. by the Mediterranean Sea and Spain, from which it is separated by the Pyrenees, and W. by the Atlantic. Its utmost extremities are comprised between 51° 5′—42° 20′ N. lat. and the 4° 42′ W.—7° 39′ E. long.; its greatest dimensions being 606 miles from N. to S., 556 miles from W. to E., and 675 miles from NW. to SE. As diminished in 1871 by the loss of Alsace and part of Lorraine (5590 sq. m.), France covers, by the measurement of 1894, an area of 206,381 sq. m.—one-eighteenth part of Europe. Pop. (1872) 36,102,921 ; (1911) 39,601,509, or about one-tenth of the population of Europe.

France, formerly divided into some 30 provinces (Normandy, Brittany, Champagne, Burgundy, Auvergne, Languedoc, Provence, &c.—see the separate articles), was at the Revolution re-distributed into deps. named generally after the rivers. These deps., mostly between 1500 and 2500 sq. m. in area, are, including Corsica and the territory of Belfort, 87 in number, and each is separately discussed in this work. Except the island of Corsica, which, geographically and ethnologically, belongs rather to Italy, France has no islands of importance. The islands off the Mediterranean coast, as well as those off Brittany, are practically but small detached fragments of the mainland ; while the Channel Islands, situated between Brittany and the Cotentin peninsula, belong to Great Britain.

The possessions of France outside of Europe, both colonies and protected countries, cover an aggregate of 4,000,000 sq. m., and have a pop. of about 50,000,000 inhabitants. Of them Algeria (q.v.) is rapidly becoming a part of France proper, and is considered as such for nearly all administrative purposes. The large territory of Tunis has since 1881-83 been under French protection. By a treaty signed in 1885 Madagascar was placed under the protection of France, which also now holds a large area in West Africa. Morocco became a protectorate in 1912. In Asia, Tonkin was annexed to France in 1884, and Annam placed under its protectorate, and portions of Siam acquired in 1893. Details of the French colonies and protectorates are given in the subjoined table :

A general idea of the leading geographical features of France can be given in a few words. Its territory embodies highlands in the south and south-east only : in the south it comprises the northern slopes of the Pyrenees, and towards the south-east frontier part of the Alps. The remainder of the territory is nearly equally divided between extensive lowlands in the north-west and a great plateau, which covers the south-eastern half, but is separated from the Alps by the broad and deep valley of the Lower Rhone. The climate of France, its vegetation, the distribution of its population, and its very history have been determined by these leading features of its orography.

The extensive mass of elevated plains which rises between the lowlands of the Mediterranean coast and those sloping towards the Atlantic reaches a height of from 3000 to 4000 feet in its higher central parts only ; several chains, partly of volcanic origin, piled over its surface, attain from 5000 to 6000 feet ; while the river-valleys are dug so deeply into the plateau that it often assumes a hilly aspect. The whole slopes gently towards the north-west, gradually melting into the lowlands of the Garonne, the Loire, and the Seine ; but the plateau has a short steep slope towards the valley of the Rhone and the Mediterranean coast, and the southern part of that slope is fringed by the Cévennes Mountains, which raise their granitic and crystalline summits to more than 5000 feet above the sea (Mont Mézenc, 5754 feet). This lofty chain separates two entirely different worlds—the fertile, sunny, and warm plains of the Lower Rhone and Languedoc from the plains of the Rouergue, dreary, cold, and 3000 feet high, upon which only rye is grown, and flocks of sheep find rich grazing-grounds. The sunny slopes of the Monts du Beaujolais, turned towards the Saône, are covered with rich vineyards ; while the plateau to the west of them is dotted with iron-works, coal-mines, and manufacturing cities. The Vosges, although making a steep descent to the valley of the Rhine, rise but gently over the plateau, their highest points being not more than from 3300 to 4000 feet above the sea (the Ballon de Soultz, 4579 feet, is now on German territory). The Massif Central of Auvergne, the highest part of the plateau, covers nearly one-seventh of France's total area, and is a region of granites, gneisses, and crystalline slates fringed by Jurassic deposits, and dotted on its surface with extinct volcanic cones surrounded by wide sheets of lava. The heights of the Massif Central, suffering as they do from a protracted winter, have but a poor, rapidly-diminishing population. The forests which once covered them have mostly been destroyed, save in the picturesque Margeride chain, and only flocks of sheep graze on their meagre pasture-grounds. The Causses receive rain in abundance, but are exceedingly dry—the water rapidly disappearing in the numberless crevices of the soil. A narrow passage near Belfort (la Trouée de Belfort), utilised by both the canal which connects the Saône with the Rhine and the railway which leads from Paris to Switzerland, separates the Vosges from the limestone plateaus of the Jura, part of which belongs to France. Since the annexation of Savoy in 1860 the Alps of Savoy, as well as a portion of the main chain, including Mont Blanc (15,780 feet), belong to France. The Pyrenees, a wild complex of lofty chains, extends for a length of 260 miles between the Atlantic Ocean and the Mediterranean Sea. A plateau, from 1600 to 2000 feet high (Lannemezan), spreads out at the northern foot of the Pyrenees. Its limestone soil is exceedingly dry, and its grazing-lands have to be irrigated.

The whole of north-western France, with the exception of a few hilly tracts in La Vendée, Brittany, and Normandy, is occupied by wide plains which constitute the real wealth of the country. Taking them in order from the south-west, we have first the Landes—a wide triangular space between the Bay of Biscay, the Adour, and the Loire, covered with Pliocene sands, which would be an immense marshy fever-den, bordered by shifting sands on the sea-coast, if it were not intersected by canals, and the sands were not fixed by plantations of trees. The Adour River fringes the Landes. The Dordogne and the Garonne join to form the Gironde, which is a true marine estuary, with the left bank bordered by the low hills of Médoc, covered with vineyards yielding every year not less than 2,200,000 gallons of the finest wines. The monotony of the rich plains between the Gironde and the Loire, which include the old province of Poitou, is broken by the dreary hills of the Gatine, a link between the chains of Margeride and Limousin and the hilly tracts of Brittany. Next we have the immense plains watered by the Loire, which becomes a great river after receiving the Allier, and has a drainage area covering one-fifth of the area of France. The peninsula of Brittany is formed by two ridges of granitic hills, from 1000 to 1200 feet high, separated by a region of crystalline slates. Its scenery and moist climate, as well as those of the Cotentin peninsula, remind one of England. The plateaus of Normandy (Le Perche), which rise from 1000 to 1300 feet above the surrounding plains, are also covered with beautiful meadows, cornfields, and forests, and French agriculture reaches there its highest development. The Seine separates them from the cretaceous chalky plains of the Caux, which raise their cliffs over the Channel, and are deeply cleft by valleys of a remarkable fertility. The wide Tertiary basin which the Seine and its tributaries water has from remote antiquity been the dominant portion of historical France. Numerous large cities, as Auxerre, Sens, Troyes, Châlons, Rheims, Laon, Rennes, and Paris, are situated either on the Seine or on its right-bank tributaries which water the fertile plains of Champagne. Havre is the great port at the mouth of the river. Artois and French Flanders are low tracts of land to some extent conquered from the sea. They have a flourishing agriculture, vast coalfields, and a great industry in their chief cities. At the other extremity of France the lowlands of the south occupy the sea-coast and the broad valley of the Rhone, along which they extend between the Alps and the plateau, as far north as Lyons, to be continued farther north by the valley of the Saône. The littoral of Provence has no great fertility, and, except the stony or marshy plains in the neighbourhood of the Rhone, there is but a narrow strip of land left between the mountains and the sea-coast, which is utilised for vineyards and fruit-gardens. The eastern part of the coast, acquired from Italy in 1860, is well known for its mild climate and rich vegetation, which render Nice, Villefranche, Cannes, and Mentone the chief resort of the invalids of Europe.

France enjoys on the whole a very fine climate; not so continental as that of central Europe, nor so maritime as that of England. If we omit the high hilly tracts of the Alps and the Pyrenees, the coldest region of France is evidently that of the high plateau with its cold winters, though it has hot summer days. The climate of Brittany is very much like that of the south-west of England; while that of the plains on the Bay of Biscay is warm and dry, and Pau, on the slopes of the Pyrenees, has the deserved reputation of a sanitary station. The climate of Languedoc and Provence assumes to some extent an African character—a temperate winter is succeeded by a burning hot summer, moderated from time to time by the mistral.

The dominant language of France is French, a Romance tongue developed out of the lingua Romana rustica of the Roman conquerors, which displaced the native Celtic tongues, and was afterwards modified in vocabulary and phonetics (but not in structure) by the invading Teutonic Franks, who gave their own name both to the language and to the country. In the south the Provençal, another Romance type, is still the popular dialect. In the north-west the ancient Celtic Breton tongue survives; and in the south-west the distinct and peculiar Basque language is spoken in the dep. of Basses Pyrénées. Flemish is spoken in French Flanders; the Walloons speak their own Romance dialect in the north-east of France; and German is still spoken in some districts of those parts of Alsace and Lorraine still left to France. The character of the French people combines the impressionability, the vivacity, the rapidity of conception, and the artistic feeling of the men of the south with the persistence, laboriousness, and rationalism of the men of the north.

Pop. (1801) 27,349,003; (1831) 32,569,223; (1861) 37,382,225; (1872) 36,102,921—the decrease being mainly due to the war with Germany and loss of territory; (1881) 37,672,048; (1891) 38,343,192; (1901) 38,961,945; (1911) 39,601,509. But between 1886 and 1891 there was an actual decrease in 55 of the departments, and in 1906–11 in 64. The annual increase throughout France is notably slower than in the other chief countries of Europe, and its low rate is due to the small proportion of children in each family—19·6 births per 1000 inhabitants (1910), as against 25 in Great Britain and 29·8 in Germany. This low birth-rate does not hold good for all France; the small yearly increase of the total population is chiefly due to the more numerous births in the north and north-west and east. Frenchmen emigrate but little. Still, there are 500,000 Frenchmen in Algeria; besides, there are 113,000 in the Argentine Republic and Uruguay, 117,000 in the United States, and fairly large numbers in Italy, in Switzerland, in Belgium, and in Spain. On the other hand, no less than 1,132,700 foreigners (chiefly Belgians, Italians, Germans, Spaniards, and Swiss) were returned in the census of 1911 as living in France. In 1850, 75 per cent. of the population lived in the country, and 25 only in the cities; but at present over 40 per cent. live in the cities. Migration is especially active into Paris and its neighbourhood, and to the seaports. In 1911 some 8,000,000 people lived in the chief communes—that is, those with more than 30,000 inhabitants; and fifteen cities have pops. of more than 100,000: Paris (2,888,000), Marseilles (551,000), Lyons (523,800), Bordeaux (261,700), Lille (217,800), Nantes, Toulouse, St Étienne, Nice, Le Havre, Rouen, Roubaix, Nancy, Rheims, and Toulon. Nearly one-half of the population still live by agriculture.

The land-holdings are subdivided into small plots of less than five acres apiece on an average, and this subdivision is the source of many drawbacks. Cereals cover about 25 per cent. of the territory. Beet-root for sugar covers about 600,000 acres. The terrible ravages of the phylloxera have reduced the area under vineyards from 6,382,000 acres in 1875 to little more than 4,000,000 in 1911. One of the most promising features of French agriculture is the high development of nursery-gardening, which achieves most remarkable results in variety and richness of crops. The exports of cattle, butter, eggs, cheese, and poultry, especially to England, are very large. The fisheries are of great importance for France, both the deep-sea fishery (especially about Newfoundland) and also the coast fisheries. There are some 600 mines of all kinds at work in France, and the total annual value of the products is over £26,000,000. The metal ores raised annually include about 12,000,000 tons of iron, 50,000 tons zinc, 15,000 tons argentiferous lead, 30,000 tons antimony, and some manganese and copper. Ores to the value of over £4,000,000 are imported annually into France. The coal-mines scattered over the north, the region of the Upper Loire, and in Languedoc doubled their produce between 1870 and 1900, and now produce over 38,000,000 tons annually; while over 11,000,000 tons are imported.

Manufactures made rapid progress during the 19th century. The textile industry gives occupation to at least 2,000,000 persons. In silks France has no longer the monopoly she formerly had; but she still occupies the first rank, especially with regard to the finer stuffs and the production of new ones. Then there are also sugar-works, chemical industries, potteries, paper-mills, and industries connected with furniture, dress, carriages, and all possible articles of luxury. In the small industries, which occupy two-thirds of the French industrial workers, the artistic taste and inventive genius of the nation are especially apparent. Paris is the world's emporium for such small industries.

The highways in France as a rule are kept in an excellent state, and no less than 25,000 miles of routes nationales, and a much greater extent of district roads, are the feeding-arteries of the network of railway lines, which covered an aggregate length of 30,000 miles in 1912. The navigable rivers and canals have a length of 8500 miles. The French mercantile marine is behind not only those of Britain, the United States, and Norway, but even of Germany and Italy. Nevertheless, a great part of the French coasting and foreign trade is carried on under the flag of the republic. France is an illustration of the fact that a country having a well-developed agriculture may be very wealthy without having a great foreign trade. During the years 1881–1911 the annual foreign trade varied in value from £161,040,000 to £364,000,000 for the imports, and from £123,524,000 to £324,000,000 for the exports. The chief import is raw produce, and the chief item of export is manufactured goods. Raw silk, cotton, and wool are imported both for home use and for re-exportation in the shape of stuffs. Hides are imported to be manufactured into fine leather, gloves, or shoes; timber leaves France in the shape of artistic furniture, &c. France imports, as already said, a good deal of coal and iron ore, as well as of colonial wares, cattle, cereals, and other alimentary substances. None of the French colonies is a source of enrichment to the mother-country.

The unit of French administration is the commune, which administers its own local affairs by means of an elected municipal council and an elected mayor. Every ten to fifteen communes constitute a canton, and next comes the arrondissement, or district, composed of not more than nine cantons; this has its own elected council, entrusted with the assessment of the local taxes, and subject to the sub-prefect. Four arrondissements on an average compose a department. Each dep. has a 'general council' elected by universal suffrage—each canton electing one councillor. The general councils have wide powers as regards taxation and the promotion of institutions of public utility; but their decisions are jealously controlled by the prefect (préfet), who is the representative of the state in the dep. The legislative functions of the central government are vested in the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate; and the executive power in the ministry and the President of the Republic. A formidable army of functionaries stands under the central government, in subjection to the prefects, who themselves are wholly under the authority of the Ministry of the Interior, and exercise a powerful influence on the results of the elections through their subordinates.

There is complete religious toleration in France, but till the separation of church and state, in 1905, three faiths were supported by the state—the Jewish as well as the Roman Catholic and Protestant, in proportion to numbers. There has been no religious census in France since 1872, but it is estimated that about three-fourths of the population are (nominally at least) Roman Catholic; the Protestants (mainly in the south and centre) are estimated at 600,000, chiefly Calvinist, and the Jews at about 80,000. The Roman Catholic Church has seventeen archbishoprics and sixty-seven bishoprics. Compulsory and free primary education has been introduced under the control of the state; the privileges of the church have been abolished; and, instead of religious teaching, the teaching of 'civic morality' from handbooks issued by the state has been introduced. Private schools of all degrees are permitted, provided the teachers pass the obligatory examinations. France is divided into seventeen educational districts called académies, including one for Algeria, the rectors of which are entrusted with the administration of higher and secondary education, as also with the inspection of the primary schools. Each educational district has an academic council, and each department has a council. Nearly one-tenth of the recruits are still illiterate. Secondary education, which may be classical, scientific, or technical, is provided for in France and Algeria in upwards of 110 lycées and 230 collèges for boys, and 116 lycées and collèges for girls, the latter of quite recent introduction. A law of 1904 ensured the suppression, in ten years, of such clerical schools, closed under the law of 1901 (which caused much debate), as were reopened under private direction. Higher education, given in the facultés (universities), is of a high standard, and almost quite free. The chief centres are at Paris, Lyons, Bordeaux, Toulouse, Montpellier, Nancy, Lille, Nantes, and Grenoble; but most of these have only three, two, or even one of the four separate facultés (law, medicine, science, literature). Indeed, there was till 1896 but one University of France, officially so called, which comprised the facultés at all the various centres. Altogether these have about 40,000 students. The clergy have their own 'free universities.' Various special institutions, such as the Collège de France, the Museum of Natural History, the Polytechnic School, and many others, have a high reputation of long standing.

At the outbreak of the German war of 1870–71

France met the invaders with less than 400,000 men and 1250 guns; and it was not till after the fall of Napoleon that 700,000 men, mostly untrained and very badly provisioned, could be brought into the field. The whole system was totally reorganised in 1872–89, and the recruitment laws altered in 1905. Every Frenchman twenty years old, if not infirm, by the law of 1913 serves three years in the active army, ten in the reserve, six in the territorial army, and six in the territorial reserve. Nearly 300,000 young men are called out every year, and more than 200,000 enter the ranks. The army numbers 600,000 men and has 600,000 horses in time of peace. But in war it can be raised to 1½ million men; and 3½ million more, all having received military training, may be added to the number. The French navy is second only to that of Great Britain. It consists of 21 battle-ships, 36 cruisers (armoured or protected, first, second, and third class), 256 torpedo-boats and destroyers, &c., 6 coast-defence ships, and 58 submarines, with a total strength of over 53,000 men.

The chief source of revenue is indirect taxation (excise, registry, customs, and stamps), which forms about 56 per cent. of the revenue; the direct taxation (land, trade, licenses, personal property, and doors and windows) comes next, and makes 13 per cent. of the revenue; the monopolies (such as tobacco) and the remunerative services (e.g. the post-office) supply 21 per cent. of the yearly income; and all these sources together have yielded annually during the ten years 1900–1909 over 3800 million francs (£150,000,000). But, as the expenditure usually exceeds the income, extraordinary sources of revenue—chiefly loans—have frequently to be resorted to. Between 1869 and 1905 the ordinary revenue had more than doubled, irrespective of these 'comptes spéciaux' or budgets for special purposes. The French debt is now heavier than that of Great Britain, and the more so as France pays much higher interest on it. In 1911 the total debt was calculated at 32,543 million francs (£1,301,718,300), and the interest and annuities at 1286 million francs (£51,446,500). The aggregate debts of the separate municipalities reach about 4200 million francs. Paris is one of the most heavily indebted cities of Europe.

At the dawn of history what is now France was occupied by a multiplicity of tribes, belonging to several different races; but the Celtic Gauls were the dominant people, and held the greater part of the country. The Ligurians occupied the neighbourhood of the Mediterranean shores; the Iberians or Basques held the south-west; and in the north-east were the Belgæ, who seem to have been Germanic immigrants who had adopted a Celtic tongue, or Celts who had been in some respects Germanised or mixed with Germans. The Gauls were sufficiently energetic to have conquered North Italy and terrorised Rome from the 5th century B.C. to the middle of the 3d century B.C., and even pushed victorious armies into Thrace and Galatia. But the Romans conquered the Cisalpine Gauls about 225 B.C., and by 150 had conquered the south of Transalpine Gaul (Provence); and in 58–50 B.C. Julius Cæsar conquered the sixty-four different states in Gaul, and from that time the Gauls rapidly adopted the Roman polity, the Latin speech, and Roman manners. From the 4th century A.D. on, Romanised Gaul—now Christian—was invaded by swarms of Teutonic barbarians, of whom the Visigoths founded a state in the south-west of Gaul, the Burgundians in the valleys of the Saône and Rhone, and the Franks in the north-east. Chlodwig or Clovis, the Frank, laid the foundations of the future kingdom of France, and established the Merovingian dynasty; but the Franks, like the other German invaders, speedily adopted the language, laws, manners, and Christian religion of their Celtic subjects. Charlemagne established a military monarchy from the Ebro to the Elbe and the North Sea, which fell to pieces under his Carlovingian successors. In the 10th century the Rhine became the eastern boundary of France, and Paris its capital; and the Northmen occupied Normandy, now called after them. In the 12th century the kings of England, dukes also of Normandy, acquired by inheritance or marriage Brittany, Maine, Touraine, Poitou, Guienne, and Gascony, and were more powerful in France than the native kings. Philippe Auguste (1180–1223) recovered much of this area from the English John, and at the end of the Hundred Years' War (1451) only Calais remained to England of all her continental possessions. Under Louis XI. and Charles VIII. (1461–98), last of the Valois kings in the direct descent, the hold of France on Maine, Anjou, Provence, and part of Burgundy (the dukedom) was definitely established. Francis I., of the Valois-Angoulême house, secured all Burgundy for France. The horrors of the Huguenot wars were put an end to by Henry IV. of Navarre, first of the Bourbons, who passed the Edict of Nantes (1598)—to be revoked by Louis XIV., whose minister Richelieu crushed the Fronde insurrection, and put all powers and classes under the heel of the monarch. Wars disastrous to France in the middle of the 18th century deprived her of her power in India, which fell to Britain; and by the peace of Paris in 1763, she ceded to Britain Nova Scotia, Cape Breton, Canada, and the Mississippi Valley (New France), as well as the islands of Grenada, St Vincent, Dominica, and Tobago. The ancien régime disappeared in the Revolution (1789–99); as First Consul (1799) Napoleon paved his way to the Empire (1804) with its military glories and the extension of French domination over Italy, Spain, the Netherlands, and parts of Germany. After the disastrous Russian campaign (1812) the empire fell, and the Bourbons were restored in the person of Louis XVIII. (1814). The 'Hundred Days' of Napoleon's recovered popularity and power ended with Waterloo (1815) and his abdication, and the renewed restoration of the Bourbons. The elder line of Bourbons was superseded by Louis-Philippe, the citizen king, at the 'July Revolution' of 1830. The Second Republic commenced with the 'February Revolution' of 1848, and was succeeded in 1852 by the coup d'état and the second empire of Napoleon III., which fell in the disasters of the Franco-German war of 1870–71. The Third Republic had to suppress the Commune, pay the milliards to Germany, and cede Alsace-Lorraine. Since then the Republic has been on the whole confirmed in the affections of the nation. The colonial possessions of France in Indo-China and in Africa were greatly extended in the last decades of the 19th century. The alliance with Russia (1895) was followed in 1905 by the entente cordiale with Britain; and 1905 saw the disestablishment of the Roman Catholic Church.

Franconia, a loosely connected aggregate of districts and territories lying chiefly within the basins of the Rhine, Main, and Neckar. The name was officially disused from 1806 to 1837, when the three northern divisions of Bavaria were called Upper, Middle, and Lower Franconia.

Fra'neker, a town of the Netherlands, 9 miles WSW. of Leeuwarden by rail. It was the seat of a university from 1585 to 1810. Pop. 7400.

Frankenberg, a town of Saxony, 32 miles SW. of Dresden. It manufactures cottons, woollens, silk-stuffs, &c. Pop. 13,600.

Frankenhausen, a town of Germany, in Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, on the Wipper, 27 miles NNW. of Weimar. It has brine-springs and a hospital for scrofulous children; and in the vicinity are the Kyffhäuser and Falkenburg with Barbarossa's Cave. Pop. 7000.

Frankenstein, a town of Prussian Silesia, 37 miles SSW. of Breslau. Pop. 8000.

Frankenthal, a town of the Bavarian Palatinate, 7 miles SW. of Worms by rail, and 3½ W. of the Rhine by a canal. It manufactures sugar, machinery, corks, &c. Pop. 19,000.

Frankfort, the capital of Kentucky, on the Kentucky River, 29 miles NW. of Lexington by rail. It contains a state-house built of Kentucky marble, the state library, penitentiary, distilleries, flour-mills, and a cotton-factory. Pop. 10,500.

Frankfort-on-the-Main (Ger. Frankfurt-am-Main), a wealthy commercial city in the Prussian province of Hesse-Nassau, long a free city, the place of election of the German emperors, and seat of the Diet (1816–66), is situated on the right bank of the Main, 22 miles from its confluence with the Rhine at Mainz, and 112 SE. of Cologne by rail. Pop. (1800) 40,000; (1875) 103,315; (1910) 414,918. The fortifications have given place to ornamental promenades; the river is bordered by broad quays; and the ancestral house of the Rothschilds is now the solitary relic of the famous Juden-Gasse, the ghetto of Frankfort. The Gothic Römer or town-house (1405–16) contains the Kaisersaal or imperial hall. The coronation took place in the cathedral of St Bartholomew (13th to 16th centuries). The palace of the Prince of Thurn and Taxis (1730) was the meeting-place of the North German Diet, while the Constituent Assembly of 1848–49 met in the church of St Paul. The Saalhof stands on the site of an earlier palace of the Carlovingian kings; the chapel dates from the 12th century. The new exchange was opened in 1879, the opera-house in 1880, and there are several other imposing new public buildings. One of the squares is adorned with a statue of Goethe, a native; in another is the elaborate Gutenberg monument. Various institutes have been combined as a university (1913–14). Frankfort is connected with the suburb of Sachsenhausen, on the left bank of the Main, by many bridges, one of them built in 1342. The city lies at the junction of seven railways, which since 1888 have converged in the new Central Station, one of the largest and handsomest in Europe. Its commerce has at all times been considerable; and in the 16th century its spring and autumn fairs were among the most important in Europe. The chief articles of trade are colonial wares, iron and steel goods, leather, hides, skins, coals, wine, and beer. The manufacturing industry has largely developed since the town became Prussian. Sewing-machines and other machinery, chemicals, soap and perfumery, iron goods, straw and felt hats are among the chief manufactures. Its chief importance, however, is due to its position as one of the leading money-markets of the world.

The capital from 843 till 889 of the eastern Frankish kingdom, and the place of election of the German emperors from 1152, Frankfort in 1257 was made the first free city of the German empire, and it also became the most important. The city embraced the Reformation in 1530; for awhile lost its independence (1810–13); and in 1866, having espoused the Austrian cause in the seven weeks' war, was seized by the Prussians, and incorporated with Prussia. The peace of Frankfort, which ended the Franco-German war of 1870–71, was signed 10th May 1871 at the Swan Hotel by Prince Bismarck and Jules Favre. See works by Horne and Grotefend (1882–84).

Frankfort-on-the-Oder, a town of Prussia, 51 miles ESE. of Berlin, is a handsome, well-built town, with three suburbs, one of which lies on the right bank of the Oder, and is connected with the remainder of the town by a wooden bridge. The university, founded in 1506, was in 1811 incorporated with that of Breslau. The manufactures embrace machines, hardware, organs, chemicals, stoneware, sugar, tobacco, spirits, leather, paper, &c. Pop. (1875) 47,176; (1910) 68,230. A flourishing member of the Hanseatic League in the 14th and 15th centuries, Frankfort since then has been several times besieged. At Kunersdorf, 4½ miles E., on August 12, 1759, Frederick the Great suffered a great defeat from the Russo-Austrian forces.

Franklin, capital of Venango county, Pennsylvania, on the Alleghany River, 123 miles by rail (65 direct) N. of Pittsburgh, with machine-shops, flour-mills, and oil-refineries. Its chief trade is in petroleum, obtained in the vicinity. Pop. 10,000.

Franzensbad, or Franzensbrunn, a watering-place on the north-west frontier of Bohemia, 3 miles NW. of Eger by rail. There are a number of mineral springs. Pop. 2300, increased by 7000 visitors during the season.

Franz-Josef Land, an archipelago in the Arctic Ocean, north of Nova Zembla, between 80° and 83° N. lat. It consists of Graham Bell Land to the north-east, Wilczek Land to the east, Rudolf Land to the north, King Oscar Land to the north-west, Alexandra Land to the south-west, and many other islands. Zichy Land, reported by Payer (1874) as separated by Austria Sound from Wilczek Land, turns out to be a group of islands. The southern shores are deeply indented with fjords; and the whole archipelago, which rises into isolated flat-topped or dome-shaped mountains of basalt, of plateau type, is sheeted with ice. There is open water round its shores in summer, and comparative abundance of animal life—bears, walruses, foxes, and numerous birds. It was discovered and partly explored by Payer and Weyprecht in 1873–74; and further explored by Leigh Smith in 1880–82, by Jackson, who met Nansen there (1896), and by later explorers.

Frasca'ti, a town of Italy, with many splendid villas, 15 miles SE. of Rome by rail, stands on the slope of the Alban Hills, not far from the site of ancient Tusculum. Cardinal York was bishop of Frascati, and his brother, Charles Edward, died here in 1788. Pop. 10,000.

Fraser or Great Sandy Island lies off the east coast of Queensland, in Australia.

Fraserburgh, a fishing-town of Aberdeenshire, 47 miles N. of Aberdeen by a branch line (1865). It stands on a bay, 2½ miles wide, immediately south of Kinnaird Head, on which are the Frasers' old castle, a lighthouse now, and the mysterious 'Wine Tower,' with a cave below. It was founded as Faithlie in 1569 by Alexander Fraser of Philorth, Lord Saltoun's ancestor, and in 1601 was erected into the free port of Fraserburgh. There are a handsome town-house (1855), a restored market-cross, a public hall, &c.; but hardly a trace remains of an abortive university (1592). The harbour has been much extended since 1855, and the rapid growth of the place is due to the development of the herring-fishery. Pop. 10,600, doubled during the fishing season.

Fraser River, the principal stream of British Columbia, is formed by two branches, which unite near Fort George, in 54° N. lat. and 122° 45′ W. long.; thence the river flows 800 miles southward to the Georgian Gulf, just north of the international boundary of 49° lat. Its chief affluent is the Thompson River. The rich alluvial deposits of gold along the Fraser's lower basin first attracted emigration to British Columbia; the lower valley contains some of the best farming land in the province. The salmon-canneries are also important. Steamboats can ascend for 100 miles.

Fraserville, or Rivière du Loup, a town and watering-place of Quebec, on the Rivière du Loup at its confluence with the St Lawrence, 127 miles from Quebec. Pop. 7000.

Fratta-Maggiore, a town of Italy, 9 miles by rail N. of Naples. Pop. 15,000.

Fraustadt (Polish Wszowa), a town of Prussia, 14 miles NE. of Glogau by rail. Near here Charles XII. of Sweden routed the Saxons, 13th February 1706. Pop. 8000.

Fray Bentos (officially Independencia), capital of the Uruguayan dep. of Rio Negro, on the Uruguay River, 72 miles SSW. of Paysandù. Here is the great Liebig meat-factory. Pop. 5500.

Fredericia, a Danish seaport on the east coast of Jutland, at the northern entrance to the Little Belt. Founded by Frederick III. in 1652, in 1657 it was stormed and razed by the Swedes, nor was it refortified until 1709. It suffered during the wars of 1848–49 and 1864. Pop. 14,000.

Frederick, a city of Maryland, 61 miles W. by N. of Baltimore by rail, with a college (1797), foundries, tanneries, flour-mills, &c. Pop. 10,400.

Fredericton, capital of the province of New Brunswick, Canada, stands on the St John River, 58 miles NNW. of the port of St John. It is the seat of an Anglican bishop and of a university. Pop. 7200.

Frederikshald, a fortified seaport of Norway, on the Idde Fjord, near the Swedish border, 85 miles by rail SSE. of Christiania. It was burned down in 1826. To the south-east stands the never-captured fortress of Frederiksteen (1661), before which Charles XII. of Sweden was killed (1718). Pop. 12,000.

Frederikshavn, a port of Jutland, on the Cattegat, 52 miles NE. of Aalborg. Pop. 7000.

Frederikstad, a seaport of Norway, at the mouth of the Glommen, 58 miles S. of Christiania by rail. Pop. 15,600.

Freeport, capital of Stephenson county, Illinois, on the Pecatonica River, 121 miles WNW. of Chicago by rail. Pop. 18,000.

Free-town, capital of Sierra Leone (q.v.), on the north side of the peninsula, 5 miles from the Atlantic. Founded as Granvilletown in 1787, it is enclosed by a range of wooded hills. The climate is unhealthy, especially for Europeans. Pop. 34,000, almost all negroes.

Freiberg, a mining-town of Saxony, on the northern slope of the Erzgebirge Mountains, 20 miles SW. of Dresden. Its cathedral, successor to one burned in 1484, contains tombs of the Saxon electors of the Albertine line, and has a Romanesque portal called the Golden Gate. The town owes its origin to its silver-mines, discovered about 1163, and has a famous school of mines (1765). The mineral ores extracted near Freiberg are silver, bismuth, nickel, cobalt, zinc, arsenic, &c. The manufactures comprise gold and silver ware, wire, chemicals, machines, leather, and cigars. Population, 36,200. [Frī-berg.]

Freiburg, or (French) Fribourg, a Swiss canton, bounded N. and E. by Bern, and S. and W. by Vaud and the Lake of Neuchâtel, with three enclaves in Vaud. Area, 644 sq. m.; population, 139,000, principally French-speaking and Catholic. —The capital is Freiburg, or Fribourg, 19 miles by rail SW. of Bern, on the Sarine or Saane, here spanned by a suspension bridge (1834), 870 feet long. St Nicholas Church, dating from 1283, has one of the finest-toned organs in Europe, and a lofty belfry. There is here an international Catholic university. Pop. 20,300.

Freiburg im Breisgau, a town of Baden, on the western edge of the Black Forest, 32 miles NNE. of Basel. It is an open, well-built town; the walls and ditches with which it was formerly surrounded have been converted into promenades and vineyards. The beautiful Gothic cathedral (1122–1513) has a western steeple, 381 feet high. The university (1455) has 150 professors and teachers and 3000 students. The chief manufactures are sewing silk, cotton and thread, buttons, artificial beads, chicory, paper, parquetry, &c. Population, over 83,300, of whom more than one-half are Protestants. Founded in 1091 by the Duke of Zähringen, and created a town in 1115, Freiburg has repeatedly changed masters; twice it was given over to France (1679–97 and 1744–48). In 1806 it fell to Baden; and in 1848 the Baden revolutionists were defeated here by the troops of the German confederation.

Freising, a town of Bavaria, on the Isar, 22 miles NNE. of Munich by rail. It has a beautiful cathedral (1160) and a former episcopal palace (now a theological seminary); whilst close by is a Benedictine abbey (725–1803), now a royal model-farm. Pop. 15,000.

Freistadtl (Hung. Galgócz), a market-town of Friendly Islands, or Tonga Group, lie 250 miles ESE. of Fiji, number 32 inhabited and about 150 small islands, and consist of three sub-groups, with a collective area of only 390 sq. m. Tonga-tabu (165 sq. m.) is the largest; and next in importance are Eooa, Vavu, Namuka and Lefuka, Tofoa, Late, and Kao. The great majority are of coral formation; but some are volcanic; there are several active volcanoes, such as Tofoa (2846 feet) and Late (1787); and earthquakes are frequent. A treaty was concluded with Germany in 1876, with Great Britain in 1879; and a Berlin convention (1886) provided for the neutrality of this archipelago. The Friendly Islands were discovered by Tasman in 1643, but named by Cook, who visited them in 1777. Both these navigators found the soil highly cultivated, and the people apparently unprovided with arms. Among the products of the islands are copra, tropical fruits, coffee, sponges, cocoa-nuts, and arrowroot. The flora resembles that of the Fiji group; but the native animals are very few. The Friendly Islands were first visited by missionaries in 1797; in 1827 the work of evangelisation fell into the hands of the Wesleyan Methodists; and now almost all the islanders (who, unlike the Fijians, belong to the fair Polynesian stock) are Wesleyans. Many can speak English, and schools are numerous. In mental development, skill in house-building, and in the preparation of weapons, dress, &c., they are superior to other South Sea islanders. They number about 23,000. Vavu has one of the best harbours in the Pacific. The various islands in 1845 were brought under the rule of one chief, King George (1818–93), and in 1899 recognised as practically a British dependency. See Basil Thomson's Savage Island (1902).

Friesland, or Vriesland (Frēs′land; anc. Frisia), in its widest sense, as the country of the Frisian race, included the provinces of Zealand, North and South Holland, part of Utrecht, Friesland proper (1280 sq. m.; pop. 370,000), and Groningen in Holland, together with Prussian East Friesland (1200 sq. m.; pop. 274,000) and a part of Oldenburg, the western coast of Sleswick between the Eider and the Tondern, and the islands of Sylt, Föhr, Nordstrand, and others.

Frisches Haff (‘Fresh-water Bay’), a Prussian lagoon, SE. of the Gulf of Danzig, 50 miles long, 4 to 11 broad, and 332 sq. m. in area.

Friuli (Frē-oo′lē; Lat. Forum Julii), a once independent duchy at the head of the Gulf of Venice. With a total pop. of about 700,000, and a total area of 3470 sq. m., it is divided between Austrian Friuli (the districts of Görz, Gradisca, and Idria) and Italian Friuli (the province of Udine and the district of Portogruaro).

Frobisher Bay, an inlet opening westward near the mouth of Davis Strait, into the territory called by Frobisher Meta Incognita, at the southern end of Baffin Land. It is 200 miles long by above 20 wide, with rugged mountainous shores.

Frome, a market-town of Somerset, on the Frome, a branch of the Avon, 12 miles S. of Bath (19 by rail). Its parish church is a fine Decorated building, with a spire 120 feet high, stations of the cross, and the grave of Bishop Ken. Frome's specialties are bell and bronze casting, brewing, cloth-weaving, the making of tools and cards for dressing cloth. Population, 11,000. Till 1885 Frome returned one member. The forest of Selwood was in the vicinity.

Frontignan (Frong-teen-yong), a town of the French dep. of Hérault, 12 miles SW. of Montpellier, famed for its muscatel wine. Pop. 3000.

Frosino'ne (anc. Frusino), a town of Italy, 60 miles SE. of Rome. Pop. 10,000.

Frozen Strait, a passage, 15 miles wide, separating Southampton Island, in the north of Hudson Bay, from Melville Peninsula.

Fuca, or JUAN DE FUCA, Strait, a passage separating Washington state from Vancouver Island, and connecting the Pacific Ocean with the Gulf of Georgia. It contains several islands, one of which, San Juan, was awarded in 1872 by the emperor of Germany to the United States; and it and several neighbouring islands now form a county of Washington state.

Fû-chau. See FOOCHOW.

Fucino (Foo-chē'no), LAKE OF (anc. Fucinus Lacus), or LAGO DI CELA'NO, a lake of Italy, in the province of Aquila, 61 sq. m. in area, and 2172 feet above sea-level. Being only 75 feet deep and having no constant outflow, it was subject to sudden risings, which inundated the surrounding regions. In 44–54 A.D. the Emperor Claudius cut a subterranean channel, nearly 3 miles long, through Monte Salviano. This tunnel, however, soon became obstructed; and as the lake had been steadily rising from 1783, a new canal was made (1852–62). By 1875 the lake was dry; it is now under cultivation.

Fuego, TIERRA DEL. See TIERRA DEL FUEGO.

Fuente Alamo, a town of Spain, 20 miles S. of Murcia. Pop. 10,000.

Fu-kian, or FŬ-CHIEN, an eastern maritime province of China.

Fukui, an important town in the main island of Japan, about 75 miles NNE. of Kioto, noted for its silk manufactures. It is a clean and cheerful city, and has several Christian missions. Pop. 50,400.

Fukuoka, a town on the NW. coast of Kiu-shiu Island, Japan, 65 miles NNE. of Nagasaki, with considerable commerce in silk, &c. Pop. 82,000.

Fukushima, a town in the main island of Japan, about 75 miles E. of Niigata. It is an important centre for trade in silkworms' eggs and raw silk. Pop. 33,500.

Fulda, a town of the Prussian province of Hesse-Nassau, on the river Fulda, 67 miles NE. of Frankfort-on-the-Main. Its famous Benedictine abbey was founded by St Boniface, the 'Apostle of Germany,' in the 8th century; from the 10th century it had a primacy over all the abbeys of Germany. The cathedral, six times destroyed by fire, was rebuilt in 1704–12. In 1734–1804 Fulda had a university. Pop. 22,500.

Fulham, one of the metropolitan and parliamentary boroughs (returning one member) of London, in the south of Middlesex, on the left bank of the Thames, 4½ miles SW. of Charing Cross. Here since 1141 has been the palace of the bishops of London, but the present building is mostly not more than a century old. The church is ancient, and contains the tombs of many of the bishops. Fulham also has memories of Bodley, Florio, Richardson, Hallam, Crotch, and Albert Smith.

Fullarton, a suburb of Irvine (q.v.).

Fullarton House, 1½ mile ESE. of Troon, a seat of the Duke of Portland.

Fulnek, a town of Moravia, 10 miles NNW. of Neutitschein. Pop. 4000. Fulnek was formerly a principal seat of the Moravian Brethren, and gave its name to Fulneck in Yorkshire, 5½ miles E. of Bradford, where a Moravian settlement was established in 1748.

Funchal (Foon'tchal), the capital of Madeira, on the south side of the island, is, in spite of its exposed harbour and roadstead, the chief port and commercial town of the island. Pop. 20,000.

Fundy, BAY OF, an arm of the Atlantic, separating Nova Scotia from New Brunswick, and branching at its head into Chignecto Bay and Minas Basin. It has an extreme breadth of 45 miles and a length up to Chignecto Bay of 140 miles; it receives the St John, the principal river of New Brunswick, and the St Croix, which separates that province from Maine. The tides rush in with impetuous force, rising 60 to 70 feet.

Fünen, or FÜHNEN (Dan. Fyen), the largest of the Danish islands after Zealand, is separated from Sleswick and Jutland on the W. by the Little Belt, and from Zealand on the E. by the Great Belt. Area, 1135 sq. m.; pop. 250,000. The coast is flat and sandy, indented on the north by the deep Odense Fjord. The interior is flat, except towards the south and west, where a range of hills rises to 420 feet. The principal towns are Odense, Svendborg, and Nyborg.

Fünfhaus, a south-western suburb of Vienna.

Fünfkirchen ('Five Churches,' from the five mosques built during the Turkish occupation, in the 16th century; Hungarian Pecs), a free town of Hungary, on the vine-clad southern slope of the Mecsek Mountains, 139 miles S. by W. of Pesth by rail. It has a Romanesque cathedral (1136), and manufactures of leather, woollens, flannels, majolica, &c. Population, 50,000.

Furneaux Islands, a group of barren islands in Bass Strait, between Australia and Tasmania, Flinders Island being the largest. About 300 inhabitants, of mixed breed, capture seals and sea-birds. The group takes its name from Furneaux, who discovered it in 1773.

Furnes, a town of Belgium, 16 miles by rail E. by N. of Dunkirk. Pop. 7000.

Furness, a district in the north-west of Lancashire, forming a peninsula between Morecambe Bay and the Irish Sea. The chief town is Barrow-in-Furness (q.v.). The ruin of Furness Abbey, 2 miles from Barrow, is a fine example of transition Norman and Early English. Founded in 1127 for the Benedictines, it afterwards became a Cistercian house. See J. Richardson's Furness, Past and Present (Barrow, 1880).

Furruckabad. See FARUKHABAD.

Fürstenwalde, a town of Prussia, on the Spree, 30 miles SE. of Berlin. It has breweries, a large malting-house, &c. Pop. 22,600.

Fürth, a town of Bavaria, at the confluence of the Rednitz and Pegnitz, 5 miles NW. of Nuremberg by the earliest German railway (1835). It is famous for its mirrors, tinsel, lead pencils, combs, optical instruments, metal toys, &c. The inhabitants (66,500) are mainly Protestants. Burned to the ground in 1634 and 1680, Fürth fell to Bavaria in 1806.

Fury and Hecla Strait, in 70° N. lat., separates Melville Peninsula from Cockburn Island, and connects Fox Channel with the Gulf of Boothia. It was discovered by Parry in 1822, and named after his ships.

Fusan, one of the ports of Corea, on the south-east shore of the peninsula, was an early centre of Japanese influence, under a treaty of 1876. The imports include Manchester goods, salt, and Japanese wares; the exports, rice, beans, hides, &c.

Fusaro, Lake of (anc. Acherusia Palus), a small brackish lake of Italy, 11 miles W. of Naples. It is near the site of the ancient Cumæ, and during the Roman empire its banks were studded with villas. Oysters have been cultivated here since Roman times.

Fusiyama (properly Fuji-san), a sacred volcano, the loftiest mountain of Japan, stands on the main island, 60 miles SW. of Tokio, and rises 12,365 feet above sea-level, with a crater 500 feet deep. Its last eruption was in 1707. Its conical outline has been made familiar by Japanese artists.

Futa Jallon, a large area NE. of Sierra Leone, forming the inland portion of the colony of French Guinea. The area is 30,000 sq. m., and the pop. (who are of the Fulah stock) some 600,000. It is a hilly, healthy country, lying round a lofty mountain mass, and contains some of the head-streams of the Gambia, the Senegal, and the Niger.

Futehgunge, &c. See Fatehganj, &c.

Fyne, Loch, an Argyllshire sea-loch, running 40 miles N. and NE. from the Sound of Bute to beyond Inveraray. It is 1 to 5 miles broad, and 40 to 70 fathoms deep. On the west side it sends off Loch Gilp (2⅞ × 1¾ miles) leading to the Crinan Canal. The herrings of Loch Fyne are held in high estimation.

Fyzabad (better Faizabad), a city of Oudh, on the Gogra, 78 miles E. of Lucknow by rail. Built on part of the site of Ajodhya (q.v.), it was the capital of Oudh from 1760 to 1780, but is now greatly fallen from its old-time splendour. It maintains, however, an active trade. Pop. 54,927. —For the capital of Badakhshan, see Faizabad.

GABLONZ, a town of the north of Bohemia, 6 miles SE. of Reichenberg. Its glass manufactures employ some 12,000 men. Pop. 30,000.

Gabun and French Congo, officially French Equatorial Africa, a French possession between Cameroon and Belgian Congo, extending from the Atlantic to Lake Chad and Anglo-Egyptian Sudan. It includes Gabun, Middle Congo, Ubangi-Shari, and the Chad Military Territory. Wadai was annexed to French Equatorial Africa in 1909. The cession of about 100,000 square miles to Germany (Cameroon) in 1911 divides the French territory into three parts. Its area, within the new boundaries, is estimated at 500,000 sq. m., and the population at 5,000,000 to 10,000,000. The coast is tolerably uniform, the principal indentations being Corisco Bay and the estuaries of the Gabun and Ogowé in the north-west. These last are, with the Kwilu, the principal rivers. The Gabun, not a river but an estuary, 10 miles wide at its entrance, penetrates 40 miles inland, with a width of from 6 to 12 miles. On the north bank is the settlement of Libreville. The climate on the coastal strip is extremely unhealthy; mean annual temperature, 83° F. On the inland plateau (2600 feet above sea-level) it is better. Amongst the exports figure rubber, timber, gum, ivory, palm oil and kernels, earth-nuts, coffee, cocoa, and copal; other products are copper, hematite, quicksilver, sugar-cane, cotton, and bananas. The principal imports are salt, spirits, gunpowder, guns, tobacco, cotton goods, and iron and brass wares. The people belong for the most part to tribes of the Bantu stock. This part of Africa was discovered by the Spaniards in the 15th century. The French made their first settlement on the Gabun estuary in 1842; twenty years later they extended their sway to the Ogowé. But they seem never to have attached any importance to the colony until after De Brazza began to explore it in 1876–86. The principal towns are Brazzaville (the capital), Franceville, Loango, and Libreville.

Gad'ames, or Ghadames (the Cydamus of the Romans), an oasis and town of Africa, on the northern border of the Sahara, attached politically to Tripoli. The gardens owe their fertility to a hot spring (89° F.). The town is an entrepôt for manufactures and foreign goods from Tripoli to the interior, and for ivory, beeswax, hides, ostrich-feathers, gold, &c., from the interior to Tripoli. Pop. 10,000.

Gad'ara, a ruined town of Syria, in the Decapolis, a few miles SE. of the Sea of Galilee. For its exploration by Schumacher, see his Northern 'Ajlûn (1890).

Gades. See Cadiz.

Gadshill, 3 miles NW. of Rochester, commands a splendid prospect, and was the scene of Falstaff's famous encounter with the 'rogues in buckram suits.' Gadshill Place, an old-fashioned red-brick house here, which Dickens coveted as a boy, was bought by him in 1856, and was his home from 1860 till his death in 1870.

Ga'eta (Lat. Caieta), a strongly fortified maritime town of Italy, picturesquely situated on a lofty promontory, 50 miles NW. of Naples. On the summit of the promontory stands the circular Roland's tower, said to be the mausoleum of Plancus, the friend of Augustus. The beauty of the Bay of Gaeta, which almost rivals that of Naples, has been celebrated by Virgil and Horace. Often besieged, Gaeta in 1848–49 was the refuge of Pope Pius IX.; in 1860–61 of Francis II. of Naples. The citadel contains the tomb of the Constable Bourbon, killed at the taking of Rome in 1527. Pop. 20,000.

Gaeta, Mola di. See Formia.

Gaillac, a town in the French dep. of Tarn, 32 miles by rail NE. of Toulouse. Pop. 7000.

Gaillard, Château. See Andelys.

Gainesville, a town of Texas, 34 miles W. of Sherman. Pop. 10,000.

Gainsborough, a market-town of Lincolnshire, on the Trent's right bank, 21 miles above its embouchure in the Humber, and 16 miles by rail NW. of Lincoln. It has a parish church, rebuilt in 1736, with the exception of a fine 12th-century tower; a manor-house, built by John of Gaunt, and now forming part of the corn exchange; and a grammar-school (1589). Vessels drawing 12 feet of water can ascend the Trent to Gainsborough, which manufactures linseed cake and oil, malt, cordage, and machinery. Pop. 20,600. See the history by Stark (2d ed. 1843).

Gairloch, an inlet of the sea on the west coast of Ross-shire, 6 miles in length, which gives name to a parish and village. See J. H. Dixon, The Gairloch (1888).

Gairney Bridge, a place 1¾ mile SSE. of Kinross, where the first Secession presbytery met in 1733. An obelisk marks it.

Galabat, a town and district (once an Egyptian province) in the NW. of Abyssinia; pop. of town, 10,000.

Galacz. See GALATZ.

Galapa'gos (Span. Galápagos, 'tortoises'), a group of volcanic islands, lying on the equator, 600 miles W. of Ecuador, to which they belong. The islands all possess English names—probably bestowed by the buccaneers. The group consists of seven principal islands, with about half-a-dozen of lesser size, and innumerable islets and rocks; the area is estimated at 2940 sq. m., of which Albemarle Island embraces over half. Rising to a height of nearly 5000 feet, the islands are covered with a dense vegetation on the south side; on the northern they are barren and forbidding in aspect, the lower parts covered entirely with ashes and lava or with prickly scrub. Darwin puts the number of craters in the group at 2000; some appear to be not yet extinct. The archipelago was annexed by Ecuador in 1832. Charles Island and Chatham Island are now occupied by agricultural colonists, the chief crop being sugar. Pop. 400.

Galashiels, a town of Selkirkshire, the chief seat in Scotland of the Scotch tweed manufacture, occupies 2½ miles of the narrow valley of the Gala, immediately above its junction with the Tweed. It is 33½ miles SSE. of Edinburgh, and 4 WNW. of Melrose. In the 15th century it is spoken of as 'the forest-steading of Galashiels;' and its tower, demolished about 1814, was then occupied by the Douglases. In 1599 it was made a burgh of barony, having then 400 inhabitants. As early as 1581 cloth was manufactured here, but so great was the progress of the tweeds trade of the town during the 19th century that before the end of it the annual value of its woollen manufactures rose from £1000 to £1,250,000. The town has also dye-works, iron-foundries, engineering works, and boot-factories. In 1868 Galashiels was made a parliamentary burgh, with Hawick and Selkirk returning one member. Pop., royal burgh, 14,500; parliamentary burgh, 13,700.

Galata, a suburb of Constantinople (q.v.).

Galatia, in ancient geography, a country in the heart of Asia Minor.

Galatina, a town of Italy, 13 miles SW. of Lecce. Pop. 15,000.

Galatz, a river-port of Moldavia, the commercial centre of the Roumanian kingdom, on the Danube's left bank, 85 miles from its Sulina mouth, and 166 by rail NE. of Bucharest. It has a dockyard, grain-stores, and manufactures of iron, copper, wax candles, and soap. Population, 66,000.

Gala Water, a Scottish stream rising among the Moorfoot Hills, and winding 21 miles SSE., past Stow and Galashiels, till, after a total descent of 800 feet, it falls into the Tweed, a little below Abbotsford, and 2½ miles W. of Melrose. In its valley, the ancient Wedale, Skene localises one of Arthur's battles; its 'braw, braw lads' are famous in song.

Galena, a city of Illinois, on the Fevre River, 6 miles above its junction with the Mississippi, and 133 WNW. of Chicago by rail. Pop. 5000.

Galesburg, a city of Illinois, 53 miles WNW. of Peoria by rail. It has foundries, machine-shops, and agricultural manufactories, and is the seat of the Lombard University (Universalist, 1857) and of Knox College (Congregational, 1841). Pop. 20,600.

Galesville, a post-village of Wisconsin, 15 miles ENE. of Winona, with a Methodist university (1855). Pop. 1000.

Galicia, formerly a kingdom and afterwards a province in the north-west of Spain. With an area of 11,340 sq. m., it has been divided since 1833 into the minor provinces of Coruña, Lugo, Orense, and Pontevedra, whose joint pop. is now close on 2,000,000.

Galicia (Polish Halicz), an Austrian province lying between the Carpathians and Russian Poland. Area, 30,300 sq. m.; population, 8,000,000, almost all of Slavonic race, the western part being occupied mainly by Poles, the eastern by Ruthenians. The Ruthenians (42 per cent.) belong for the most part to the Greek Church, and the Poles (45 per cent.) to the Roman Catholic Church. The southern portion of the country is a high terrace, flanking the northern face of the Carpathians. Thence the land slopes away northwards, through a low hilly region, to the deep plains of the Dniester and the Vistula. There are many large rivers—those in the west being feeders of the Vistula, those in the east of the Danube and Dniester. One-fourth of the surface is covered with forests. Salt is the most important mineral; but coal, iron ore, sulphur, lead, zinc, and petroleum are also extracted. There are about thirty-five mineral springs, most of them containing sulphur. Lemberg (the capital) and Cracow are the chief towns. The western portion of the country belonged from 1382 till 1772 to Poland; in 1846 Cracow, with its territory, was given up to Austria, and annexed to Galicia.

Galicz. See HALICZ.

Galilee, SEA OF, called also Lake of Gennesaret and Sea of Tiberias (in O. T. Sea of Chinnereth or Cinneroth), a lake in north Palestine, 13 miles long by 6 broad. Its surface lies 682 feet below sea-level, at the bottom of a volcanic basin; its maximum depth, heretofore given at 820 feet, was in 1890 fixed at 148 feet by M. Barrois. Although the Jordan runs into it red and turbid from the north, and many warm and brackish springs also find their way thither, its waters are cool, clear, and sweet. The shores on the east and north sides are bare and rocky; on the west they are covered with luxuriant vegetation.

In the time of our Lord, Galilee (Heb. Galil, 'circle') embraced the whole northern portion of Palestine from the Mediterranean to the Jordan. It was divided into Upper and Lower Galilee, the former hilly and well wooded, the latter level and very fertile. At that time it was mainly inhabited by Syrians, Phœnicians, Arabs, and Greeks, with a few Jews. The principal towns were Tiberias and Sepphoris; those that figure in the gospels are Cana, Capernaum, Nazareth, and Nain. After the destruction of Jerusalem the despised Galilee became the refuge of the proud doctors of Jewish law, and the city of Tiberias the seat of Rabbinical learning. Galilee now forms part of the pashalic of Damascus, in the Turkish province of Syria, and is remarkable for its beauty and fertility. See Dr S. Merrill, Galilee in the Time of Christ (new ed. 1885).

Galion, a town of Ohio, 58 miles N. by E. of Columbus, with cigar-factories, machine-shops, railroad-shops, &c. Pop. 10,000.

Galla Country, a region of Abyssinia and British East Africa, inhabited by two or three millions of fierce, energetic, mainly heathen Gallas, some of whom have been Mohammedanised, and others, under Abyssinian influence, profess a corrupt Christianity. Many parts of southern Abyssinia are held by Gallas, who belong probably to the Hamitic stock.

Galle, or Point de Galle, a fortified seaport of the south-west extremity of Ceylon, stands on a low rocky promontory, and has a good harbour. It has lost its former importance as a coaling and transhipping station for the great lines of ocean-steamers since the completion of the breakwater at Colombo. Pop. 40,000.

Galle'go, a principal affluent of the Ebro.

Gallip'oli (Greek Kallipolis), a cathedral city of southern Italy, on a steep insulated rock in the Gulf of Taranto, connected with the mainland by a bridge, 59 miles by rail S. of Brindisi. It has a fortified harbour protected by a mole, and exports olive-oil. Pop. 13,000.

Gallipoli (anc. Kallipolis), a seaport of European Turkey, on the peninsula of the same name (the ancient Thracian Chersonesus), at the north-eastern extremity of the Dardenelles, 90 miles S. of Adrianople, and 130 WSW. of Constantinople. Pop. 25,000.

Galloway, an extensive district of south-west Scotland, once somewhat larger, but now entirely comprised in the shire of Wigtown and stewartry of Kirkcudbright. It is 70 miles long by 40 at its utmost breadth, and contains the greatest diversity of scenery—mountain, lake, and stream, as well as dreary waste and almost pathless moor. The province owes its name to the fact that the natives were called Gall-Gael, or foreign Gaels, at first because of their falling under the foreign rule of the Anglians; but as the Picts of Galloway they continued to be known so late as the Battle of the Standard in 1138. See works by Sir Andrew Agnew (2d ed. 1893), M'Kerlie (1870–91), and Sir H. Maxwell (1896).

Galloway, Mull of, a bold headland, the southern extremity of the peninsula called the Rhinns of Galloway, in Wigtownshire, and the most southern point of Scotland, 23 miles S. of Stranraer. It is 1¼ mile long, and ¼ mile broad, and rises to 210 feet at its eastern extremity, on which stands a lighthouse, 60 feet high, whose light is visible 23 nautical miles.

Galston, an Ayrshire village, 5 miles SE. of Kilmarnock by rail. It manufactures muslins and lace, and has neighbouring coal-pits. Pop. 5300.

Galt, a town of Ontario, Canada, on the Grand River, 25 miles by rail E. by N. of Hamilton. It manufactures flour, machines, cast-iron, paper, leather, &c. Galt was founded in 1816. Pop. 10,300, mostly of Scotch descent.

Galtee Mountains, a range of Tipperary and Limerick, attaining 3008 feet in Galteemore.

Galveston, a seaport of Texas, on Galveston Island, at the opening of Galveston Bay into the Gulf of Mexico, 214 miles ESE. of Austin by rail. The island is a low strip of land, 30 miles long by 3 broad; the bay extends northward from the city to the mouth of the Trinity River, a distance of 35 miles, and has a breadth of from 12 to 18 miles. The city contains a Catholic cathedral, the Catholic University of St Mary, and the Texas Medical College; and it has foundries, mills, and machine-shops. Since the hurricane and flood of 1900, its harbour is protected, and the level of the town raised. The foreign trade (£45,000,000 in 1911) is mainly the export of cotton and cotton-seed oil. Pop. 37,000.

Galway, a maritime county of Ireland, in the province of Connaught, and, after Cork, the largest of all the Irish counties. Area, 1,520,000 acres, of which a little more than one-half is arable. Pop. (1831) 414,684; (1871) 248,458; (1881) 241,662; (1911) 182,224 (97·6 per cent. Catholics). It is watered in the east by the Shannon, the Suck, and their feeders; and in the west by Loughs Mask and Corrib, and by the streams which fall into them and Galway Bay. In the south are the Slieve-Baughta Mountains; and in the west are the Maam-Turk Mountains, and the Twelve Pins (2395 feet). South-west from Lough Corrib to the sea is the district called Connemara, which contains vast bogs, moors, lakes, and morasses. North-east of Connemara is Joyce's Country, and south-east of it is Iar-Connaught, or Western Connaught. The shore is much broken, with many islands and bays. Agriculture and fishing are the chief pursuits. Raths and cromlechs are numerous; there are seven round towers; whilst of many monastic ruins the finest is that of Knockmoy, near Tuam. Since 1885 Galway county has returned four members to parliament.

Galway Bay is an inlet of the Atlantic, on the west coast of Ireland, between the counties of Galway and Clare. It is a noble sheet of water, 30 miles long from W. to E., and 10 in average breadth, and is sheltered by the Aran Isles.

Galway, a municipal and parliamentary borough of Ireland, a seaport, and county of itself, at the mouth of the Corrib, on the north shore of Galway Bay, 50 miles NNW. of Limerick, and 127 W. of Dublin by rail. The old town is poorly built and irregular. In the wall of a house here is the 'Lynch Stone,' where in 1493 'Mayor Lynch' had his own son hanged for the murder of a Spaniard. The new town consists of well-planned streets, and is built on a rising-ground which slopes gradually toward the sea and the river. A suburb, called Claddagh, is inhabited by fishermen. Galway is the see of a Catholic bishop. The principal buildings are the cruciform church (Episcopal) of St Nicholas (1320), St Augustine's Catholic Church (1859), the county court-house, &c. Queen's College (1849) became in 1908 University College, of the National University of Ireland; its quadrangular buildings are spacious and handsome. Galway has flour-mills, a distillery, a foundry, extensive salmon and sea fishing, a good harbour, with docks that admit vessels of 500 tons, and a lighthouse. The exports consist mainly of agricultural produce, wool, and black marble. Galway returns one member to parliament. Pop. 13,300; parliamentary borough, 16,000 (nine-tenths Catholics). Galway was taken by Richard de Burgh in 1232, by Sir Charles Coote in 1652, and in 1691 by General Ginckell. See Hardiman's History of the Town and County of Galway (Dublin, 1820).

Gambia, a river of western Africa, the more southerly of the two great streams of Senegambia, enters the Atlantic after a course of over 1000 miles, by an estuary which in some parts measures nearly 27 miles across, but contracts to little more than 2 at the mouth. It is navigable from June to November for vessels of 150 tons up to Barraconda, 400 miles from the sea.—The British colony of Gambia, except St Mary's Island (4 sq. m.), on which stands Bathurst, the capital, is administered on the protectorate system. Its area is 69 sq. m.; but a protected strip on each side of the river, added in 1890, makes, after the cession of the port of Yarbatenda to the French in 1904, a total area of over 4000 sq. m. Pop. of St Mary's Island, 7700; of whole, 146,100. The climate is 'fairly healthy during the dry months.' The staple product is the ground-nut; other products being hides, rice, cotton, beeswax, kola nuts, and india-rubber, and there is an active entrepôt trade with the neighbouring French settlements in cotton goods, spirits, rice, kola nuts, and hardware. Formerly a dependency of Sierra Leone, the settlement was created an independent colony in 1843, a portion of the West African Settlements in 1876, and a separate government in 1888. It is now practically shut in by French territory. The settlement is connected with Europe by telegraph cables, and the Liverpool mail-steamers call fortnightly. In February 1894 a small British expedition to punish a slave-raiding Mandingo chief received a check, an event which led to decisive measures.

Gambier Islands, or MANGARÉVA, a Polynesian group of six larger and several smaller islands, under a French protectorate, in 23° 8′ S. lat. and 134° 55′ W. long. Area, 15 sq. m.; pop. 1500.

Gamrun. See GOMBROON.

Gand. See GHENT.

Gandak, a river of India, rises in the Nepal Himalayas, and flows SE., between the United Provinces and Bihar, to the Ganges at Patna.

Gandamak, an Afghan village, between Kabul and Peshawar, where in 1842 the last remnant of the British force from Kabul was massacred. Here a treaty was signed with Yakub Khan in 1879.

Gandersheim (Gan'ders-hīm), a town of 3000 inhabitants in Brunswick, 30 miles N. of Göttingen by rail. Its famous abbey (852) gave the title of abbess to the daughters of German princes, and until 1803 was itself a principality.

Gandia, a town of Spain, near the mouth of the Alcoy, and 47 miles SSE. of Valencia by rail. Pop. 10,000.

Gando, a Fulah state of the western Soudan, lying west of Sokoto, and on both sides of the Niger north of Borgu; most of it is now, since 1900, within (British) northern Nigeria, while the western part is in French West Africa.—GANDO, 50 miles SW. of the town of Sokoto, is the capital; the trading town on the Niger is Egga (q.v.).

Gandolfo. See CASTEL GANDOLFO.

Ganges, the great river of northern India, rises in Garhwal in 30° 56′ 4″ N. lat. and 79° 6′ 40″ E. long., issuing, under the name of the Bhagirathi, from an ice-cave 8 miles above Gangotri and 13,800 feet above sea-level. A few miles below Gangotri it receives the Jahnavi, and 133 miles from its source the Alaknanda, from which point the united stream is known as the Ganges. From Sukhi, where it bursts through the Himalayas, it flows south-west to Hardwar, and thence winds south-east to Allahabad, where it is joined by the Jumna. Hence the great river rolls on, past the holy city of Benares, and across the plains of Behar, fed by the Son, the Gandak, and the Kusi. It then turns sharply to the southward, and begins to throw out the branches which enclose the level delta, at a point 220 miles from the Bay of Bengal. The main channel, called the Padma or Padda, runs south-east to Goalanda, where it is met by the main stream of the Brahmaputra, and the vast confluence of waters flows in a broad estuary, the Meghna, into the Bay of Bengal near Noakhali. Between this most easterly mouth, and the Hugli or Hooghly (q.v.), the most westerly and the great channel of navigation, lies the delta, with a multitude of mouths and channels. The delta in its upper angle is very fertile, but in the south, towards the sea, the country is a desolate waste of swamps (see SUNDARBANS), intersected by a network of canals. The Ganges has a total length of 1557 (by the Hugli mouth, 1509) miles; its drainage basin embraces over 430,000 sq. m. In spite of the shoals and rapids that lie above Allahabad, it is in some sense navigable from the point where it enters the lowlands, near Hardwar; and its stream, which never fails in the hottest summer, distributes fertility throughout its course, and even its inundations spread over the fields a rich top-dressing of alluvial silt. The ruined or decayed cities near its banks, however, bear mute witness to the loss inflicted by the constant changes which take place in the river-bed. The Ganges excels all the great rivers of India in sanctity; from the source down to the sea every foot of 'Mother Gangâ's' course is holy ground, to bathe in her waters will wash away sin, to die and be buried on her banks secures free entry to eternal bliss.

The GANGES CANAL, opened in 1854, is an important irrigation work and navigable channel, extending, on the right of the Ganges, from Hardwar to Cawnpore, with a long branch to Hamirpur on the Jumna. The main canal is 445 miles in length. The Lower Ganges Canal, planned in 1866, and begun in 1873, is a southward extension of the main line to Allahabad.

Gangi, a town of Sicily, 18 miles SSE. of Cefalù. Pop. 14,000.

Gan-hwuy, or AN-HUI, an eastern inland province of China, crossed by the Yang-tsze-Kiang.

Ganjam, a town of Madras presidency, at the mouth of the Rishikuliya, 18 miles NE. of Berhampur. Pop. 5037.

Gannat, a town in the French dep. of Allier, 245 miles SSE. of Paris by rail. Pop. 5000.

Gantang Pass, 18,295 feet high, leads eastward from the Bashahr hill state, across the Himalayas into Chinese territory.

Gantur. See GUNTUR.

Gap (anc. Vapincum), the capital of the French dep. Hautes Alpes, on the Luye, 2424 feet above sea-level, 47 miles SE. of Grenoble. It has a cathedral (rebuilt since 1866). Pop. 10,000.

Garabit, a point on the railway from Marvejols (Lozère) to Neussargues, 10 miles S. of St Flour, in the French dep. of Cantal, where the line crosses a gorge through which the waters of the Truyère run, 401 feet below the rails. The Eiffel viaduct here is 1852½ feet long, and crosses the river by an arch, with a span of 541⅓ feet.

Garamantes. See FEZZAN.

Garaye, LA, a ruined château in Brittany, 2 miles from Dinan. Its last owners, Claude Toussaint and his countess, in the first half of the 18th century converted it into a hospital, which forms the theme of the Hon. Mrs Norton's poem, 'The Lady of La Garaye' (1862).

Gard, a French dep. on the Mediterranean, and bounded E. by the Rhone, with an area of 2245 sq. m., one-third arable. It is divided into the arrondissements of Alais, Nîmes (the capital), Uzès, and Vigan. Pop. 413,500.

Garda, Lago di (Roman Lacus Benacus), a beautiful, clear lake, the largest of Italy, lies between Lombardy and Venetia, its northern end extending into the Austrian Tyrol. Situated 226 feet above sea-level, it has an area of 115 sq. m., a greatest length of 35 miles, a breadth of 2 to 11 miles, and a maximum depth of 967 feet; the surface is studded with many islands. It is drained by the Mincio, a tributary of the Po. The mild climate and the beauty of the vicinity have caused its shores to be lined with villas.

Gardaia, or Ghardaïa, a town in the Algerian Sahara, stands on a conical hill, in an oasis-valley full of date-palms, 82 miles WNW. of Wargla. In 1882 a garrisoned fort was established here by the French. Pop. of oasis, 40,000.

Gardelegen, an old town of Prussian Saxony, on the Milde, 28 miles (53 by rail) NNW. of Magdeburg. Pop. 9000.

Garden City, in Long Island, now part of Queens borough, New York, was laid out as a town of model villas by the New York millionaire, A. T. Stewart (1803–76).—Garden City is the name given to a model city planned on an estate acquired at Letchworth, near Hitchin in Herts, the amenities of country life being specially secured.

Gardenstown, a Banffshire fishing-village, 8 miles ENE. of Banff. It was founded in 1720 by A. Garden, Esq., of Troup. Population, about 1100.

Gardiner, a port of Maine, on the Kennebec River, 56 miles NNE. of Portland. Pop. 5300.

Gardner, a town of Massachusetts, 70 miles WNW. of Boston by rail, with manufactures of wooden wares. Pop. 15,000.

Gareloch. See Dumbartonshire.

Garelochhead, a Dumbartonshire village at the head of the Gareloch, 7½ miles NNW. of Helensburgh by rail. Pop. 900.

Gargano (anc. Gargānus), a mountainous peninsula, the 'spur' of Italy, in the province of Foggia, jutting out 30 miles into the Adriatic, and attaining 5110 feet in Monte Calvo.

Garhmukhtesar, a town in the United Provinces, on the Ganges, 26 miles SE. of Meerut, with four shrines of Gangâ, and a fair, which attracts 200,000 pilgrims. Pop. 6300.

Garhwal, a native state in the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh, on the borders of Tibet; area, 4200 sq. m.; pop. 300,000. Also an adjoining British district in the United Provinces; area, 5629 sq. m.; pop. 500,000.

Gariep. See Orange River.

Garigliano (anc. Liris; Liri still in its upper course), a river of Italy, rises in the Abruzzi, and flows 90 miles S. to the Gulf of Gaeta. It is navigable below Pontecorvo. On its banks in 1503 the Spaniards defeated the French.

Garioch, a district of mid-Aberdeenshire.

Garleton Hills, a range (590 feet), 1½ mile N. of Haddington, crowned with a column to the Earl of Hopetoun, the Peninsular hero. Ruined Garleton or Garmylton Castle, at its N. base, was perhaps Sir David Lyndsay's birthplace.

Garliestown, a Wigtownshire seaport, 9¼ miles by rail SSE. of Wigtown. It was founded about 1760 by Lord Garlies (the seventh Earl of Galloway. Pop. 500.

Garmouth, an Elginshire village, 3 miles N. by W. of Fochabers. Charles II. landed here in 1650. Pop. with Kingston-on-Spey, 700.

Garmylton. See Garleton.

Garnkirk, a Lanarkshire village, with fireclay-works, 4 miles WNW. of Coatbridge.

Garnock, an Ayrshire stream flowing 21 miles southward to the Firth of Clyde at Irvine.

Garnqueen, a Lanarkshire village, 2½ miles N. by W. of Coatbridge.

Garo Hills, a mountainous district forming the SW. corner of Assam, with an area of 3270 sq. m., and a pop. of 138,300.

Garonne (anc. Garumna), the principal river of south-west France, rises within the Spanish frontier in the Val d'Aran, at the base of Mount Maladetta, in the Pyrenees, 6142 feet above sea-level. About 26 miles from its source it enters the French territory in the dep. of Haute Garonne, and flows NE. and NW. until, joined by the Dordogne, 20 miles below Bordeaux, and widening afterwards into the Gironde estuary, it enters the Atlantic at the Pointe de Grave. The estuary, the largest in France, is nearly 50 miles long. The total length of the river is 346 miles; it drains an area of 22,020 sq. m. Its navigation, which, however, is much impeded above Toulouse, commences for small craft at Cazères; ocean steamers go up to Bordeaux. Its principal affluents are the Tarn, Lot, and Dordogne, on the right; and on the left, the Save, Gers, and Baise. At Toulouse it is joined by the Canal du Midi, running eastward to the Mediterranean; and the river's own canal latéral, starting also from Toulouse, runs 120 miles along the right bank.

Garonne, Haute, a dep. in the south of France, embracing portions of ancient Gascony and Languedoc. Area, 2428 sq. m.; population, about 432,000. It is divided into the four arrondissements of Toulouse (the capital), Muret, St Gaudens, and Villefranche.

Garry. See Glengarry.

Garscadden, a Dumbartonshire village, 3 miles WNW. of Maryhill.

Garstang, a Lancashire market-town, on the Wyre, 10½ miles S. of Lancaster. Pop. 1000.

Garston, a Lancashire town, on the Mersey, 4 miles SE. of Liverpool, to which it was added in 1902 (pop. in 1901, 17,289).

Gartsherrie. See Coatbridge.

Gasconade, a river of Missouri, winding 200 miles north-eastward to the Missouri River, 35 miles below Jefferson City.

Gascony, an ancient district of SW. France, now included in the deps. of Landes, Gers, Hautes-Pyrénées, and the south portions of Haute-Garonne, Tarn-et-Garonne, and Lot-et-Garonne.

Gask, a Perthshire parish, 8 miles WSW. of Perth. Its lairds were the Jacobite Oliphants, to whom belonged Lady Nairne, the song-writer.

Gaspé, a peninsula of Quebec province, projecting into the Gulf of St Lawrence, between the river St Lawrence on the N. and the Bay of Chaleurs on the S.—Gaspé Basin, where Cartier landed in 1584, is a port in Gaspé Bay, now the seat of fisheries. Pop. 600.

Gastein, a romantic valley (pop. 5000) in the south of the Austrian duchy of Salzburg, 28 miles long, with many small villages. The chief, Wildbad-Gastein, is visited every summer by some 8000 guests to drink of its seven warm springs. Here, on 14th August 1865, a convention was signed between Austria and Prussia for the partition of Sleswick-Holstein.

Gatchina, a town of Russia, 30 miles by rail SSW. of St Petersburg. It has porcelain manufactures, barracks, and a palace long the favourite residence of Alexander III., and guarded with extraordinary care. Pop. 15,000.

Gatehouse-of-Fleet, a pretty Kirkcudbrightshire river-port, on the Fleet, 9 miles WNW. of Kirkcudbright. Pop. 1000.

Gateshead, a town on the northern verge of the county of Durham, and on the south bank of the Tyne, opposite Newcastle. Governed for centuries by a chief bailiff appointed by the prince-bishop of the palatinate, aided by popularly elected burgesses, Gateshead became a parliamentary borough (sending one member) in 1832, a municipal borough in 1835, and a county borough in 1888. Pop. (1831) 15,177; (1851) 25,568; (1881) 65,855; and (1911) 16,917. The two towns are intimately connected by a splendid suspension bridge (1871) at Redheugh; by Stephenson's celebrated high-level road and railway bridge (1849); and by a swing-bridge (1876), which opens to allow the passage of ships. Engine-works, electrical machines, hempen and wire rope manufactories, chemical-works, cement-works, glass-works, and ironworks employ many of the inhabitants. The town-hall and free library are among the architectural ornaments of the borough, which also has a grammar-school (1700), King James's Hospital (1611) for poor brethren, a public park at Saltwell (1874), public libraries (1886), high schools, swimming-baths, &c. St Mary's Church in 1080 was the scene of the murder of Bishop Walcher; and at Gateshead Defoe wrote Robinson Crusoe. The quarries yielding the world-famous Newcastle grindstones are worked at Gateshead Fell. See Welford's History of Newcastle and Gateshead (2 vols. 1884–85).

Gath, one of the five chief cities of the Philistines, was situated on the frontiers of Judah. Its site is probably the Blanche Garde of the Crusaders, who built a castle here.

Gatineau, a river of Quebec, Canada, issuing from a chain of lakes just N. of 48° N. lat., flows 400 miles SSW. to the Ottawa River, a mile below Ottawa City.

Gatschina, Gatshina. See GATCHINA.

Gattonside, a Tweedside village, opposite Melrose, famous for its fruit.

Gauhátí. See ASSAM.

Gaul. See FRANCE.

Gaur, or LAKHNAUTI, the mediæval capital of Bengal, whose ruins still cover a space of seven miles by two, on a branch of the Ganges, and include Hindu buildings and interesting 15th-century mosques, besides extensive reservoirs, channels, and embanked roads.

Gaya, a town of Bihar, on the Phalgu, 57 miles S. of Patna by rail. It is a place of the greatest sanctity, from its associations with Buddha, and is annually visited by 100,000 Hindu pilgrims. Pop. 70,000.

Gaya, the wine suburb of Oporto (q.v.).

Gaza, one of the five chief cities of the ancient Philistines, situated in the south-west of Palestine, 3 miles from the sea, on the borders of the desert which separates Palestine from Egypt. In 333 B.C. it was taken after a five months' siege by Alexander the Great, and from then to 1799, when the French captured it, it witnessed the victories of the Maccabees, Calif Abu-bekr, the Templars, and the heroic Saladin. Constantine the Great, who rebuilt the town, made it the seat of a bishop. The modern Guzzeh is a collection of mere villages, its only building of interest the great mosque. Pop. 25,000.

Gebweiler (Fr. Guebwiller), a town of Alsace-Lorraine, at the foot of the Vosges, 15 miles SSW. of Colmar, has cotton-spinning, dyeworks, machine-factories, and vineyards. Pop. 13,000.

Gedrosia. See BELUCHISTAN.

Geelong (g soft), a city of Victoria, on the south side of Corio Bay, 45 miles SW. of Melbourne by rail. The river Barwon forms the southern boundary of the city, and 3 miles farther spreads into the Connewarre Lakes, falling into the sea at Point Flinders. The gold discoveries in 1851 added to the prosperity of Geelong, which had been incorporated as a town in 1849, and became a principal seat of the wool trade—the first woollen mill in Victoria being erected here. Alongside of the railway jetty the largest ships can load and discharge, and through the bar at the entrance to Corio Bay channels have been dredged for steamer traffic. The industries include the manufacture of woollen cloths and paper, meat-preserving, tanning, rope-making, fishing, &c. The Exhibition Hall and general produce exchange, theatre, and assembly-rooms combined, stands in the market-square. The city has two parks, botanical gardens, government buildings, a town-hall, a post-office (1889), an excellent hospital, a chamber of commerce, &c. Corio Bay is a favourite bathing-resort. Pop. 33,500.

Geelvink Bay penetrates 125 miles southward into the western arm of New Guinea. Islands protect its entrance, 155 miles wide.

Geestemünde, a Prussian free port, at the Geeste's confluence with the Weser, just SE. of Bremerhaven. Its docks and wharves were constructed in 1857–63. Pop. 25,100.

Gefle, a town of Sweden, on an inlet of the Gulf of Bothnia, 71 miles by rail N. by W. of Uppsala. Rebuilt since its destruction by fire in 1869, it has a castle (16th and 18th c.), shipbuilding yards, and manufactures of sailcloth, cotton, and tobacco, and fisheries. It is one of Sweden's principal commercial towns, exporting iron, timber, and tar, and importing corn and salt. Pop. 36,000.

Gelderland. See GUELDERLAND.

Gellivara, a great Swedish iron-mining centre, 115 miles NW. of Luleå, on the railway between Luleå and Narvik.

Gelnhausen, a town of Prussia, on a hill, 26 miles NE. of Frankfort-on-Main; pop. 5000.

Gelsenkirchen (g hard), a modern manufacturing town of Westphalia, 4 miles NW. of Bochum. It owes to coal and iron its rise from a mere village since 1860. Pop. 170,000.

Gemmi Pass (g hard), a narrow Alpine path, nearly 2 miles long and 7553 feet high, connecting the Swiss cantons of Bern and Valais.

Genazza'no, a town 27 miles E. of Rome, containing an old castle of the Colonnas and a far-famed pilgrimage-chapel; pop. 5000.

Genesee, a river rising in Pennsylvania, and flowing nearly 200 miles north through western New York into Lake Ontario, 7 miles N. of Rochester. Three of its extraordinary falls occur within 1½ mile; two being 68 and 90 feet high, and the Portage Falls 110 feet. The river has also a sheer fall of 95 feet at Rochester, utilised for water-power; and another cascade, a few miles below, is almost as high.

Geneva (Fr. Genève, Ger. Genf, Ital. Ginevra), a canton in the south-west of Switzerland, bounded S., E., and W. by the territories of France; area, 108 sq. m.; population, 154,000, about half being Catholics, and 85 per cent. French-speaking. It is watered by the Rhone and Arve, which unite 2 miles from the south-west extremity of the Lake of Geneva. The surface is hilly, chief eminences being the steep Salève (4528 feet) and the Reculet (5631).

GENEVA, the capital, is situated at the exit of the Rhone from the Lake of Geneva, 388 miles by rail SE. of Paris. A Gallic town originally, Geneva acknowledged Roman supremacy in 120 B.C.; passed backwards and forwards from and to Burgundy; was made a bishop's seat in the 4th century; and having secured Freiburg (1519) and Bern (1526) for allies, finally won its complete independence from Savoy, a few years later accepting Protestantism. In 1535 Calvin arrived at Geneva, and began his reconstitution of the political and social life of the republic, which created it one of the chief strongholds of Protestantism in Europe. Formerly Geneva was walled, and consisted of clusters of narrow streets; but since the accession of the radical party to power in 1847 the town has been almost entirely rebuilt in modern style. The ancient ramparts have been removed, streets widened and well paved, and new and commodious quays constructed along the lake and river. In its course through the town the Rhone forms two islands, on one of which still exists an antique and picturesque cluster of buildings; on the other, laid out as a public pleasure-ground, is a statue of Rousseau. In the Place des Alpes is a sumptuous monument to Duke Charles XI. of Brunswick, who, dying here in 1873, left 16,500,000 francs to the city. Famous as a theological, literary, and scientific centre, Geneva has given birth to Rousseau; to the physicist De Saussure; to the naturalists De Candolle, Bonnet, and the Pictets; to Necker, the French minister of finance; to the humorist Toepffer; and to the sculptor Pradier. The principal edifices are the Transition cathedral of St Peter (1124); the town-hall, in which the Alabama arbitrators met in 1872; the academy, founded by Calvin in 1559, with a library of 170,000 volumes, and in 1873 converted into a university (with now 1400 students); the magnificent theatre (1879); the Rath Museum (1824–26); the Fol Museum, with Greek, Roman, and Etruscan antiquities; the Athenæum, devoted to the fine arts; and the museum of natural history, &c. The staple manufactures of the town are watches, musical-boxes, and jewellery. Pop. 125,500.

Geneva, a town of New York, at the north end of Seneca Lake, 26 miles W. of Auburn by rail, with flouring-mills and manufactures of engines, boilers, &c. It is the seat of Hobart College (Episcopal, founded in 1824). Pop. 12,500.

Geneva, LAKE OF, or LAKE LEMAN (Lacus Lemanus), situated between Switzerland, to which the larger portion belongs, and France. It lies 1218 feet above sea-level, and curves 45 miles westward, in the form of a crescent. Its greatest breadth is 9 miles, its area 223 sq. m., and its maximum depth 1092 feet. The lake abounds in fish. The Pays de Vaud shore is celebrated by Rousseau and Byron, while the names of Voltaire and Madame de Staël are connected with Ferney and Coppet at the Geneva extremity, Gibbon's with Lausanne. The southern French shore rises solemn and stern, with the mountains of Savoy in the background; Mont Blanc, though 60 miles distant, is often reflected in the water. The tidal phenomenon called seiches has been studied in the lake. The Rhone enters it at the upper end, turbid and yellow, and leaves it at the town of Geneva as clear as glass, and of a deep blue tint.

Gennesaret, SEA OF. See GALILEE.

Genoa (Ital. Genova, Fr. Gênes, anc. Genua), a city of Italy, situated on the Mediterranean gulf of the same name, at the foot of the Apennines, is the capital of a province and the most important seaport. By rail it is 801 miles SE. of Paris, 171 NE. of Marseilles, and 93 SSW. of Milan. Population, 272,000. The slopes of the hills behind the city down to the shore are covered with buildings, terraced gardens, and orange and pomegranate groves; while the bleak summits of the loftier ranges rising still farther back are capped with strong forts, batteries, and outworks. The fine semicircular harbour, with a diameter of rather less than a mile, is protected seawards from the south and south-east winds by piers, and was much improved towards the end of the 19th century. In front of this inner harbour another one has been made by the construction of two outer moles. On the north side of the port is a naval harbour and a marine arsenal; and on the east side the warehouses of the former (until 1867) free port. Genoa is the commercial outlet for a wide extent of country, of which the chief exports are rice, wine, olive-oil, silk goods, coral, paper, macaroni, and marble. The imports are principally raw cotton, wheat, sugar, coal, hides, coffee, raw wool, fish, petroleum, iron, machinery, and cotton and woollen textiles. The annual exports (by sea) of Genoa are valued at about £10,000,000, while the imports are returned at about £20,000,000. About 7000 vessels, of 7,000,000 tons burden, enter annually. The principal industrial establishments of the city embrace ironworks, cotton and cloth mills, macaroni-works, tanneries, sugar-refineries, and vesta-match, filigree, and paper factories. Genoa benefited greatly by the opening of the St Gothard Railway. Many thousands of emigrants sail every year from Genoa for South America.

While strikingly grand as viewed from the sea, and so far worthy of being entitled Genova la Superba, Genoa is in reality built awkwardly on irregular rising ground, and consists of a labyrinth of narrow and intricate lanes. Of the palaces the most famous are the former palace of the doges, now the meeting-place of the senate; and the Doria, presented in 1529 to the great Genoese citizen Andrea Doria. Foremost amongst the churches stands the cathedral, a grand 12th-century pile in the Italian Gothic style. The marble municipal palace and the palace of the Dogana must also be mentioned. The university (with over 1000 students), originally built in 1623, reorganised in 1812, has a library of 130,000 volumes. To Columbus and Mazzini, Genoa's most famous sons, there are fine monuments. A great mediæval republic, the rival of Pisa and Venice, Genoa in 1768 ceded Corsica to France, and in 1802 was made a French dep., in 1815 a province of Piedmont. See works by Bent (1880) and W. W. Johnson (1892).

Genoa, Gulf of, a large indentation in the northern shore of the Mediterranean, north of Corsica, has between the towns of Oneglia on the west and Spezia on the east a width of nearly 90 miles, with a depth of about 30 miles.

Gensan, or Wŏnsan, a town and port of Corea, at the head of an arm of Broughton Bay, near the middle of the east coast of the peninsula. Pop. 20,000, including 3000 Japanese.

Gentilly (Zhang-tē-yē), a southern suburb of Paris, at the foot of Bicêtre hill; pop. 8000.

Genza'no, a town of Italy, on the Via Appia, 16 miles SE. of Rome; pop. 10,000.

George, a western division of the Cape Province, on the south coast, east of Capetown; area, 2600 sq. m.; pop. 15,400. The town of George stands 6 miles N. of the coast. On the coast is the port of Mossel Bay.

George, Lake. See Albert Edward.

George, Lake, or Horicon, a beautiful lake, 32 miles long, near the eastern border of New York state. It discharges to Lake Champlain, is studded with hundreds of islands, and on its shores has several favourite summer-resorts, especially the village of Caldwell or Lake George. In the battle of Lake George the French and Algonquins were utterly defeated by the English and Iroquois, 8th September 1755.

Georgetown, a former port of entry in the District of Columbia, on the Potomac, above Washington, at the head of navigation. Here the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal crosses the Potomac by a great viaduct 1446 feet long. Containing many educational institutions, one of them a Roman Catholic college (1789), it is now included within the limits of Washington, and is regularly styled West Washington.

Georgetown (formerly the Dutch Stabroek), capital of British Guiana, on the right bank of the Demerara River, near its mouth. It consists of wide, clean streets, intersecting at right angles; the brightly painted wooden houses, with their verandas, are generally raised on piles a few feet above the unhealthy soil, and embosomed in trees, of which the cabbage-palm and coconut are the chief. Some of the streets are traversed by canals, with bridges at the cross streets. The principal public edifices are the government building, the cathedral, the Queen's College, and a museum and library. There are botanical gardens, two markets, a railway to New Amsterdam, a good harbour, a lighthouse, and fortifications; the foreign trade is virtually that of the colony. Population, 54,000, of whom only about 5500 are whites.

Georgetown. See Penang.

Georgia, the most southerly of the original thirteen states of the American Union, is bounded by Tennessee, North and South Carolina, the Atlantic Ocean, Florida, and Alabama. It has an area of 59,475 sq. m.—a little more than the area of England and Wales; and its low-lying and sandy coast is bordered with islands. The state falls into five physical divisions: (1) The Sea Islands, famous for their cotton, and covered with a growth of oak, palmetto, magnolia, cedar, pine, and myrtle; (2) the Swamp Region, consisting of rich alluvial lands and deltas, verdant with a dense and semi-tropical vegetation, and admirably fitted for rice-culture; (3) the Pine Barrens, with a thin soil, sheltered by vast forests of pitch-pine; (4) Middle Georgia, fertile, salubrious, hilly, crowned with forests of oak and hickory, the home of the short-staple cotton-plant, a fine fruit region, and yielding Indian corn, oats, wheat, and other cereals; and (5) Cherokee Georgia, abounding in mountains, with fertile valleys, streams, and waterfalls. Rivers emptying into the Atlantic Ocean are the Savannah, the Great Ogeechee, and the Altamaha, with the Oconee and the Ocmulgee. Belonging to the Gulf system are the Chattahoochee, the Flint, and the Alapaha.

With the exception of the swamp-region in the south and south-east of the state, the climate is salubrious and agreeable. The mean temperature is 78° in summer and 47° in winter; the annual rainfall nearly 50 inches. In the lowlands oranges and other semi-tropical fruits readily mature, whilst in the uplands peaches, apples, pears, &c. flourish; and fruits and market vegetables are exported to the North. Game is still plentiful. Sea-fowl throng the coast and estuaries, alligators are numerous in the rivers, and food-fishes, oysters, clams, turtle, &c. are abundant. Food-fishes have largely disappeared from the streams, and the pearl-bearing unio is now seldom seen. The mineral wealth includes gold, coal, iron, copper, silver, and lead ores, marble, granite, slate, gypsum, limestone, &c., and occasional diamonds and other precious stones. Prior to the civil war, the inhabitants were almost exclusively engaged in agriculture and commerce; but more recent industries are the lumber, iron, and steel trades, and extensive cotton, woollen, and other manufactures. The chief agricultural products of Georgia are cotton (about 2,000,000 bales yearly), rice, Indian corn, wheat, oats, sweet potatoes, sugar, and tobacco. From the ports of Savannah, Darien, Brunswick, and St Mary shipments of lumber and naval stores are annually increasing. Atlanta is the capital, and Savannah the commercial metropolis; Augusta, Macon, Columbus, and Athens are other cities. Pop. (1790) 82,548; (1860) 1,057,286; (1880) 1,542,180; (1910) 2,609,000, slightly more than one-half whites. The colony of Georgia, named from George II., was founded by James Oglethorpe in 1733, as a refuge for poor debtors and religious refugees. It has long been regarded as the Empire State of the South.

Georgia, the name formerly applied to the central portion of what is now Russian Transcaucasia (q.v.), bounded by the Caucasian mountains on the north, and on the south by the Armenian mountains. The Russian name is Gruzia; the Persian Gurjestan, from which form the name Georgia probably arose, it being perhaps a corruption of Guria, the name of one of the western provinces. An independent kingdom from the time of Alexander the Great, and earlier, Georgia was united with Russia between 1799 and 1829. It now is mainly included in the governments of Kutais, Tiflis, and Elizabethpol. The Georgians, who speak agglutinative languages, form the southern group of Caucasian peoples. Their numbers are variously estimated at something over or under a million. See Wardrop, The Kingdom of Georgia (1888).

Georgia, Gulf of, an arm of the Pacific, 30 miles broad and nearly 250 long, between Vancouver's Island and British Columbia, communicating with the ocean by Queen Charlotte's Sound and the Strait of Juan de Fuca.

Georgian Bay. See Huron (Lake).

Georgswalde, a town of Bohemia, 112 miles N. of Prague, with a mineral spring. Pop. 10,000.

Gera (Gā-ra), the capital of the small German principality of Reuss-Schleiz, on the White Elster, 42 miles E. by S. of Weimar by rail. Nearly destroyed by fire in 1780, it has broad and regular streets; its older buildings include a castle and a fine town-hall. There are woollen factories, cotton-works, dyeing and printing works, manufactures of machinery, leather, tobacco, beer, &c. Population, 50,000, nearly all Protestants.

Gerace (Jā-rā-chā), a town of southern Italy, 4 miles from the sea, and 37 (58 by rail) NE. of Reggio. It has a cathedral, rebuilt after the earthquake of 1783, and a trade in wine. Pop. 10,000.

Gérardmer ('Queen of the Vosges'), a holiday resort much frequented by Parisians, and famous for its cheeses, in the French dep. of Vosges, 32 miles SE. of Épinal by rail. Pop. 4000.

Ger'asa, a ruined city of Palestine, among the mountains of Gilead, 20 miles E. of the Jordan.

Gerizim and Ebal, the two highest mountains in the central Palestine chain, are separated from each other by a deep narrow valley, in which stands the town of Nâbulus, the ancient Shechem, the metropolis of the Samaritan sect. The tops are about 3000 feet above sea-level, with a fertile valley between 1500 feet deep.

Germantown, a former borough of Pennsylvania, included since 1854 in the limits of Philadelphia. Here an attack by Washington on the British camp, 4th October 1777, was repulsed.

Germany (from Lat. Germania) is the English name of the country which the natives call Deutschland, and the French L'Allemagne. The word is sometimes used to denote the whole area of the European continent within which the Germanic race and language are dominant. In this broad sense it includes, besides Germany proper, parts of Austria, Switzerland, and perhaps even of the Netherlands; but in the present article the name is to be understood as denoting the existing Germanic empire, of which Prussia is the head. Germany occupies the central portions of Europe, and is bounded on the N. by the North Sea, the Danish peninsula, the Baltic, Russia, Austria, Switzerland, France, Belgium, and the Netherlands. Its area is 208,780 sq. m., or about $\frac{1}{16}$th of that of all Europe—slightly larger than France, but not twice as large as Great Britain and Ireland. Germany is composed of a federation of twenty-five states, with one imperial territory (Reichsland), which vary enormously in area and influence. Thus, while Prussia alone exceeds the British Islands in area, Bavaria is almost as large as Scotland, Würtemberg is larger than Wales, and Baden and Saxony are neither of them equal to Yorkshire. Waldeck is about equal to Bedford, and Reuss-Greiz is smaller than Rutland, the smallest English county. The Isle of Man is nearly as great in area as Schaumburg-Lippe and Reuss-Greiz together, respectively twenty-second and twenty-third in size of the German states. The Duke of Buccleuch's Scottish estates alone (676 sq. m.) exceed in area Saxe-Altenburg or any of the ten smaller states. In 1910 Berlin, the capital of the empire, had 2,000,000 inhabitants; next come Hamburg, 930,000; Munich, Leipzig, Dresden, Cologne, and Breslau, with over 500,000. There are 16 towns with between 200,000 and 500,000, and 25 towns between 100,000 and 200,000. The population of the German empire (exclusive of foreign possessions) at the census of 1871 was 41,058,792; in 1880, 45,234,061; in 1885, 46,855,704; in 1901, 56,367,178.

Germany presents two very distinct physical formations. (1) A range of high tableland, occupying the centre and southern parts of the country, interspersed with numerous ranges and groups of mountains, the most important of which are the Harz and Teutoburgerwald, in the north; the Taunus, Thüringerwald, Erzgebirge, and Riesengebirge, in the middle; and the Black Forest (Schwarzwald), Rauhe Alb, and Bavarian Alps in the south (with the Zugspitz, the highest point in Germany, 9738 feet high); and containing an area of 110,000 sq. m. (2) A vast sandy plain, which extends from the centre of the empire north to the German Ocean, and from the Netherlands into Russia, contains an area of about 98,000 sq. m., and is varied by slight terrace-like elevations marked by summits of 500 to 800 feet high. A large portion of the plain is occupied by sandy tracts interspersed with deposits of peat; but other parts are moderately fertile, and admit of successful cultivation.

The surface of Germany may be regarded as belonging to three drainage basins. The Danube (q.v.) from its source in the Black Forest to the borders of Austria belongs to Germany; and through its channel the waters of the greater part of Bavaria are poured into the Black Sea. By far the greater part of the surface has a northern slope, and belongs partly to the basin of the North Sea, partly to that of the Baltic. The chief German streams flowing into the North Sea are the Rhine (q.v.), with its tributaries the Neckar, Main, Lahn, Sieg, Wupper, Ruhr, and Lippe on the right, and the Ill and Moselle on the left; the Weser and the Elbe. Into the Baltic flow the Oder, Vistula, Memel, and Pregel. The natural and artificial waterways of Germany are extensive, especially in the northern plain, and connect the rivers flowing into the Baltic and the North Sea with those flowing into the English Channel and the Black Sea. The North Sea and Baltic Ship Canal, from Brunsbüttel at the mouth of the Elbe to Kiel (1887–95), is intended chiefly for war-ships. Numerous lakes occur, but few of them are of any great size. The so-called 'Haffs' of the north coasts are landlocked salt-water lagoons or coast-lakes. Mineral springs occur principally in Nassau, Würtemberg, Baden, Bavaria, and Rhenish Prussia. The climate of Germany presents less diversity than a first glance at the map might lead one to infer, for the greater heats of the more southern latitudes are considerably modified by the hilly character of the country in those parallels, while the cold of the northern plains is mitigated by their vicinity to the ocean.

The mineral products of Germany are very rich and varied, and their exploitation forms a most important industry. The chief mining and smelting districts are in Silesia, on the Lower Rhine, in the Upper Harz, and in Saxony. Silver is found in the Upper Harz and Saxony. Iron occurs in numerous mountain-ranges, especially in Upper Silesia, Rheinland, and Westphalia. Alsace and Lorraine contain a great part of perhaps the largest iron-deposit in Europe, which stretches into France and Luxemburg. The iron of the Thüringerwald is fine, though not abundant. The chief coalfields are in Silesia, Westphalia (on the Ruhr), and Saxony—the first containing the largest coalfield in Europe. Prussia yields nearly one-half of the zinc annually produced in the world. Lead is found in the Harz, in other parts of Prussia, and in Saxony. A little copper is mined at Mansfeld. Tin and tungsten are yielded by the Erzgebirge; manganese at Wiesbaden; quicksilver in Westphalia; antimony in Thuringia. Salt is produced at Halle, Stassfurt, and other parts of Prussia. Germany is rich in clays of all kinds, from the finest to the coarsest: the porcelain of Meissen, the pottery of Thuringia, and the glass of Silesia and Bavaria are celebrated. Building-stone is well distributed; marble, alabaster, slates, and lithographic stones also occur; and cobalt, arsenic, sulphur, saltpetre, alum, gypsum, bismuth, pumice-stone, Tripoli slate, kaolin, emery, ochre, and vitriol are all among the exports of Germany. The average value of the total production of minerals is about £100,000,000 a year. All the ordinary cereals are extensively cultivated in the north, and potatoes are exported. Hemp, flax, madder, woad, and saffron grow well in the central districts. The vine is cultivated in suitable localities as far north as 51°. Tobacco and chicory are largely grown. Magdeburg and Frankfort-on-the-Oder are the centres of a large beet industry. About 50 per cent. of the total area is arable ground; 15 per cent. is occupied by heath, meadow, and pasture; and 26 per cent. is forest, 9 per cent. being unproductive. The most extensive forests are found in central Germany, while the deficiency of wood in the north-west parts of the great plain is in some degree met by the abundance of turf.

The forests of northern and central Germany abound in small game; some still shelter wild boars. The Bavarian Alps shelter the chamois, the red deer and wild goat, the fox and marten. Wolves are still found in Bavaria, eastern Prussia, and Lorraine. In the plains of the north storks, wild geese, and ducks are abundant. Both fresh and salt water fisheries are diligently taken advantage of. Forestry receives almost as much attention in Germany as agriculture. The oldest and most important of the German industrial arts are the manufactures of linen and woollen goods. The chief localities for linen production are the mountain-valleys of Silesia, Lusatia, Westphalia, and Saxony (for thread-laces); while cotton fabrics are principally made in Rhenish Prussia and Saxony. The same districts, together with Pomerania, Bavaria, Alsace, Würtemberg, and Baden, manufacture the choicest woollen fabrics, including damasks and carpets. The silk industry has its central point in Rhenish Prussia, specially about Crefeld. Germany rivals France in the production of satins. Jute-spinning is carried on in Brunswick, at Meissen, and at Bonn; thread is manufactured in Saxony, Silesia, and the Rhine provinces; and hosiery is most largely produced in Saxony and Thuringia. The making of toys and wooden clocks, and wood-carving, which may be regarded as almost a speciality of German industry, flourish in the hilly districts of Saxony, Bavaria, and the Black Forest. Paper is made chiefly in the districts of Aix-la-Chapelle, Arnsberg, and Liegnitz, and in Saxony. Tanning is prominent in the south-west. The best iron and steel manufactures belong to the west, Silesia, Hanover, and Saxony. Silesia probably has the finest glass-manufactories, but those of Bavaria are also important; while Saxony and Prussia stand pre-eminent for the excellence of their china and earthenware. Augsburg and Nuremberg dispute with Munich and Berlin the title to pre-eminence in silver, gold, and jewellery work, and in the manufacture of scientific and musical instruments; while Leipzig and Munich claim the first rank for typefounding, printing, and lithography. The trading cities of northern Germany nearly monopolise the preparation of beet-root sugar, tobacco, snuff, &c., and the distillation of spirits from the potato and other roots; while vinegar and oils are prepared in central and southern Germany. Prussia and Bavaria produce most beer.

In 1898–1912 the total annual value of German imports fluctuated from £271,983,800 (in 1898) to £550,000,000 (in 1912). The exports for the same years varied from £200,528,250 (in 1898) to £450,000,000 (in 1912). Russia, the United States, Great Britain, Austria-Hungary, France, and India contribute more of the German imports than any other countries; Great Britain, Austria-Hungary, and the United States took more of the exports. In 1893–1912 German exports to Britain varied from £26,364,849 to £70,000,000 a year, according to British Board of Trade returns; but much German produce comes through Holland and Belgium, and was formerly excluded from the statistics relating to Germany. The German mercantile fleet is the fourth in the world, being excelled only by those of Great Britain, the United States, and Norway. In her commercial policy Germany has of late years committed herself more and more to protection. The silver mark, superseding guldens and thalers, is almost exactly equal to a shilling in value, and gold is now the monetary standard. Since 1872 the metrical system of weights and measures has been in use. The length of railways in the empire in 1914 was 40,000 miles, of which total all but 3000 belonged to the state. The postal and telegraphic systems of all the German states, except Bavaria and Würtemberg, are now under a central imperial administration.

The German-speaking inhabitants of the empire number upwards of 51,500,000; but a considerable proportion of these are not of the Germanic stock. Among the peoples retaining their own language (about 4¼ millions in 1900) are Poles (mainly in eastern and north-eastern Prussia), 3,329,000; Wends (in Silesia, Brandenburg, and Saxony), 93,000; Czechs (in Silesia), 107,000; Lithuanians (in eastern Prussia), 103,000; Danes (in Sleswick), 141,000; French (in Rhenish Prussia, Alsace, and Lorraine) and Walloons (about Aix-la-Chapelle), 224,000. The Germans are divided into High and Low Germans; the language of the former is the cultivated language of all the German states; that of the latter, known as Platt-Deutsch, is spoken in the north and north-west. It is computed that there are about 30,000,000 persons of German race and language beyond the boundary of the empire, of whom 10 millions are in Austria, 3 in the United States, 2½ in Switzerland, 2 in the Russian empire, especially the Baltic provinces, Poland, the Volga country, and middle and south Russia. The average density of the population of Germany is 310·4 per sq. m. The most densely populated state, except free towns, is Saxony, with 829·5 per sq. m.; the most sparsely populated is Mecklenburg-Strelitz, with 93·8 per sq. m. The concentration of the population in large towns has not gone so far in Germany as in some other countries. After 1830 emigration from Germany steadily swelled; the highest total (220,798) was reached in 1881. Between 1830 and 1892, 4,750,000 emigrants left the country, five-sevenths for the United States. In 1908–12 the average number was 22,314. To balance this efflux of native blood there are over a million and a quarter foreigners in the empire, of whom half are Austrians and Hungarians. In 1884–99 the following regions became German possessions or came under German protection: In Africa, Togoland, Cameroon (extended 1912), German South-west Africa, and German East Africa; area, 1,000,000 sq. m.; pop. 12,000,000. In Asia, Kiao-chau; area, 200 sq. m.; pop. 200,000. In the Pacific, German New Guinea (Kaiser Wilhelm Land, Bismarck Archipelago, Caroline Islands, Pelew Islands, Marianne Islands, Solomon Islands, Marshall Islands, &c.), Samoan Islands; total area, 96,000 sq. m.; total pop. 700,000. German East Africa, between British and Portuguese East Africa, stretches to Lakes Victoria, Tanganyika, and Nyasa. It is a mountainous country, including Kilimanjaro (19,300 feet) and plateaux which have in part been found suitable for European settlement, but the bulk of the population is native. Rubber, fibres, copra, &c. are exported. The capital is the seaport of Dar-es-Salaam, with railway (1914) to Ujiji on Tanganyika. For South-west Africa, see DAMARALAND, NAMAQUALAND. The other possessions are the subjects of separate articles.

Education is more systematically cultivated in Germany than in any other country of Europe. Besides the Lyceum at Braunsberg, there are 21 universities: Heidelberg, Würzburg, Leipzig, Rostock, Greifswald, Freiburg, Munich, Tübingen, Marburg, Königsberg, Jena, Giessen, Kiel, Göttingen, Erlangen, Berlin, Breslau, Halle, Bonn, Strasburg, and Münster. Berlin has 500 professors and teachers and 10,000 students. Of the universities, 13 are Protestant in the theological faculty, four are Roman Catholic, and four are mixed. There are also 11 polytechnic institutions; over 1400 gymnasia, realschulen, &c.; numerous special schools of technology, agriculture, forestry, mining, commerce, military science, &c.; seminaries for teachers and preachers; and about 60,000 elementary schools. Among the military recruits only ·04 per cent. are illiterate. Public libraries, museums, botanical gardens, art-collections, picture-galleries, schools of music and design, and academies of arts and sciences are to be met with in most of the capitals and in many of the country towns. The chief centres of the book trade are Leipzig and Stuttgart. Protestantism predominates in the north and middle, and Roman Catholicism in the south, east, and west, although very few states exhibit exclusively either form of faith. The Protestants belong chiefly to the Lutheran confession, except in Hesse, Anhalt, and the Palatinate, where the Reformed or Calvinistic Church predominates. A union between these two churches has taken place in Prussia. The total number of Protestants in 1910 was 40,000,000, of Catholics 24,000,000, of Jews 600,000.

In 1871 the Prussian military system was extended to the whole empire; and alterations have since been introduced, especially (in the way of strengthening the army) in 1893. Every German who is capable of bearing arms must be in the standing army for seven years (generally his twenty-first to his twenty-eighth year). Two (in some cases three) of these years must be spent in active service, and the remainder in the army of reserve. He then spends five years in the first class of the Landwehr, after which he belongs to the second class to the age of thirty-nine. Besides this, every German, from seventeen to twenty, and from thirty-nine to forty-five, is a member of the Landsturm, a force only to be called out in the last necessity. Those who pass certain examinations require to serve only one year with the colours. The whole of the land forces of the empire form a united army under the command of the emperor in war and peace. The imperial army, on its peace footing, consisted in 1913 of about 30,000 officers, about 650,000 rank and file, and 160,000 horses. On its war footing, 3,000,000 trained men would be available. In 1913 the imperial fleet comprised 35 battleships, 8 coast-defence ships, 13 large and 45 small cruisers, 11 gun-boats, about 200 torpedo-boats and destroyers, and submarines. This fleet was manned by 80,000 officers and men. The seafaring population of Germany are liable to service in the navy instead of in the army.

The revenue of the German empire is derived (1) from the customs dues on tobacco, salt, and beet-root sugar, which are entirely made over to it by all the states; from those on brandy and malt, which are also assigned by most of the states; from taxes on playing-cards and stamps; from posts, telegraphs, and railways, the imperial bank, and various miscellaneous sources; (2) from extraordinary sources—as votes for public buildings and loans; and (3) from the proportional contributions of the various states. The chief items of expenditure are the maintenance of the Reichstag and various government offices, the army and navy, posts and telegraphs, railways, justice, pensions, and other miscellaneous claims. The revenue and expenditure in the year 1913–14 balanced at about £185,000,000. The public debt of the empire in the year 1912 was about £254,000,000.

The empire, as reconstituted in 1871, possesses the exclusive right of legislation on all military and naval affairs; on civil and criminal law for general application; on imperial finance and commerce; on posts, telegraphs, and railways in so far as the interests of the national defence and general trade are concerned. In all disputes that arise among the individual states, the imperial jurisdiction is supreme and final. There are two legislative bodies in the empire—the Bundesrat, or Federal Council, the members of which are annually appointed by the governments of the various states; and the Reichstag, the members of which are elected by universal suffrage and ballot for a period of five years. The former deliberates on proposals to be submitted to the latter, and on the resolutions received from it. The Reichstag contains approximately one member for every 131,600 inhabitants; in 1914 there were 397 members. They are paid, and enjoy various privileges and immunities. The Reichstag at present falls into no fewer than thirteen parties or groups (conservatives, national liberals, social democrats, &c.).

When first in the 4th century B.C. the Romans heard of new peoples of common kin whom they called Germani, the German tribes were living between the Elbe and Rhine and to the north of the Main. In 58 B.C. Cæsar drove back the Germans who had crossed the Rhine. Successful Roman incursions were made into Germany under Augustus; but in 6 A.D. the German tribes rose under Arminius (Hermann) and utterly destroyed Varus and his legions. Henceforth the Romans were in the main content to hold a strip of territory from the Lower Rhine to the Upper Danube, and to guard the frontiers of the empire against German raids. From the 3d century on this became impossible, and in the 4th, the Germans continued to force their way into Roman territory. The settlement of the Franks in the north of Gaul founded the French nation and the German empire, or rather the 'Holy Roman Empire,' or Germany. Charlemagne, who received the imperial crown from the pope in 800, extended his dominions north over the heathen Saxons and as far east as Hungary. Under his successors France and Germany fell apart, and in 911 the national diet of the Germans claimed and secured the right of electing their emperor, who could not assume the imperial title till crowned by the pope. At this period there were in Germany five nations—the Franks, Saxons, Bavarians, Swabians, and Lorrainers. A duke of Franconia was emperor 911–918; his rival and successor, Henry, Duke of Saxony, and Henry's son Otho extended the empire over northern Slavs, Magyars, and into Lombardy. Burgundy was added by Conrad II., first of a new Franconian dynasty, in 1030, and his successor temporarily annexed Denmark, Bohemia, and Hungary. Henry IV., of this line, was constantly at feud with Pope Gregory VII.; but it was under Conrad III., first of the Hohenstaufen dynasty, that the wars of Guelphs and Ghibellines, between pope and emperor, so disastrously weakened the empire. His nephew Barbarossa was more concerned about his interests in Italy and the Crusades than about the internal well-being of Germany. From the accession in 1273 of Rudolf, first of the Hapsburgs, till 1806, the Austrian princes were emperors almost without break, and the imperial crown was all but hereditary (see AUSTRIA). The emperor Charles V. was also king of Spain, and lord of the Netherlands and of great part of Italy. The influence of the Reformation and the Thirty Years' War was to weaken the imperial power, and cut up the empire into a crowd of petty factions and almost independent states: at one time there were as many as 300 states in the empire. Alsace and Lorraine were lost to the empire in 1648–97. The Napoleonic wars reconstructed the map of Germany. In 1806 the emperor resigned the German crown and contented himself with being Emperor of Austria; and the Confederation of the Rhine was formed under French influence, to be succeeded in 1815 by the German Confederation, which comprised virtually all Germany, including German Austria, in 35 states, with a diet at Frankfort. The political discontents of 1848 and 1849 led to not a few local insurrectionary movements which were swiftly crushed, and followed by a period of severe reaction and repression. The rivalries of Austria and Prussia for pre-eminence in the Confederation, ended at Königgrätz (1866) with the exclusion of Austria from Germany. The great Franco-German war of 1870–71 led to the re-annexation of Alsace-Lorraine and the constitution of the new German empire, with the kings of Prussia as hereditary emperors. German colonial extension began in 1884. Commerce has vastly developed. The alliance of Germany with Austria and Italy (to balance Russia and France), the strengthening of the army (in spite of the Socialists, who polled 4,250,000 votes in 1912), diplomatic energy in the East, and the great increase of the fleet are keynotes of recent policy.

Germersheim (Ger'mers-hīm; g hard), a town of the Bavarian Palatinate, on the Rhine's left bank, 8 miles SSW. of Spires; pop 6000.

Germiston, a Rand town of the Transvaal, 9 miles E. of Johannesburg; pop. 55,000.

Gero'na, capital of a Spanish province, 65 miles NE. of Barcelona, with a cathedral; pop. 16,000.

Gers (Zhār), a dep. of SW. France (Gascony); area, 2415 sq. m.; pop. 222,000.

Gersau (g hard), a village in the Swiss canton of Schwyz, on the Lake of Lucerne, and near the foot of the Rigi; pop. 2000.

Gersoppa, a village of South India which gives name to the great falls of the Sharawati River, 960 feet high, 30 miles SE. of Honawar.

Gethse'mane (Heb. gath, 'a wine-press,' and shemen, 'oil') was a small farm or estate at the foot of Mount Olivet, somewhere on the east slope of the Kedron valley, and rather more than ½ mile from Jerusalem.

Gettysburg (g hard), in Pennsylvania, 50 miles by rail SSW. of Harrisburg, with a Lutheran college (1832) and seminary; pop. 4000. Here in 1863 (July 1–3) Meade defeated Lee.

Gex, once capital of the Pays de Gex in Savoy, now a town of 2500 inhabitants in the French department of Ain, is 12 miles NW. of Geneva, on the slopes of the Jura.

Geyser Springs, a number of boiling springs (not real geysers) in the Devil's Cañon, in California, 90 miles NW. of San Francisco and 2000 feet above the sea.

Ghadames. See GADAMES.

Gháts, or GHAUTS ('gates, passes, or landing-stairs'), EASTERN and WESTERN, two converging ranges of mountains, which run parallel with the east and west coasts of southern India, and meet at an angle near Cape Comorin. (1) The Eastern Gháts commence a little north of the Mahanadi, and run through Madras, with an average height of 1500 feet, for the most part at a distance of from 50 to 150 miles from the coast. (2) The Western Gháts stretch from the valley of the Tapti to their junction with the kindred ridge, and on to Cape Comorin itself. Their elevation varies from 3000 feet to 8760 in the peak of Dodabetta, in the Nilgiri hills.

Ghaziabad, a town and important railway junction in the United Provinces of India, 28 miles SW. of Meerut. Pop. 12,000.

Ghazipur, a city in the United Provinces of India, on the left bank of the Ganges, 44 miles NE. of Benares. It has the ruins of the Palace of Forty Pillars, a marble statue by Flaxman to Lord Cornwallis, who died here in 1805, and manufactures of opium. Pop. 40,000.

Ghazni (also Ghizni and Ghuznee), a fortified town of Afghanistan, stands 7729 feet above sea-level, and 84 miles SW. of Kabul, on the road to Kandahar and at the head of the Gomal route to India. From the 10th to the 12th century it was the capital of the Ghaznevid empire; and was captured by the Mongols, and in 1738 by Nadir Shah of Persia. It was taken by Lord Keane in 1839, and in 1842 by General Nutt. The celebrated gates of Somnath were kept at Ghazni from 1024 to 1842. Pop. 10,000.

Gheel, a famous colony for the insane, in Belgium, 26 miles ESE. of Antwerp by rail.

Ghent (Flem. and Ger. Gent, Fr. Gand), a city of Belgium, capital of the province of East Flanders, is situated at the confluence of the Lys and the Scheldt, 34 miles by rail NW. of Brussels. It is divided by canals into 26 islands, connected by 270 bridges, and is encompassed with gardens and meadows. It is in general well built; in the older part it retains several quaint and picturesque houses. Among the chief buildings are the splendid cathedral of St Bavon, of the 13th and 14th centuries, containing the 'Adoration of the Lamb,' by the brothers Van Eyck; the belfry (1183–1339); the castle of the Counts of Flanders (1180); the Cloth Hall (1426–1903); the hôtel-de-ville (1480–1628); the castle of Gerard the Devil; St Bavon's Abbey (in ruins); the Palais de Justice (1835–43); the university (1816); the Béguinages; and the Academy of Painting. The industries include cotton, woollen, and linen manufactures, besides leather, lace, sugar, iron, beer, &c. Specially noteworthy is the floriculture of Ghent. By a ship-canal to the Scheldt (deepened 1895–1910), and by a canal to Ostend, Ghent is united with the sea, and it can receive sea-going vessels into its docks. New docks were opened in 1881–1904. Pop. 166,000. Ghent, which in the 12th century was made the capital of Flanders, and which in 1830 fell to Belgium, was the birthplace of Jacob van Artevelde and of John of Gaunt—i.e. Ghent.

Ghilan', a province of Persia, the western portion of the narrow strip of country lying between the Elburz range and the Caspian Sea.

Ghizeh. See GIZEH.

Ghizni. See GHAZNI.

Ghûr, or GHORE, a mountainous district of western Afghanistan, lying south-east of Herât.

Giants' Causeway (deriving its name from a legend that it was the commencement of a road to be constructed by giants across the channel to Scotland) is a sort of natural pier or mole, of columnar basalt, projecting from the northern coast of Antrim, Ireland, into the North Channel, 7 miles NE. of Portrush by an electric tramway (1883). It is part of an overlying mass of basalt, from 300 to 500 feet thick, which covers almost all Antrim and the eastern part of Londonderry. The first bed appears at the bold promontory of Fair Head; its columns exceed 200 feet in height. The other two are seen together rising above the sea-level at Bengore Head, the lower one forming the Giants' Causeway. It is exposed for 300 yards, and exhibits an unequal pavement, formed of the tops of 40,000 vertical closely-fitting columns, which in shape are chiefly hexagonal, though examples may be found with 5, 7, 8, or 9 sides. Their diameter varies from 15 to 20 inches.

Giarre (Jar're), a town of Sicily, on the eastern slope of Mount Etna; pop. 20,000.

Giaveno (Ja-vay'no), a town of Piedmont, 17 miles W. of Turin; pop. 10,000.

Gibeah (g hard; Heb. 'hill'), 4 miles N. of Jerusalem, near Ramah, was the residence, if not the birthplace, of King Saul.

Gibeon, a city of ancient Palestine, on a hill 5 miles NW. of Jerusalem.

Gibraltar (Span. Gibraltar'), an isolated mass of rock, in the SW. of Spain, rising to an altitude of 1408 feet, 3 miles in length, and ¾ mile in average breadth, is situated at the extremity of a low sandy peninsula, which connects it on the north with Andalusia. By the completion of the railway route in 1892, Gibraltar is within four days of England. Its western side is washed by the Bay of Gibraltar, called also the Bay of Algeciras; and at the foot of the rock, on this same side, is the town of Gibraltar, which consists of two parts, the South Town, above the dockyard, and the North Town, which has narrow streets and many mean houses, and is inhabited by a motley agglomeration of English, Spaniards, Jews, and Moors. Pop. (1911), civil, 19,120; military, 5340; total, 24,460. One may notice the numerous barracks; the governor's official residence, an old Franciscan convent; the naval hospital; the Alameda Gardens; the signal-station, crowning the central eminence of the rock, 1255 feet high; the remains of the Moorish castle (10th c.); and the lighthouse (1841), on Point Europa, whose light, 150 feet above the sea, is seen for 20 miles. At the northern base of the rock is the open space called the North Front, extending as far as the British lines; here are the cemetery, the cricket-ground, the race-course, &c. Between the British and the Spanish lines is the neutral ground, which is uninhabited. The harbour and dock improvements of the 20th century (mainly for naval purposes) can secure a fleet against torpedo-boats. There is good anchorage in the Bay of Gibraltar, 8 miles deep by 5 wide. Gibraltar has been a free port since its capture by the British, was for a time one of the chief commercial emporiums of the Mediterranean, and is an important coaling-station. Since 1842 it has been the see of an Anglican bishop. Almost the entire rock bristles with artillery; and the approaches from the north and from the sea are guarded by many powerful batteries. Towards the north and north-west the defences are aided by a series of fortified galleries, 2 to 3 miles in length. The eastern side is so precipitous as to be altogether secure from assault. In these days, however, of steamships and heavy long-range guns, the military importance of Gibraltar has certainly diminished. The rocky mass is perforated by numerous caverns, some of which penetrate for several hundred feet into the rock. The largest, called the 'Hall of St Michael,' is 220 feet long, 90 wide, and 70 high, and its floor is connected with the roof by stalactite pillars ranging up to 50 feet in height; the entrance lies 1100 feet above the sea. Gibraltar is the only place in Europe where monkeys (a few Barbary apes) live wild.

Gibraltar was known to the early Phœnician navigators. The Greeks called it Calpe, and it and Abyla opposite (now Ceuta) formed the Pillars of Hercules, long held to be the western boundary of the world. In 711 A.D. the Saracen leader Tarik fortified it, as a base of operations against the Visigothic kingdom; and from him it took the name of Gebel el-Tarik, or Hill of Tarik, of which Gibraltar is a corruption. In 1302 Ferdinand II. of Castile won it from the Moors; but in 1333 it fell into the hands of the king of Fez. In 1410 Yussuf, king of Granada, possessed himself of the fortress, which, however, was finally wrested from the Moors by the Spaniards in 1462. A combined Dutch and English force compelled the governor to capitulate in 1704; and since then Gibraltar has remained continuously in the possession of the British, in spite of many desperate efforts on the part of Spain and France to dislodge them, the greatest in 1779–82, when it was defended with heroic valour by General Eliott (Lord Heathfield) and 5000 men, including 1100 Hanoverians.

Gibraltar, Strait of (anc. Strait of Hercules), connects the Mediterranean with the Atlantic. It is 36 miles long, and narrow eastward; its width between Point Europa and Cape Ceuta being only 15 miles, at the western extremity 24, and at the narrowest 9.

Gidding, Little, a parish of Hants, 11 miles NW. of Huntingdon. Here in 1625 Nicholas Ferrar founded the religious community so well known through John Inglesant.

Gien, a town in the French dep. of Loiret, on the Loire, 38 miles SE. of Orleans; pop. 6000.

Giessen (Gēs′sen; g hard), a town of Hesse-Darmstadt, on the Lahn, 40 miles N. of Frankfort-on-the-Main. It has a university (founded in 1607), with about 100 professors and 1300 students, and manufactures tobacco, iron, beer, &c. Pop. 30,000.

Gifford (g hard), a Haddingtonshire village, on Gifford Water (a feeder of the Tyne), 4¼ miles SSE. of Haddington; pop. 330.

Giffordgate, a suburb of Haddington, perhaps the birthplace of Knox.

Giggleswick, a village in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 1 mile WNW. of Settle. It has a well-endowed grammar-school (1553). Pop. 1000.

Gigha (Gē′ha; g hard), an Argyllshire island, 1¾ mile W. of Kintyre. It measures 6 by 2 miles, and attains 260 feet. Pop. 300.

Gijon, a seaport of Spain, on a peninsula and bay of the Atlantic, 20 miles by rail NE. of Oviedo. It manufactures tobacco, glass, and earthenware. Pop. 55,000.

Gila (Hē′la), a river rising in the state of New Mexico, and flowing nearly 650 miles westward, across Arizona, to the Colorado, 75 miles above its mouth in the Gulf of California.

Gilbert Islands, a British archipelago in the Pacific, lying on the equator, between 172° and 177° E. long.; area, 166 sq. m.; pop. 30,000. The group consists of sixteen atolls, several of them triangular in shape, with two outlying hilly islands. Coconuts and copra are the chief products. Marshall and Gilbert discovered it in 1788.

Gilboa, a bare chain of hills between 500 and 600 feet high, overhanging the site of the ancient city of Jezreel, between the Jordan and the plain of Esdraelon. Here King Saul met his doom.

Gilead, a mountainous district on the east side of the Jordan, described by Laurence Oliphant as a country of wine and oil, with rich alluvial deposits. See his Land of Gilead (1880).

Gilford, a town of County Down, on the Bann, 4 miles NW. of Banbridge; pop. 1100.

Gilghit. See Cashmere, Dardistan.

Gillingham (g hard), since 1903 a municipal borough of Kent, 1 mile NE. of Chatham, the centre of a fruit-growing district. Chatham dockyard and cement and brick works provide employment. Pop. 52,000.—There is another Gillingham, a Dorset market-town, on the Stour, 22 miles by rail W. of Salisbury. Near it are the 'Pen Pits,' thought to be either quarry-holes or prehistoric dwellings. Pop. 3400.

Gilmerton, a Midlothian village, 4 miles SSE. of Edinburgh; pop. 2000.

Gilnockie (g hard), Dumfriesshire, on the Esk, 4¼ miles SSE. of Langholm, was the site of the peel-tower of Johnny Armstrong, hanged by James V. at Caerlanrig in 1529.

Gilolo, one of the Moluccas (q.v.) or Spice Islands.

Gilp, Loch, an arm of Loch Fyne, 3 miles long.

Gilsland (g hard), a Cumberland village, with a sulphur-spring, 8 miles NE. of Brampton.

Gioja del Colle, a town of Italy, 33 miles by rail S. of Bari; pop. 20,000.

Giovinazzo, an Italian cathedral town on the Adriatic, 14 miles WNW. of Bari; pop. 12,000.

Gipping (g hard), a Suffolk river, flowing 15 miles south-south-eastward from Stowmarket to Ipswich (q.v.), where it becomes tidal, and takes the name Orwell.

Gippsland, the southern one of the four important districts of Victoria, Australia. It was originally called Caledonia Australis by Macmillan, its first explorer (1839), and then Gippsland after the governor, Sir George Gipps.

Girgeh, a town of Egypt, on the Nile's left bank, in 26° 20′ N. lat. and 31° 58′ E. long., 10½ miles N. of the ancient Abydos. Outside it is a Roman Catholic monastery, said to be the oldest in Egypt. Pop. 20,000.

Girgenti (Jēr-jen′tē; anc. Agrigentum), a coast-town of Sicily, 84 miles by rail SSE. of Palermo, with magnificent Greek ruins. Pop. 27,000.

Girnar, a sacred mountain (3500 feet) of India, in Kathiawar, Bombay. As a holy place of Jainism, it is covered with ruined temples.

Gironde (Zhē-rongd), a maritime dep. of south-west France, is formed out of part of the old province of Guienne. Area, 3760 sq. m.; pop. (1872) 705,149; (1911) 829,095. It is watered mainly by the Garonne and the Dordogne, and by the Gironde, the estuary formed by the union of these two rivers. It includes the six arrondissements of Bazas, Blaye, Bordeaux (the capital), Lesparre, Libourne, and Réole.

Girton (g hard), a parish 3½ miles NNE. of Cambridge. Girton College for women was removed hither from Hitchin in 1873.

Girvan (g hard), an Ayrshire seaport and watering-place, at the mouth of the river Girvan, 21 miles SSW. of Ayr by rail. The harbour is small, but has been improved since 1881. Pop. 4500.

Gisborne, a post-town of New Zealand, in the North Island, on the Turanganui (fine bridge, 1885), 250 miles SE. of Auckland. It is the port of entry for Poverty Bay, a name given by Captain Cook in 1769, and sometimes still retained for the town. In 1889–96 a harbour was constructed. It has freezing-works, and trades in wool and dairy produce. In 1886 petroleum was struck in the neighbourhood. Pop. 8000.

Gisors (Zhē-zor'), a town in the French dep. of Eure, on the Epte, 43 miles NW. of Paris by rail. The octagonal donjon of the ruined castle was built by Henry I. of England. Here Richard I. defeated the French in 1198; his watchword, Dieu et mon Droit, has ever since been the motto of the royal arms of England. Pop. 5000.

Gitschin (Czech Jičin), a town of Bohemia, 60 miles by rail NE. of Prague. It was once the capital of the duchy of Friedland, where Wallenstein built a splendid palace (1630). On 29th June 1866 the Austrians were severely defeated here by the Prussians. Pop. 10,000.

Giugliano, a town of Italy, 8 miles NW. of Naples; pop. 15,000.

Giurgevo (Joor-je-vo; Roumanian Giurgiu), a town of Roumania, on the Danube's left bank, opposite Rustchuk, 40 miles by rail SSW. of Bucharest, of which it is the port. It was settled by the Genoese in the 14th century. Pop. 20,000.

Givet (Zhē-veh), a frontier town and former fortress in the French dep. of Ardennes, on the Meuse, 31 miles by rail S. of Namur. The citadel of Charlemont, on a rock 700 feet above the stream, was reconstructed by Vauban. Pop. 7000.

Givors (Zhē-vor), a smoky town in the French dep. of Rhône, on the Rhone, 14 miles S. of Lyons by rail. Glass bottles and silk and iron goods are extensively manufactured. Pop. 12,000.

Gizeh, or Ghizeh, a town in Egypt, approached from Cairo by bridges over the Nile, has a zoological garden. The Pyramids (q.v.) of Gizeh are 5 miles to the W. Pop. 12,500.

Gjedser, a port of Denmark, at the S. end of Falster, has a train-ferry to Warnemünde on the Berlin-Copenhagen route.

Gladbach, or Bergisch-Gladbach, an industrial town of Rhenish Prussia, 8 miles NE. of Cologne; pop. 15,000.

Gladbach, or München-Gladbach, a rapidly growing manufacturing town of Rhenish Prussia, 16 miles W. of Düsseldorf. The centre of the Rhenish cotton-spinning industry, it also has manufactures of silk, wool, linen, and paper, cotton-printing works, dyeworks, bleachfields, iron-foundries, machine-shops, breweries, and brickworks. Gladbach, which has been a town since 1366, was formerly the seat of an important linen trade; the cotton industry was introduced in the end of the 18th century. The town formerly contained a famous Benedictine abbey, founded in 792. Pop. (1858) 14,000; (1910) 66,400, mostly Roman Catholics.

Gladsmuir, a Haddingtonshire parish, 3½ miles E. of Tranent. With the Jacobites it gave name to the battle of Prestonpans.

Glamis Castle (Glâmz), the seat of the Earl of Strathmore, in Forfarshire, 5 miles WSW. of Forfar. It is a splendid château-like pile of (mainly) the 17th century.

Glamorganshire (Welsh Gwlad Morgan), the most southerly county of Wales, bounded S. and SW. by the Bristol Channel; area, 811 sq. m.; pop. (1801) 70,879; (1841) 171,188; (1881) 511,433; (1911) 1,120,910. This unexampled increase is due to the development of the mineral industries. In the west of the county the coast is indented by Swansea Bay, from which it projects westward into the peninsula of Gower. The northern district is covered with rugged hills, the highest of which, however, Llangeinor, is only 1859 feet in height. Here is one of the richest coalfields in the kingdom. The southern portion of the county consists of a series of fertile valleys, richly wooded and with a mild climate, the finest being the Vale of Glamorgan, the 'garden of Wales.' The chief rivers—the Rhymney, Taff, Neath, Tawe, and Llwchwr—flow southward into the Bristol Channel. Besides coal, anthracite or stone-coal, coking-coal, ironstone, and limestone are found. At Merthyr-Tydvil and Dowlais are large ironworks; at Swansea, Neath, Aberavon, large copper-smelting works. Tin and lead are also smelted in the county. The county sends five members to parliament; the represented boroughs are Merthyr-Tydvil (with two), Swansea boroughs (two), Cardiff boroughs (one). Oystermouth Castle, Caerphilly Castle, and Castle Coch are fine ruins; Cardiff Castle is a stately restored edifice. See Thomas Nicholas, History of Glamorganshire (1874).

Glarus, a canton of Switzerland, bounded by the cantons of St Gall, the Grisons, Uri, and Schwyz. Area, 266½ sq. m.; population, 33,200, mainly Protestant and German-speaking. It is an Alpine region, in the Tödi peak attaining 11,887 feet. The climate is very severe, and only one-fifth of the land is arable. The capital is the town of Glarus (pop. 5000), 43 miles SE. of Zurich by rail. It was founded by an Irish monk, Fridolin, in the end of the 5th century. Zwingli was pastor here, 1506–16.

Glasbury, a Radnorshire village, on the Wye, 4 miles SW. of Hay. Pop. of parish, 500.

Glasgow, the industrial metropolis of Scotland and the most populous city in Great Britain next to London, is situated on the banks of the Clyde, in the county of Lanark, the portions heretofore in Renfrew and Dumbarton shires having been transferred to Lanark under the act of 1889. At Greenock, 22 miles below, the river spreads out into a great estuary, the Firth of Clyde. Glasgow is 405½ miles by rail from London, and from 44 to 47¼ miles from Edinburgh. In 1801 the population was only 77,385, but the increase has been rapid and enormous. In 1881 the municipal population was 511,415. In 1891, before the extension of boundary, it was 565,839; after the extension in that year, when the area of the city was increased from 6111 acres to 11,861 by the addition of six suburban burghs and other districts, it was 658,198. In 1901 the municipal and police burgh contained a population of 761,709; in 1911, 784,485. In 1912 the population was raised to more than 1,000,000, and the area to more than 19,000 acres by the absorption of the former burghs of Govan, Partick, and Pollokshaws, and the districts of Shettleston, Tollcross, Cathcart, Newlands, Scotstoun, and Temple. The parliamentary burgh has a population of 599,573, divided into seven constituencies—viz. Bridgeton Division, Camlachie Division, St Rollox Division, Central Division, College Division, Tradeston Division, and Blackfriars and Hutchesontown Division. In 1893 Glasgow was constituted a county of a city.

As an archiepiscopal seat, and subsequently as a centre of Covenanting activity, Glasgow has a prominence in the religious history of Scotland; but as an industrial city its history can hardly be dated farther back than the Union of 1707. This event opened up to the town

—the most favourably situated in Scotland for the enterprise—an immense trading prospect with America, and roused in its inhabitants the extraordinary mercantile activity which has been its leading feature ever since. And yet the city of Glasgow is a very old one. It was about 560 A.D. that St Kentigern or Mungo, the apostle of the rude Celts of Strathclyde, on the banks of the Molendinar, built his little wooden church on the very spot where now rises the venerable cathedral. In 1116 the diocese was restored; and between 1175 and 1178 Jocelyn, Bishop of Glasgow, received authority from William the Lion to 'have and hold' a burgh in the neighbourhood of the cathedral; but it was not till 1636 that Glasgow received the position of a royal burgh. Of buildings possessing historical interest Glasgow is conspicuously destitute, with the very notable exception of the cathedral, which is a fine example of the Early English Gothic style of architecture. Built between 1197 and 1446, it was saved from injury at the Reformation by the Glasgow craftsmen, and afterwards, from time to time, was carefully repaired by the Protestant archbishops who governed the see until the Revolution. It is 319 feet long, and 63 wide. From the centre rises a tower, surmounted by a graceful spire, 225 feet in height. The richly-ornamented so-called crypt under the choir is really a lower church formed to take advantage of the ground sloping eastward towards the Molendinar. The city chambers, opened in 1889, built at a cost of £530,000, occupy a prominent position, filling the east side of George Square. The Royal Exchange (1829) is a handsome building ornamented with colonnades of Corinthian pillars. The architecture of many of the churches, banks, and other public buildings is varied in style and rich in detail, and the post-office buildings, though severely plain and massive, deserve mention for their great size and perfect planning.

Many extensive improvements have been made by the corporation. A plentiful supply of water from Loch Katrine has been introduced (1854–59 and 1889–96), and additional works at Loch Arklet were undertaken in 1909. The municipality controls the lighting (including the electric system) and the electric tramways, which run far beyond the city boundaries, as well as the sanitation and sewage disposal. Large sums have been spent on improved dwellings for the working-classes.

Glasgow has several public pleasure-grounds besides the Glasgow Green—a wide expanse along the north bank of the river. The equestrian statue of Wellington stands opposite the Royal Exchange, and that of William III. at the east end of Argyle Street, near the site of the old cross. There are a number of monumental statues in George Square, including, besides Sir John Moore and Lord Clyde (natives), Scott, Burns, Livingstone, and others.

The university, founded in 1451 by Bishop Turnbull, occupies fine new buildings at Gilmorehill, overlooking the West End Park, designed by Sir G. G. Scott, and opened in 1870, their total cost being upwards of half a million, including the Marquis of Bute's common hall, the students' union, &c. It has five faculties—arts, science, divinity, law, and medicine—a teaching staff of 170, and, if we include the Queen Margaret College for Women, 2700 students. There are over 300 bursaries of from £6 to £80, besides the Snell exhibitions to Balliol College, Oxford, and the Clark scholarships. The Glasgow and West of Scotland Technical College was formed in 1886 by the amalgamation of several institutions (including the arts department of Anderson's College). It was renamed the Royal Technical College in 1912. St Mungo's College, dating from 1889, has faculties in medicine and law; and the medical department of Anderson's College is a separate school. The latter college was founded by John Anderson (1726–96), professor of Natural Philosophy, and has nearly twenty teachers of medicine, science, languages, music, &c. The United Free Church College possesses conspicuous buildings; and mention should also be made of the Normal Schools, and of the School of Arts and Haldane's Academy. Of the secondary schools in Glasgow the principal is the High School. In addition to free lending libraries, there are several great collections which may be used free of charge as consulting libraries. Of these the Mitchell Library, which is under corporation management, was removed to a new building in 1911. It contains over 180,000 volumes; and the Stirling's and Glasgow Public Library contains about 65,000. Baillie's Library is under the same roof. In the Kelvingrove industrial museum (1871–76) a considerable collection, especially in natural history, is displayed. A valuable collection of pictures and statuary (1854) belonging to the corporation is now housed in a fine building which formed part of the exhibition of 1901 in the Kelvinside Park. In addition to numerous hospitals and dispensaries for special diseases, there are three general infirmaries, which among them accommodate upwards of one thousand patients.

Three vast terminal railway stations bring traffic to the heart of the town; and there are several systems of underground railways, besides electric tramways, extending to outlying suburbs and adjoining towns. Another means of transit is found in the magnificent fleet of river-steamers. The river Clyde (q.v.) has been a chief source of the great prosperity of Glasgow. Its utility has been almost created by the gigantic works of narrowing the channel and dredging, so as to permit of the passage of the largest vessels. The quayage of the harbour and docks from the Broomielaw extends to over 8 miles, and the water space covers over 200 acres, while since 1875 three graving-docks have been provided capable of accommodating the largest mercantile steamers afloat. On the river and harbour the Clyde Navigation Trust has spent about ten millions sterling. An average of about 12,000 vessels of 6,000,000 tons clear the port annually. The principal feature of the Clyde beyond the harbour is the great shipbuilding and marine engineering yards which line its sides, and which have flourished since the second quarter of the 19th century. The pioneers of these industries—the Napiers, Charles Randolph, John Elder, &c.—have a world-wide fame. They launched from their yards the most perfect examples of naval architecture and engineering skill of their day, and their present successors amply uphold that reputation. The greatest tonnage launched in any year on the Clyde was 767,000 in 1913; in 1903 there were (exclusive of war-vessels) 176 steamers and 46 sailing-vessels, of a gross tonnage of 363,306 tons, built. To the success of the little Comet, the earliest trading steamship in the Old World, which began to ply between Glasgow and Greenock in 1812, may be traced the great development of shipbuilding and shipping on the Clyde.

But another factor in the industrial prosperity of the city is the fact that it is built over a coalfield rich in seams of ironstone. It was in the neighbourhood of the city that the first experiments with Neilson's hot-blast in iron-furnaces, patented in 1828, were made, and the economy thereby effected developed the iron industry so rapidly in Glasgow as to distance for a long period all competition. Great forges, with powerful steam-hammers and other appliances, the making of steam-tubes, boiler-making, locomotive-engine building, sugar machinery, and general engineering are among the most important industrial features of the city.

Bleaching and calico-printing were established in Glasgow in 1738, nearly thirty years earlier than in Lancashire. The dyeing of Turkey-red was inaugurated in 1785 as a British industry by two Glasgow citizens, David Dale and George Macintosh; and this branch of trade has developed in Glasgow and the neighbourhood to an extent unequalled in any other manufacturing centre. In Glasgow, also, bleaching-powder (chloride of lime) was patented in 1799 by Charles Tennant, who thereby laid the foundation of the gigantic St Rollox chemical works, and gave the first impetus to chemical works generally. These, with the spinning and weaving industries, afford employment for a great proportion of the population.

See works by M'Ure (1736), Gibson (1779), Brown (1795–97), Cleland (1829), Macgeorge (3d ed. 1888), MacGregor (1881), Wallace (1882), Bell and Paton (1896); Innes and Robertson (1854) and Stewart (1891) on the university; for the cathedral, Eyre Todd (1898) and Macgregor Chalmers (1914).

Glasnevin, a ward (since 1900) of Dublin.

Glastonbury, an ancient municipal borough of Somerset, selected in 1913 as a 'British Bayreuth,' lies, engirt by the river Brue, amid orchards and level pastures—once fen-land—at the foot of the Tor (500 feet), crowned by the tower of the vanished St Michael's Chapel, 6 miles by rail SSW. of Wells. The Celtic Ynysvitrin, the Avalon of Arthurian legend, and the Glæstingaburh or Glæstings' borough of the West Saxons, it was hither, says William of Malmesbury, that Joseph of Arimathea came bearing the Holy Grail, here that he founded the first Christian church in Britain. On Weary-all Hill he planted his pilgrim's staff; it took root, and grew into the Holy Thorn, which blossomed miraculously every Old Christmas-eve until it was cut down by a Puritan. A wattled basilica, which contained the grave of a St Patrick and of Gildas, was in 630 encased by Paulinus of York in boards and lead; and to the east of it in 719 King Ine reared the great church of SS. Peter and Paul. This, spoiled by the Danes, was the abbey refounded by St Dunstan about 946, and became the sepulchre of Kings Edmund, Edgar, and Edmund Ironside, if not indeed of Dunstan himself, of Joseph of Arimathea, or of Arthur and Guinevere. It had just been rebuilt when in 1184 the whole pile was consumed by fire; and the splendid minster, 528 feet long, then undertaken by Henry II., was not dedicated till 1303. In 1539 Richard Whiting, the last abbot, was hanged on the Tor by Henry VIII.; and the ruins of this great Benedictine house, which had covered 60 acres, are now comparatively scanty. Yet still on the site of the 'Vetusta Ecclesia' stands the roofless chapel of Our Lady or St Joseph, a fine example of Transition Norman, with its 15th-century crypt; still there is the massive stone Abbot's Kitchen, 33½ feet square and 72 high, with its four huge fireplaces and pyramidal roof. Apart from its abbey and its two parish churches, one of which has a noble tower 140 feet high, Glastonbury is a quaint, old-world place, with the 15th-century Pilgrims' Inn (now the 'George'), the Tribunal, and the Abbot's Barn. Remains of several lake-villages have been discovered in the neighbourhood. Sharpham, 2 miles SW., was Fielding's birthplace. Sheepskins, mats, rugs, gloves, and pottery are manufactured. The population is a little over 4000.

Glasvein, a mountain (3006 feet) of Ross-shire, 5 miles ENE. of Invershiel.

Glatz (Czech Kladsko), a town of Prussian Silesia, between two fortified hills, on the Neisse, 58 miles by rail SSW. of Breslau. It manufactures linen, cigars, leather, &c. Pop. 20,000.

Glauchau (Glow-how), the second manufacturing town of Saxony, on the Mulde's right bank, 20 miles W. of Chemnitz by rail. It is the centre of the woollen-weaving industry, goods to the value of £2,000,000 being exported annually. There are also dyeworks, print-works, iron-foundries, and carpet, paper, and machine factories. Population, 25,000.

Gledstanes, EASTER, in Libberton parish, Lanarkshire, 5 miles NW. of Biggar, was the ancient seat of the Gledstane or Gladstone family.

Gleiwitz, a town of Prussian Silesia, 40 miles SE. of Oppeln. It has extensive iron, glass, paper, and wood manufactures. Pop. 67,000.

Glenalmond, a romantic valley of Perthshire, much visited for its scenery, and for Ossian's grave—the subject of Wordsworth's verses on the 'Narrow Glen.' It is the seat, 12 miles WNW. of Perth, of Trinity College, Glenalmond (1847), a public school of about 100 boys.

Glenarm, an Antrim seaport, on Glenarm Bay, 11 miles NW. of Larne. Pop. 1000.

Glencoe, a valley of northern Argyllshire, descending 7½ miles west-by-northward from a 'col,' 1011 feet high, to salt-water Loch Leven, 2 miles ENE. of Ballachulish. It is traversed by the Coe (or Cona of Ossian), and flanked by conical mountains, the Pap of Glencoe (2430 feet) the most prominent, Benveedan (3766) the loftiest. On 13th February 1692 it was the scene of the massacre, by 120 soldiers (Campbells mostly), of thirty-eight Macdonalds, others also perishing of cold and hunger.

Glencorse. See PENICUIK.

Glencroe, an Argyllshire glen descending 4½ miles south-eastward to Loch Long, 2½ miles SW. of Arrochar. At its head is a stone seat inscribed 'Rest and be thankful.'

Glendalough, a valley in Wicklow county, 15 miles SW. of Bray, which combines the attractions of fine scenery and remarkable ruins. It became a seat of religion with St Kevin in the 6th century; and some of the ruined 'seven churches,' as well as the round tower (110 feet high), may date from the 7th century.

Glenelg, a shallow river of Australia, rising in the Grampians in SW. Victoria, and flowing 281 miles to the Southern Ocean between Capes Northumberland and Bridgewater, at the boundary of South Australia and Victoria.

Glenfinnan, a glen in Inverness-shire, 18 miles W. of Fort-William. Here, on 19th August 1745, the clans gathered under Prince Charles Edward's banner, and here in 1815 a tower was built with an inscription in Gaelic, Latin, and English.

Glengariff, a village of County Cork, at the head of the island-dotted Glengariff Harbour, an inlet of Bantry Bay, and at the foot of a mountain glen, much frequented by tourists.

Glengarnock, an Ayrshire village, with ironworks, 3½ miles NNE. of Dalry. Pop. 3000.

Glengarry, (1) a glen of W. Inverness-shire, through which the Garry winds, 19 miles eastward, from Loch Quoich to Loch Oich, 8 miles SW. of Fort Augustus.—(2) A glen of NW. Perthshire, traversed by the Highland Railway. Its Garry falls into the Tummel.

Gleniffer, BRAES OF, a range of hills (749 feet), 3 miles SSW. of Paisley. They are celebrated by Tannahill.

Glenisla (Glen-ī'la), a Forfarshire parish, 9 miles N. by W. of Alyth.

Glenlivet (Glen-lē'vet), the valley in Banffshire of Livet Water, which runs 14 miles north-westward till, at a point 5 miles S. of Ballindalloch station, it falls after a total descent of 1600 feet into the Aven, itself an affluent of the Spey. Its population still is largely Catholic. Since 1824 its 200 whisky bothies have given place to one celebrated distillery. In the battle of Glenlivet or Alltacoileachan (4th October 1594), 10,000 Protestants under the Earl of Argyll were routed by the Catholic insurgents under the Earl of Huntly.

Glenluce', a Wigtownshire village, 15 miles WSW. of Newton-Stewart. Near it are the ruins of Glenluce Abbey (1190). Pop. 800.

Glenlyon, a Perthshire glen descending 24 miles ENE. to the Vale of Fortingall.

Glenmore-nan-Albin ('great glen of Scotland'), the Highland depression, 60 miles long, now traversed by the Caledonian Canal (q.v.).

Glenroy', a deep Inverness-shire glen, descending 14 miles south-westward to a point 13 miles NE. of Fort-William. Its three 'parallel roads' mark the shore-lines of former fresh-water lakes, which were dammed up by glacier ice, and gradually sank as the barrier melted away.

Glen's Falls, a town of New York, on the Hudson, 60 miles by rail N. of Albany, with sawmills and machine-shops, and a quarry of black marble. The river, which is crossed by a bridge, here falls about 50 feet, and is very picturesque. Pop. 15,000.

Glenshiel', a valley of Ross-shire, 58 miles SW. of Inverness. Here, on 11th June 1719, 1500 Jacobites and 274 Spaniards encountered 1600 Hanoverians. The fight was indecisive, but next day the Highlanders dispersed, and the Spaniards surrendered.

Glenties, a Donegal village, on the Owenea, 26 miles W. of Stranorlar.

Glentilt', in north Perthshire, the deep narrow glen of the troutful, impetuous Tilt, which issues from Loch Tilt (3 by 2 furlongs; 1650 feet), and runs 16 miles SW. to the Garry at Blair-Athole.

Glockner, or GROSS-GLOCKNER, the highest peak (12,458 feet) of the Noric Alps, on the boundary between Tyrol, Carinthia, and Salzburg.

Glogau, or GROSS-GLOGAU, a town and fortress in Prussian Silesia, on the Oder's left bank, 60 miles NNW. of Breslau by rail. It manufactures agricultural implements, pottery, tobacco, sugar, &c., and has a cartographical institute. Pop. about 25,000.

Glommen, or STOR-ELV (i.e. 'great river'), the largest river in Norway, issues from Lake Aursund, at 2339 feet above sea-level, and winds 350 miles southward to the Skager Rack at Frederikstad. Its course is interrupted by frequent waterfalls, the last, with a descent of 74 feet, being the Sarpsfos, 7 miles from the mouth.

Glossop, a market-town of Derbyshire, amid bleak but picturesque hills, 13 miles ESE. of Manchester, and 24 WNW. of Sheffield. It is the chief seat of the cotton manufacture in Derbyshire, and has also woollen and paper mills, dyeing, bleaching, and print works, and iron-foundries. Near it is Glossop Hall, the seat of Lord Howard of Glossop. The town was incorporated in 1866. Pop. 21,700.

Gloucester (Glos'ter), the capital of Gloucestershire, a parliamentary and county borough, is pleasantly situated on the left bank of the Severn, which here becomes tidal. It is 114 miles by rail (by road 106) WNW. of London, 38 NNE. of Bristol, and 55 SSW. of Birmingham. The Caergloui of the Britons, and Glevum of the Romans, whose cruciform ground-plan survives in the four main streets, Gleauanceastre or Gloucester was the seat successively of a nunnery (681), a monastery (821), and a great Benedictine abbey (1022). The last was suppressed in 1539; and its church two years later became the cathedral of the new see of Gloucester—a see conjoined with that of Bristol in 1836, but made independent again in 1897. Built between 1088 and 1498, and restored since 1853, the cathedral measures 420 feet by 144 across the transept, and though substantially Norman—crypt, chapter-house, and the interior of the nave are Norman—in general character is Perpendicular. Its pinnacled central tower (1457) rises 225 feet, and contains the 'Great Peter' bell, weighing 3 tons 2 cwt. Other noteworthy features are the lofty round piers of the nave, the east window (the largest in England —72 by 38 feet) with its splendid stained glass of 1350, the shrine of King Osric of Northumbria, the exquisite canopied shrine of Edward II., the statue of Jenner, and a group by Flaxman, the 'whispering gallery' in the triforium, and the matchless fan-vaulted cloisters (1351–1412). A new episcopal palace was built in 1862; the picturesque deanery is the old prior's lodge; and other buildings are the 12th-century West Gate, the New Inn (built about 1450 for pilgrims), the Tolsey or guildhall, the shire-hall (1816), the infirmary (1755), the county lunatic asylum (1823), the King's or College school, the Crypt grammar-school, the Blue-coat hospital, and a theological college. There is a cross (1863) to Hooper, and a statue (1880) of Raikes, the founder of Sunday schools; in the public park is a chalybeate spring, which was discovered in 1814. Gloucester's commerce is now more important than its manufactures—chemicals, soap, matches, railway plant, shipbuilding, &c. The Gloucester and Berkeley Canal, 17 miles long, and admitting vessels of 600 tons, was completed in 1827 at a cost of £500,000. The number of vessels entering the port has greatly increased during recent years; the imports include corn and timber, the exports agricultural produce and the minerals of the Forest of Dean. Gloucester returns one member. Pop. (county borough, as extended in 1900) 50,000; (parliamentary borough) 46,000. In the Great Rebellion (1643) Gloucester held out successfully against Charles I. till Essex relieved it. Among its natives have been (doubtfully) the chronicler Robert of Gloucester; Taylor, the water-poet; Whitefield, Raikes, Wheatstone, and W. E. Henley. See works by Rudder (1781), Britton (1829), F. Bond (1848), Waller (1856), Massé (1898); also Murray's Western Cathedrals.

Gloucester, a port of entry of Massachusetts, on the south side of Cape Ann peninsula, 28 miles NNE. of Boston. It has an excellent harbour, and the cod and mackerel fisheries employ several thousand men; but there are also a large trade in the granite quarried here, shipbuilding, and manufactures of anchors and railroad iron. Gloucester was incorporated as a town in 1642, and made a city in 1874. Pop. 24,400.

Gloucester City, a town of New Jersey, on the Delaware, opposite Philadelphia. It contains ironworks and cotton-factories. Pop. 10,000.

Gloucestershire, a west midland county of England, lying around the lower course and the estuary of the Severn, and bounded by the counties of Monmouth, Hereford, Worcester, Warwick, Oxford, Berks, Wilts, and Somerset. With a maximum length and breadth of 64 by 43 miles, and an area of 1258 sq. m., it offers a very irregular outline. There are three well-marked divisions, each with its natural characteristics—the Hill, the Vale, and the Forest. The first is formed by the Coteswold Hills (q.v.), whose highest point is Cleeve Hill (1134 feet); the second, comprising the Vales of Gloucester and Berkeley, by the low rich meadow-lands lying along the Severn; and the third, to the west of the Severn, by the Forest of Dean (q.v.). The principal rivers are the Severn, Wye, Upper and Lower Avon, and Thames, which receives all the waters east of the Coteswolds. Permanent pasture and corn-crops occupy more than two-thirds of the entire area. Gloucestershire is famous as a dairy country, and raises large numbers of cattle. The well-known double and single Glo'ster cheese is produced in the Vale of Berkeley. The orchards yield great quantities of cider; and woods and plantations cover 82 sq. m. Building-stone is plentiful; and there are two rich coalfields—that of Bristol in the SW., and the Forest of Dean in the W.; but the ironworks are of less importance than formerly. The woollen manufacture is of ancient standing. Gloucestershire since 1885 contains the parliamentary boroughs of Gloucester and Cheltenham, with part of Bristol, and five parliamentary divisions—Mid or Stroud, North or Tewkesbury, East or Cirencester, Forest of Dean, and South or Thornbury. Pop. (1801) 250,723; (1881) 572,433; (1891) 599,947; (1911) 736,097. See the 'Victoria History.'

Gloversville, a town of New York, 53 miles NW. of Albany. It manufactures buckskin and other gloves. Pop. 21,000.

Gluchov, a Russian town, 112 miles E. of Tchernigoff; pop. 20,000.

Glückstadt, a town in the Prussian province of Sleswick-Holstein, on the Elbe's right bank, 32 miles NW. of Hamburg. Founded in 1616 by Christian IV. of Denmark, it is a pretty town, regularly built, and intersected by canals, its chief building the Rathhaus (1642). Its harbour, much improved since 1880, remains open in winter, when the Elbe higher up is frozen. Pop. 7000.

Glukhov. See GLUCHOV.

Gmünd, a town of Würtemberg, in the fertile valley of the Rems, 30 miles E. of Stuttgart by rail. It manufactures jewels and hardware. Pop. about 20,000.

Gmunden (Ge-moon'den, g being hard), a town of Upper Austria, 159 miles W. of Vienna by rail. It lies 1439 feet above sea-level, amid the grandest scenery of the Salzkammergut, at the lower end of the Traunsee or Lake Gmunden (8 by 2 miles), above which towers the Traunstein (5536 feet). It is a favourite summer bathing-place. Near it are salt-mines. Pop. 8000.

Gnesen (Polish Gniezno), a Prussian town, situated in a region of hills and lakes, 31 miles ENE. of Posen by rail. It has a Catholic cathedral (965), till 1320 the coronation-place of the Polish kings. Pop. 25,000.

Goa, a Portuguese possession on the west coast of India, 250 miles SSE. of Bombay, with an area of 1469 sq. m., and a population of 475,500. A hilly country, bounded on the east by the Western Gháts, the territory is watered by numerous rivers. Half the land under cultivation, which embraces a third of the entire area, is devoted to rice; stately forests cover nearly a fourth of the remainder. Captured by Albuquerque in 1510, 'Golden Goa' reached by the end of the century a high pitch of military and ecclesiastical splendour and commercial prosperity. The decline of the Portuguese power quickly followed the appearance of the Dutch, and in 1759 the city of Old Goa, once the chief emporium of trade between the east and west, was deserted by all but its ecclesiastical inhabitants, and left to the decay in which it has since lain. Its former pop. of 200,000 has sunk to less than 1900; its arsenal, its palaces, its quays, even many of its churches are in ruins, their sites covered with coconut plantations, and the streets overrun with grass. Among the edifices that survive are the majestic archiepiscopal cathedral, and the splendid church of Bom Jesus, containing the magnificent tomb of St Francis Xavier.—The new capital is Nova Goa or Panjim, nearer the sea, on the Mandavi, 3 miles from its mouth. It presents a picturesque appearance; its streets are wide and clean; and new harbour and railway works were inaugurated on 31st October 1882. The public buildings include the viceregal palace and spacious barracks, one wing of which accommodates the national lyceum, the public library, and a college for practical sciences. Pop. 10,000. See works by Fonseca (1878) and Lady Burton (1879).

Goalanda, a town of Bengal, on a tongue of land at the confluence of the Ganges and Brahmaputra, is an important entrepôt for trade by river and railway, and the starting-point of the Assam steamers; pop. 10,000.

Goalpara, a town of Assam, on the Brahmaputra. Pop. 6700.

Goatfell, the highest point (2866 feet) of Arran, 3¼ miles NNW. of Brodick.

Gobi, DESERT OF. See ASIA.

God'alming, a borough of Surrey, 34 miles SW. of London. Hither in 1872 was removed from London the Charterhouse public school, founded in 1611 by Thomas Sutton on the site of a Chartreuse or Carthusian monastery. Among its scholars have been Addison, Steele, Wesley, Thackeray, Leech, Thirlwall, Eastlake, and Helps. The new school forms a quadrangle, with a gatehouse tower 130 feet high, and a chapel rich in stained glass. Pop. 9000. See works by Dr Haig Brown (1879) and Eardley-Wilmot (1894).

Goda'vari, the largest river of the Deccan, rises within 50 miles of the Indian Ocean, and flows 898 miles south-east across the peninsula to the Bay of Bengal, entering it by seven mouths. Where by a rocky gorge the river bursts through the barrier of the Eastern Gháts, its picturesque scenery has earned for it the name of the Indian Rhine. The magnificent anicut or dam at the head of the delta throws off three main irrigating canals which turn the entire delta into a great garden. The upper navigation is impeded by three impassable rocky barriers or rapids within a space of 150 miles; the works undertaken in 1861 to get rid of them were abandoned ten years later. The Godavari is one of the twelve sacred rivers of India, and the great bathing festival, called Pushkaram, is held on its banks once in twelve years.

Goderich (God'er-itch), a port of entry of Ontario, on Lake Huron, 160 miles WNW. of Buffalo by rail, with a good harbour, factories and mills, and eight salt-wells; pop. 4500.

Goderich Castle. See GOODRICH.

Godesberg, a village of Rhenish Prussia, on the Rhine, 4 miles S. of Bonn. It has a mineral spring and a ruined castle (1213). Pop. 10,000.

Godmanchester (Gum'sester). See HUNTINGDON.

Gödöllö, a town of Hungary, 15 miles NE. of Budapest, with a castle and park presented by the Hungarians in 1867 to the emperor-king of Austria-Hungary; pop. 6000.

Godolphin, a Cornish manor, 5½ miles NW. of Helston. It was the seat of the Godolphins from the Conquest until 1785.

Godthaab. See GREENLAND.

Godwin-Austen, or K2 (28,250 feet), the second peak in the world, is in the Himalayan system, in the western range that is crossed in the east by the Karakorum Pass. It was named in 1888 after Lieut.-colonel Godwin-Austen of the Trigonometrical Survey of India, and climbed in 1909 to 24,600 feet by the Duke of the Abruzzi.

Goes (Hoos), or TER GOES, a Dutch town in South Beveland, 16 miles NE. of Flushing; pop. 8000.

Gogmagog Hills, a range of hillocks, 4 miles SE. of Cambridge.

Gogo, a decayed seaport of India, in the peninsula of Kathiawar, and on the Gulf of Cambay, 193 miles NW. of Bombay. Pop. 10,000.

Gogra, or GHAGRA, a river flowing 600 miles SE. to the Ganges at Chapra.

Godstow, a ruined nunnery (1138) with Fair Rosamond's grave, on the Isis, 3½ miles NNW. of Oxford.

Gohelwar', or GOHELWAD, a tract of country in Bombay presidency, comprising several tributary states, and lying along the Gulf of Cambay, on the eastern coast of the peninsula of Kathiawar.

Goil, LOCH, a picturesque loch in Argyllshire, a branch of Loch Long, is 6 miles long and less than 1 mile broad. The mountains in the neighbourhood rise to the height of more than 2000 feet.—LOCHGOILHEAD, 20 miles NNW. of Greenock, is a favourite summer watering-place.

Gol'chika, a small port at the mouth of the Yenisei (q.v.).

Golconda, an extensive fortress of the Nizam, situated on a granite ridge, 7 miles W. of Hyderabad. In its neighbourhood are the ruins of an ancient city, till 1687 the metropolis of a powerful kingdom. Golconda is proverbially famous for its diamonds; but, in truth, they were merely cut and polished here.

Goldau, formerly a small town of the Swiss canton of Schwyz, is memorable for its destruction by a stupendous landslip, 2d September 1806.

Goldberg, a town of Prussian Silesia, on the Katzbach, 13 miles by rail WSW. of Liegnitz. It owes both origin and name to its former rich gold-mines. Pop. 10,000.

Gold Coast, a British crown colony and protectorate on the Gulf of Guinea, with a coast-line of about 350 miles, is bounded east by German Togoland, west by the French Ivory Coast, and north by the French Soudan. The area, including Adansi and Ashanti, is about 74,000 sq. miles, with a pop. of 1,500,000 (1700 Europeans). The chief towns are Accra (20,000), Cape Coast Castle (11,400), Elmina, Kwitta, Saltpond, Winneba, Axim, and Akuse. Ashanti came under British protection in 1896, and in 1901, with the Northern Territories, was definitely annexed. The principal exports are palm kernels and oil, india-rubber, gold-dust, ivory, and monkey-skins; but coconuts, copra, coffee, Calabar beans, corn, groundnuts, Guinea grains, ginger, cam-wood, gum-copal, tobacco, and porcupine-quills are also produced. The climate on the low and swampy coast is very unhealthy, but is better inland. A railway from Sekondi on the coast to Kumasi, or Coomassie (pop. 9000), the chief town of Ashanti, was opened in 1903. Another is being made from Accra inland. See Ellis, History of the Gold Coast (1893); Macdonald, Gold Coast Past and Present (1898); and Lucas, British Colonies, vol. iii. (1895).

Golden Gate, a channel 2 miles wide, the entrance to the magnificent Bay of San Francisco.

Golden Horn. See CONSTANTINOPLE.

Gold Hill, a town of Nevada, 7000 feet above the sea, and 1 mile S. of Virginia City, with rich silver-mines, and quartz-mills. Here, on Mount Davidson, is the famous Comstock Lode.

Goletta (Fr. La Goulette), the former port of Tunis, from which it is 11 miles N. by rail. It has lost much of its importance since the opening in 1893 of the ship-channel from it across the lagoon to the capital. Pop. 4000.

Göllnitz, or GÖLLNICZBANYA, a town of Hungary, 17 miles SW. of Eperies. It has iron and copper mines, and ironworks. Pop. 4000.

Gollnow, a town of Prussia, in Pomerania, 15 miles NE. of Stettin; pop. 10,000.

Golspie, a Sutherland coast-village, 84 miles by rail N. by E. of Inverness; pop. 1000.

Gombroon', or BENDER ABBAS, a seaport of Persia, on the Strait and the island of Ormuz. It owes its name Bender Abbas to Shah Abbás, who, assisted by the English, drove the Portuguese in 1622 from Ormuz, ruined that seaport, and transferred its commerce to Gombroon. For a while the new town prospered; but at present it is a wretched place. Pop. 8000.

Gome'ra, one of the Canary Islands (q.v.).

Gom'etra, an Argyllshire island, measuring 2 miles by 1, W. of Ulva.

Gomorrah. See SODOM AND GOMORRAH.

Gomul. See ZHOB.

Gonaïves, a seaport of Hayti, on the W. coast, 65 miles NNW. of Port au Prince. Pop. 13,000.

Gondar, capital of Amhara in Abyssinia, is situated on a basaltic hill 23 miles N. of Lake Tzana. It was formerly the capital of Abyssinia, with 50,000 inhabitants; now barely 4000, though there are still some forty churches.

Gondo'koro, a trading-post (for ivory, &c.) in the Northern Province of Uganda, on the Upper Nile, in about 4° 54′ N. lat. To put down the slave-trade Baker established a strong military station here in 1871; later Gordon removed the station to Lado, 6 miles lower down the Nile.

Good Hope. See Cape of Good Hope.

Goodrich Castle, a stately ruin in Herefordshire, on the Wye, 4 miles SSW. of Ross. Goodrich Court is the seat of the Meyricks.

Goodwin Sands, famous sandbanks stretching 10 miles NE. and SW. at an average distance of 5½ miles from the east coast of Kent. Large level patches of sand are left dry when the tide recedes, and afford a firm foothold, so that cricket has often been played upon them. When covered the sands are shifting, and may be moved by the prevailing tide to such an extent as to considerably change the form of the shoal; still, the general outline has been fairly constant. The shoal is divided into the North and the South Goodwin, between which is the deep anchorage named Trinity Bay. These sands, which are marked by four lightships, have always been dangerous to vessels passing through the Strait of Dover. They serve as a breakwater to form a secure anchorage in the Downs (q.v.) when easterly or south-easterly winds are blowing; but when the wind blows strongly off-shore, ships are apt to drag their anchors, and to strand upon the perfidious Goodwins. Many wrecks have taken place here, the most terrible the loss of an entire fleet of thirteen men-of-war, during the 'great storm' on the night of 26th November 1703. These dangerous sands are said to have once been a low fertile island called Lomea (Infera Insula of the Romans), belonging to Earl Godwin; but in 1014, and again in 1099, it was overwhelmed by a sudden inundation of the sea. The tale is that at the period of the Conquest these estates were taken from Earl Godwin's son, and bestowed upon the abbey of St Augustine at Canterbury. The abbot having diverted the funds with which the sea-wall should have been maintained to the building of Tenterden (q.v.) steeple, in 1099 the waves rushed in; and thus 'Tenterden steeple was the cause of the Goodwin Sands.' But geology indicates a date long anterior. See Gattie, Memorials of the Goodwin Sands (1889).

Goodwood, the seat of the Duke of Richmond, 3½ miles NE. of Chichester. An 18th-century building by Chambers and Wyatt, it has a notable collection of portraits; and its park is famous for its cedars and other trees, which in 1754 included thirty different kinds of oaks and 400 different American trees and shrubs. Here is the picturesque racecourse, where the famous Goodwood meeting is held at the end of July, at the close of the London season. It was established in 1802; but its importance (since 1825) was due to Lord George Bentinck.

Goole, a town and river-port in the West Riding of Yorkshire, at the junction of the Ouse with the Don, 22 miles SSE. of York. It has grown rapidly since 1829, and now ranks amongst the chief ports of the kingdom, its extensive docks being annually entered and cleared by some 4600 vessels of over 1,100,000 tons burden. The annual value of the imports amounts to about 4¼ millions sterling, of the exports to more than 4¾ millions. Amongst the imports are shoddy for manufacturing purposes, oil, logwood, timber, champagne, farm-produce, and groceries. Coal, cloth, and machinery are amongst the chief exports. There are iron-foundries, alum, sugar, and cordage manufactories, ship and boat building yards, and establishments for sail-making and agricultural machine-making. Population, 20,000.

Göppingen, a town of Würtemberg, 26 miles by rail ESE. of Stuttgart, has a 16th-century castle, a mineral spring, and manufactures of woollens, paper, toys, &c.; pop. 22,400.

Gorakhpur, a town in the United Provinces of India, on the Rapti, 430 miles NW. of Calcutta; pop. 65,000.

Gordon Bennett, Mount, an African mountain seen by Stanley in 1875. It lies S. of Albert Nyanza, a little N. of the equator and E. of 30° E. long. Sometimes snow-covered, it is a truncated cone, probably an extinct crater, and rises 14,000 or 15,000 feet. See Ruwenzori.

Gordon Castle. See Fochabers.

Gorée, a small island of French Senegal, S. of Cape Verde, is almost entirely covered by the town of Gorée (pop. 1000), whose commerce has been transferred to Dakar on the mainland.

Gorey, a municipal borough of County Wexford, 59 miles S. of Dublin by rail, and 3 from St George's Channel; pop. 2300.

Gorgonzo'la, a village of Italy, 12 miles NE. of Milan, with a fine church and trade in a special kind of cheese; pop. 5000.

Gorkum (Dutch Gorinchem), a fortified town of South Holland, on the Merwede, 22 miles ESE. of Rotterdam, possesses an arsenal; pop. 12,000.

Gorleston, a Suffolk suburb of Yarmouth.

Görlitz, a town of Prussian Silesia, on the left bank of the Neisse, 49 miles W. of Liegnitz. One of its old mural towers, the Kaisertrutz, is now the guard-house and armoury. Among the beautiful Gothic churches is that of SS. Peter and Paul (1423–97), with five naves. There are monuments of Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia (1891) and the Emperor William (1893); and outside the town is the Kreuzkapelle (1489), an imitation of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. A railway viaduct, 2720 feet long and 118 high, here crosses the Neisse's valley. Görlitz has manufactures of cloth, which is its staple, cotton, linen, and fictile wares, with iron-foundries and machine-shops. Here Jacob Boehme lived and died. Population, 86,000.

Gorton, a south-eastern suburb of Manchester.

Görz (Girts), capital of the Austrian province of Görz-Gradisca, in the Küstenland, in a fruitful plain, 35 miles NNW. of Trieste by rail. Shut in by mountains on all sides except the south, it enjoys an almost Italian climate, and has some fame as a health-resort. Among its principal buildings are the old castle and the former Jesuit college, both now used as barracks; the cathedral; and the prince-bishop's palace. Görz's specialty has long been the printing of Hebrew books for the East. There are dyeworks, and important manufactures of flour, sugar, cotton, silks, rosoglio, paper, leather, soap, and matches. In a Franciscan cloister close by are the graves of Charles X. of France, the Duc d'Angoulême and his wife, and the Comte de Chambord. Pop. 31,000.

Gosford, the seat of the Earl of Wemyss, 6 miles NW. of Haddington.

Goshen, that part of ancient Egypt which Pharaoh presented to Joseph's kindred, appears to have lain between the eastern delta of the Nile and the Isthmus of Suez, as far south as the modern Ismailia.—Goshen was the name given to a part of Bechuanaland, South Africa (now British), which in 1884 was the seat of a mushroom Boer republic.

Goshen, the capital of Elkhart county, Indiana, on the Elkhart River, 111 miles E. by S. of Chicago. Pop. 10,000.

Goslar, an ancient town of Hanover, on the north slope of the Harz Mountains, 27 miles SE. of Hildesheim. At one time a free imperial city, and the residence of the emperors, it has the 'Zwinger' tower, with walls 23 feet thick; the emperor's house (1050), the town-house (1136–84), and the Kaiserworth, an old building containing statues of eight emperors. Goslar was founded by Henry I. in 920. About 1350 it joined the Hanseatic League. It suffered severely in the Thirty Years' War. Here were born the Emperor Henry IV. and Maurice of Saxony. Pop. 20,000.

Gospic, a town of Croatia, Austria-Hungary, 14 miles from the Adriatic. Pop. 11,000.

Gosport ('God's port'), a seaport of Hants, on the west shore of Portsmouth harbour, directly opposite Portsmouth, with which it is connected by a floating bridge. Here are an iron-foundry for making anchors and chain-cables, naval powder-magazines, barracks, the Clarence victualling-yard, and Haslar Naval Hospital (1746). Pop. (1851) 7414; (1911, with Alverstoke) 33,300.

Gosselies, a manufacturing town of Hainaut, Belgium, 4 miles N. of Charleroi. Pop. 10,050.

Gotha (Go'ta), a town of Germany, alternately with Coburg the capital of the duchy of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, stands 31 miles W. by S. of Weimar, on the northern outskirt of the Thuringian Forest. The castle of Friedenstein, rebuilt in 1648 on a rock 78 feet above the town, contains a library of 200,000 volumes and 6000 MSS. The new museum (1878), in the Renaissance style, includes the picture-gallery, a natural history collection, &c. A new observatory was built in 1874. Gotha is an active industrial town, the principal manufactures being shoes, fire-engine pipes, sugar, toys, and sausages. Many designers, engravers, printers, and map-colourers are employed in the large geographical establishment of Perthes, which also publishes the Almanach de Gotha. Population, 40,000. See SAXE-COBURG-GOTHA.

Gotham, a Nottinghamshire village, 7 miles SSW. of Nottingham, whose inhabitants from at least Henry VI.'s time were reputed to be fools.

Gothard. See ST GOTHARD.

Gothenburg (usually pron. Gotenburg; Swed. Göteborg), next to Stockholm the most important town of Sweden, stands at the mouth of the Göta, 284 miles by rail SW. of Stockholm. Although originally founded by Gustavus Adolphus in 1618–21, the town, in consequence of numerous fires, is quite modern—regularly built and clean, with several canals, crossed by numerous bridges, and an excellent harbour seldom obstructed by ice. The few buildings which deserve special mention are the exchange, cathedral, town-hall, museum (art, zoology, industry), and a fine garden belonging to the Horticultural Society. The industries embrace shipbuilding, iron-working, sugar-refining, the brewing of porter, and herring-fishing. During the Continental blockade of 1806, Gothenburg became the chief British depot in northern Europe. The town has given its name to the much-debated Gothenburg Licensing System, which originated here in 1865. All the wine and spirit shops are kept by a company licensed by the town authorities, and are conducted by salaried managers; all profits remaining after the company has been allowed 5 per cent. on its capital go into the town treasury. Pop. (1877) 71,707; (1890) 104,657; (1910) 167,813.

Gothland (Swed. Götaland and Götarike), the southernmost of the three old provinces of Sweden, with an area of 35,803 sq. m. and a pop. of 3,000,000.—(2) A Swedish island (Swed. Gottland) in the Baltic, 44 miles E. from the mainland, constitutes with Farö, Gotska Sandö, and other smaller islands the province of Gottland or Wisby. Area, 1217 sq. m. The island consists mainly of terrace-like slopes of limestone, encircled on the west by cliffs broken by numerous deep fjords. Next to agriculture, the chief occupations of the inhabitants, 55,074 in 1892, are shipping, fishing, seal-fishing, fowling, and lime-burning. In the middle ages, and till 1645, the island belonged to the German Hanseatic League. The capital is Wisby.

Göttingen (Göt'ting-en), a town in the former kingdom of Hanover, lies 538 feet above sea-level in the Leine's wide valley, encircled by gentle hills—the highest, the Hainberg (1246 feet). By rail it is 67 miles S. of Hanover, and 36 NE. of Cassel. The ramparts, long since outgrown, and now planted with lindens, form a charming promenade; but architecturally Göttingen has nothing much to boast of—a quaint rathhaus, a statue of William IV., and a few antique buildings, one of which, the Jacobikirche, has a steeple 320 feet high. The celebrated university was founded 1734–37 by Baron Münchhausen, under the auspices of George II., Elector of Hanover and king of England, and now has 160 professors and more than 2300 students. Connected with it are the library (500,000 vols. and 7000 MSS.), museum, botanic garden, observatory, laboratory, hospital, &c., as also the Royal Society (1750). Coleridge, Beddoes, Pusey, Lever, Longfellow, Motley, Ticknor, and Bancroft studied at Göttingen, whose native alumni include many of Germany's most famous sons, among them Prince Bismarck, in whose honour a tower was built in 1894. The 'Göttinger Dichterbund' was a small poet band (Voss, the two Stolbergs, Klopstock, Bürger, &c.); by the 'Göttinger Sieben' are meant the seven professors (Albrecht, Dahlmann, Ewald, Gervinus, the two Grimms, and Weber) who for their liberal tendencies were in 1837 expelled by King Ernest Augustus. The book-trade is of more importance than the manufactures—woollens, sugar, chemicals, &c. Pop. (1875) 17,057; (1890) 23,689; (1910) 37,594.

Gouda (Dutch pron. Hou'da), or TER GOUWE, a town of South Holland, on the right bank of the Hollaendsche Yssel, 13 miles by rail NE. of Rotterdam. The church of St John has seventy-five magnificent stained-glass windows, which were executed between 1560 and 1603 by the brothers Crabeth. The organ, too, has a fine vox humana stop.
